beyond the average carelessness of men in his employment? The evidence on the part of the plaintiff on that subject is evidence of reputation. You can see, probably, the difficulties that present themselves to both sides on a question of this kind when you have in consideration the question of a man's character for any purpose, and require that character to be proven from the witness stand. As I have stated, it is not the fact that he may have been negligent at one time, or twice; it is not a question of whether he had accidents happen to the car which he was operating, because then the question arises as to whether such accidents were due to his negligence or whether they were not. And so it is not absolutely determined by the question as to eral reputation for incompetency, among those acquainted with his work, is admissible as tending to show the master's notice of the incompetency, although his reputation among a particular class, which includes but a part of those who know his character or work, is inadmissible for this purpose. Moering v. Falk Co. 141 Wis. 294, 124 N. W. 402, 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 926.

In an action against a pawnbroker by a pledgee, to recover the value of certain pledged property carried away by the defendant's absconding manager, through the alleged negligence of the defendant in keeping as manager a man unfitted for the trust, evidence as to the reputation of the manager is admissible, after proof of his unfitness, to show that the defendant might or ought to have known the reputed facts. Carson v. Canning, 180 Mass. 461, 62 N. E. 964.

So, evidence that the general reputation of a coach carpenter employed by a railroad, among his fellow workmen, for competency and care, was bad, is admissible on the issue as to whether or not the company exercised ordinary care to discover his incompetency. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Jackson, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 619, 62 S. W. 91.

And evidence that a servant's general reputation was that of a careless engineer is proper as tending to prove that the master knew, or by the exercise of due care would have known, that he was habitually careless, and thus incompetent. Stoll v. Daly Min. Co. 19 Utah, 271, 57 Pac. 295.

In Kansas City Consolidated Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Taylor, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 605, 107 S. W. 889, it was held that evidence of an incompetent servant's general reputation is admissible to show, in connection with other evidence, that the master had notice of his incompetency, and was negligent in retaining him in its employ.

And in Morrow v. St. Paul City R. Co. 71 Minn. 326, 73 N. W. 973, later appeal, 74 Minn. 480, 77 N. W. 303, evidence tending to show that a servant's general reputation was that he was incompetent, together with other evidence, was held to be sufficient to go to the jury on the question of the defendant's knowledge of the servant's incompetency.

But in Pittsburgh R. Co. v. Thomas, 98 C. C. A. 437, 174 Fed. 591, it was held that testimony that a motorman has a bad reputation for competency among the conductors and motormen who daily congregate, to the number of thirty or forty, in the car barn, and who are best able to form an opinion in regard to it, is not conclusive, and should be of such a character as to satisfy the jury that it should have come to the knowledge of the company.

And testimony of witnesses not acquainted with the general reputation of a railway engineer, as to his reputation among conductors and brakemen, excluding from consideration the engineers and others acquainted with him and his service, is inadmissible to show that his reputation for incompetence is so notorious that the officers of the railway company, whose duty it was to hire and discharge the servants, would have been aware of it if they had exercised reasonable diligence. Southern P. Co. v. Hetzer, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 288, 68 C. C. A. 26, 135 Fed. 272.

In New York, it has been held that the knowledge of a master of the incompetence of a servant may not be shown by testimony as to mere general reputation, although it may be shown by evidence tending to establish that such incompetency was generally known in the community,—that is, by testimony that knowledge of the specific acts evidencing his incompetency was general in the community. McCarty v. Ritch, 59 App. Div. 145, 69 N. Y. Supp. 129. The court said: "Reputation general in the community for incompetency, based upon acts or reputed acts of ignorance or carelessness, is one thing; the mere gossip or speech of people, that may have no foundation upon acts even alleged, is another."

what a man's reputation is, because a man may have a reputation which he does not deserve. The question for your determination is: Was he so reckless in the discharge of his duties as to render him unfit to be kept in that position? Nor, did he have such a reputation? That is not the first question here. But, has the evidence of reputation satisfied you, or can you find from the evidence of reputation, that he was in fact unfit for this position by reason of his negligent habit? If you find that in the negative, that is, if you find that the evidence does not justify your finding that he was of such negligent habits as to render him unfit to be placed in this position, then your verdict should be for the defendant. If, however, you find that he was unfit to be placed in the position as a motorman in charge of a car, then the next question for your consideration is: Was the fact that he was incompetent known to this company? Or was his incompetency such, did it so manifest itself, that the company should have known it had they exercised the ordinary care which an employer is bound to exercise in the supervision of its employees? We have evidence on the part of the plaintiff of his reputation, which also goes to the question as to whether his character was known to his employers or should have been known. We have evidence of one witness, I believe, that complaint had been made to the division superintendent, or possibly not a complaint, but that a statement of this man's character had been made to a division superintendent, and that statements of the fact had been made to dispatchers. There is no evidence that any statement was made to any person who had the power to discharge Staley; but there is evidence that reports of this kind, under the rules of the company, should be made to the division superintendent. Now, in passing upon this question, if you come to that, as to whether or not Staley's character for care was known or should have been known to his employer, you consider evidence of his reputation, and the evidence of the information given to the different persons in the employ of the defendant company. If you find that he was incompetent, but that that fact was not known to his employer, and by the exercise of reasonable care could not have been known to his employer, then your verdict should be for the defendant. But if you find . . . that Staley was incompetent, and that his incompetency was known to his employer, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

Messrs. Clarence Burleigh and William A. Challoner, for appellant:

The defendant exercised ordinary care and skill in the hiring of Staley.

Proof of reputation is good evidence only when it relates to the character of the person prior to the employment, and such evidence is not admissible when the alleged incompetency of the employee arises after his lawful employment; as to the latter, proof of actual incompetency must be made.

Mr. Ralph P. Tannehill for appellee.

Moschzisker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Crawford B. Rosenstiel, a lineman in the employ of the defendant company, was killed on November 10, 1905, while engaged at work on the repair of an overhead trolley wire. His death was due to the act of Joseph Staley, a motorman in the employ of the same company, who ran his car into the ladder upon which Rosenstiel was standing. The plaintiff, the decedent's widow, recovered a verdict, and the defendant has appealed. The statement of claim avers the facts as we have given them, with certain details surrounding the accident, that Staley was a reckless, careless, and incompetent employee, and that this was known, or should have been known, to the defendant, had it made a reasonable and proper investigation. The issues on the negligence of Staley and the contributory negligence of the decedent were properly submitted to the jury, and the only questions raised by the assignments of error go the issues concerning the alleged incompetency of Staley, and notice of that fact to the defendant. In this relation the appellant attacks certain rulings on the evidence and the charge of the trial judge, contending that the evidence was incompetent, and insufficient; that it should not have been submitted to the jury; and that the court should have given binding instructions for the defendant.

Without quoting in extenso from the testimony, there was evidence to show that Staley had been employed by the defendant from 1902 until the time of the accident; that during this period his reputation for care, skill, and competency as a motorman was "bad," and that of "one who was continually running reckless at places where he should not;" that he was "very reckless," "a careless and reckless motorman," "a wild, careless sort of a fellow." One who had had worked with him stated that "he was a reckless runner." Another, "He was sort of reckless." Mr. Harget, a witness, who had been superintendent of construction on a branch of the defendant company's road between 1902 and 1904, testified that he had held a conversation with a Mr. Lawton, who was the superintendent of the division upon which Staley was then employed; that, "in a discussion of the employees in general," Mr. Lawton mentioned Staley, and the witness then said that he had been a passenger on Staley's car upon several occasions; that he had observed his actions and thought Staley "very reckless;" that Lawton replied, "I know what you tell me is true, and eventually he will have trouble." The occasion for, or the object of, this conversation does not appear. There was testimony also of a statement or complaint made to a Mr. Fitch, one of the despatchers of the defendant, concerning Staley on a particular occasion when his car ran off the track. This Mr. Fitch was the only witness produced by the defendant. He testified that he had been with the company since 1902; that he had worked himself up from motorman to division superintendent; that he had known Staley for some years; that he had seen him operating his car frequently between 1902 and 1905; that "Mr. Staley was a good, competent motorman;" that he did not remember that the alleged complaint had been made to him. Speaking in reference to the operation of the cars, he further testified that "the proper person was the division superintendent to make complaints to," and that "complaints of the character of which you were speaking should go properly to the division superintendent."

The issues concerning Staley's incompetency, and the defendant's knowledge of that fact, were submitted upon this testimony. The trial judge instructed the jury that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish "that Staley was an incompetent motorman, because of his reckless and careless habits; that the fact that he was incompetent to occupy the position which he did was known, or under the circumstances should have been known, if reasonable, ordinary care had been exercised, by the defendant corporation." This was followed by explicit instructions upon the several points in the case, and the law in relation thereto, as appears by the abstract from the charge printed in the reporter's notes preceding this opinion.

While we find no reversible error in the statements of law contained in the charge, the point is: Was there any evidence to justify a submission of the issues in question? Counsel for the appellant argues that there was not; that the plaintiff had not produced anything more than proof of reputation; "that under our authorities proof of reputation is good evidence only when it relates to the character of the person prior to the employment; and that such evidence is not admissible when the alleged incompetency of the employee arises after his lawful employment; as to the latter, proof of actual incompetency must be made." He further argues that the evidence offered by the plaintiff was faulty in that it did not tend to prove a bad reputation for the particular kind of negligence which caused the injury in this case. We must consider the soundness of these propositions.

The leading case in Pennsylvania upon the subject of the evidence required to show the incompetency of a fellow servant is Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467. There the action was by a brakeman to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of a conductor. The declaration averred that the defendant had, on ("the day on which the collision happened), carelessly and wrongfully put the said train under the conduct and charge of one Henry Shaeffer, in the capacity of conductor, etc.; that said Henry Shaeffer was at the time a 'reckless, untrustworthy, careless, and negligent man, and not skilled in the duties which appertained to the office or station of conductor of a train;' . . . that said company, at and before that time, well knew that Shaeffer was a . . . careless, . . . man; . . . [or] that the defendants might by proper care have known the character of the conductor." At the trial the plaintiff proved that Shaeffer "had had several collisions on the road before, for which he was fined by the company, and that the agents, etc., of the company, knew this; that the former collisions were caused by his carelessness." The report further shows that the defendants objected to this testimony on the ground that "previous acts of negligence are not matter for the jury as to general character." In reversing the judgment, Mr. Chief Justice Lowrie said: "The fundamental averment here is that it was because of the carelessness of the conductor that the brakeman was injured, and, in order to show that the company was responsible for this, it is averred that they were in fault in knowingly or negligently employing a careless conductor. . . . The question of character thus became an important one, and we are constrained to say that it was tried on improper evidence. Character for care, skill, and truth, of witnesses, parties, or others, must all alike be proved by evidence of general reputation, and not of special acts. The reasons for this have been so often given that we need not repeat them. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 461-469; Elliott v. Boyles, 31 Pa. 67." From the report of this case, it is evident that the negligence averred was not the employment of an incompetent conductor, but the retention of the conductor after his incompetency had arisen. This is clearly demonstrated when we consider the pleadings and the fact that the very testimony, the admission of which caused the reversal, was of particular prior acts of negligence committed by the conductor while he was in the employ of the defendant company. When the writer of that opinion used the word "employing," he evidently meant it in the sense of "keeping in employ," and, where he subsequently used the word "employ," it was in the sense of "have in its employ." Therefore, at the very outset, we meet with this case, which is squarely against the contention of the appellant.

A study of the other cases submitted by counsel for the appellant, and of those disclosed by our own research, fails to convince us that this court has modified or departed from the rule laid down in the Frazier Case. At first blush, Huntingdon & B. T. M. R. & Coal Co. v. Decker, 82 Pa. 119, would seem at variance with that case; but consideration will show this not to be the fact. The offer there was to show that the conductor, whose competency was at issue, was "of intemperate habits; that he had been repeatedly discharged by McKillips [the superintendent] for disobedience of orders and drunkenness." In sustaining the admission of this testimony, we said: "It was clearly competent to prove Bowser's [the conductor's] accustomed disobedience of orders and his habitual drunkenness; that these facts were known to the superintendent, who had the entire control and management of the road, including the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

right to employ and discharge conductors." Proof of the disobedience of an order differs from proof of a special act of negligence. The former would usually present a single issue; whereas, the latter, to be of any real value, would practically mean the trial of another negligence case; and, if more than one special act were alleged, it would mean the trial of as many negligence cases as there might be specific acts of negligence involved. In addition, in the case under review, the element of habitual drunkenness was coupled with the disobedience of the orders, and we have expressly ruled: "If by direct evidence it appeared that the conductor was a man of intemperate habits, it would cast upon the defendants the burden of proving that he was not intoxicated at the time. . . . Where a habit of intoxication in a conductor is shown, it raises, in the case of an accident, a presumption of negligence." Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Books, 57 Pa. 339, 98 Am. Dec. 229.

The case of Snodgrass v. Carnegie Steel Co. 173 Pa. 228, 33 Atl. 1104, relied upon by the appellant, is not at variance with the Frazier Case. In the first place, Mr. Justice Green starts his opinion by quoting the rule laid down in the Frazier Case, after which he says: "In order that the plaintiff might recover against this defendant, he was bound to show by affirmative testimony: . . . (2) That Snyder was an incompetent servant for the duty he had to perform; and (3) that the fact of his incompetency was known to the defendant when he was employed, by means of his having a reputation for incompetency, or by acquiring a knowledge of it during his employment and before the accident." There is nothing in this which rules that incompetency arising after employment, or the knowledge of such incompetency, could not be proven by evidence of general reputation. Then, too, the opinion in that case expressly states that there was no proof that Snyder had the reputation of being incompetent. "Not a word of testimony was given or offered on this most vital subject. Not a witness testified that he had such a reputation."

The appellant calls our attention to the case of Stasch v. Cornwall Ore Bank Co., 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 113, concerning which it is sufficient to say that the case relies upon those we have already cited, and there is no ruling in it at variance with our decisions. The latest Pennsylvania case upon the subject is Zeigler v. Simplex Foundation Co. 228 Pa. 64, 77 Atl. 239, which is in accord with our other cases.

When we look at the cases cited from other jurisdictions, there seems to be a divergence of view in the different states.

The law of New York is that incompetency cannot be shown by general reputation, but must be shown by specific acts. Park v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 155 N. Y. 215, 63 Am. St. Rep. 663, 49 N. E. 674. The same rule prevails in California. Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. 108 Cal. 129, 41 Pac. 22. And in Indiana, Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294, 10 Am. Rep. 111. While Massachusetts follows the Pennsylvania rule, holding evidence of specific acts to be inadmissible on the ground that they "would necessarily have a tendency to confuse the case by collateral inquiries, to protract it indefinitely if those inquiries were carefully made, and to mislead and distract the court and jury from the true issue." Hatt v. Nay, 144 Mass. 186, 10 N. E. 807.

It is not necessary to prove that the person whose competency is at issue had a bad general reputation for the precise character of negligence which caused the injury. Proof of habitual recklessness and carelessness in the work he is employed to do is sufficient. In Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Rep. 467, the court charged: "The question is: Was he a careful and competent conductor? Or was he careless and imprudent and incompetent in the discharge of his duties? If he was the latter, and the company knew it, it was their duty to discharge him. And their neglect in not discharging him renders them liable for any injuries resulting from his carelessness, although it might not be of the same specific character of the careless acts he has been guilty of before." While the assignment of error embracing this particular instruction was not expressly passed upon, the opinion in that case ends by saying: "These views seem to cover all the points that stand in need of correction by us." In Huntingdon & B. T. M. R. & Coal Co. v. Decker, 82 Pa. 119, where the negligence was the failure on the part of a conductor to obey an order, and the incompetency of the conductor was at issue, evidence was admitted to show that his "character as a conductor was that of a reckless, careless man, . . . who was unfit for the position of conductor." In reversing upon other assignments, we said that we discovered no substantial error in the remaining assignments, among which was one covering the admission of the testimony just referred to.

Our conclusions upon the points under consideration can be best summed up in the language of the learned judge of the court below, in his opinion refusing a new trial: "Character in Pennsylvania is established by reputation, and not by specific acts. The law recognizes that a careful man may sometimes do acts of negligence, and it is only the care or character of the ordinary man that is required. Besides, the introduction of evidence of specific acts of negligence would confuse the issue on trial. Every alleged act of negligence would raise a new issue which would have to be tried and determined by the jury. It would be unfair to the defendant, for he would have no notice and no opportunity to meet the alleged acts of specific negligence." Aside from these practical reasons for excluding evidence of specific acts of negligence, the theory seems to be that, when a servant's general reputation for negligence, carelessness, or incompetency is properly established, the reputation is assumed to reflect the character to such an extent that the fact of the actual existence of such a character may be found therefrom, as well as the fact of the master's knowledge that the servant had such a character. We are of the opinion that no error was committed in admitting the testimony of general reputation, or in submitting it to the jury on the issues as to the incompetency of the motorman and the defendant's knowledge thereof. Although the testimony set forth in some of the assignments, standing alone, may appear faulty, it has a different aspect when taken with its context; and, as a whole, it was sufficient in quality and quantity to justify its submission. The assignments of error 3 to 11, inclusive, are all dismissed.

The first two specifications of error go to the refusal of binding instructions, and to the denial of judgment for the defendant. While these assignments simply raise the question of the sufficiency of the evidence produced by the plaintiff, we take occasion to say that there was no effort on the part of the defendant to meet the evidence of bad reputation by counter evidence of good reputation; there was no attempt to show by the official designated to receive complaints, or by the official whose duty it was to discharge, that in point of fact they did not know of the motorman's bad reputation, or to show that prior to the accident the defendant had investigated and had failed to find any foundation for the alleged bad reputation. After producing one witness, who expressed his opinion that Staley was a competent motorman, the appellant rested its case. We cannot rule that the court below was in error in refusing binding instructions, or in subsequently refusing to enter judgment n. o. v. for the defendant. Assignments 1 and 2 are dismissed.

The twelfth assignment raises a point not yet touched upon. In addition to the evidence of general reputation, the plaintiff relied upon the statement made by Mr. Lawton to the witness Harget. The testimony is very meager; but it might justify the inference that Harget was addressing Lawton as a division superintendent, and that the conversation was in reference to the recklessness of Staley as a motor-man. No denial of this conversation was entered by the defendant, and the plaintiff argues that when Mr. Lawton said, "I know what you tell me is true, and eventually he (Staley) will have trouble," he uttered an admission showing knowledge on the part of the company of the incompetency of Staley. The appellant replies that the evidence was too vague to justify a finding thereon, and besides, as there was no evidence that Mr. Lawton had the power to employ and discharge, his admission could not bind the defendant company. There was evidence, however, that Mr. Lawton was the general superintendent of the division in which Staley was employed, and that he was the person designated to receive complaints concerning employees and their management of the cars. This being the fact, any knowledge of Staley's incompetency possessed by Lawton in his official capacity would be fixed upon the officer whose duty it was to employ and discharge men, and hence upon the defendant company. But the appellant points to the case of Snodgrass v. Carnegie Steel Co. 173 Pa. 228, 33 Atl. 1104, and contends thereunder that the evidence was of no value to show an admission. The information conveyed and the reply made by the superintendent in that case are of a different character from those in this case, and the one does not in any sense rule the other. We are of the opinion that, when properly shown, Mr. Lawton's admission of knowledge of the incompetency of an employee, would bind the defendant company. It is not necessary to decide whether or not the testimony offered was sufficient for that purpose, as the judgment in this case must be reversed on other grounds which we are about to discuss. But, since the case will go back for a new trial, we call attention to the fact that the testimony concerning Mr. Lawton's alleged admission, and his powers and duties as division superintendent, as it appears upon the present record, is most lacking in essential detail. Testimony of this character must be susceptible of much fuller and more satisfactory presentation. We dismiss this assignment as we did the others.

The particular matters which require reversal are called to our attention in the two remaining specifications, and we will rule the case upon those assignments. Under the thirteenth specification the appellant assigns for error that part of the charge in which the trial judge said: "Now, in passing upon the question . . . as to whether or not Staley's character or care was known, or should have been known, to his employer, you consider the evidence of his reputation, and the evidence of the information given to the different persons in the employ of the defendant company." Immediately before this, the judge had referred to the fact that statements concerning the character of Staley had been made to the "despatchers" of the defendant company. The admission of this testimony is assigned for error under the fourteenth specification. It consisted of the narration of a statement concerning Staley, made by the witness to the despatcher named Fitch, as follows: "We got off the tracks out past Castle Shannon there, and, of course, it was our place to make a report about it, and I says to Fitch, 'That man runs like a crazy horse.' There was a sign up there, 'Run slow,' crossing a new bridge down there between Arlington and Castle Shannon; and we went off the track there." This is dangerously near evidence of a special or particular act of negligence, and, as such, in conflict with Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467.

Although the trial judge immediately explained to the jury that the testimony in question was not accepted as evidence of negligence, but merely to fix the time of a conversation, the trouble is that it was not proper evidence for any legitimate purpose. Moreover, its admission and subsequent submission to the jury, as evidence from which the fact of notice might be found, was directly contrary to our rule in Reiser v. Pennsylvania Co. 152 Pa. 38, 34 Am. St. Rep. 620, 25 Atl. 175. There the negligence complained of was the employment of an incompetent telegraph operator, and, in affirming a judgment for the defendant, we said: "Did the company have notice while Crossman was in its service that he was incompetent? We think not, unless notice to Pardue was notice to the company." Pardue was the defendant company's "chief train despatcher," and we held that, in the absence of testimony showing that he had the power to employ and discharge its servants, notice to him was not notice to the defendant company. The only other case which we find touching upon this subject is Huntingdon & B. T. M. R. & Coal Co. v. Decker, 82 Pa. 119, where the plaintiff proved complaints made to a train master. In disposing of the question of the admissibility of this testimony, we said that, "under the whole evidence we discover no substantial error." But there the report shows that the complaints to the train master had been transmitted by him to the general superintendent, who had power to employ and discharge. In the present case there was no testimony that the despatcher had the authority to employ or discharge, or that he transmitted the complaint to one who had such power. We cannot say that the admission of the testimony was harmless error, for it is only reasonable to assume that the evidence concerning the complaint to the despatcher must have had substantial weight in affecting the determination of the questions at issue. Not only may it have been the deciding element in determining the substantive issue of incompetency, but Mr. Fitch, to whom the complaint was made, was the sole witness produced by the defense, and his testimony was relied upon to overcome the plaintiff's testimony as to the motor-man's bad reputation. After testifying to facts showing long observation of Staley, he was allowed to express the opinion that "Staley was a good, competent motorman." See Gahagan v. Boston & L. R. Co. 1 Allen, 187, 79 Am. Dec. 724. As Mr. Fitch was obliged to meet the plaintiff's story concerning the complaint made to him, and to submit to cross-examination on that point, it well may be that his value as a witness was utterly destroyed by this irrelevant testimony which was admitted against the objection of the defendant, and not withdrawn from the jury.

In a line of cases commencing with Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Barnes, 31 Pa. 193, followed by Huntingdon & B. T. M. R. & Canal Co. v. Decker, 82 Pa. 119; Erie & M. Valley R. Co. v. Smith, 125 Pa. 259, 11 Am. St. Rep. 895, 17 Atl. 443; Rathgebe v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 179 Pa. 31, 36 Atl. 160; Hamory v. Pennsylvania, M. & S. R. Co. 222 Pa. 631, 72 Atl. 277, and Willock v. Beaver Valley R. Co. 229 Pa. 626, 79 Atl. 138, we have held that, "where evidence has been improperly received which tends to prejudice the minds of the jurors, the error is not cured by an instruction . . . to disregard it;" and we have said: "It may be withdrawn by the party who has given it, or the court may withdraw it and positively instruct the jury to disregard it,—to discard it from their view. In such a case, it is the duty of the court to see to it that no mischief is done; that the illegal evidence be withdrawn, wholly withdrawn, and withdrawn for every purpose." Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Barnes, supra. We have further said that it must be stricken from the record before counsel make their addresses to the jury. Here, not only was there a failure to withdraw the objectionable testimony, but it was submitted to the jury, and they were told to consider it in determining the issues. We are constrained to hold that this constituted error for which we must reverse.

The thirteenth and fourteenth assignments are sustained, and the judgment of the court below is reversed, with a venire facias de novo.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

BLUEFIELD WATERWORKS & IMPROVEMENT COMPANY et al., Appts.,
v.

(— W. Va. —, 70 S. E. 772.)

Municipal corporation — control of public service rates.

1. In the absence of a delegation thereof by the legislature, express or necessarily implied, a municipal corporation has no power to regulate or control rates for pub-

Headnotes by POFFENBARGER, J.

Note. — Power of municipality, apart from contract, to regulate the rates to be charged by public service corporations.

As to the right of a municipality to exact a license from a telegraph or telephone company which has been authorized by statute to use the streets, see Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Milwaukee, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 581, and note.

The power which municipalities have to regulate public service corporations operating within their limits is derived from the legislature, and the rule is, as stated in BLUEFIELD WATERWORKS & IMPROV. Co. v. BLUEFIELD, that, in the absence of express or necessarily implied authority from the legislature, a municipality has no power, at least in the absence of contract, to regulate by ordinance the rates to be charged by such a corporation. Old Colony Trust Co. v. Atlanta, 83 Fed. 39, affirmed in 32 C. C. A. 125, 59 U. S. App. 230, 88 Fed. 859; Jacksonville v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 57 Fla. 374, 49 So. 509; Re Pryor, 55 Kan. 724, 29 L.R.A. 398, 49 Am. St. Rep. 280, 41 Pac. 958; State ex rel. Garner v. Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. 189 Mo. 83, 88 S. W. 41; Wabaska Electric Co. v. Wymore, 60 Neb. 199, 82 N. W. 626; Ball v. Texarkana Water Corp. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 127 S. W. 1068.

Where the statute expressly prohibited a city from demanding or receiving any compensation for the use of its streets, except that necessary to restore the pavements, it was held that a telephone company could not be compelled to agree to the fixing of lic service, such as the furnishing of water, gas, or electricity, or the terms and conditions of contracts therefor, otherwise than by contract with the corporation of person rendering such service.

Same — enforcement by penalty.

2. Though such regulation is usually in the form of an ordinance, it is nevertheless contractual or administrative in character, and not enforceable by criminal penalties, except in those instances in which the legislature has delegated to the municipal corporation power and authority to enforce compliance therewith in that way.

Same — scope of authority.

3. Authority in a municipal charter to pass all ordinances necessary to the execution of the powers vested in the city, and such as may be deemed necessary and proper to conserve the health, comfort, happiness, and convenience of its inhabitants, and enforce the same by reasonable fines and penalties, does not include power to regulate or control such public service rates and conditions otherwise than by contract, nor to enforce regulations so made by fines or criminal penalties.

Injunction — enforcement of rate regulation.

4. Attempted enforcement of contractual regulations of public service, by criminal proceedings, under an ordinance of a city not authorized by legislative enactment to adopt such means of enforcement, may be enjoined.

its rates as a condition for a renewal of its franchise. State ex rel. Matthews v. Central U. Teleph. Co. 14 Ohio C. C. 273, 7 Ohio C. D. 536.

And under this same statute it was held in Farmer v. Columbiana County Teleph. Co. 72 Ohio St. 526, 74 N. E. 1078, that, though a telephone company consented to the fixing of its rates by a municipality, it was not bound by such rates, because of the want of authority by the municipality to make such an agreement.

In Noblesville v. Noblesville Gas & Improv. Co. 157 Ind. 162, 60 N. E. 1032, it was held that where a gas company having a franchise accepted an ordinance subsequently passed regulating certain rates, it retained power to fix its own rates for service not specified in the new ordinance.

The power which is given to municipalities to regulate public service corporations is strictly construed, and will not be extended beyond its clear meaning.

Thus, in Lewisville Natural Gas Co. v. State, 135 Ind. 49, 21 L.R.A. 734, 34 N. E. 702, overruling Rushville v. Rushville Natural Gas Co. 132 Ind. 575, 15 L.R.A. 321, 28 N. E. 853, it was held that power to fix the rates of a gas company was not included in a general grant of power to provide reasonable regulations for the safe supply, distribution, and consumption of natural gas.

In Wright v. Glen Teleph. Co. 112 App. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Mercer County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from enforcing by criminal proceedings an ordinance of the city alleged to affect property rights of the plaintiffs and the conduct of their business. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. W. Reynolds and Sanders & Crockett, for appellants:

If the ordinance of the city of Bluefield, in the attempted enforcement of which the plaintiff was arrested, is void, and the enforcement of it will interfere with the private property rights of the plaintiffs, a court of equity has jurisdiction, at the suit of the plaintiffs, to enjoin its enforcement. Block v. Crockett, 61 W. Va. 421, 56 S. E. 826; 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 903, 904; Flaherty v. Fleming, 58 W. Va. 669, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 461, 52 S. E. 857; 5 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 354; High, Inj. 3d ed. § 1247; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1159; Mills v. Chicago, 127 Fed. 731.

The city had no power to legislate on the subject embraced in the ordinance.

Div. 745, 99 N. Y. Supp. 85, where the state was given power to regulate only the setting of poles and stringing of telephone wires, it was held that it had no power to regulate rates, and that a franchise purporting to do so was not binding on the company though accepted by it.

In Tacoma Gas & E. L. Co. v. Tacoma, 14 Wash. 288, 44 Pac. 655, a statute authorizing cities to provide for lighting streets and furnishing inhabitants with gas or other light was held not to empower it to fix the price at which gas should be furnished.

Power to fix rates is not conferred upon the city by a statute giving gas companies the right to lay pipes in the streets subject to such regulations as the city may impose by ordinance. Mills v. Chicago, 127 Fed. 731.

Nor is such power embraced in a grant of general power to regulate the streets. St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co. 96 Mo. 623, 2 L.R.A. 278, 9 Am. St. Rep. 370, 10 S. W. 197.

Even express power to license, tax, and regulate such corporations does not authorize a municipality to fix rates. Ibid.; State ex rel. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Sheboygan, 111 Wis. 23, 86 N. W. 657.

Power given to a municipality by the legislature to regulate the manner of construction of telephone or telegraph lines does not include power to fix rates or to exclude telephone lines from the streets. South McAlester-Eufaula Teleph. Co. v. State, 25 Okla. 524, 106 Pac. 962.

The ordinance impairs the obligation of contracts.

The ordinance is unreasonable and oppressive.

A probate court, under a statute giving it the power to direct the mode in which a telephone company may construct its lines along the streets, has no authority to fix the rates to be charged by such a company. State ex rel. Sheets v. Toledo Home Teleph. Co. 72 Ohio St. 60, 74 N. E. 162.

What is commonly known as the general welfare clause does not authorize a municipality to regulate by ordinance the rates to be charged by a water company operating under a prior franchise. Schroeder v. Scranton Gas & Water Co. 20 Pa. Super. Ct. 255.

Where the right to use streets and highways is given to a company directly by the state, the municipality can exercise its police power only in regulating such a company, and not to regulate rates. Macklin v. Home Teleph. Co. 24 Ohio C. C. 446.

Even when authority to fix rates is conferred upon a municipality by statute, it seems that such authority will be strictly limited.

This limitation may be as to the extent of its power, as in Richmond v. Richmond Natural Gas Co. 168 Ind. 82, 79 N. E. 1031, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 746, where it was held that statutory authority to fix rates by contract or franchise does not confer power to fix rates by ordinance as to a company operating under an existing franchise.

Messrs. D. E. French and Ritz & Ritz, for appellees:

The city had the power, and a perfect right, to pass and enforce the ordinance in question.

Parkersburg Gas Co. v. Parkersburg, 30 W. Va. 439, 4 S. E. 650; Christie v. Malden, 23 W. Va. 667; Charleston v. Reed, 27 W. Va. 681, 55 Am. Rep. 336; Richards v. Clarksburg, 30 W. Va. 491, 4 S. E. 774; Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 192, p. 2130; Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co. 107 Tenn. 647, 61 L.R.A. 888, 64 S. W. 1075; Mason v. Ohio River R. Co. 51 W. Va. 183, 41 S. Va. 628, 57 L.R.A. 413, 41 S. E. 197; Charleston Natural Gas Co. v. Lowe, 52 W. Va. 662, 44 S. E. 410.

The ordinance in question and all of its provisions are not only just and reasonable, but necessary to protect the citizens in their rights, and prevent the water company by its rules from imposing unjust and unreasonable hardships upon them.

State, Trenton Horse R. Co. Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132, 11 L.R.A. 410, 20 Atl. 1076; State ex rel. Milsted v. Butte City Water Co. 18 Mont. 199, 32 L.R.A. 697, 56 Am. St. Rep. 574, 44 Pac. 966;

Thus, where an ordinance granting a franchise to a street railway company fixed the maximum fare to be charged, a reservation of the right from time to time to make such further rules, orders, or regulations as to the common council may seem proper, does not include power further to regulate rates during the term of the franchise. Detroit v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. 184 U. S. 368, 46 L. ed. 592, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 410; Cleveland City R. Co. v. Cleveland, 94 Fed. 385.

Or the limitation upon the power of the municipality may be as to the right so to exercise the power as to prevent future regulation, as in Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co. 107 Tenn. 647, 61 L.R.A. 888, 64 S. W. 1075, where, under a charter provision that a city shall have power to regulate the price of water, it was held that the city was not authorized to make an irrevocable contract for rates, and hence that it may later fix other rates, subject only to the limitation that they are reasonable; and Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 155 Fed. 554, affirmed in 211 U. S. 265, 53 L. ed. 176, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50, where a city authorized by its charter to fix rates for telephones granted a franchise in which certain maximum rates were fixed, and it was held that by doing so it did not surrender its power further to regulate the rates within the period limited for the life of the franchise.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions in this case arise out of the action of the circuit court of Mercer county, upon a bill in equity, filed by the Bluefield Waterworks & Improvement Company and William McCarthy, agent of said company, to enjoin the city of Bluefield, its officers, agents, and attorneys, from enforcing, by criminal proceedings, a certain ordinance of the city, affecting property rights of said company and the conduct of its business. A preliminary injunction was awarded, and, later, upon a full hearing of the cause, the court dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill.

The city of Bluefield seems to have been originally incorporated under chapter 47 of the Code. The legislature, at the session of 1897, granted it a special charter, found in chapter 99 of the acts of that session. This was amended and re-enacted by chapter 3 of the Acts of 1905. Certain sections were again amended by chapter 2 of the Acts of 1907, and the entire charter was amended and re-enacted by chapter 1 of the Acts of 1909. The ordinance here complained of was passed on the 24th day of August, 1908, and the franchise of the waterworks company is found in ordinances passed on the 20th day of January, 1891, and October 3, 1892. The franchise ordinance is very informal and incomplete. As first granted, it conferred upon the water company the right to construct and forever maintain its waterworks, pipes, and mains through, beneath, over, across, and along any and all of the streets, alleys, and public grounds of the city, for the purpose of supplying and furnishing water to the city 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) and the citizens and property owners thereof for domestic and manufacturing purposes, and for all other purposes for which it should be desirable, for rent, lease, hire, sale, and reward, upon any terms and conditions that, from time to time, might be agreed upon between the company, its successors and assigns, and the city and other patrons and customers. This ordinance did not affirmatively require the waterworks company to furnish water nor fix any maximum rate. Deeming it not sufficiently explicit and obligatory in these respects, the council amended it on the 3d day of October, 1892, by the addition of four clauses, by the first and second of which it was made obligatory upon the waterworks company to furnish water to the town and the general public and all persons and corporations desiring it, to the extent of the company's ability so to do, at prices to be agreed on by it and the purchasers of water, provided the rate should not exceed the then existing rate for private consumers, whatever that means, and 25 cents per thousand gallons for consumers by meter. The third additional clause provided that the company should conduct its business of supplying the public with water in accordance with the ordinances of the town, theretofore or to be thereafter enacted, so long as said company should operate its said business under the authority conferred on it by the ordinances of the town, except that the maximum rate to be charged for water as fixed by the ordinance should not be changed without the consent of the company. The fourth clause approved and confirmed the powers conferred upon the company by the former ordinance, that of January 20, 1891.

Under its franchise, as evidenced by these two ordinances, the waterworks company continued its business without any attempt on the part of the city to regulate or control the same in respect to its contracts with citizens, from 1892 until 1908. Some of the rules and forms of contract adopted and enforced by it seem to have caused dissatisfaction and complaint. It required owners of property into which it carried water to agree to pay the water rents, not only for water consumed by themselves, but also for that furnished to their tenants. Another rule required payment of three months' flat rate water rent in advance. Another required the customer or patron to bear the cost of putting in the pipes or fixtures from the property line to a certain point in the street. Another required any person causing the main to be tapped by a plumber not employed by the company itself, to give bond for any damages that might result from negligent or unskillful work, even though such plumber had a license from the city. The public dissatisfaction with these rules and regulations, and others which need not be mentioned, found its way into the city council, and on the 24th day of August, 1908, that body passed an ordinance purporting to be a general rule or law for the government or regulation of persons, firms, or corporations furnishing water in the city. It consists of two sections, the first of which lays down ten rules, only two of which are involved here, those designated "c" and "d." They read as follows: "(c) The water shall not be cut off from any consumer thereof, so long as the same is used in a proper and legitimate manner, and the water rents are paid, or tender for same has been made by the owner or occupant of the property to which such water is furnished. (d) Water rent shall not be required to be paid for more than one month in advance when charged on flat rate. When water is furnished through meter, the rent for same shall be due on the first of the month immediately following the month in which the service was rendered, but the water shall not be cut off from any consumer on account of the nonpayment of water rent, until a bill has been rendered therefor, and the party against whom same is charged given an opportunity to pay for same." The 2d section is a penal clause providing for the enforcement of the regulations prescribed by § 1, and reads as follows: "Any person, firm, or corporation, or the agent, representative, or employee of any such person, firm, or corporation, violating any of the provisions of this ordinance, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than one, nor more than one hundred., dollars for each offense."

Florence A. Harstock and H. J. Harstock had, on April 19, 1908, entered into a contract with the company for water to be furnished in certain property owned by them, and thereby agreed to pay all water bills at the company's office as they should become due, against both themselves and their tenants, according to the rules, regulations, and rates as they then were or should thereafter be, and this contract was to remain in force until canceled by notice. The Harstocks neglected to pay some of the water rents, and, while these rents were in arrears, J. L. Peters became their tenant of the property, and demanded service from the water company. This it refused to furnish until the arrearages of rent should be paid, and also until Peters would pay three months' water rent in advance. He tendered rent in advance for one month. William McCarthy, superintendent of the waterworks company, who, on its behalf, had declined to furnish water to Peters, was arrested and taken before the recorder of the city, charged with violation of the ordinance. He denied the validity of the ordinance, but was convicted and fined $100, which he was required to pay as a condition of his appeal to the criminal court of the county. He was further informed that, for each day he failed and refused to furnish the water, he would be fined $100.

If the ordinance, for the enforcement of which the proceedings against the superintendent of the waterworks company were instituted, is invalid, in so far as it attempts to provide a remedy by fine, there can be no doubt about the jurisdiction by injunction. The object and direct effect of the criminal proceeding is to control the waterworks company in respect to the use of its property, and works a restraint thereon, affecting its use and enjoyment. The jurisdiction does not depend solely upon the invalidity of the ordinance. Two elements are necessary, invalidity of the proceeding and invasion by it of a personal or property right. Coal & Coke R. Co. v. Conley, 67 W. Va. 129, 67 S. E. 613; State v. Ehrlick, 65 W. Va. 700, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 691, 64 S. E. 935; Fellows v. Charleston, 62 W. Va. 665, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 737, 125 Am. St. Rep. 990, 59 S. E. 623, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1185; Block v. Crockett, 61 W. Va. 421, 56 S. E. 826; Flaherty v. Fleming, 58 W. Va. 669, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461, 52 S. E. 857. If the ordinance is invalid to the extent aforesaid, both of these elements are present in this case.

The regulation of rates for public service belongs to the police power of the state. Coal & Coke R. Co. v. Conley, cited. The state has very ample powers for the control and government of corporations and the transaction of their business, and may no doubt ordain and enforce such regulative measures as are embodied in the ordinance complained of, and enforce compliance therewith by making failure to observe them a criminal offense, punishable by fine. But municipal corporations do not possess all the police powers of the state. They have only such portions thereof as are granted to them by the legislature in express terms or by necessary implication. Judy v. Lashley, 50 W. Va. 628, 57 L.R.A. 413, 41 S. E. 197. The city of Bluefield, therefore, to maintain its position, must find warrant for the power it has assumed to exercise in some act of the legislature. Its powers respecting gas, electric light, and waterworks companies, as found in § 28 of chapter 47 of the Code, are "to erect, or authorize, or prohibit the erection of gas works, electric light works, or waterworks in the city, town, or village; to prevent injury to or pollution of the same, or to the water or healthfulness thereof." As we have said, the city was originally incorporated under that chapter. Its special charter, granted by the act of 1897, contained only this provision: "To erect waterworks and provide a water supply for said city, or to authorize or prohibit the erection of gas works in or near the city, to prevent injury to, and provide for the protection of, the same; to provide for the purity of the water and healthfulness of the city." Section 21. If the amended charter of 1905 contains any provision relating, in express terms, to the subject of waterworks, it is no broader than that of the charter of 1897. The only provisions relied upon as conferring the authority claimed are §§ 24, 44, and 87. These are all very general, and signify no legislative intent to vest power in the city to regulate rates or prescribe regulations for the transaction of business by corporations or between citizens. Section 24 gives authority to pass all ordinances necessary to carry into effect any power granted to or vested in the city, and to enforce them by reasonable lines and penalties. Section 44 gives authority to pass and enforce such rules as may be deemed necessary and proper to preserve the health of the inhabitants, and pass such ordinances as the comfort, health, happiness, and convenience of the inhabitants of the city shall require. Section 87 reserves to the city all powers conferred upon it or the council or any of its officers by general law, not inconsistent with the powers conferred by that act. These are such provisions as are generally found in municipal charters. If they conferred the authority claimed here, almost every municipal corporation in this state and every other state would have such power. These provisions manifestly do no more than vest power in the council to carry into execution the limited police powers therein granted and those granted by other parts of the charter. Power to conserve the health, comfort, happiness, and convenience of the inhabitants of a city, as defined by the courts, does not include power to determine in what manner one citizen may deal with another or on what terms they shall contract for particular services. This delegation of legislative power is entirely too general and indefinite to include matters of that kind. A general welfare clause does not extend beyond the police powers ordinarily vested in municipal corporations. Tiedeman, Mun. Corp. § 135.

The waterworks company derives its power to do business as a corporate entity from the state, not from the city of Bluefield. Its charter was obtained under the general law authorizing it to construct its works and lay its pipe lines and mains to supply the city and its inhabitants with water for all proper purposes. Its power to do business and make and enforce contracts is as ample and full as that of an individual, and is subject to regulation in the exercise thereof only by the state itself, or under authority delegated by the state. Of course, its operations within a city are subject to the police power of the city; that is, such police power as has been delegated by the legislature, but nothing more. The legislature has not delegated to the city of Bluefield any authority to regulate or control it in its business or operations, except in so far as its operations may conflict with the delegated police powers of the city, its control of its streets; power to keep them clean, in repair, and free from obstruction; its power to give or withhold permission to any corporation or person to permanently occupy them for public purposes; its power to prescribe conditions upon which they may be so occupied for such purposes; its power to require cleanliness and purity throughout the city for the comfort and health of the people; and other similar powers. This corporation is subject to the exercise of all these city powers just as other corporations and all inhabitants are, and the city itself cannot surrender them, nor barter them away, nor bind itself not to exercise them.

This corporation, chartered by the state, could not obtain the right to occupy the streets of the city or do business therein under its state franchise, without the consent of the city. In order to obtain that consent, it was bound to submit itself to such regulatory conditions as the city saw fit to impose. When these conditions were imposed and accepted by the company, the prescription and acceptance thereof formed a contract between the city and the company. Wheeling & E. G. R. Co. v. Triadelphia, 58 W. Va. 487, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 321, 52 S. E. 499; Clarksburg Electric Light Co. v. Clarksburg, 47 W. Va. 739, 50 L.R.A. 142, 35 S. E. 994. The power thus conferred upon the company to occupy the streets and do business is not revocable, except for breach of the contract in some form by the company. It is a contract fully protected by the constitutional guaranties, and immune from destruction or impairment by the city. The contractual relation extends not only to the immediate parties, the city and the company, but also to the inhabitants of the city. It confers upon them rights which the company cannot withhold nor deny, and also upon the company rights which the city cannot destroy. The rates prescribed by the contract, if any, and the remedies for the enforcement thereof, left in the hands of the company, such as rules and regulations, form parts of the contract. Detroit v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. 184 U. S. 368, 46 L. ed. 592, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 410; Knoxville Water Co. v. Knoxville, 189 U. S. 434, 47 L. ed. 887, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 531; Cleveland v. Cleveland Electric R. Co. 201 U. S. 529, 50 L. ed. 854, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 513. Of course, the rates and method of doing business are subject to regulation to some extent by the state, under its general police power, but not by the city; the state not having delegated to it power to make such regulations. In its use of the streets and its general conduct, it is subject to such regulations as the city may make under the police powers delegated to it; but these do not extend to rates and terms of contract. The function performed by a municipal corporation in securing rates and guaranties of modes of transacting business between itself and public utility corporations seems to rest upon its contractual, not its legislative, capacity. Mr. Tiedeman, in his valuable work on Municipal Corporations, at § 163, refers the municipal capacity to obtain and secure for the city and its inhabitants such rights as are involved here to its contractual powers. The function may be, to some extent, legislative; but it seems to be more nearly administrative. Being administrative, it is exercised in connection with the police power, which is legislative, so that the two functions are not always readily distinguishable in respect to the basis of authority. The one may be easily confounded with the other. We think the city's power of regulation as to the rates to be charged, and the forms of contract between the company and its patrons, both public and private, rests solely upon its right to make contracts, and not upon delegated legislative power. Its administrative powers, under its right to make such contracts, may be exercised in the form of ordinances; but its right to pass ordinances upon the subject does not include the right to enforce its contracts, either in favor of itself or the inhabitants, by the imposition of criminal penalties. It can enforce its contracts only in those modes allowed to individuals and private corporations. Not having the power to make violations of contracts criminal, it could not reserve any such power to itself in the ordinances by which it granted the franchise. Nor could the waterworks company, having no power to add anything to the capacity of the city, confer upon it such right or power. Two private persons cannot, by their contract, confer upon each other right to inflict fines and imprisonment for violations of their contract. This power, if it exists at all, is vested in the legislature of the state, and has not been delegated to the city of Bluefield. It could not be obtained from any other source. Hence it is plain that the city does not possess it.

It is said this court, in Charleston Natural Gas Co. v. Lowe, 52 W. Va. 662, 670, 44 S. E. 410, has recognized and asserted power in municipal corporations of this state to regulate rates. The question was not directly involved in that case. The inquiry there was the right of a gas company, having a city franchise for furnishing gas to the inhabitants of the city, to exercise the power of eminent domain. It became necessary to say whether or not the land sought to be taken was required for a public purpose. In the discussion of that question, it was said that such company is bound to furnish gas to every inhabitant of the city or town who applies therefor, and complies with the regulations prescribed by the ordinances of the town, or fixed by contract between the council and company, and also that the transportation and use of gas seems to be susceptible of but little regulation beyond fixing the maximum price to the consumer by municipal corporations, to which the legislature has qualifiedly delegated powers of local government. This was followed by the observation that they have ample authority to regulate rates, as well as to impose terms and conditions such as will insure safety of the lives and property of citizens in the use of gas. This language may go somewhat beyond the position taken here; but the source of power to regulate and the mode of regulation was not the subject of inquiry in that case. It was only necessary to say that the city had power to secure to the inhabitants the right to obtain the gas from the company, and to provide against danger and injury to persons and property in the conduct of the business of the gas company. Whether this power was legislative, administrative, or contractual was wholly unimportant in that case. Hence, what is said in the opinion upon the subject is not to be regarded as a deliberate judgment or conclusion. Capacity derived from either source sufficed.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that § 2 of the ordinance adopted by the city of Bluefield August 24, 1908, is void, and the proceedings on the part of the city under it wholly without legal sanction.

Where the regulations prescribed in § 1 are valid as modifications of the franchise, under power reserved in the amended ordinance of October 3, 1892, it is unnecessary to determine. The city or any citizen may test that question by any proper proceeding in a judicial forum having jurisdiction, upon an application for the appropriate remedy to enforce the right alleged to have been conferred or secured by these regulations. Though we have referred the power of the city to make such regulations to its contractual rights and capacity, the waterworks company is a public service corporation, and the rights, so secured to it and the inhabitants, may rest upon a legal foundation, giving a remedy by mandamus. We deem it proper to make this observation, lest what has been said here may be regarded as precluding that remedy. As a public service corporation, the company may be under a legal duty to the city and its inhabitants though the rights were fixed and secured by virtue of the city's contractual powers. In other words, a legal duty may rest upon the waterworks company, though the rates were secured by virtue of the contractual powers of the city. At any rate, §§ 28c. I. and 28c. II. of chapter 47 of the Code of 1906, gives a remedy, and this signifies legislative intent to withhold the drastic one adopted by the city.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of will be reversed, the demurrer and the motion to dissolve the injunction overruled, and the injunction reinstated, in so far as it inhibits proceedings under said § 2 of the ordinance of August 24, 1908, and perpetuated; but, in so far as it relates to the other provisions of said ordinance, the injunction was properly dissolved, and, to that extent, the decree of dissolution will be affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF COLORADO, Plff. in Err.,
v.

R. E. TURPIN et al.

Voter — residence — selection — non-presence.

1. The selection and purchase of a home in a state, with the intention of making it a permanent residence, is not of itself sufficient to make one a citizen of the state for the purpose of fixing his right to vote, if, pending the vacation of the property by the former occupant, he continues to occupy his former residence in another state.

Witness — voter — duty to disclose candidate voted for.

2. An unqualified person who has voted at 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a school election, the laws governing which provide no method for identifying and rejecting his ballot, may be required in a proceeding to contest the validity of the election, to state how he voted.

(December 5, 1910.)

ERROR to the District Court for Mesa County to review a judgment in defendants' favor in a proceeding to contest the validity of an election for the consolidation of certain school districts. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. M. Logan, Wheeler & Weiser, and R. D. Thompson, for the People:

To effect a change of domicile, there must be both act and intention. There must be a severance from the old place, with the intention of uniting with the new one, and these must concur.

Note. — Gaining new domicile or residence before abandoning occupation of old residence, by purchasing or hiring property in new locality with intention of establishing permanent residence there.

This note is confined to cases where there has been a purchase or renting of property in a new locality, with intent to acquire a domicile there, while the occupation of the old residence has not yet been abandoned. It will be observed that this note by its scope presupposes the existence of the intention essential to a change of domicile or residence, and, with the exception of a few cases which were decided before that intention had been fully carried out, or after it had been abandoned, the question is practically as to when the change of domicile or residence was effected, rather than whether there has been any change at all.

For cases upon the general question as to when a person who intends to leave a state permanently, but has not yet done so, becomes a nonresident, see the note to Brown v. Beckwith, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 778.

Cases where the statute attaches presumption to the residence of a man's "family" are omitted.

The reader is reminded that a change of domicile requires act and intent,—there must be both factum et animus, an actual new residence and an intention to make it home. Also that the courts often do not distinguish between domicile and residence and citizenship, although, in some special cases, a distinction is necessary, as where a man has two or more residences; so, also, it has been held that a citizen may be a nonresident for attachment purposes, or that he may acquire a new residence to

Mr. Henry J. Hersey, with Messrs. S. M. Logan and N. C. Miller, for defendants in error.

Hill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought under § 289 of Mills's Annotated Code, to determine the right of the defendants in error to hold certain offices, the existence of which depends qualify as an administrator without changing his domicile.

"When once it is ascertained what is necessary to constitute one's domicile in any place, it is easy to point out what must be done in order to effect a change of that person's domicile to another place. All the conditions which are required to constitute the domicile in the given place must be transferred to the new place. When this is done, the domicile is changed; and until this is done, the domicile is not changed. The old one is not abandoned, the new one is not acquired. This, of course, excludes the existence of an intention to return to the former place; for the existence of an intention to return is inconsistent with the idea that the former home is abandoned." Hartford v. Champion, 58 Conn. 275, 20 Atl. 471.

The general principles are well set out by Leventritt, J., in Plant v. Harrison, 36 Misc. 649, 74 N. Y. Supp. 411, where he says: "A domicile of choice, being gained animo et facto, can be relinquished only in the same manner. Udney v. Udney, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 441, 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 782. But both the animus et factum must be expressive of the present intention to reside presently and permanently in the domicile. Personal presence, coupled with the intention to begin in futuro a residence of however permanent character, is not sufficient. Jacobs, Domicil, § 177. Abandonment in fact of the old domicile, residence in the new locality, and the intention to remain there, are the essential requisites. The length of the residence in the new domicile is quite immaterial, so long as the intention is bona fide, and is consummated by an adequate act. It is well, perhaps, to bear in mind, in considering the facts of the case at bar, that, while a domicile of origin reverts easily upon relinquishment of a domicile of choice, the American decisions have not gone the length of the English authorities in the application of this principle. The English rule that the domicile of origin reverts at once upon the abandonment of the domicile of choice (Udney v. Udney, supra) has not been folupon the validity of an election for the consolidation of certain school districts in Mesa County. Elections were held in three school districts, under an act of the legislature approved May 5, 1909 (Laws 1909, chap. 204), entitled, "For the Consolidation of Adjoining School Districts," etc. This proceeding pertains, in part, to the election upon this question in district No. 32, known as "Pomona school district in Mesa county," in which the judges of election canvassed the votes and declared that sixty-two had been cast for, and that sixty had been cast against, such consolidation. After the results of these elections were announced (all of which were for consolidation), the defendants in error, at their union meeting (called as provided for by allowed in this country, where the rule seems to be that a domicile once acquired continues not only until it is abandoned, but until another is acquired. Jacobs, Domicil, § 114."

Necessity of actual removal.

As held in PEOPLE v. TURPIN, there must be an actual removal to effect a change of residence.

Thus, renting a farm in a town about the 1st of March, and moving on it on the 9th, will not make a man a residence on the 8th, and so able to vote thirty days later, on the 7th of April, although his corn, plows, chickens, and a cupboard were moved before the 9th of March. Carter v. Putnam, 141 Ill. 133, 30 N. E. 681.

Where a man built a house and, with his wife, occupied it on January 6, he and she, until that time, having occupied rooms in another ward, it was held he had not resided in the new house for voting purposes until January 6. State ex rel. Goodell v. McGeary, 69 Vt. 461, 44 L.R.A. 446, 38 Atl. 165.

Where an employee who slept over the shop, with his wife, rented a house in another ward, intending to hold his first residence until after an election, and moved some of his furniture, having a bed in each place, he and his wife sleeping in the rented house during the moving, and, while there, he was taken sick and quarantined till three days before the election, and, on the night before the election, he slept in the old house, but his wife in the new, it was held that he kept his old residence until after the election. Welsh v. Shumway, 232 Ill. 54, 83 N. E. 549.

Where a man rented a house in another voting district, moved in some of his furniture, and there was conflict as to whether he and his wife began to sleep in the new house more than thirty days before the election, the court threw out his vote in the new district, being largely moved there-to because he first attempted to vote in the old district, where he was challenged, and then voted in the new. Ibid.

the act), were elected as the president, secretary, and treasurer of the consolidated district, to be known as "district No. 38," and they entered upon their duties as such.

The prayer of the complaint is that judgment be entered decreeing that the defendants and each of them are unlawfully and illegally usurping the office of school directors of said consolidated school district No. 38, and that they and each of them be ousted therefrom, and ordered to desist from further attempting to exercise such offices; that the organization of the so-called consolidated school district be declared illegal; that the defendants be enjoined from further acting as a school board for said so-called school district No. 38, etc. Among other reasons alleged why this prayer should be granted is the claim that at said election in district No. 32, there were five illegal votes or ballots cast, received, and counted for consolidation, which were included in the sixty-two votes declared by the judges to have been cast in favor of consolidation; that a majority of said qualified electors of said school district did not cast their ballots for consolidation; that it did not carry at said election by a majority of the votes cast, etc.; that, on account thereof, said consolidated school district No. 38 had not been organized and created according to law, etc. The answer denied in detail the allegations concerning the illegal votes. Trial was to the court. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, a motion for a nonsuit was granted, and the

It is generally held that the removal of the man's family must precede the change of domicil. Thus, where a resident of Georgia came to Alabama with the design of settling there, leased land, and procured materials for erecting a foundry, returned to Georgia to bring his family, but for some cause was so delayed that it was over two months before he returned with them, it was held that until his return with his family he acquired no domicil in Georgia, and that he was not legally entitled to vote at a presidential election held less than a year thereafter. State v. Hallett, 8 Ala. 159.

Where the only evidence of the abandonment of an acquired residence in Osceola was that the plaintiff had gone to Chicago, purchased property, and gone into business with the intention of permanently locating there, his family continuing to reside in Osceola, where to all appearances they were permanently located, it was held that the plaintiff was a resident of Osceola, and rightly assessed and taxed there upon his personal property. Nugent v. Bates, 51 Iowa, 77, 33 Am. Rep. 117, 50 N. W. 76.

Where the plaintiff, having been appointed clerk of court, came to Dedham on October 28, and took possession of the apartments of the courthouse assigned for the clerk's use, his family and household establishment remaining in Roxbury until November 12th, when he removed them to Dedham, he having on October 29th contracted for a house in Dedham which he was to rent and occupy from November 12th, and until November 12th he lodging part of the time in Roxbury and part of the time at a public house in Dedham, it was held that he did not become a resident of Dedham to qualify as an elector for Congressman until November 12th. Williams v. Whiting, 11 Mass. 424.

Where a resident of Texas, having purchased the controlling interest in a St. Louis hotel company, came there April 15th, and remained about a month, when he returned to Texas, where he remained, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) abandoning the hotel business, having never removed his family or any of his household effects from Texas, it was held that he was a citizen of Texas on May 7th, so as to support the jurisdiction of a suit against him in the United States circuit court founded upon diverse citizenship, although he had come to St. Louis to look after his hotel business and with the intention of permanently removing his family there later in the season. State Sav. Asso. v. Howard, 31 Fed. 433.

So, in McCalley v. Moore, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 37, a case perhaps not strictly within the scope of this note, it was held that a man engaging in business in another place where he owns no property, and living in lodgings there, with the intention of making that place his permanent residence, will not, while his wife and children remain in the former abode, escape giving security for costs as a nonresident of the place where he lodges.

Where a lawyer in May, 1879, went to D., a distant state, took up government land, built a shanty, returned, and sometime later, viz., May 23, 1880, removed his family to D., selling and conveying his old homestead May 8, 1880, it was held that, conceding that he became a resident of D. in May, 1879, his original homestead was not subject to a judgment lien when conveyed, both because his family had not removed with him at first, and because his wife's signature was necessary to the sale of the homestead. Savings Bank v. Kennedy, 58 Iowa, 454, 12 N. W. 479.

Reference may be here made to Smith v. Croom, 7 Fla. 81, where, however, the evidence of the man's declarations of intention were conflicting. It was there held that when a man domiciled in one state had not disposed of his family mansion there, which continued to be the actual habitation of his wife and children, his domicil of succession was not changed to another state by his purchase of large tracts of land there, transferring thither the greater part of his slaves, so that the bulk of his property was in the new locality, spending a considerable time there case dismissed. Numerous errors have been assigned. We will only consider those pertaining to the validity of the votes cast by a Mr. and Mrs. Wooliston, as the court's ruling thereon will necessitate a reversal of the judgment.

This election was held upon November 16, 1909. The substance of the Woolistons' testimony given at the trial (upon May 5, 1910) is to the effect that they moved from Phillips, Nebraska, to a fruit farm in this school district, between the 7th and 10th of March, 1909, when they shipped their household goods and other effects from Nebraska to Grand Junction, and at once moved them out to this place. Until they moved their effects direct to Grand Junction, in March, 1909, they had not lived at any other place in this state, but had lived at Phillips, Nebraska.

Upon cross-examination it was shown that they first came to Colorado in August, 1908, stopped in Denver a few days; from there went to Colorado Springs; thence to Grand Junction, where they stayed four or five days, during which period they bought this farm. It being occupied, they did not get possession of it at that time, and after their four or five days' sojourn at Grand Junction, they returned to their home in Nebraska, where they continued to reside between six and seven months. In cross-examination it was shown that, prior to coming here in August, 1908, they had decided to locate in Colorado in the future, and came here in August, 1908, for each year himself, voting in the new place, and ceasing to vote in the old. The court held that the political domicile was not necessarily that of succession, and emphasized the necessity of present, as distinguished from future, intention.

It has been held, however, that under some circumstances the delay of the wife in joining her husband will not postpone his acquisition of a new domicile. Thus, where a resident of Maine, having bought a plantation in Virginia with the intention of making it his permanent home, went there in the fall with one of his daughters, sending on some of his household furniture, and, during the winter, made repairs to the plantation for the convenience of his family, it being his intention to bring his wife and other daughter from Maine in the spring, they living, at least, until January in his house in Maine, which was sold at that time; but, his wife being unwilling to go except with him personally, and he not being able conveniently to come for her until the following September, he then came to Maine, sold the residue of his furniture there on September 28, and sailed for Virginia with his wife and other daughter the following day, it was held that he was not a citizen of Maine on September 28, so as to support suit against him in the United States court there by citizens of New Hampshire. Burnham v. Rangeley, 1 Woodb. & M. 7.

Where a man removed from New York to Illinois, purchased a farm, cultivated it, lived on it some three years, having a female relation as housekeeper, making one or more short visits to his wife, who continued to live in New York, he declaring his intention to make Illinois his permanent home, improving his house with that intent, and saying that his wife would join him on the decease of her mother, who was too old to be removed, it was held that his property was not subject to attachment in Illinois as that of a nonresident; but the court held that the reason of the separation was immaterial. Wells v. People, 44 Ill. 40.

And in some cases the prior removal of the family has been held unnecessary.

Thus, where a man bought and obtained possession of a farm, removed part of his household goods to it, and remained on it and commenced work on it with two of his sons, with the intention of making it his permanent residence, it was held that the new residence for voting purposes was acquired at once, although the rest of his family, consisting of a wife and three children, did not move till a fortnight or more later. Lankford v. Gebhart, 130 Mo. 621, 51 Am. St. Rep. 585, 32 S. W. 1127.

And it was held in State ex rel. Smith v. Deniston, 46 Kan. 359, 26 Pac. 742, that filing a homestead claim in Oklahoma in June, and cultivating it, building a house on it in November and December, where the intention was to have one's home there, and where his family followed him soon after the 7th of November, made a man an illegal voter on November 5th at his old home in Kansas, where he had returned to see his family.

It may be noted that the converse of this decision was reached in Carwile v. Jones, 38 Mont. 590, 101 Pac. 153, a case without the scope of this note, as arising under an election law providing that "the place where a man's family resides is presumed to be his place of residence," it being there held that filing upon a homestead with intent to make it one's permanent home effected a change of residence at once, although the filer did not bring his family on till later.

Some cases may be noted where it does not appear from the report that there had been any property acquired or rented in the new locality, and yet it seems that there may possibly have been under the circumstances.

In Plummer v. Brandon, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 190, where a man starting for another state declared he was going there to look about, and, if pleased with the country, intended to stay or make a permanent location there, and, taking with him eight or ten valuable negroes, he rethe purpose of looking up a location; with that object in view, they at that time purchased this farm in the Pomona district for the purpose of making it their future home; but they both testified that after this purchase they went back to Nebraska, and lived there until they came here in March, 1909; that, at the time of the purchase of the farm, they left no personal effects in Colorado. Mr. Wooliston was asked, "Did you live in Phillips, Nebraska, until you moved direct to Grand Junction in March, 1909?" He answered, "Yes, sir; I did." Referring to this question he was further asked, "Had you lived in Colorado previous to coming here at that time,—had you resided in Colorado previous to moving here in March?" His answer was, "No, sir; I had lived in Nebraska, but I had intended to buy here. I had come out here and bought a place in August before." Upon cross-examination he stated he bought this place to make it his home, and that when he bought it he did elect to make that his home; that at that time he had no home except his rented home in Nebraska. Upon redirect examination he stated that he first made his home here about the 7th of March; that he did not become a resident here until 1909, but that he had the place and was intending to come here; that between the date of the purchase in August, 1908, and March, 1909, he resided back in Nebraska, and that he did not reside here until he moved here in March, 1909. He further stated that after his purchase here, his purpose in returning to Nebraska was to prepare to return to Colorado.

Upon the question of intention, in response to the question, "Had you been advised by anyone that you was a qualified voter at that election?" Mrs. Wooliston answered, "I was given the impression by people whom I thought knew. I had never read up on the state law of Colorado, but it was my impression that had we had the intention of residing in the state for a year, that we were entitled to vote at a school election at any rate." From this undisputed testimony, we concluded that Mr. and Mrs. Wooliston, who were husband and wife, did not become residents of this state until they moved here (in March, 1909) for the purpose of making this their permanent home, for which reasons at the time of the election they had not resided within the state a year, as required by our sided in the new state a year and died, his family continuing to live on and cultivate the old place, it was held, in the matter of administration, that he had not changed his domicile.

Where a debtor left his home in Illinois, and removed with his family to Minnesota, where he resided with them for two years, and then returned with them to his old home, and had stated before going away that, if he liked the country and could do well in his business, he would remain, otherwise he would return, it was held that his homestead in Illinois (leased during his absence) had thus been abandoned as such, and that it was subject to a judgment lien upon debts contracted before his departure. Cabeen v. Mulligan, 37 Ill. 230, 87 Am. Dec. 247.

Where a man domiciled in Wisconsin went to Buffalo, New York, and secured employment there, and some months later concluded to make that his residence, and returned to Wisconsin to bring on his family and household goods, but, finding his wife in delicate health, he returned without his family, whom he brought on later, and shortly before they joined him he was sued in Wisconsin, it was held that he had not met the burden of showing that his domicile was changed before his family joined him. Huntley v. Baker, 33 Hun, 578.

In Faires v. Young, 69 Tex. 482, 6 S. W. 800, it appeared that a physician, about September 1, sold his residence in F. county, settled up his accounts, notified his patrons, did everything necessary to prevent the need of his return, and went to another county, where he formed a partnership, but was recalled to F. county by the illness of his mother, and was detained there till October 29, by the illness of himself and family, when he left with his family for his new home. His personal effects were shipped October 22, and his family occupied the old home after he had sold it until October 19 or 20, and he was sued in F. county on October 23, and it was held that he was not then a resident of that county.

Where a man rented a farm in an adjoining state, and lived on it with his family for two years cultivating it, and then moved back with his family to his father's house in Illinois, with the intention of making it his home, the fact that his lease had not expired, that he left considerable property behind not disposed of till later, and that some of his household goods were not moved till later, did not make him an illegal voter in Illinois. Behrensmeyer v. Kreitz, 135 Ill. 591, 26 N. E. 704.

In Whitly v. Steakly, 3 Baxt. 393, it was held that the court correctly charged the jury "that if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff went to Texas with the intention to make that his residence, or if, after he got to Texas, he determined to make that his residence, and was actually residing there when the attachment was levied, then he would be a nonresident, although he might not have carried his family with him; but if he went on a visit, or had not changed his residence, he would not be a nonresident."

Constitution. In the case of Jain v. Bos- sen, 27 Colo. 427, 62 Pac. 195, this court said: "The requirements of the law on the qualification of electors are mandatory, and must be strictly observed."

All the authorities point to the fact that, to effect a change of residence from one state to another, there must be an actual removal, an actual change of domicile, and a bona fide intention of abandoning the former place of residence and establishing a new one, and the acts of the parties must correspond with such purpose. This intention of the parties to at that time make the state they removed to the place of their permanent residence is to be gathered from their acts, declarations, and from a variety of other circumstances. If a citizen of one state, in good faith, gives up his residence there, goes to another state, and takes up a permanent residence therein, he at once loses his former residence, and acquires a residence in the new domicile, but it must appear that he has left the former state with the intention of then giving up his residence there.

In the case of Sharp v. McIntire, 23 Colo. 99, 46 Pac. 115, referring to the construction to be given the residence qualification provided by our Constitution, as it then read, this court said: "We think the residence therein contemplated is synonymous with 'home' or 'domicil,' and means an actual settlement within the state, and its adoption as a fixed and permanent habitation; and requires not only a personal presence for the requisite time, but a concurrence therewith of an intention to make the place of inhabitancy the true home; and that one who has made a home or domicile in some other state or territory, where his family reside, cannot, by a sojourn here on business or pleasure, however long, without abandoning such former domicile, acquire a residence in the constitutional and statutory sense."

It is earnestly urged by the defendants in error that the facts pertaining to the voters Jones and Laffaty in the case of Kellogg v. Hickman, 12 Colo. 256, 21 Pac. 325, are similar to those here, and hence that case is decisive of this one. We cannot agree with this contention. Pertaining to the voter Jones, the court said: "The domicile or residence, in a legal sense, is determined by the intention of the party. He cannot have two domiciles at the same time. When he acquires the new home he loses the old one; but to effect this change there must be both act and intention. . . . There must be the act of severance from the old place, with the intention of uniting with the new place. The intention should be gathered from the acts of the party." Referring to the voter Laffaty, the court said: "The act of changing from Illinois to Colorado was consummated May 3d. That such was the intention is verified by every act thenceforward. This voter had no family." Referring to which it was further stated: "The domicile or residence in the state may commence before a definite county or precinct is fixed for a permanent residence. . . . As to the six months' residence required by statute, if the purpose of remaining in the state be clearly proved, a particular home is not necessary."

In the case under consideration the particular home to be secured in the future was decided upon; it was purchased in August, 1908, but it was understood that possession could not be secured at that time. It is true, these people intended to make it their home in the future, to establish their residence there at a later period. The fact was then settled in their minds as to where their home in Colorado would be when it became established, to wit, when they gave up their home in Nebraska and located here. This could not be done so long as they were maintaining a home in Nebraska, which they had not yet abandoned. Neither the intent nor the act of doing so was perfected, because the intent in this case referred to a future date, and the physical act itself was not accomplished until some future date, so that the facts urged in the case of Kellogg v. Hickman, supra, are not applicable here. This is further demonstrated by the questions asked both Mr. and Mrs. Wooliston as to when they did establish their residence in Colorado, and as to when they moved here, to both of which they frankly answered, in March, 1909.

The facts pertaining to the voter Herne in the case of Kellogg v. Hickman, supra, are more in harmony with the facts here. In speaking of this the court said: "The evidence does not make it clear as to the time this voter terminated his residence in Kansas. It appears from his testimony that he was a man with a family, residing in Abilene, Kansas, and was interested in a drug store there; that he came to Colorado May 1st, and looked around a couple of weeks for a location. About the middle of May he went back to Kansas, to close out his interest in the drug store there. He did so then, and broke up housekeeping there when the drug store was sold. He returned to Colorado, and his wife went visiting until he could send for her. It does not appear that the act of terminating his residence in Kansas had occurred until after the 8th day of May. He could not have his residence in Colorado while he had one in Kansas. The residence there must terminate before the residence here can commence. The evidence tends to show that he did not terminate his residence there until he sold his drug-store interest there, which was after May 8th."

It stands undisputed that at the time the Woolistons first came to Colorado they had not abandoned their residence in Nebraska, and, after staying here but a few days while making the purchase of the farm, they again returned to the state of Nebraska, where they continued to occupy their home there for a period of about seven months, at the expiration of which time they abandoned it, shipped their goods to Colorado, and came themselves, which was in March, 1909, when they moved out upon this property; at which time, and not before, both the act and intent were consummated by which they became residents of the precinct as well as of the state. When one has a residence either of origin or of choice, he must abandon it before he can acquire another, and to effect this there must be both act and intention. There must be the act of severance from the old place, with the intention of uniting with the new place, and these must concur. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 599. The abandonment of the old residence must be actual. The mere intention to change the domicile unaccompanied by an actual removal, avails nothing. State v. Hallett, 8 Ala. 169; Smith v. Croom, 7 Fla. 81.

A very recent case where the facts were similar to those under consideration is that of Welsh v. Shumway, 232 Ill. 54, 83 N. E. 549, where numerous cases are cited, all of which are in harmony with our conclusions here.

The case of State v. Hallett, supra, is directly in point. At page 161 of 8 Ala., in speaking to this point, the court said: "Here the facts were that the defendant, being domiciled in Georgia, came to this state with the design of settling here, and manifested his intention of making this state his permanent residence by leasing a piece of land, procuring materials for the erection of a foundry, and going to Georgia to bring his family. These acts all mark, unequivocally, his intention to change his residence from Georgia to this state. These facts, however, are not sufficient to cause a loss of the domicile he previously had. If, on his return to Georgia, he had died before being able to carry his purpose into effect, it can admit of no doubt, the courts of Georgia, and not of this state, would have been entitled to distribute his estate."

The above conclusions are applicable here. In case Mr. Wooliston, after returning to his home in Nebraska, had changed his mind and decided that he would not return to Colorado, would anyone have questioned his right to vote there? Likewise, had he died before returning, the courts of Nebraska, and not of this state, would have been entitled to distribute his personal estate. The evidence having established that Mr. and Mrs. Wooliston were not entitled to vote, it follows that the trial court misconceived the legal effect of their testimony, and erred in not requiring them to answer how they voted. By our present system of voting at general elections, under what is commonly called the Australian ballot system, in cases of this kind the ballots cast by these voters could have been secured, identified and rejected; but as our school laws do not so provide, and the evidence showing that no record was kept by which any ballots cast at this election could be identified, the testimony of the voter was then competent. The law protecting the secrecy of the ballot is only intended for lawful voters, and does not apply to or protect illegal voters, who, when that fact is shown, can be forced to testify as to how they voted. Colo. Const. art. 7, § 9; Black v. Pate, 130 Ala. 514, 30 So. 434; Montgomery v. Dormer, 181 Mo. 5, 79 S. W. 913; Van Winkle v. Crabtree, 34 Or. 462, 55 Pac. 831, 56 Pac. 74; Vallier v. Brakke, 7 S. D. 343, 64 N. W. 180; State ex rel. Heath v. Kraft, 18 Or. 550, 23 Pac. 663; Lane v. Bailey, 29 Mont. 548, 75 Pac. 191.

It is true, if it is not shown that the vote was illegal, the voter cannot be compelled to answer how he voted; but if illegal, in addition to compelling him to answer, other evidence may be received and considered on the subject. Black v. Pate, 130 Ala. 514, 30 So. 434; Rexroth v. Schein, 206 Ill. 80, 69 N. E. 240; Welsh v. Shumway, 232 Ill. 55, 83 N. E. 549; Sorenson v. Sorenson, 189 Ill. 179, 69 N. E. 555; People ex rel. Smith v. Pease, 27 N. Y. 45, 84 Am. Dec. 242; People ex rel. Boyer v. Teague, 106 N. C. 576, 19 Am. St. Rep. 547, 11 S. E. 665.

Other errors are assigned, some pertain to the validity of other votes, others urge constitutional questions, while others pertain to the regularity of this election in other respects, etc.; but, inasmuch as the ruling upon the two votes heretofore considered compels a reversal of the judgment, and, if they were cast as counsel claim they were, and the way the record as a whole appears to indicate, it makes unnecessary the consideration of any of the other questions urged.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed.

Note. — Effect of consideration moving from beneficiary originally named in the certificate issued by a mutual benefit association, upon the right of a member to change beneficiaries.

This question is discussed in the note to Stronge v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1206, where the cases up to that time will be found collected. In that note it is said that, notwithstanding the general rule that the beneficiary in a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association has no vested interest therein prior to the death of the member, and that the latter may change beneficiaries at his pleasure if he conforms to the rules of the association, yet, by an agreement sufficiently specific between the member and such beneficiary, duly performed by the latter, the former may waive his right to change beneficiaries and the latter may acquire a vested right which will be recognized, at least, on principles of equity, against a substituted beneficiary having no superior equity. This principle of law finds support in cases reviewed in that note, in which the consideration moving from the beneficiary was money advanced to, or a promise of support of, the assured.

It is also stated in that note that there was some conflict among the cases whether the payment of assessments by the beneficiary originally designated in pursuance of an agreement or understanding to that effect, would operate to give the beneficiary a vested right, and prevent the member from changing beneficiaries; and the same conflict is found in the cases decided since the preparation of that note.

"Where a proper beneficiary has been designated, and the beneficiary has advanced the member money upon the faith of the certificate, or paid dues and assessments thereon, the fraudulent change of the certificate without the knowledge of the beneficiary will not be permitted to defeat the right of the beneficiary named in the original certificate, on the ground that such beneficiary has acquired a beneficial interest which may be enforced in a court of equity."

Where the designation of the beneficiary in a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association is made in pursuance of an agreement founded upon a sufficient consideration, the person so designated acquires a vested interest, and, unless by reason of countervailing equities, cannot be displaced, although the rules of the order permit the member to change the beneficiary at will.

On the other hand, it was held in Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Denzer, 129 Ky. 202, 110 S. W. 882; Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. McFadden, 213 Mo. 269, 111 S. W. 1172; and *Supreme Council, R. A. v. W. 628, that a member of a fraternal benefit association was not prevented from changing the beneficiary by the mere payment of assessments and dues by the beneficiary originally named, under an agreement with the member that the beneficiary should pay them.

In Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Jones, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 533, 106 S. W. 184, an injunction was refused to prevent a fraternal benefit association from changing, in accordance with its laws and at the direction of an assured, the beneficiary in a certificate issued by it, thereby defeating the claim of a creditor who was the beneficiary named in such certificate, as trustee for a son of the assured, under an agreement by which the creditor was to keep alive the certificate

4. The statutory rule that no party shall testify in his own behalf in respect to any transaction had personally with a person since deceased, where the adverse party is the heir at law, next of kin, or assignee of such deceased person, does not apply where the adverse party claims as the beneficiary of a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association to such decedent, because the beneficiary named in the certificate is not the assignee of the member to whom it was issued, and the circumstance that he is in fact his heir or next of kin is not material where his claim is not founded on that relationship.

APPEAL by defendants Russell Savage et al. from a judgment of the District Court for Wyandotte County in plaintiff's favor in an action to recover upon a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nathan Cree, E. R. Blum, and C. O. Littick, for appellants:

Mrs. Savage never paid anything to keep up the policy out of any earnings which were in law her own.

Wyandotte v. Agan, 37 Kan. 528, 15 Pac. 529; Mewhirter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, by paying the assessments thereon, and in return therefor to discharge his claim against the insured out of the proceeds thereof. It is to be noted that the laws of the association required the beneficiary to be a member of the family of, or related by blood to, the assured, but the court merely assumed the validity of the certificate without passing upon that question.

It is also stated in the note above referred to that the voluntary payment of assessments upon a certificate by the beneficiary named therein, without any agreement with the member to do so, will not deprive the latter of the right to change beneficiaries, nor entitle the beneficiary originally named to the insurance fund as against a subsequent beneficiary named by the member in accordance with the rules of the association. This proposition of law finds further support in Supreme Tent K. M. v. Altmann, 134 Mo. App. 363, 114 S. W. 1107, decided since the preparation of that note.

Another proposition established by the cases cited in the note above referred to, that the failure of the beneficiary, without the fault of the member, to perform the agreement on his part constituting the consideration for his designation as beneficiary, will deprive the beneficiary of any vested right which he or she might otherwise have in the certificate, and enable the member to designate a new beneficiary, is also supported by Eatman v. Eatman, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 165 (failure to continue payment of assessments).

In Knights of Modern Maccabees v. Sharp, post, 780, it was held that where a husband and wife mutually insured their lives for the benefit of each other, and further agreed that the survivor would continue the insurance for the benefit of their children, such agreement could not be enforced by the children so as to prevent the survivor from changing the beneficiaries.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1898 George T. Savage obtained a benefit certificate in the Modern Woodman of America in favor of his wife, Nora L. Savage. The rules of the association authorized him to change the beneficiary at his pleasure. On July 13, 1908, he elected to constitute his son, Russell Savage, and his daughter, Mabel Sebree, the beneficiaries. Upon complying with the prescribed forms, he obtained, on July 16th, a new certificate designating them as such. Three days later he died. His widow brought action for the amount of the certificate, making the son and daughters parties. The association admitted indebtedness under one certificate or the other, and asked that the rights of the rival claimants be determined. A trial resulted in a judgment in favor of the widow, and the son and daughter, who will be referred to as the defendants, appeal.

The plaintiff's petition declared upon the original certificate. The defendants each filed an answer and cross petition setting out the change of beneficiary and the issuance of the new certificate. The plaintiff filed replies alleging in effect that George T. Savage had agreed with her that if she would help pay the premiums, he would never change the beneficiary; that she had done so for a term of years, thereby acquiring a vested right in the certificate; and that the attempted change was therefore ineffectual. The defendants demurred, and now urge that a reversal should be ordered upon the ground that the new matter in the replies constituted a departure from the petition; that, to have been available to the plaintiff, the allegations regarding the accrual of a vested right should have been inserted in the petition, instead of in the replies. As the issues were framed, the contention of each party was made clear, and in the trial neither was denied a full opportunity to develop the facts. Whether or not the plaintiff's pleadings presented a departure, and whether or not she should have been required to reshape them, the error, if any, did not prejudice the substantial rights of the defendants, and does not justify a reversal.

While there is some conflict on the subject, the weight of authority supports the view, which we think well founded in reason, that, where the designation of the beneficiary in a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association is made in pursuance of an agreement founded upon a sufficient consideration, the person designated acquires a vested interest, and, unless by reason of countervailing equities, cannot be displaced, although the rules of the association permit the member to change the beneficiary at will. Stronge v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. 189 N. Y. 346, 82 N. E. 433, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1207, note, 121 Am. St. Rep. 902, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 944, note. See also opinion in Great Camp, K. O. T. M. v. Savage, 135 Mich. 459, 98 N. W. 26.

"Where the member, upon taking out the certificate, makes an agreement with the beneficiary that the latter should pay the assessments, and that no substitution should be made, the beneficiary, upon performing this agreement, acquires a vested right." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 993.

"Equities may exist in favor of the original beneficiary which will preclude the member from substituting a new beneficiary who has no equity superior to that of the person originally designated. . . . An equity in favor of the original beneficiary, precluding the substitution of another in his place, may rest on a contract between him and the member, based on a sufficient consideration, by which he is to receive the benefits. Thus, if a member designates a beneficiary, or, having designated a beneficiary, delivers the certificate to him, on an agreement that he shall receive the benefits in consideration of past advances made by him, or present or future advances, or in consideration of his promise to pay dues and assessments, which promise is fulfilled, the member cannot thereafter substitute a different person as beneficiary." 29 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 128.

The defendants claim that there was no substantial evidence of any agreement on the part of George T. Savage to name and retain his wife as the beneficiary of his membership certificate. The argument is in part a challenge of the credibility of a portion of the testimony. A daughter of the plaintiff testified that she heard her father tell her mother that he intended to take out insurance for her if she would assist in paying the dues, and he would never change it. The plaintiff testified that he said substantially the same thing to the children in her presence. Her testimony is objected to as a violation of the statute reading: "No party shall be allowed to testify in his own behalf in respect to any transaction or communication had personally by such party with a deceased person, when the adverse party is the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, surviving partner, or assignee of such deceased person, where they have acquired title to the cause of action immediately from such deceased person." Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5914 (Code Civ. Proc. § 320). The plaintiff maintains that the rule has no application, because, she testified, that in the particular conversation to which she referred her husband addressed his remarks to the children more than to her. We think it unnecessary to indulge in this refinement. The statute does not apply because the defendants are not within its protection.

"The statutes are strictly construed in respect to the persons excluded from testifying, and the exclusion will not be extended by implication to a class of persons not named, though the reasons for embracing them may have been equally as strong as those which existed for excluding the persons expressly designated. . . . Where the statutes prohibit parties or persons interested from testifying when the adverse or opposite party sues or defends as trustee, guardian, executor, administrator, heir, legatee, devisee, etc., in order for such opposite party to be entitled to the protection of the statute, he must come within its terms, and, if the suit is not by or against parties in such enumerated classes, the other may testify. The rule only applies in favor of the persons named in the various statutes." 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 983, 1019.

The rule of strict construction is in full force in this state. A witness is deemed competent unless clearly rendered incompetent by the terms of the statute. Williams v. Campbell, 84 Kan. —, 113 Pac. 800, decided this session. The defendants are not, within the meaning of the law, heirs or next of kin of the deceased person, George T. Savage. They do not claim in that capacity or in virtue of that relationship, and the circumstance that they are so related to him does not enable them to invoke the statute. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1022, note 8; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1024, paragraph "f." They are not assignees of the decedent. "An assignment involves contractual relations. But the claim of a beneficiary is not based upon contract on his part." Shuman v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. 110 Iowa, 480, 482, 81 N. W. 717, 718. See also Crowell v. Northwestern Nat. L. Ins. Co. 140 Iowa, 258, 118 N. W. 412; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1023, ¶ "d." The supreme court of Michigan holds that under such circumstances the witness is disqualified. Franken v. Supreme Court, I. O. F. 152 Mich. 502, 116 N. W. 188. The ruling seems to have originated in Wallace v. Fraternal Mystic Circle, 127 Mich. 387, 86 N. W. 853, although it was there justified upon the ground that in principle it was controlled by an earlier decision. In the opinion it was said: "It is strenuously contended that the plaintiff is not a legatee, heir, or assignee, within the meaning of the statute. It is possibly correct to say that she does not come within the precise words of the statute, and, were the question entirely new, there might be ground for hesitancy. It should be kept in mind, however, that plaintiff is a beneficiary of the assured, and that, up to the time of his decease, he retained the power of disposition of his policy. She takes, therefore, by virtue of a right bestowed upon her by the deceased." At page 389 of 127 Mich. That case was followed in Great Camp, K. O. T. M. v. Savage, 135 Mich. 459, 98 N. W. 26, although two of the five justices dissented. The doctrine results from excluding witnesses who are within the reason of the statutory rule, although not within its terms, while the general practice and the practice in this state is to the contrary.

The defendants assert that there is nothing to show that the plaintiff ever accepted the proposition of her husband to make her the beneficiary if she would help pay the assessments. We think this may fairly be implied from the fact that she did render such assistance, and from her general course of conduct. There was evidence that many of the payments were the act of the plaintiff; but the defendants maintain that they were made from community money, of which the husband was, in legal contemplation, the owner; that an agreement of a wife to assist in maintaining such a common fund is in effect to promise to perform her marital duties, and cannot be made the basis of a business contract, within the rule of such cases as Dempster Mill Mfg. Co. v. Bundy, 64 Kan. 444, 56 L.R.A. 739, 67 Pac. 816. The plaintiff in a sense had no separate property. But there was evidence that at various times she was given money by her relatives, which she used in paying assessments; that she made money by keeping boarders and selling milk, eggs, and chickens; that, while her husband was on the police force, she borrowed money from her mother and started a grocery store, which was run in her husband's name, but which she personally managed for a considerable period. No separate sum was at any time set apart as belonging to her individually, and the assessments were paid out of the common fund, except where, as already noted, money furnished by her relatives was used for that purpose. In this state the married woman's field of individual action is enlarged beyond the bare letter of the statute. Her marriage does not deprive her of the legal capacity to enter into a personal contract. Harrington v. Lowe, 73 Kan. 1, 16, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 547, 84 Pac. 570. According to the usual interpretation of statutes similar to our own, the wife is entitled to treat as her separate property the proceeds of her labor outside of her ordinary household duties. 21 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1393; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 357. Here the plaintiff had a basis for the creation of an independent estate. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The fact that she permitted the proceeds of her efforts to be commingled with the community property ought not to operate to her prejudice in such a case as the present. It is unnecessary to review decisions made where the rights of creditors are concerned, for the questions there presented are very different from that now under discussion. Upon the plaintiff's version of the facts, she agreed to help pay the assessments and did so, using to that end in part, at least, the fruits of her own efforts exerted in a field beyond the scope of her marital obligation. This furnished a sufficient consideration for the agreement, notwithstanding her earnings were turned into the common fund. The judgment is affirmed.

THE SUPREME LODGE OF THE KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS

v.

LLOYD B. FERRELL, Appt.,
and
EDITH M. STANLEY, formerly Edith M. Ferrell.

Husband and wife — antenuptial contract — execution — validity.

1. In an action by a widow to maintain her rights derived through the execution of a parol antenuptial contract, the contract being executed by both parties thereto, the statute of frauds has no application. Such executed contract is valid.

Same — change of insurance policy.

2. Where, in the part performance of an antenuptial contract, a husband procures a change in a certificate of insurance in which his children were the sole beneficiaries, so as to make his wife an equal beneficiary with the children, and where she has fully executed the antenuptial contract on her part, she thereby obtains an equitable interest in the certificate, and he cannot thereafter, without her consent, surrender the certificate, and obtain the issuance of a new one in which a third party is named as the sole beneficiary, and thus divest her of her interest in the certificate which was procured pursuant to such contract.

Headnotes by SMITH, J.

Note. — The question of the effect of consideration moving from the beneficiary originally named in the certificate issued by a mutual benefit association, upon the right of the member to change beneficiaries, is discussed in the note to Savage v. Modern Woodmen, ante, 773.

Insurance — rights of beneficiary — possession of policy.

3. The rights of a beneficiary named in a certificate of insurance in no wise depend upon the possession thereof by the beneficiary.

APPEAL by defendant Ferrell from a judgment of the District Court for Sedgwick County in favor of defendant Stanley in an action brought to determine rights under a certificate issued by a fraternal insurance company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kos Harris and V. Harris, for appellant:

The antenuptial agreement was contrary to the statute of frauds, being an agreement made in consideration of marriage.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Supreme Lodge of the Knights of Pythias, a fraternal insurance corporation, commenced this action, and in its petition alleged that one George Ferrell, deceased, was at the time of his death a member in good standing of the organization; that he had a benefit certificate for $3,000; that the amount was due upon the certificate, and that the corporation was ready to pay, but that there was a dispute as to who among the parties whom it made defendants in the action, namely, Lloyd B. Ferrell, Edith M. Stanley (formerly Ferrell, (Adele C. Ferrell, and Paul H. Ferrell, was entitled to receive payment. Lloyd B. Ferrell answered and alleged that he was entitled to the entire sum of $3,000 under the certificate. Edith M. Stanley answered, and alleged that she was entitled to the sum of $1,000 of the amount of the certificate. The defendants Adele C. Ferrell and Paul H. Ferrell did not appear.

The undisputed facts are that about May, 1885, George Ferrell became a member of the association, and took out a certificate for $3,000 payable to his wife, Mary E. Ferrell; that some time prior to the 14th day of June, 1899, Mary E. Ferrell died, leaving two children, Adele C. Ferrell and Paul H. Ferrell; that on June 14, 1899, George Ferrell surrendered the certificate and took out a new one, naming his two children as the beneficiaries; that on the 10th day of January, 1901, he surrendered the second certificate and took out a new one for the same amount, payable to Edith M. Ferrell, his then wife, and to his two children, in the sum of $1,000 to each; and that the last-named certificate remained in force until about the 5th of December, 1907, when George Ferrell surrendered it and took out a new certificate for the same amount, making Lloyd B. Ferrell, his brother, the sole beneficiary, and that shortly thereafter, and before the commencement of this action, George Ferrell died.

In her answer, Edith M. Stanley alleges that, prior to her marriage to George Ferrell, and at a time when his two children stood as the beneficiaries of the certificate, George Ferrell proposed to her that, if she would marry him and care for his children, he would provide her a home and care for her, and would have the certificate changed so that she should receive $1,000 from the benefit certificate and each of the children $1,000, in case of his death before her death; that, in consideration of such promise, she consented to marry him and did marry him, and that he executed the antenuptial contract by surrendering the old certificate, and procuring a new one to be issued in accordance with the terms of his agreement; and that the subsequent change of the certificate, making it payable entirely to Lloyd B. Ferrell, was without her consent, and in violation of her rights under the contract. This claim Lloyd B. Ferrell denied, and a trial of the issue thus formed was had to the court and a jury. Until Edith M. Stanley had offered her evidence, Lloyd B. Ferrell had demurred thereto, and the court had overruled the demurrer, whereupon the parties agreed that the jury should be discharged and the case decided by the court, Lloyd B. Ferrell reserving his exceptions to the ruling on the demurrer to the evidence. The court rendered judgment in favor of Edith M. Stanley as to the amount claimed. To reverse this judgment, Lloyd B. Ferrell brings the case here.

Edith M. Stanley, being called as a witness in her own behalf, was asked to relate the conversation by which the alleged antenuptial contract was made. An objection was made thereto on the grounds that the contract, not being in writing, was void. The objection was overruled and the ruling is assigned as an error. Section 3838, Gen. Stat. 1909 (Laws 1905, chap. 266, § 1), being a portion of the statutes to prevent frauds and perjuries, reads in part: "No action shall be brought whereby . . . to charge any person upon any agreement made upon a consideration of marriage." It is urged that this provision makes the contract absolutely void, and for that reason proof of it should not be allowed. The statute does not render the contract void, but, to prevent the perpetration of frauds and perjuries, to which the nature of the transaction lends great inducement and facility, it is provided that no action shall be maintained on such a contract unless it is in writing. The reason that the statutory provision fails where the antenuptial contract has been fully executed is that proof of the rights of the parties under the contract no longer rests upon the testimony of the party asserting it, or upon the statements of others who may have heard it or claimed to have heard it. Where the contract has been fully executed, as this antenuptial agreement is claimed to have been the action is not upon the original contract, but is usually to retain the benefits which have accrued therefrom. The original contract in such an action is immaterial, except to explain the consideration for which the benefits were received. In some states it has been held that an antenuptial contract is no consideration for a marriage, but that has never been held by this court. Hafer v. Neddo, 33 Kan. 449, 6 Pac. 537; Neddo v. Neddo, 56 Kan. 607, 44 Pac. 1.

St. Rep. 517, 81 Pac. 183, it was said: "An oral agreement made in consideration of marriage, that after the marriage a debt of one of the contracting parties to the other shall be mutually regarded as paid, is fully performed when the marriage takes place, and is not thereafter affected by the statute of frauds." (Syllabus.) In the opinion it is said: "The statute of frauds does not render void the verbal contracts to which it refers. They are valid for all purposes except that of suit. Stout v. Ennis, 28 Kan. 706. The parties may perform them if they desire, and when performed the statute has no application to them. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 829, 941." The objection was properly overruled.

It is contended that the court erred in permitting this witness to testify, referring to her husband and the policy that "he gave it to me." It is contended that this was a transaction between the witness and her husband during the time that the marriage relation existed, and that the opposing party, Lloyd B. Ferrell, was the legal representative of the deceased. The provision of the statute invoked to sustain this objection is a part of § 5914, Gen. Stat. 1909, and reads: "No party shall be allowed to testify in his own behalf in respect to any transaction or communication had personally by such party with a deceased person, when the adverse party is the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, surviving partner, or assignee of such deceased person, where they have acquired title to the cause of action immediately from such deceased person." On the other hand, it is contended that Lloyd B. Ferrell did not acquire title to the cause of action immediately from the deceased; that the deceased had no title to the certificate, and could derive no benefit therefrom; that he had only the naked power under the certificate of designating or appointing the beneficiary under the rules of the corporation; that the certificate did not pass from the deceased to Lloyd B. Ferrell by assignment, or for any consideration paid or agreed to be paid therefor by Lloyd B. Ferrell. We are inclined in favor of the latter contention, but regard this controversy as quite immaterial. The objection that the witness should not have been allowed to testify to this statement, on the ground that she was the wife of the deceased at the time it is said to have been made, should probably have been sustained, but, if it was erroneous to allow the statement, it was likewise immaterial. If the deceased contracted in consideration of marriage to change the certificate as claimed, and Edith M. Stanley performed her part of the contract relying upon such agreement, and thereafter her husband performed his part of the contract, by having the certificate changed as he agreed to do, the contract thereby became fully executed, and the wife had a vested interest in that policy of which her husband could not divest her without her consent. Stronge v. Supreme Lodge, K. P. 189 N. Y. 346, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1206, case note; Bunnell v. Shilling, 17 Can. Law Times Occ. N. 121. It is immaterial whether he gave her the policy or whether she ever saw it. Probably three fourths of the beneficiaries in insurance policies never even see, much less have in their possession, the policies which are made for their benefit. Indeed, under the circumstances of that case, it was held in Weld v. Weld, supra, in substance, that where an antenuptial contract is made, and the marriage is celebrated in reliance thereon, that the marriage ipso facto discharges the previously existing indebtedness between the contracting parties in accordance with the antenuptial agreement.

In this case Edith M. Stanley produced in court and introduced in evidence the certificate which she claimed was made in execution of the contract, and which designated herself and the two children as beneficiaries. How she came by that certificate is quite immaterial. The presumption would probably be that she came by it lawfully. But, as before stated, the material fact in determining whether George Ferrell executed the antenuptial contract on his part is whether he procured the issuance of the certificate in accordance with the terms of the contract. The marriage on her part, and the procuring of the certificate in accordance with the terms of the agreement by him, executed the contract entirely.

The order of the court overruling the demurrer to the evidence of Edith M. Stanley is also assigned as error, but it follows from what we have said that no error can be predicated thereon.

We find no prejudicial error in the proceedings, and the judgment is affirmed.

Mr. John B. McIlwain for appellee insurance company.

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The issues raised by the answers to complainant's bill of interpleader are sufficiently indicated in the opinion of the learned trial judge as follows: "On July 23, 1896, Asa B. Sharp and his first wife, Minnie D. Sharp, lived in the village of Yale, St. Clair county, Michigan. At that time he was thirty years of age and his wife twenty-eight. They had five small children. He was a laboring man, and his family was dependent on his earnings for support. Some time prior to the above-named date, the husband and wife entered into a contract by the terms of which he agreed he would take out a policy of insurance in complainant order, in which his wife should be named as beneficiary and so remain during her life and his, and, in case his wife should die before he did, that their children should always remain the beneficiaries; the wife agreed she would take out a policy of insurance in the Ladies of the Maccabees, a woman's fraternal benefit association, in which her husband should be named as beneficiary, and so remain during his life and hers, and, in case her husband should die before she did, that their children should always remain the beneficiaries. The consideration for this agreement on the part of each was the promise made by the other. The object of this mutual agreement was the protection of the children. The testimony of one witness, Grace O'Dell, goes to the extent of tending to show the existence of this contract prior to the time the policies were issued to the husband and wife, as hereinafter stated, while three other witnesses testify to having heard the husband and wife, in the presence of each other, state what their contract in this regard had been, after or about the time of the issuance of the policies. On July 23, 1896, a policy for $1,000 was issued by complainant association to Asa B. Sharp, in which his wife was named as beneficiary, and on the same date a policy of like amount was issued by the Ladies of the Maccabees to Minnie D. Sharp, in which her husband was named as beneficiary. After these policies were taken out, Asa B. Sharp was laid up for a time with sickness, and was unable to earn money to support his family and to keep up his assessments or his wife's assessments, on these policies of insurance. It appears from the testimony, that during this time, Minnie D. Sharp, relying on the agreement with her husband, as heretofore recited, went out washing, housecleaning, and doing other work, in order to obtain money to support the family and to keep up the assessments on these policies, and it appears that she did for a time, at least, pay some of the assessments on her husband's policy. On January 1, 1902, Minnie D. Sharp deceased, and the proceeds of her policy in the Ladies of the Maccabees were paid to her husband, Asa B. Sharp, who had remained the beneficiary in her certificate since the time it was issued. On August 17, 1904, Asa B. Sharp married Melinda Sharp, now his widow. At this time she was a widow with several children, living on her own farm in Lapeer county, Michigan. On April 19, 1906, Asa B. Sharp signed a paper revoking his former designation of beneficiary in his policy, and designated Melinda Sharp, his wife, as the new beneficiary. At the time he did this, he was sufficiently sound in his mind to know who was his former beneficiary, to know to whom payments of benefits would be made in case of his death without any change in his certificate, to know and keep in mind his minor children, who were dependent upon him. He had been sick before this date, and had not fully recovered his physical strength, and, perhaps, not his normal mental powers, but he was sufficiently strong and sound mentally to transact and understand ordinary business affairs. Asa B. Sharp surrendered his first certificate, and on May 8, 1906, a new one was issued to him by complainant association, in which claimant, Melinda Sharp, was named as beneficiary, and she remained as such designated beneficiary up to the time of her husband's death." He concludes that each of said mutual promises was good consideration for the other, and that on the death of Minnie D. Sharp the agreement became fully executed on her part, and the husband concluded from changing the beneficiary in his policy.

Two questions are presented, being, first, whether the parol agreement alleged to have been made by and between Asa B. Sharp and his first wife, Minnie, was in fact made; and, second, whether, if made, Asa was thereby precluded from making a change of beneficiary.

1. As to the question of fact, it is to be considered that the certificates issued by complainant have no value during the life of the assured except the value of the right to keep them in force. There is no cash or other surrender value, and default in the payment of the assessments which are levied avoids the contract. An agreement by the assured that he will never change the beneficiary named in his certificate is of no value to anyone, unless the assessments are paid to the time of his death. The evidence relied upon to prove a mutual agreement between Asa Sharp and his wife Minnie, that neither would ever change the beneficiaries named in their respective certificates, is exceedingly vague and unsatisfactory, and is found in the testimony of witnesses who attempt to tell of conversations and statements made in their presence by one or both of the contracting parties. The desire of both the husband and wife to make some provision for each other and, directly or indirectly, for their children, is manifested by their becoming members of complainant, taking out the certificates and paying assessments. The statements and conversations related by the witnesses evidence little, if anything, more than this. It is true that one or more witnesses testify to a conclusion that an agreement existed between the husband and wife that the certificate held by the survivor of them should be payable to the children. For example, a witness testified: "Mr. and Mrs. Sharp agreed before me, in my presence, that they should take out insurance in the Maccabees, his drawn to her, and hers to him, as long as they lived, and after her death his should run to the children, and after his death hers should run to the children, and never should be changed." But when they detail what was said, it amounts to little more than the statement of facts already related, namely, that by the terms of the certificates and the laws of complainant, the certificates, if in force at the death of either, would benefit either the survivor or the children and, if the survivor, then, indirectly, the children also. The testimony gains no extended meaning from the fact that either paid assessments levied upon the other at the cost of personal labor and inconvenience. In doing so, especially during the sickness of one of them, only ordinary self-interest was served. It is a fair, if not a necessary, inference from the testimony, that the husband paid the assessments upon both certificates except upon occasion or occasions when he was ill, when his wife Minnie, paid them. Nor does the testimony acquire any extended or peculiar meaning from the fact that, upon the death of Minnie, Asa received the benefit of the fund payable according to her certificate. He was the beneficiary named in the certificate. In other words, there is nothing peculiar in the facts that a husband and wife each took out a certificate payable to the other, that either paid assessments upon both certificates, and that the husband, after the death of the wife, received what her certificate promised him, the death benefit. They are material facts here only upon the theory that they occurred in the carrying out of mutual promises, the making of which must be otherwise established. It seems that in the contest made before the complainant's tribunal, the minors asserted, as reason for refusing payment to the beneficiary named in the policy, that their father, the assured, was not mentally competent to make a change of beneficiaries, and they asserted no other reason. This, also, was one of the issues of fact raised by the answer. This was an issue the children could rightfully raise, since, after the death of their mother, they were, by the rules of complainant, the contract beneficiaries. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. McGrath, 133 Mich. 626, 95 N. W. 739; Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Frank, 133 Mich. 232, 94 N. W. 731. It is significant that both grounds for contest were not asserted before the suit was begun.

2. Assuming the mutual promises never to change beneficiaries to have been made as is claimed, upon what theory may the children enforce the contract? No promise was made to them or any of them, no consideration for the promise moved from them. The agreement related to no fund in existence. No trust was created. I find no reason for thinking that the parties were not at liberty, at any time, to revoke their promises. It is true that after the death of the mother there could be no mutual revocation, but, unless some legal interest in the performance of the promise vested in the children when the promise of the father was made, such interest never vested.

It is the general rule in England that a third person cannot become entitled, by the contract itself, to demand the performance of any duty under the contract. Pollock, Contr. 7th ed. 199. The rule, contracts creating trusts aside, is the same whether such enforcement is attempted at law or in equity. Id. 213. In this state the English rule has been followed when the attempted enforcement of the contract by a third person was at law. Pipp v. Reynolds, 20 Mich. 88; Turner v. McCarty, 22 Mich. 265; Hicks v. McGarry, 38 Mich. 667; Hunt v. Strew, 39 Mich. 368; Hidden v. Chappel, 48 Mich. 527, 12 N. W. 687; Edwards v. Clements, 81 Mich. 513, 45 N. W. 1107; Linneman v. Moross, 98 Mich. 178, 39 Am.

St. Rep. 528, 57 N. W. 103. There is a well-recognized exception to the rule in England, as to the provisions contained in a settlement made upon and in consideration of marriage, for the benefit of children to be born of the marriage. Whether there is, in that jurisdiction, any other or further exception, may be doubted. Tweddle v. Atkinson, 1 Best & S. 303, 30 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 265, 8 Jur. N. S. 332, 4 L. T. N. S. 468, 9 Week. Rep. 781. See also Exchange Bank v. Rice, 107 Mass. 37, 9 Am. Rep. 1; Marston v. Bigelow, 150 Mass. 45, 5 L.R.A. 43, 22 N. E. 71, and, generally, Pollock, Contr. 7th ed. chap. 5; Harriman, Contr. 2d ed. pp. 212-216; 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 374-385. The contention of appellees is that the principle underlying the English exception to the rule should be extended, at least in equity, so as to support the enforcement by children of contracts made by their father or mother, with each other or with strangers, for their benefit, and Buchanan v. Tilden, 158 N. Y. 109, 44 L.R.A. 170, 70 Am. St. Rep. 454, 52 N. E. 724, is cited and relied upon. The courts of New York do not follow the English rule. In the case cited, a woman was permitted to recover in an action at law a sum of money which defendant had promised her husband to pay to her upon a consideration moving from the husband and others to the defendant and others. The sum of money promised to be paid to the wife was $50,000. The trial court gave her judgment. The appellate division of the supreme court reversed the judgment, and the court of appeals reversed the appellate division by a vote of four to three of the judges. It will be discovered from the opinion that the points involved, and concerning which the judges disagreed, were whether the promise made by the defendant to the third person was upon a valid consideration, and whether the promisee had a legal interest that the contract be performed in favor of the plaintiff. If these things appeared, then, under the rule laid down in Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, and Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 32 N. E. 49, plaintiff was entitled to enforce the contract at law. The majority opinion concludes with the statement, that "the case at bar is decided upon its peculiar facts. We do not hold that the mere relation of husband and wife alone constituted a sufficient consideration to enable the plaintiff to maintain this action. We deem it unnecessary to decide that question at this time. What we do hold is that the equities of the plaintiff [her interest as an adopted child, who, in conscience and equity, but not legally, was entitled to a share of the fund sought to be recovered, and 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) which was recovered by defendant with the aid of plaintiff's husband] were such that, when considered in connection with the duty of her husband to provide for her future, and with that purpose in view the money was procured for the defendant to institute and pursue the necessary litigation to secure the fund to which her equities related, all taken together, were sufficient to sustain the plaintiff's action."

It cannot be said that the decision sustains appellee's contention, and we are referred to none in which the general rule in force here is recognized which does sustain it. The general rule in this state is regarded as settled. I see no reason for saying that it is not the same in proceedings at law and in equity. To what extent and under what circumstances an exception to the rule should be recognized in favor of the enforcement by children of contracts (other than those creating trusts) made for their direct or indirect benefit, by persons nearly related to them or by those sustaining the duty to provide for them, is a subject which needs to be considered no further than this, that the mutual promises of a father and mother who each hold the certificate of a beneficial association in which the other is named as beneficiary, never to change the beneficiaries so named, create no legal or equitable interest of the children in the fund derived on the death of the surviving parent, although, if no such change had been made, they would have been the legal beneficiaries, and although the mutual promises of the parents contemplated that in such case they should be the legal beneficiaries.

The case presented is ruled precisely as it would be ruled if the children, in the lifetime of the father, were seeking specific performance of the alleged contract, or an injunction to restrain a threatened change of beneficiaries. It may be added, although the suggestion relates rather to the facts than to the law, that the children, appellees, appear to have no particular claim, as against the appellant, to equitable consideration. It is not claimed that appellant knew of any arrangement between her husband and his former wife about life insurance. His relation to her is a sufficient reason for insuring his life for her benefit. If, instead of pursuing the method of substituting one beneficiary for another, he had refused to pay assessments, thus permitting the original certificate to lapse, and procured one in which appellant was named as beneficiary, it is clear that her right to any fund derived therefrom, and from his death, would be unassailable.

The decree below, except as to the provision for costs to complainant, is reversed, and a decree will be entered in this court for the payment of the fund to the appellant, who will recover of the appellees the costs of both courts.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

SALATHIEL MASTIN, Resp't.,

v.

CITY OF NEW YORK, Appt.

(201 N. Y. 81, 94 N. E. 611.)

Highway — taking picture in — using focusing cloth — negligence.

One who, for the purpose of taking a picture, stands on the curb of a public street, and, after satisfying himself that the only vehicle in sight is standing still 100 to 150 feet away, covers his head with the focusing cloth, and keeps it so covered for five minutes, is guilty of such negligence that he cannot hold the owner of the vehicle liable for injury caused by its running against him, although the owner of the vehicle is APPEAL by defendant from a judgment entered in the office of the Clerk of Kings County upon an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James D. Bell, with Mr. Archibald R. Watson, for appellant:

There was an entire failure of proof on the part of the plaintiff to show defendant's negligence or his own freedom from contributory negligence, and the judgment en-

Note. — Voluntary obstruction of view while on highway as contributory negligence.

There appears to be no case directly in point with MASTIN v. New York, which holds a photographer guilty of negligence in covering his head with a focusing cloth on a highway, as a consequence of which he is struck by a city ash cart. However, the following cases are set out for the purpose of showing the attitude of the court in somewhat similar instances:

In Undhejem v. Hastings, 38 Minn. 485, 38 N. W. 488, it was held a question for the jury whether plaintiff, who was struck and injured by a buggy, was guilty of negligence in going along the street picking up articles he had dropped, without looking to see if any vehicle might be coming along the street behind him.

And in Nead v. Roscoe Lumber Co. 54 App. Div. 621, 66 N. Y. Supp. 419, the question of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence was for the jury, where plaintiff was struck and injured by a passing wagon while his horse was at a watering trough, and he stood three or four minutes engaged in tightening the cover at the rear of his cart, without looking about him.

So, in Jones v. Swift & Co. 30 Wash. 462, 70 Pac. 1109, where one, while working in an excavation in the street, was injured by barriers guarding the pit being knocked down upon him by a passing wagon, it was held a question for the jury whether he was negligent in going into the pit with the barrels and boards surrounding the pit unsecurely fastened. "It does not necessarily follow," said the court, "that because these barrels and boards were placed loosely around the pit, respondent must be held to know that they were likely to be knocked into the pit. They were placed on top of an embankment which was from 2 to 3 feet high, and which of itself was sufficient to lead one to suppose that teams would in daytime avoid it. The barrels and boards were out of the reach of ordinary travel upon the street, and one would naturally suppose that no one would drive upon or ordinarily go upon the embankment so as to interfere therewith. If the barrels and boards were so placed as to lead an ordinarily reasonable person to believe that no one would knock them down, it was not negligence for the plaintiff to go into the pit with the barrels and boards so placed."

And in Anselment v. Daniell, 4 Misc. 144, 23 N. Y. Supp. 875, plaintiff was held not guilty of contributory negligence where, while paving a street near a railroad track, he suddenly turned to readjust a paving block without looking for approaching vehicles, and was struck by the hub of a wagon driven rapidly along the track. "Plaintiff," said the court, "was lawfully and necessarily in the roadway, engaged in the performance of duty. He was absolutely safe from all risk of injury by passing vehicles, excepting only such as would arise from the negligence of the drivers of those vehicles,—a risk which was avoidable by the drivers with the exercise of ordinary care. Upon their exercise of such care, plaintiff had a right to rely. He was not obliged to anticipate their wanton and reckless conduct, unless, indeed, it may be successfully claimed that greater vigilance is required to escape the imputation of contributory negligence than to avoid a just charge of negligence; that extraordinary care is required to avoid being injured, and ordinary care only to avoid doing injury. Plaintiff's occupation imperatively demanded his attention and the use of his eyes. The noise of approaching vehicles was unavoidably inaudible to him.

Mr. Martin T. Manton, for respondent:

The question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was a question of fact for the jury, and their verdict is in accord with the weight of evidence, and should stand.

New York, 83 App. Div. 212, 82 N. Y. Supp. 44; Malizia v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 127 App. Div. 202, 110 N. Y. Supp. 1003; Campbell v. Wood, 22 App.

His person was plainly visible to the drivers of approaching vehicles,—a fact in itself sufficient to excite the caution of an ordinarily prudent person. To hold him, employed as he was, to the exercise of constant vigilance, to avoid injury from the want of ordinary care on the part of the drivers of vehicles incessantly passing on a public thoroughfare, means either that he must expose himself and his fellow workmen to the risk of injury from inattentive performance of his work, or that he must abandon his work altogether. We are unable to see wherein plaintiff was at fault, and without fault he cannot be said to have been guilty of contributory negligence."

In Menger v. Laur, 55 N. J. L. 205, 20 L.R.A. 61, 26 Atl. 180, where a surveyor's instrument was injured by a passing vehicle, and plaintiffs were held guilty of contributory negligence in exposing the instrument to danger by leaving it standing in the public highway, the court said, "Set up in the roadway, the person in charge of the instrument knew that it was liable to injury from passing vehicles driven with the utmost care. He left the instrument exposed to injury without anyone to look after its safety, or to warn persons of its presence. His negligence was an immediate concurring and co-operative cause of the injury, within the rule which debars a plaintiff from recovering damages for the injury sustained."

In Lyons v. Avis, 5 App. Div. 193, 38 N. Y. Supp. 1104, an action by one who was run over by a truck while stooping over in the street mixing mortar, it was held correct to charge that "it is the duty of one using the street for the purpose of mixing mortar or filling the same into a hod, to use diligence in avoiding danger, especially in looking out for teams, and if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff did not use such diligence, and by reason whereof met with this accident, he cannot recover from this defendant."

In Wheeler v. Gibbon, 126 N. C. 811, 36 S. E. 277, plaintiff, who was injured by being struck by a rapidly approaching buggy, was held guilty of contributory negligence in crossing the street in a violent storm with his head hid behind an umbrella.

And in Evans v. Adams Exp. Co. 122 Ind. 362, 7 L.R.A. 678, 23 N. E. 1039, it is held that to stand in the carriage way of a public street at night engaged in conversation, heedless of horses and vehicles that are passing, is such negligence as will prevent recovery for injuries resulting from being thrown down by a wagon, the driver of which did not see the person injured, although the driver also was negligent. The court said: "It cannot be said as a matter of law that standing in the carriageway of a public street in a city in the dark, and engaging in conversation, without using sufficient vigilance to discover a slowly approaching horse and vehicle, may not preclude the recovery of damages for injuries resulting from the inattention of the driver. The degree of vigilance must always be in proportion to the danger which is reasonably to be apprehended from the situation in which one voluntarily places himself, and if a footman selects the carriage way of a public street as a place at which to hold converse with his friends after nightfall, he may know that the situation and occasion are such as to demand more than ordinary vigilance, to avoid contact with vehicles in the charge of inattentive drivers who are not looking out to avoid footmen standing in the way."

As to care required from one of defective sight in using streets, see note in 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 648.

Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Unless the rule which requires affirmative proof of the absence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is to be ignored in actions to recover damages for personal injuries, it seems to me that this judgment must be reversed. As I view the evidence, not only was there a failure to furnish affirmative proof that the plaintiff was not himself at fault, as in the case of Whalen v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. 151 N. Y. 70, 45 N. E. 363, but the plaintiff's own testimony demonstrates his contributory negligence, as in the case of Dolfini v. Erie R. Co. 178 N. Y. 1, 70 N. E. 68.

The plaintiff, who was a photographer, was injured on Washington street, in the borough of Brooklyn, while engaged in taking a photograph of a building on that street. He was struck by a wagon belonging to the street cleaning department of the city of New York. The accident occurred between half past 1 and 2 o'clock in the afternoon, on December 27, 1906. In order to take the picture, the plaintiff placed his camera, which was supported by a tripod, on the sidewalk near the curb. The only vehicle which he then saw was the city ash cart which subsequently struck him. This was standing about 100 or 150 feet down the street. The plaintiff stood right at the edge of the curb,—he is not certain that one foot may not have projected over the curb into the highway,—and covered his face with a dark cloth in order to focus the instrument. While his vision was thus obscured, the cart came along, and some portion of the vehicle struck his hip, and knocked him down into the gutter. From the time when he thus covered his head with the dark cloth until the ash cart collided with his body a period of five minutes elapsed, during which he was practically blind to what was going on in the highway; and it is the fact that he voluntarily thus blinded himself for such a length of time in such a situation, which seems to me conclusive evidence that he was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. To affirm this judgment would be to hold that it can be regarded as the act of a reasonably careful person to shut one's eyes and stand on the edge of a sidewalk in a busily traveled public street in a great city for five minutes at a time. I do not think that any court has heretofore gone so far as to pronounce such conduct prudent.

I fix the time during which the plaintiff stood at the curb with the cloth over his head as five minutes, because the plaintiff repeatedly testified to that period as his best judgment. When he was asked by his own counsel how long he was under the cloth focusing the camera before the wagon struck him, he answered: "Well, it takes from three to five minutes to focus on a building of that size. I couldn't tell exactly the time." He was then asked to give his best judgment, and said: "Well, it was not over five minutes. It was the same ash cart that struck me that I saw down the street. There was no person on the wagon at all at the time." Again, upon cross-examination he testified in reference to this matter of time as follows:

Q. Mr. Mastin, in this attitude, with your camera pointing toward the store the picture of which you were taking, as you were standing as you have stated, not remembering or not knowing, recalling at this time whether you were bending or whether one foot was or was not beyond the curb and in the street, and the cloth over your head and face,—how long a time did that last, taking those things together?

A. Well, it takes, as I said, from three to five minutes to focus. I couldn't tell you exactly the minute. I am quite sure that it was not any longer than that. I saw the wagon standing perhaps 100 to 150 feet down the street, as near as I could judge.

And still further on in the course of his cross-examination he repeated that it was not over five minutes during which he had the cloth over his head before he was struck. These repeated references to five minutes justify, and I think require us to accept, that estimate of time as the period which really elapsed during which the plaintiff's head was covered with his camera cloth; and, as I have already intimated, it seems to me too clear for argument that it was contributory negligence as matter of law to assume such a position in such a place under such circumstances for such a length of time.

My Brother Werner's suggestion in the dissenting opinion, that the question of contributory negligence should be deemed a question of fact for the jury, instead of being decided against him as a question of law, because a majority of all the judges who have considered the case have entertained that view, would preclude us from ever reversing a judgment of this character for contributory negligence, when there were three dissents in this court. He concedes that instances may arise where persons engaged in lawful street occupations are so affirmatively careless as to preclude them, as matter of law, from recovering for injuries which they sustain through the negligence of others, but declares that the case at bar does not belong in that category. This is the precise point upon which we differ. He would be entirely right if the element of time could properly be disregarded; but we think that the time during which the plaintiff voluntarily blinded himself was too long to be excusable, upon any reasonable theory of prudent conduct.

In the course of the development of the law of imputed negligence as applied to municipalities, the courts have gone very far in the direction of charging the defendants with a pretty strict and rigorous degree of liability in the maintenance of the public streets in a safe condition for travel. Surely, it is not requisite for the protection of the public to extend this liability so as to make a city responsible for an accident which befalls a person who is imprudent enough to do what the plaintiff did in this case.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

Cullen, Ch. J., and Gray and Collin, JJ., concur.

Werner, J., dissenting:

Although I have always been consistently opposed to the writing and publication of dissenting opinions which cannot influence decisions, I am constrained by the peculiar circumstances of this case to record the reasons for my dissent from the decision about to be made.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff. Upon pleadings which fairly state the issues of defendant's alleged negligence, and the plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence, the case was brought to trial. At the close of the evidence for the plaintiff, the learned counsel for the defendant moved to dismiss the complaint upon the grounds that the plaintiff had failed to establish the defendant's negligence and his own freedom from contributory negligence. The court reserved its decision until the close of all the evidence, when the motion was renewed and denied. The case went to the jury, and the plaintiff was given a verdict. From the judgment entered, there was an appeal to the appellate division, which resulted in an affirmance with one dissenting vote. The case is now before us upon the defendant's appeal, and the sole question to be decided is whether the evidence bearing upon the defendant's alleged negligence and the plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence presented issues of fact for submission to a jury, or issues of law to be decided by the court.

Thus far five judges have held that the evidence presents questions of fact for the arbitrament of a jury. Three judges of this court are of the same opinion. When the decision of this court goes down, therefore, eight judges will have held that the case was properly submitted to a jury, and four will have decided that the evidence of defendant's negligence is so weak, and the evidence of plaintiff's contributory negligence is so strong, that both of these issues should be decided against the plaintiff as matter of law. While this disparity in number does not create a presumption that the majority are right, it does emphasize the fact that judges, who of all men are supposed to be intelligent and reasonable, are sharply disagreeing over the question whether certain evidence presents a state of facts from which intelligent and reasonable laymen can draw divergent conclusions. That is a situation which furnishes the precise test which, in actions of this class, has always been applied in differentiating a case for the jury from one for the court. We have often said that, when reasonable and intelligent men may differ as to what facts have been established, or may draw antagonistic inferences from undisputed facts, the case is one for a jury. Smith v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 177 N. Y. 224, 229, 69 N. E. 427, and cases there cited. For the purpose of demonstrating that this case was properly for the jury, I shall briefly refer to the controlling facts.

The plaintiff, a photographer, was engaged in taking a picture of a building in Washington street in the city of New York. He placed his camera on the edge of the sidewalk so that, in looking through the lens to get the proper focus, he stood upon the curb with both feet or with one foot in the gutter. Before covering his head with the cloth or mantle which is a familiar part of a photographer's outfit, he looked about him and saw a city ash cart standing at distance of 100 feet or 150 feet from the point where his camera was planted. The driver of the cart and another city employee stood by the cart engaged in conversation. The plaintiff covered his head and proceeded to focus his camera. While thus engaged, he was struck by some portion of the wheel of the ash cart, and sustained the injuries of which he complains. The horse drawing the ash cart was unattended by the driver, and it is undisputed that the horse was started by the driver. The only conflict of evidence was whether the horse was thus started from a point 100 or 150 feet distant from the plaintiff's camera, or only 50 feet distant therefrom, and whether the driver was then actually engaged in gathering ashes from houses in that part of the street, or permitted his horse to move unattended from the place where the driver and another city employee are said to have been engaged in conversation.

Upon these facts the first question is whether there was evidence upon which a jury could base a finding of negligence against the defendant. As the plaintiff is entitled to the most favorable view which the jury might have taken of the evidence, the question whether the defendant was negligent or not must be considered upon the assumption that the ash cart stood 100 or 150 feet from the plaintiff's camera, and that the horse attached to the cart was permitted by the driver to move unattended and unguided along the street to the place where the plaintiff was struck. One can easily imagine circumstances in which such conduct on the part of a driver would be negligence as a matter of law. It may be conceded that the facts of this case would not warrant such a conclusion, but I think the evidence as to the defendant's negligence clearly presented a question for the jury.

It is argued, however, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and I suppose that is to be the ground upon which the judgment of the appellate division is to be reversed. In considering that question we must, of course, ascertain what the plaintiff did or omitted to do that constitutes negligence on his part. No one will deny that he was lawfully upon the sidewalk for a lawful purpose. He had the right to be employed by the owner of the building for the purpose of making a photograph, and that included the right to do whatever was necessary and proper in the completion of his task. It is said that he was negligent in covering his head with the cloth which was an indispensable part of his equipment. It would be just as reasonable to argue that a surveyor, engaged in his lawful work, would be guilty of negligence in turning his back upon a portion of a street while he was looking through his instrument in the opposite direction; or that a lineman employed in stringing wires would be negligent because he pulled backward instead of turning around and pulling forward; or that a person engaged in moving a push cart in the street would be guilty of negligence because he was facing the direction in which he was pushing the cart, instead of walking backwards. There may be instances, of course, in which persons engaged in lawful street occupation may be so affirmatively careless as to preclude them, as matter of law, from recovering for injuries which they sustain through the negligence of others. The case at bar does not belong in that category.

Here the question is whether it was negligence per se for the plaintiff to plant his camera on the edge of the sidewalk, and cover his head which he was getting a proper focus for a picture. When he did that, he looked and saw the defendant's ash cart at least 100 feet away, with the driver in a position which gave the plaintiff the right to assume that the horse would not be started except under proper guidance and control. In these circumstances, I submit, it was a question for the jury whether the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident that caused his injuries.

The judgment of the appellate division should be affirmed, with costs.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF IOWA

v.

O'NEIL, Appt.

(147 Iowa, 513, 126 N. W. 454.)

Intoxicating liquor — illegal sale — change of court ruling — effect.

One cannot be punished for selling intoxicating liquor at a time when the prohibitory law is, by decision of the highest court of the state, unconstitutional, although that court subsequently changes its opinion and holds the law to be valid.

Note. — Criminal responsibility for violation of a statute after a judicial ruling that it was unconstitutional, and before that ruling had been changed.

No case directly in point has been discovered. Perhaps, the case most nearly in point is Ingersoll v. State, 11 Ind. 464. In that case the defendant was convicted of selling liquor by retail without a license pursuant to the liquor act of 1853, the prosecution having been commenced after the liquor law of 1855 went into force, which law expressly repealed all former laws in conflict with it. It appeared that for three years after the passage of the act of 1855, the court was equally divided as to the constitutionality of that portion of it inhibiting the retail of liquors, thus leaving that portion in force during that time. Subsequently, however, the act of 1855 was held unconstitutional and void. The conviction was reversed upon the ground that under the circumstances it would be unjust and in violation of principle of right to hold that the act of 1853 was all the time in force and the people incurring its penalties. The court remarked that to so hold would make the law a concealed trap to catch victims. From the suggestion in the opinion that legislative action was necessary to provide a remedy for the evil, it may be inferred that the court meant that the act of 1853 was not revived at all, either as to transactions prior to the declaration of the unconstitutionality of the act of 1855, or as to those subsequent thereto. If so, the case is hardly a precedent for STATE v. O'NEIL, as that case assumes that the statute is in force, at least as to transactions occurring subsequently to the change of decisions; and it is that assumption which raises the difficulty of taking prior transactions out of its operation.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Wayne County affirming a judgment of a Justice's Court convicting him of soliciting and taking orders for the purchase, sale, and shipment of intoxicating liquors in violation of law. Reversed.

Statement by McClain, J.:

Defendant was accused before a justice of the peace of the crime of soliciting, taking, and accepting orders for the purchase, sale, and shipment of intoxicating liquors. The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts, and resulted in defendant's conviction. He thereupon appealed to the district court, where the defendant filed a motion for judgment upon the agreed facts.

In People v. Tiphaine, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 241, it was held that an act in relation to intemperance being unconstitutional, the provisions of the Revised Statute on the subject were left in full force, notwithstanding that the act purported to repeal all previous statutes inconsistent with its provisions. While it appears that the unconstitutionality of the repealing statute had been declared prior to the decision in the Tiphaine Case, it does not appear whether the offense in question was committed before or after such declaration, and there is no discussion or even recognition of the question under annotation. In fact, it does not appear in this case that there had ever been any judicial declaration that the repealing statute was constitutional. There is an obvious distinction between a transaction occurring before any judicial decision with respect to a statute, and one occurring after such a decision and before that decision has been changed.

In Rex v. Younger, 5 T. R. 450, a prosecution of a baker for violating the Sunday law, Lord Kenyon said that thirty-four years had passed since a decision giving the public notice that all bakers had a right to do what was imputed to the defendant in the case at bar as an offense, and added: "This circumstance alone ought to have some weight in the determination of this case. It would be cruel not only to the defendant, but also to those in a similar 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This motion was overruled, and defendant, pleading guilty after the overruling of his motion, was again convicted for the offense charged. He then appealed to this court.

Messrs. Porter & Greenleaf for appellant.

Messrs. H. W. Byers, Attorney General, and Charles W. Lyon for the State.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An agreed statement of facts filed on the trial before the justice of the peace was the basis of the finding of the district court, that defendant in October, 1908, solicited, accepted, and took from various persons situation with him, if we were now to punish him for doing that which this court publicly declared so many years ago might be done with impunity." The court was not convinced, however, that the former decision was wrong, and did not announce any change of decision even as to subsequent offenses, and the case therefore cannot be regarded as an authority on the question.

In State v. Bell, 136 N. C. 674, 49 S. E. 163, the court, while overruling a previous decision that a tenant indicted for removal of crops without giving the landlord notice might show in defense that he had sustained damages in amount more than rents and advancements in consequence of the landlord's failure to comply with the contract, and declaring that the contrary should be the rule for future cases, nevertheless, in view of the possibility that the defendant in the case at bar may have acted upon the advice of counsel based upon the decision in the earlier case, directed a new trial to allow him an opportunity to establish his defense in accordance with the doctrine of the earlier case. The opinion by Connor, J., admits that no authority directly in point had been found.

In State v. Fulton, 149 N. C. 485, 68 S. E. 145, a ruling of the trial court quashing an indictment against a husband for malicious slander of his wife was affirmed by a majority of the court. Two of the justices were of the opinion that an earlier decision that the statute relating to the malicious slander of a woman does not apply to a slander by the husband was correct. One of the justices, though of a contrary opinion as to the proper construction of the statute, concurred in the result upon the principle laid down in State v. Bell, supra. The chief justice and Connor, J., however, were not only of the opinion that the earlier decision was wrong, and that the statute should be construed to cover a slander by the husband, but also that the new rule of construction should be applied in the case at bar, notwithstanding the earlier decision. The chief justice remarked on this point: "The misconception of the statute in State v. Edens, 95 N. C. 693, 59 orders for the purchase by them, and sale and shipment to them, of intoxicating liquors from and by a certain brewing company in Kansas City, Missouri, said orders being subject to the approval of said company; and that the liquors so ordered were to be shipped directly to the persons named from the place of business of said company. Defendant's motion for judgment in his favor, which was overruled, recited that the acts charged were not criminal under the law of this state at the time of their commission, and, further, that the statute of the state making such acts criminal is in violation of the Constitution of the United States as an interference with the clause thereof relating to interstate commerce, and statutes on that subject passed by Congress. The acts with which defendant was charged were in violation of the provisions of Code, § 2382, as amended by Acts 28th Gen. Assem. chap. 74 (Code Supp. § 2382), prohibiting any person from soliciting, taking, or accepting "any order for the purchase, sale, shipment, or delivery of any (intoxicating) liquor." In the case of State v. Hanaphy, 117 Iowa, 15, 90 N. W. 601, followed in State v. Bernstein, 129 Iowa, 520, 105 N. W. 1015, decided, respectively, in 1902 and 1906, this statute was held unconstitutional, as in violation of the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. In 1909 this court, relying upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Delamater v. South Dakota, 205 U. S. 93, 51 L. ed. 724, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 447, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 733, decided in

Am. Rep. 294, did not repeal it, or give the defendant a vested right to slander his wife. Should he be convicted, and the judge find that the defendant would not have wantonly and maliciously attempted to destroy his wife's reputation by falsely charging her with adultery, but for his knowledge of State v. Edens, and therefore supposing that he was immune from punishment, the judge can give that fact such weight as he thinks proper in imposing sentence, or the governor can do so in passing upon a petition for pardon or commutation. But what we now declare the meaning of the statute to be is a declaration of what it meant when passed. The defendant Edens is the only person entitled to be protected by the erroneous construction placed on the statute in this case."

Connor, J., who wrote the opinion in the Bell Case, said in the Fulton Case: "While I do not think that the question decided in State v. Bell, supra, is presented here, I deem it proper to say that, having written the opinion in that case, upon further consideration, I do not think that the decision is consistent with, or sustained by, reason or the best-considered authorities. It seemed probable that, in view of the peculiar facts of that case, and the evident hardship imposed upon the defendant by reason of a misunderstanding of his rights under the contract with his landlord, he was misled by the decision in State v. Neal, 129 N. C. 692, 40 S. E. 205. I do not care to enter into further discussion of that question at this time, and only mention it in deference to the opinion of Mr. Justice Walker, and because I think frankness makes it proper to say this much. It was one of those hard cases which are said to be the 'quicksands of the law.' I do not think it should be extended or applied to the wanton and malicious slander, with intent to destroy the reputation of an innocent woman."

Notwithstanding this disavowal by the judge who wrote the opinion in the Bell Case, his position in that case has been referred to with apparent approval in a number of later cases in North Carolina, involving a departure from stare decisis in civil cases. See Hill v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. 143 N. C. 539, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 606, 55 S. E. 854; Volivar v. Richmond Cedar Works, 152 N. C. 656, 68 S. E. 200; Mason v. A. E. Nelson Cotton Co. 148 N. C. 492, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1221, 123 Am. St. Rep. 635, 62 S. E. 625; Hill v. Brown, 144 N. C. 117, 56 S. E. 693.

In Lanier v. State, 57 Miss. 102, the court said that the doctrine of stare decisis in criminal cases cannot be carried to the extent of allowing violators of law a vested interest in rules which have been previously sanctioned. It appears in this case, however, that the expressions in the earlier opinions which were overruled were obiter, or at least went further than the facts of the case in which they were uttered warranted; and the court remarked that it did not consider that the earlier case, when construed with reference to its facts, laid down any different rule than was announced in the Lanier Case. The Lanier Case, therefore, cannot be regarded as an authority against the decision in the O'NEIL Case.

In New York it is expressly provided by statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1961) that whenever, by the decision of the appellate division of the supreme court, a construction is given to a statute, an act done in good faith and in conformity to that construction after the decision was made, and before reversal thereof by the court of appeals, is so far valid that a party doing it is not liable to any penalty or forfeiture for an act that was adjudged lawful by such decision. It will be observed, however, that this does not provide for the contingency of the court of appeals departing from the rule stare decisis, and overruling a previous decision.

All of the members of the court in the O'NEIL Case recognized the injustice of plying the statute to a transaction which took place before the decision of the Federal Supreme Court or of the state court upholding the constitutionality of the statute.

All of the members of the court in the O'NEIL Case recognized the injustice of plying the statute to a transaction which took place before the decision of the Federal Supreme Court or of the state court upholding the constitutionality of the statute.

1907, reached the conclusion that its previous holding that the statute was in violation of the Federal Constitution was erroneous, and expressly overruled the two cases in which that conclusion had been announced, and sustained a judgment enjoining the maintenance of a place for carrying on the business of soliciting, taking, and accepting orders for the purchase, sale, and shipment of intoxicating liquors, for and on behalf of a corporation located and doing business in another state, as a nuisance. McCollum v. McConaughy, 141 Iowa, 172, 119 N. W. 539.

It will be noticed that the acts charged as against this defendant (and in fact also the filing of the information before the justice of the peace) were after the supreme court of this state had held the statute to be unconstitutional, and also after the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in a somewhat similar case from South Dakota, sustaining the validity of such a statute as against the contention that it was in violation of the Federal Constitution, but prior to the action of this court in reversing its prior decisions in reliance on the later decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The contention for defendant is that the decision of this court sustaining the constitutionality of the statute should not be given a retroactive effect, and defendant should not be punished for acts which, according to the prior decisions of the supreme court of this state, were lawful.

It is, of course, well settled that a statute which has been held unconstitutional, ute; but, as is apparent from the different theories advanced in the several opinions, considerable difficulty was experienced in reconciling the reversal of the conviction with the theory that, despite the decisions to the contrary in the earlier cases, the statute was constitutional from the beginning. It appears that the Iowa supreme court, in the previous case of McCollum v. McConaughy, 141 Iowa, 172, 119 N. W. 539, had decided, upon the authority of the Federal Supreme Court case, that the statute was constitutional, and overruled the earlier decisions to the contrary, though that was a civil, and not a criminal, case. If the O'NEIL CASE had been the first one following the decision of the Federal Supreme Court to present to the state court the question of the constitutionality of the statute, it would seem that the court might have avoided the difficulty by disposing of the case upon the principle of stare decisis; at the same time, however, expressing its conviction that the earlier cases were erroneously decided, and intimating that it would not feel bound to adhere to the same as to subsequent offenses. In other words, the court, although convinced that the earlier decisions were erroneous, might defer its departure from the rule stare decisis until a proper occasion arose, viz., a case presenting a subsequent offense. Upon this theory it would seem that the justice who wrote the opinion in the Bell Case might have reconciled it with his opinion in the Fulton Case. The offense in the Bell Case being somewhat technical and involving no moral turpitude, in other words, being malum prohibitum, and not malum in se, an immediate departure from the rule stare decisis would be unjust, and such a departure might be properly deferred until a case involving a subsequent offense should arise, notice being given by the opinion in the meantime that the court had become convinced that the earlier decisions were erroneous on principle, and would not be adhered to in subsequent cases. While, upon this theory, such a declaration would be in the nature of an obiter dictum, it 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

would doubtless be sufficient to justify the departure from the rule stare decisis as to subsequent offenses, if the court still remained of the opinion that the earlier cases were erroneously decided. Upon the other hand, the offense in the Fulton Case being malum in se, and not merely malum prohibitum, the court might properly conclude that there would be no injustice in an immediate departure from the rule stare decisis.

As intimated, however, this theory is hardly adequate to the exigency presented in the O'NEIL CASE, in view of the previous announcement in the McCollum Case of the change of decision as to the constitutionality of the statute. That decision put the court in the position of having already departed from the rule stare decisis.

As suggested in the note to Crigler v. Shepler, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 509, dealing with the effect of a change of judicial decision to impair the obligation of a contract, a court which has deemed it proper in a particular case to depart from the principle of stare decisis might deem another departure justified, in order to do justice as between parties to a transaction which occurred before the first departure. It is true that such a second departure would be subject to the objection not applicable to the first, that it was not intended to establish a permanent general rule, but was temporary, and designed only to cover a particular class of cases. It would seem, however, that such class of cases is so exceptional, and from the circumstances makes such a peculiar appeal for exclusion from the general rule adopted upon the first departure, as to justify a second departure from the rule stare decisis, even if temporary and partial. At all events, the justice of the result in the O'NEIL CASE is apparent, however difficult it may be to reconcile it with accepted theories as to the effect of a change of judicial decisions, and as to the operation and effect of statutes erroneously declared unconstitutional.

either in toto or as applied to a particular class of cases, is valid and enforceable without re-enactment, when the supposed constitutional objection has been removed, or has been found not to exist. That was the holding in McCullum v. McConaughy, supra, and is not now questioned. See also Pierce v. Pierce, 46 Ind. 86. And the conviction below was proper, unless some benefit is to be given to defendant of the fact that, when the acts were committed, the latest announced decision of this court was to the effect that the statute was unconstitutional, and therefore not enforceable. It is only by analogy, applying the rule of precedent, and not of adjudication, that the decision in one case becomes in any sense the law in another case. The analogy may be so complete that the reasoning of the one case necessarily points out the conclusions to be reached in the other, and, if so, the court feels bound to bow to its previous decision, unless it is made to appear that it is so manifestly erroneous that it should be overruled. If overruled, its force as a precedent ceases, and the later decision becomes a precedent. The analogy, however, may be incomplete, and then it is for the court to determine in the subsequent case whether the reasoning of the prior case is applicable under circumstances in some of which the cases are similar, and in others dissimilar. It is not the function of a court to lay down the law for future cases, but to announce the law for the case which it is deciding. It is an important function of an appellate court to so announce its reasons for decision that they may be understood and applied with reference to subsequent cases which are likely to arise, but no court can attempt to anticipate by announcement what the law will be found to be in a case in some respects dissimilar, which may subsequently arise. Therefore, as has often been said, there is no vested right in the decisions of a court, and, under the clause in the Federal Constitution prohibiting any state from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts, the Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held that the change of decisions of a state court does not constitute the passing of a law, although the effect of such change is to impair the validity of a contract made in reliance on prior decisions. National Mut. Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Brahan, 193 U. S. 635, 48 L. ed. 823, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532; Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 40 L. ed. 91, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80. And see Storrie v. Cortes, 90 Tex. 283, 35 L.R.A. 666, 38 S. W. 154; Swanson v. Ottumwa, 131 Iowa, 540, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 860, 106 N. W. 9, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1117; Lanier v. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

State, 57 Miss. 102. It is also quite clear that the change in the decisions of a court of a state does not violate the prohibition found in the same clause of the Federal Constitution against the making of ex post facto laws.

From the conclusion that, in a constitutional sense, there is no vested right in reliance on decisions of the court as precedent, and that one who is brought into court for a violation of law cannot sustain himself on the mere plea that, in some other case which he thought to be analogous, the court rendered a decision which, if applied as he thought it would be applied, would result in exculpating him from wrong, it does not necessarily follow that the court cannot take into account, as a controlling consideration in reaching the conclusion as to the justice of a case, that the party charged with wrongful conduct relied reasonably and in good faith upon decisions of the courts in determining whether a wrong was committed. The Supreme Court of the United States, while recognizing its general obligation to follow the decisions of the courts of the state in which a contract is made in determining its validity, has held that it will not recognize a change of rule in a state made by judicial decision, where the effect of such change is to render invalid contracts which, according to the views previously expressed by the state courts at the time the contracts were made, were valid. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, 17 L. ed. 520; Thomson v. Lee County, 3 Wall. 331, 18 L. ed. 178; Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968; Center School Twp. v. State, 150 Ind. 168, 49 N. E. 961. In Muhler v. New York & H. R. Co. 197 U. S. 544, 49 L. ed. 872, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522, the judges whose views on this point are expressed in the opinions filed were equally divided on the question whether one acquiring property in reliance on decisions of the courts of the state, relating to his rights in an abutting street, had a vested right as against a subsequent change of decision in the state courts. These cases are cited, not as indicating any constitutional duty on the part of the courts of a state to protect a litigant in rights which he in good faith supposed he had already acquired by reason of previous decisions of the same court in other cases, but for the purpose of illustrating the extent to which a court may properly go in administering the law for the purpose of effectuating justice; that is, for the purpose of rendering such decision as shall appeal to intelligent and fair-minded people as right and proper. Courts have always taken such considerations into account in the enforcement of legislative enactments. Before there was any separate equity jurisdiction, and when the term "equity" was used as a mere synonym of equality and justice, the courts interpreted statutes with a view to their equity, and not merely in accordance with their strict terms; so that the case might be within the equity of a statute, although not expressly covered by it, and, vice versa, the statute might be held not applicable in its equity, although its strict terms covered the case. The term "equity of a statute" has fallen into disuse since the establishment of a system of equity jurisprudence, but the courts have not ceased in either branch of their jurisdiction to give consideration to the general purpose of the law-maker, as furnishing a guide to interpretation. See Dr. Hammond's note in his edition of Lieber's Hermeneutics, p. 283. This again is but an illustration of the effort the court will properly make to do justice in a broad sense. In criminal cases, where the life or liberty of an individual is involved on one side, and the enforcement of law in the interest of the public welfare on the other, no private right of contract or property being imperiled by liberality of construction, the courts go further than in civil cases to recognize the common judgment of humanity as to what is right and just, and they allow many exceptions to statutory definitions of what shall constitute a crime. For instance, in this state, although there is no statutory recognition of a coverture as a defense on the part of a married woman for a crime committed in the presence of her husband, we have said that the common-law exception in that respect is applicable. State v. Fitzgerald, 49 Iowa, 260, 31 Am. Rep. 148, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 1; State v. Kelly, 74 Iowa, 589, 38 N. W. 503; State v. Harvey, 130 Iowa, 394, 106 N. W. 938. And it is the general rule in all the states of the Union, even those in which the criminal law is codified, to recognize infancy and insanity as relieving from the punishment prescribed by statute for criminal offenses, as they were recognized at common law, although such defenses are not allowed under any express statutory provision. The assumption is that even the statutory criminal law is to be administered in accordance with the general principles of right and justice recognized in the common-law system. 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 35. In the determination of the criminality of an act, even under the statutory definition the intent is a material consideration. It is the absence of criminal intent which constitutes the basis of the defenses of infancy, insanity, and coverture. Ignorance and mistake are also recognized as in the same category, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but here enters a question of public policy. One who is bound to obey the law ought not to be allowed to say that he was ignorant of it. He may show as a defense that he was mistaken as to a fact which, if it had been as he supposed it to be, would have rendered his act lawful; but he cannot say that if the law had been as he supposed it to be, his act would have been lawful, and he should not be punished. This principle of public policy has become crystallized into the maxim, "Ignorance of the law excuses no one," and, as applied to the present case, it might well be said, if we followed this maxim, that defendant is not to be excused because he did not know the law, that is, did not know that the previous decisions of this court holding the statute which he was violating to be unconstitutional were wrong, and the statute was in fact valid and operative. As between conflicting rights, we might well refuse to allow any impairment of so well settled a principle, and hold that parties act at their peril as to what the law shall be decided to be. But, as already indicated, in a criminal case there is no such imperative obligation, for after all the punishment of crime is a matter of public concern only, and we think that it would strike any reasonable and fair person as manifestly unjust that one should be adjudged criminal in having done an act not morally wrong, but only wrong because prohibited by statute, that is, an act malum prohibitum, and not one malum in se, relying upon the decisions of the highest court in the state holding such statute to be wholly invalid because in excess of the power of the legislature to enact it.

In this connection it is to be noticed that the decisions of courts as to the constitutionality of a statute stand on somewhat different ground than those relating to the common law or the interpretation of statutes, as applied to particular cases. The function of determining whether a statute is invalid because in excess of the legislative power is one peculiar to our system of government, and unknown in other jurisdictions in which the common law prevails. It is true that such an adjudication is made in a particular case. Although the power to be investigated is that of the legislative department itself, which cannot be a party so as to be bound by any judicial decision, nevertheless the courts discuss such question when it arises, and decide the matter, not only for the purpose of determining the rights of particular parties, but with reference to the effect of the decision upon the law of the state. A statute unconstitutional properly remains on the statute books as a part of the written law, but those who are bound to obey the law may, we think, reasonably take into account the decisions rendered by the courts in the exercise of their peculiar function of passing upon the constitutionality of the statutes, in determining what the law of the state really is. To the ordinary mind, it would smack of absurdity to say that defendant ought to have known that the statute was constitutional, and would, in case he violated it, be enforced against him, although the supreme court of the state had fully considered the validity of the statute as against the claim that it was unconstitutional, and had unanimously held that it was in excess of state legislative power as to its entire subject-matter, and therefore invalid. Under such circumstances, it is plain that there should be some relief to defendant from punishment, for the very purpose of punishment is defeated, if unreasonably and arbitrarily imposed. Respect for law, which is the most cogent force in prompting orderly conduct in a civilized community, is weakened, if men are punished for acts which, according to the general consensus of opinion, they were justified in believing to be morally right and in accordance with law. If we should sustain the conviction, we would do so in the belief that the case was one in which executive clemency ought to be exercised. But is it quite fair to throw upon the executive the responsibility of relieving from punishment on account of the very nature of the act committed which is made apparent to this court, and its nature as being innocent or guilty appears to depend upon the effect to be given to the decisions of this court? We think we would be shirking our responsibility if we should leave it to the executive to do what we believe to be manifest justice in this case, and should stigmatize the defendant with a conviction for crime, when, as it appears, he was innocent of any real wrong. We think the real question as to the guilt of defendant is to be settled by referring to the doctrine of criminal intent, which has always been held to be of the essence of a crime. 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, §§ 205, 285-291b. And justifiable ignorance or mistake has always been taken into account in determining the criminality of the act. 4 Bl. Com. 27; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, §§ 292-312; Reg. v. Prince, L. R. 2 C. C. 154, 44 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 122, 32 L. T. N. S. 700, 24 Week. Rep. 76, 13 Cox C. C. 138, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 1. For reasons already pointed out, mere ignorance of law does not excuse, and even ignorance of fact which the statute, expressly or impliedly, makes it the duty of one acting in reference to the subject-matter regulated by the statute to know, and with reference to which he is required to act 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) at his peril, will not excuse him. But even as to these strict rules there are necessary exceptions. If a mistake of fact is due to mistake of law, so that it appears that there is no guilty mind, punishment should not be imposed. Rex v. Hall, 3 Car. & P. 409; Reg. v. Reed, Car. & M. 306; People v. Powell, 63 N. Y. 88; People v. Husband, 36 Mich. 306; 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 111; Com. v. Stebbins, 8 Gray. 492. And no matter how stringently the statute may impose the duty of knowing the facts on which the defendant has relied in a course of conduct that is prohibited, save under certain prescribed conditions, the common-law exceptions which relieve on account of lack of criminal intent, due to infancy, insanity, coverture, or necessity, are recognized. Cutter v. State, 36 N. J. L. 125; The William Gray (U. S. C. C.) 1 Paine, 16, Fed. Cas. No. 17,694. These cases are cited not as directly in point for the solution of our present difficulty, but as illustrations of the fact that courts must, especially in the administration of the criminal law, make exceptions in the interest of justice and public policy, to rules which it is very essential to maintain in ordinary cases. An exception to the rule that everyone is required to know the law is justified, we believe, when, as to the validity of a statute on constitutional grounds, a person has relied upon the expressed decisions of the highest court in his state. We do not believe such exception to be against public interest, but rather in the furtherance of justice. This question seems not to have often arisen, so as to have been considered in courts of last resort, but we have support in the conclusion we have reached in the cases of State v. Bell, 136 N. C. 674, 49 S. E. 163, and State v. Fulton, 149 N. C. 485, 63 S. E. 145.

That our conclusion in this case may not be misapprehended, and relied upon in support of propositions to which we have no disposition to yield consent, we desire to emphasize the following controlling conditions. This is a criminal case, and therefore involves no conflicting claims as to contractual or property rights. The defendant may be presumed to have acted with knowledge of the fact that the statute now invoked as rendering illegal an act not otherwise wrongful or immoral had been expressly held by this court, in cases prosecuted under public authority, to be unconstitutional because in excess of legislative power.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed.

Deemer, Ch. J., concurring:

While concurring in the result reached, the case is so peculiar in its facts, and the principles upon which it is decided by the majority opinion so important, that I deem it my duty to express my views thereon in a separate opinion. I am constrained to do this largely because of the fact that it is an illustration of the truth of Lord Campbell's exclamation of many years ago, that "hard cases must not make bad law." Some things are said in the majority opinion with which I fully agree, but there are other statements therein which I cannot approve, and which I think will rise to plague us in the future if they be adopted without dissent. The majority make the decision turn, as I understand it, upon the thought that defendant had no criminal intent, and for that reason should not be punished for his violation of a statute which to my mind involves no question of intent, other than the doing of the prohibited act. I do not believe that this is sound.

Again, the opinion seems to proceed upon the theory that there is an implied exception in this statute, which the courts should recognize. I do not believe that this is true.

Moreover, ignorance or mistake of law seems to be thought of some merit in deciding the question before us. I fear that the introduction of this principle into the case at bar is fraught with much danger. I must especially dissent from the statement in the opinion that the real question as to the guilt of the defendant is to be settled by referring to the doctrine of criminal intent. The statement in the opinion that "if a mistake of fact is due to a mistake of law, so that it appears there is no guilty mind, punishment should not be imposed." I cannot agree to this unless the statute in question in some way makes intent, either general or specific, an element of the offense.

I do not like that part of the discussion in the opinion which treats of the effect to be given judicial opinions, particularly where they involve constitutional questions, or relate to the construction of statutory enactments. I think the case may be decided and properly bottomed upon two well-settled principles. The first one is that a change of judicial decision involving the constitutionality of an act or construing an act of the legislature should, like an act emanating from the lawmaking power, be given a prospective rather than a retrospective or retroactive operation; second, the Constitution provides that "excessive fines shall not be imposed, and cruel and unusual punishment shall not be inflicted." See § 17, art. 1. My own convictions regarding the effect of a change in judicial decisions, as applied to contracts, are fully expressed in the case of Swanson v. Ottumwa, 131 Iowa, 540, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 860, 106 N. W. 9, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1117, and need not be elaborated here. I need only quote the following from that opinion: "We are inclined to the view there is nothing in the Constitution which forbids a change of judicial opinion, except it be with reference to a particular statute, although we must confess that there are some strong cases to the contrary. As supporting our view, see Storrie v. Cortes, 90 Tex. 283, 35 L.R.A. 666, 38 S. W. 154; Center School Twp. v. State, 150 Ind. 168, 49 N. E. 961; Shepherd's Point Land Co. v. Atlantic Hotel, 134 N. C. 397, 46 S. E. 748." It will be noticed from this extract that, if the decision be with reference to a particular statute, there may be a violation of the constitutional limitation, if the change of judicial opinion be with reference to that particular statute. It is quite fundamental, I think, that the judicial construction of a statute becomes a part of it, and, as to rights which accrue afterwards, it should be adhered to for the protection of those rights. As said in Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 319: "To devest them by a change of the construction is to legislate retroactively. The constitutional barrier to legislation impairing the obligation of contracts applies also to decisions altering the law as previously expounded, so as to affect the obligations of existing contracts made on the faith of the earlier adjudications." As further supporting this view, see Green v. Neal, 6 Pet. 291, 8 L. ed. 402; Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. 368, 6 L. ed. 497. In the case of Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 432, 14 L. ed. 1003, Chief Justice Taney said that "the sound and true rule is that, if the contract when made was valid by the laws of the state as then expounded by all the departments of its government, and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent act of the legislature . . . or decision of its courts altering the construction of the law." In Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968, it was held that "the true rule is to give a change of judicial construction in respect to a statute the same effect in its operation on contracts and existing contract rights that would be given to a legislative amendment; that is to say, make it prospective, but not retroactive. After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself, and a change of decision is, to all intents and purposes, the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment." The following cases also support this doctrine: Green County v. Conness, 109 U. S. 104, 27 L. ed. 872, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 69; Olcott v. Fond du Lac County, 16 Wall. 689, 21 L. ed. 386; Fairfield v. Gallatin County, 100 U. S. 52, 25 L. ed. 546; Carroll County v. United States, 18 Wall. 71, 21 L. ed. 771; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 206, 17 L. ed. 525. In Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, § 363, it is said: "Judicial interpretation of a statute becomes a part of the statute law, and a change of it is, in practical effect, the same as a change of the statute." See also, as sustaining this doctrine, Ray v. Natural Gas Co. 138 Pa. 591, 12 L.R.A. 290, 21 Am. St. Rep. 927, 20 Atl. 1065; Walker v. State, 12 S. C. 271; Lyon v. Richmond, 2 Johns. Ch. 51; Columbia County v. King, 13 Fla. 463; Edwards v. Darby, 12 Wheat. 206, 6 L. ed. 603; Stallcup v. Tacoma, 13 Wash. 152, 52 Am. St. Rep. 32, 42 Pac. 541; Ex parte Selma & G. R. Co. 45 Ala. 730, 6 Am. Rep. 730; Hall v. Wells, 54 Miss. 301; Herndon v. Moore, 18 S. C. 354; Wickersham v. Savage, 58 Pa. 369; State v. Comptoir National D'Escompte, 51 La. Ann. 1272, 26 So. 94; Vermont & C. R. Co. v. Vermont C. R. Co. 63 Vt. 23, 10 L.R.A. 565, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 488, 21 Atl. 262, 731; Opinion of Justices, 58 N. H. 625; Muhler v. New York & H. R. Co. 197 U. S. 573, 49 L. ed. 879, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522. It must be remembered that I am not now discussing the effect of a decision relating to that great body of the law known as the unwritten, wherein, as I think, a different principle is to be applied. See further, as supporting these views, Ryalls v. Mechanics' Mills, 150 Mass. 190, 5 L.R.A. 667, 22 N. E. 766; Philadelphia & E. R. Co. v. Catawissa R. Co. 53 Pa. 20; Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 122, 9 Am. Dec. 123. It is well settled, of course, that when the legislature adopts a statute of another state, it adopts with it the judicial construction of that statute as interpreted by the court from which the statute is borrowed. Trabant v. Rummell, 14 Or. 17, 12 Pac. 56; Pratt v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 141 Mass. 225, 55 Am. Rep. 465, 5 N. E. 307. There is much ground for holding that a change of decision with reference to the interpretation of a statute is to all intents and purposes the same in its effect as an amendment of the law by means of legislative enactment. That view finds express support in Farrior v. New England Mortg. Security Co. 92 Ala. 176, 12 L.R.A. 856, 9 So. 532; Taylor v. Ypsilanti, 105 U. S. 72, 26 L. ed. 1012; Lane v. Watson, 51

N. J. L. 186, 17 Atl. 117; State v. Bell, 136 N. C. 674, 49 S. E. 163; Center School Twp. v. State, 150 Ind. 168, 49 N. E. 961; Lewis v. Symmes, 61 Ohio St. 471, 76 Am. St. Rep. 428, 56 N. E. 194; State v. Fulton, 149 N. C. 485, 63 S. E. 145; Haskett v. Maxey, 134 Ind. 182, 19 L.R.A. 379, 33 N. E. 358; Loeb v. Columbia Twp. 179 U. S. 472, 45 L. ed. 280, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174, and cases cited; State ex rel. Clyde v. Bristol, 109 Tenn. 315, 70 S. W. 1031; Gross v. Whitley County, 158 Ind. 537, 58 L.R.A. 394, 64 N. E. 25; Harmon v. Auditor, 123 Ill. 122, 5 Am. St. Rep. 510, 13 N. E. 161; Mountain Grove Bank v. Douglas County, 146 Mo. 42, 47 S. W. 946; Stockton v. Dundee Mfg. Co. 22 N. J. Eq. 56; Richardson v. Marshall County, 100 Tenn. 346, 45 S. W. 440; Falconer v. Simmons, 51 W. Va. 172, 41 S. E. 193.

In very many of these cases it is squarely held that a change of judicial opinion should be given the same effect as a subsequent enactment of the legislature, that is to say, a prospective operation, in order to avoid the objections which have just been pointed out. I shall not take the time to quote from all of these; but do wish to call attention to what is said to be a well-established and well-understood exception to the rule pointed out in the majority opinion. This exception, as stated in the Haskett Case, 134 Ind. 182, 19 L.R.A. 379, 33 N. E. 358, is as follows: "After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself; and a change of decision is to all intents and purposes the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment." In Douglas v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968, it is said: "The true rule is to give a change of judicial construction in respect to a statute the same effect in its operation on contracts and existing contract rights that would be given to a legislative amendment, that is to say, making it prospective, but not retroactive." In the Hawkins Case, supra, it is said: "The true rule (affirmed by the authorities and the prevailing one) is to give a change of judicial construction in regard to a statute the same effect in its operation, so as not to disturb vested rights, as would be given to a legislative amendment, that is, apply the change made in the interpretation of the law so as to operate prospectively, and not retroactively." If this be the rule with reference to the interpretation of statutes in actions involving property or contract rights, and such seems to be the doctrine established by the weight of judicial decisions, there is the more reason for holding it applicable to criminal cases, particularly where the court has once held the criminal statute void and of no effect, because contrary to some provision of the fundamental law. That it is within the power of the courts of this country to declare a statute inoperative and void because contrary to the Constitution is well established, and such decisions are binding, not only upon the parties immediately involved, but upon all departments of government; indeed, upon the state itself. An unconstitutional statute is absolutely void. It is, so to speak, as so much waste paper, and according to the uniform tenor of the authorities such a determination is conclusive on everyone until reversed or overruled. People v. Briggs, 114 N. Y. 63, 20 N. E. 820; People v. Arensberg, 105 N. Y. 123, 59 Am. Rep. 483, 11 N. E. 277; People v. West, 106 N. Y. 293, 60 Am. Rep. 452, 12 N. E. 610; People v. Kibler, 106 N. Y. 321, 12 N. E. 795; Douglass v. Pike County, supra. Such a statute may be vitalized or resuscitated by a decision overruling prior ones holding to the contrary, and this occurs although there be no re-enactment by the legislature. But, when once determined to be unconstitutional, the legislature itself cannot cure the defects in the law by declaring the act constitutional; nor has any other department of government any such power. As said, the decision is binding upon everyone save the court itself. If this be true, it is little short of an absurdity to say that a decision finally upholding the statute as a valid exercise of legislative power should be given retroactive effect, and that acts done at a time when the statute had been declared void by the highest tribunal of the state must be punished because that court took a new view of the constitutional provision. In a criminal case everyone is conclusively presumed to know the law, but he is not expected to know the law better than the courts, or to know what the law will be at some future day. A decision holding a statute unconstitutional is the law until overruled or reversed, and that decision, as we have observed, is binding upon everyone. To hold that one may not do what an unconstitutional statute forbids him doing, because the court may change its mind, is to say that, although declared null and void by the only tribunal having that power, such decision is of no effect, and cannot be made a rule of human conduct, because the court may change its mind, is in effect to deprive the court of its power to annul a statute because of its unconstitutionality. As already intimated, there is a wide distinction between cases involving the validity and interpretation of statutes, and those which have to deal with the common or unwritten law, for the reason that the judicial construction of a statute is a part of the law itself. Exposition of a statute is a part of the statute. There is every reason, therefore, for holding that a decision holding a criminal statute constitutional, which had theretofore been held unconstitutional, should not be given retroactive effect. Until the decision in the McCullum Case, cited in the majority opinion, the statute was absolutely of no effect. In State v. Fulton, 149 N. C. 485, 63 S. E. 146, it is said: "The judicial interpretation of a statute becomes, as it were, a part of the statute," and, if that 'interpretation' is afterwards changed or modified, the defendant should be tried under the law as it had been declared to be at the time the alleged offense was committed, simply because it was the law at that time. The defendant, it is true, has no vested right in a decision of this court, but it does not follow that we should reverse our decisions, and then declare that to be criminal which we had decided was not so at the time of the commission of the alleged offense." Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, says at page 188 of the third edition: "When a statute is adjudged to be unconstitutional, it is as if it had never been. Rights cannot be built up under it. Contracts which depend upon it for their consideration are void. It constitutes a protection to no one who has acted under it, and no one can be punished for having refused obedience to it before the decision was made." I see no good reason for not holding that this case comes within the provision of § 21 of article 1 of the Bill of Rights, which prohibits the passage of ex post facto laws. An ex post facto law is one which makes an act innocent when done a crime. States v. Squires, 26 Iowa, 340. Strictly speaking, perhaps, this refers only to laws passed by the legislature, but there is every reason for holding that it also applies to a change of judicial decisions. Decisions of courts construing statutes or declaring them unconstitutional are as much a part of the law of the land as legislative enactments. They become a part of the body of the law itself, and are not merely the evidences thereof, as are decisions relating to the unwritten or common law.

2. I am very clearly of the opinion that no other basis is needed for the conclusion which everyone desires to reach in this case, than the constitutional provision against cruel and unusual punishment. These terms had a well-defined significance in England, where there is no written Constitution; and in interpreting our written

Constitution; we are not only justified, but it is our duty, to look for the meaning of these terms as found in the decision of courts and the works of commentators published before the adoption of the Constitution. Sir William Blackstone, in treating of the nature of the laws of England (vol. 1, p. 46), said: "There is still a more unreasonable method than this, which is called making of laws ex post facto, when after an action (indifferent in itself) is committed, the legislator then for the first time declares it to have been a crime, and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it. Here it is impossible that the party could foresee that an action, innocent when it was done, should be afterwards converted to guilt by a subsequent law. He had therefore no cause to abstain from it, and all punishment for not abstaining must of consequence be cruel and unjust." Such legislation was regarded as invalid in England, where they have no Constitution, on the ground that the punishment was cruel and unjust. The article of the Constitution referred to does not relate to laws passed by the legislature. The broad statement is that cruel and unusual punishment shall not be inflicted. Reading this in the light of the rule as stated by Blackstone, which is well fortified by authority, there seems to be no difficulty in holding that to punish defendant for acts which were innocent when done would be both cruel and unjust. Other reasons might be given, but I believe those already suggested are sound, and should rule the decision.

I think the majority do not give sufficient weight to the decisions of courts interpreting statutes or declaring them unconstitutional; and, in an endeavor to do justice, have announced rules which are unsound in principle, and not sustained by authority. The analogy between the defenses of insanity and infancy and the defense interposed here is not apparent.

I concur in reversal of the judgment for the reasons indicated.

Sherwin, J.:

I concur in the views expressed in the first division of this opinion.

Weaver, J., concurring:

If the majority had announced the conclusion that, under our peculiar system of government, it is an implied term or condition in every statute defining crime that its penalties are not to be enforced for an act done after an authoritative judicial decision declaring the enactment unconstitutional, and before a later decision by which the former is overruled and the valid—ity of such law judicially affirmed, I should not burden the record with any expression of my individual views. The authority of a court to say that a statute is not applicable to every case apparently included within its general terms is a delicate, if not dangerous, one, which in the hands of a reckless judiciary would be productive of the gravest abuses; but it is nevertheless a necessary authority, and one to which the most eminent courts of the country have at times resorted. General statutes are necessarily stated in general terms to effect certain general or specific results, and it not infrequently happens that we find a case which is embraced within the literal general terms of the law, but which, we are morally certain, is not within its intent, and, when such appears to be the case, the enforcement of such law is restricted accordingly. In line with this thought I quote the following: "Acts of Parliament are to be so construed as no man that is innocent or free from injury or wrong be, by a literal construction, punished or endamaged." Margate Pier Co. v. Hannam, 3 Barn. & Ald. 266, 22 Revised Rep. 378. "If a literal construction of the words of a statute be absurd, the act must be so construed as to avoid the absurdity." State v. Clark, 29 N. J. L. 96. "All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression, or an absurd consequence. It will always, therefore, be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter." United States v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 19 L. ed. 278. See also United States v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. 631, 4 L. ed. 477. "It is a familiar rule that a thing may be within the letter of the statute, and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit nor within the intention of its makers. . . . This is not the substitution of the will of the judge for that of the legislator, for frequently words of general meaning are used in a statute, words broad enough to include the act in question, and yet a consideration of the whole legislation, or of the circumstances surrounding its enactment, or of the absurd results which follow from giving such broad meaning to the words, makes it unreasonable to believe that the legislature intended to include the particular act." Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U. S. 457, 36 L. ed. 226, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 511. "A thing which is within the letter of a statute is not within the statute unless it be within the intention of the makers." Jackson ex dem. Scofield v. Collins, 3 Cow.

89. See also Ryegate v. Wardsboro, 30 Vt. 746; Murray v. Hobson, 10 Colo. 66, 13 Pac. 921; Com. v. Kimball, 24 Pick. 366; Whitney v. Whitney, 14 Mass. 88; Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 508; Austin v. State, 22 Ind. App. 221, 53 N. E. 481. It is a fair deduction from these authorities that the very absurdity, to say nothing of the essential injustice, involved in punishing as criminal the violation of a statute of the state which we, as the court of last resort in that state, were then solemnly assuring the people was unconstitutional and void, and not entitled to their obedience, is sufficient reason for saying that the legislature could not have intended any such application of its enactment. The road by which this result is reached is not wholly unlike the one pursued in the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice McClain. It differs, however, in this somewhat material respect, in that he emphasizes the lack of criminal intent upon the part of the appellant in doing the act, while I have emphasized the absence of legislative intent to include such acts within the penalty of the statute. The latter view appeals to me as being sound, and it avoids the otherwise formidable objection raised by Mr. Chief Justice Deemer, that we cannot make the absence of criminal intent a controlling consideration without creating confusion in our decisions, and unsettling or weakening the authority of the precedents to which he refers. The argument by analogy from the rule which obtains where the accused is shown to be an insane person or an irresponsible infant is hardly applicable, for in such cases crime is not imputed,—not so much from the want of criminal intent as from the incapacity of the accused to know or appreciate the quality of the act with which he is charged. On the other hand, I cannot agree with the concurring opinion by the chief justice, in holding that a change in judicial interpretation of a statute becomes a part of the statute, or that a change in such interpretation is the “same in effect as an amendment of the law by means of legislative enactment.” Whatever may have been their practice in borderline cases, our courts have always been quick to deny the charge of magnifying their authority or indulging in judicial legislation, and I think we should carefully avoid any pronouncement which may give color to criticism of that character. The rule which sometimes obtains in civil actions involving contract rights would in my judgment have a very misleading application in criminal cases, for in the former the party is relieved from the effect of the change of decision not because the erroneous holding becomes a part of the law (though 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) that expression is often used), but because the parties are presumed to have contracted with reference to such decision, which is thereby made in effect a term or condition of the agreement itself.

I am also firmly persuaded that the constitutional inhibition of cruel and inhuman punishments is not available to the appellant in this case. To make it applicable, we must assume the guilt of the accused, but hold the punishment prescribed is objectionable because it is cruel, inhuman, or one out of all reasonable proportion to the nature and quality of the offense. But, assuming guilt, a punishment is not obnoxious to the constitutional provision merely because it is severe. Fine and imprisonment are substantially the only practicable penalties which the state can impose upon offenders, and except in extreme case showing gross abuse of such authority, the courts will not, or at least ought not, assume to say that a statute imposing them is void. The penalty which the statute imposes for the offense charged against the appellant is a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $100 for the first offense, with alternative of imprisonment not exceeding thirty days in case the fine be not paid. Code, §§ 2382, 2383. Assuming that appellant was punishable at all, and as I have said we must so assume before raising the constitutional objection, it is to me inconceivable that such punishment is excessive or cruel, or inhuman or unreasonable, within the meaning of that provision. The books will be searched in vain for a precedent to justify that holding. To the contrary, see State v. Teeters, 97 Iowa, 453, 66 N. W. 754; Martin v. Blattner, 68 Iowa, 286, 25 N. W. 131, 27 N. W. 244, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 148; State v. Huff, 76 Iowa, 204, 40 N. W. 720; Fisher v. McDaniel, 9 Wyo. 457, 87 Am. St. Rep. 981, 64 Pac. 1056; Luton v. Circuit Judge, 69 Mich. 610, 37 N. W. 701; Com. v. Hitchings, 5 Gray, 482; Blydenburgh v. Miles, 39 Conn. 484; Com. v. Murphy, 165 Mass. 66, 30 L.R.A. 734, 52 Am. St. Rep. 496, 42 N. E. 504, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 67; Ex parte Keeler, 45 S. C. 537, 31 L.R.A. 678, 55 Am. St. Rep. 785, 23 S. E. 865; State v. Nelson, 10 Idaho, 522, 67 L.R.A. 808, 109 Am. St. Rep. 226, 79 Pac. 79, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 322; Ex parte Swann, 96 Mo. 44, 9 S. W. 10; Pervear v. Massachusetts, 5 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 608; McLaughlin v. State, 45 Ind. 338; *State ex rel. In fact as I view it, there is but one tenable ground on which we can interfere with the judgment of the trial court in this case, and that is to say that the act with which the defendant is charged, though within the letter of the prohibition of the statute, is not within its purpose, reason, or intent, and is therefore not punishable. On that ground alone I would reverse.

OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

FRED D. WARREN, Plff. in Err.,

v.

UNITED STATES.

(106 C. C. A. 156, 183 Fed. 718.)

Postoffice — unmailable matter — freedom of speech.

1. No unconstitutional interference with liberty or freedom of speech is effected by forbidding the placing of scurrilous matter on packages placed in the mail.

Same — offering reward — permissibility.

2. The placing by a private citizen of a package in the mail bearing an inscription offering a reward for the return of a certain Constitutionality.

The constitutional power of Congress to determine what shall be excluded from the mails, as is affirmed in WARREN v. UNITED STATES, would seem to admit of no question. In Ex parte Jackson, 96 U. S. 727, 24 L. ed. 877, a case arising under the act prohibiting the mailing of lottery circulars, it was said: "The power possessed by Congress embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. The right to designate what shall be carried necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded." (Quoted in United States v. Burnell, 75 Fed. 824.) The court said, further, that in cases where the object is exposed, and shows unmistakably that it is prohibited, as in the case of an obscene picture or print "no difficulty arises, and no principle is violated, in excluding the prohibited articles, or refusing to forward them;" and the court refers to the act of March 3, 1873, against the mailing of cards or envelopes with indecent or scurrilous epithets, etc.

In Re Rapier, 143 U. S. 110, 36 L. ed. 93, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 374, where the petitioner was convicted of mailing a newspaper with an advertisement of a lottery, the court, in dismissing his writ of habeas corpus, said: "In Ex parte Jackson, supra, it was held that the power vested in Congress to establish postoffices and post roads embraced the regulation of the entire postal system of the country, and that under it Congress may designate what may be carried in the mail and what excluded; that in excluding various articles from the mails the object of Congress is not to interfere with the freedom of the press or with any other rights of the people, but to refuse the facilities for the distribution of matter deemed injurious, by Congress, to the public morals; and that the transportation in any other way of matters excluded from the mails would not be forbidden. Unless we are prepared to overrule that decision, it is decisive of the question before us."

And in Public Clearing House v. Coyne, 194 U. S. 497, 48 L. ed. 1092, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 789, the court, in sustaining the order of the Postmaster General, in excluding from the mail registered letters addressed to a company engaged in a lottery, made under the empowering statute, said: "The constitutional principles underlying the administration of the Postoffice Department were discussed in the opinion of the court in Ex parte Jackson, supra, in which we held that the power vested in Congress to establish postoffices and post roads embraced the regulation of the entire postal system of the country; that Congress might designate what might be carried in the mails and what excluded, and that in the enforcement of such regulations a distinction was made between letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage, and such other packages as were open to inspection, such as newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, and that the constitutional guaranty against unreasonable searches and seizures extended to letters, but did not ex-

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment convicting defendant of sending nonmailable matter through the mail in violation of a statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Hook and Adams, Circuit Judges, and Reed, District Judge.

Messrs. Fred D. Warren, Clarence S. Darrow, Boyle & Howell, J. I. Shepard, and J. S. Brooks for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. S. West and Harry J. Bone for the United States.

Hook, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error was indicted for depositing in the postoffice of the United States at Girard, Kansas, for mailing, non-mailable matter, contrary to the act of September 26, 1888 (act Sept. 26, 1888, chap. 1039, 25 Stat. at L. 496, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2661). Among other things the act prohibits the deposit for mailing of all matter, otherwise mailable, upon the envelope or outside cover or wrapper of which is written, printed, or otherwise impressed any language of a scurrilous, defamatory, or threatening character, or calculated by the terms or manner or style of display and obviously intended to reflect injuriously upon the character or conduct of another. The envelope described in the indictment was properly stamped and addressed to another, but on its face there was printed in large red characters the following: "$1,000 reward will be paid to any person who kidnaps Ex-Gov. Taylor and returns him to Kentucky authorities."

The indictment also charged that the words so printed were of a scurrilous, defamatory, and threatening character, and were calculated and obviously intended to reflect injuriously upon the character and conduct of William S. Taylor, a former governor of the state of Kentucky. There was tend to printed matter. . . . For more than thirty years not only has the transmission of obscene matter been prohibited, but it has been made a crime, punishable by fine or imprisonment, for a person to deposit such matter in the mails. The constitutionality of this law, we believe, has never been attacked."

In United States v. Bott, 11 Blatchf. 316, Fed. Cas. No. 14,626, a case under the provisions against mailing any article or thing intended for the procuring of abortion, etc., the court said: "Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over the mails, and may prohibit the use of the mails for the transmission of any article. Any article of any description, whether harmless or not, may therefore be declared contraband in the mail by act of Congress, and its deposit there be made a crime."

In United States v. Burnell, infra, where it was claimed that the statute as applied to the printed papers in question interfered with the freedom of the press, the court pointed out that the act did not exclude papers with scurrilous or defamatory matter unless exposed, and quoted Ex parte Jackson, supra, where the court disposed of this question with the statement that if Congress excluded printed matter from the mails it could not forbid its transportation in any other way.

In Re Barber, 75 Fed. 980, the court, while deciding that the matter in question was not within the statute, said of the power of Congress to protect against defamatory matter in the mails: "This protection concerning the mail service is clearly within the purview of Congress."

a verdict of guilty as charged, and sentence followed.

When the case arose in this court, the accused appeared in his own behalf, dispensed with counsel who had filed a brief, asserted his right to use the mails in the way described in the indictment, and said the only question he desired considered was whether the printed indorsement on the envelope could make his conduct a public offense. But aside from this concession, an examination of the record and briefs discloses no other question that requires consideration. The other objections to the indictment urged in the brief are, we think, without merit. What purports to be a bill of exceptions in the record is not authenticated by the certificate of the trial judge, and the proceedings at the trial are therefore not open to review.

There is no substantial question of liberty or freedom of speech involved in this case. The unrestricted use of the mails is not one of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution. Public Clearing House v. Coyne, 194 U. S. 497, 48 L. ed. 1092, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 789. No one has a natural or constitutional right to send what Matter prohibited.

The form of the statute has undergone some changes. It was held in 1875 that the clause of the statute (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3893, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2658) prohibiting the mailing of postal cards with "indecent or scurrilous epithets" includes words not in themselves indecent or scurrilous, but expressing indecent or scurrilous ideas; so, where the writing imputed illicit connection between a woman and a negro. United States v. Pratt, Fed. Cas. No. 16,082.

A postal card describing the addressee as a "d—n scoundrel and rascal" does not contain "indecent and obscene epithets, terms, and language" within U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3893, as amended in 1876, as "indecent" means immodest, impure. United States v. Smith, 11 Fed. 663.

In United States v. Olney (1889) W. D. Tenn. reported in a note to United States v. Davis, 38 Fed. 328, the court left it to the jury to say whether the following writing was scurrilous: "Mr. Editor:—I thought that you was publishing a paper for the wheel, but I see nothing but rotten Democracy. I am a Republican, and a wheeler, and you can take your paper and Democracy, and go to hell with it."

It was held in 1887 that U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3893, prohibiting the mailing of envelopes or postal cards upon which indecent, lewd, obscene, or lascivious delineations, epithets, terms, or language may be written, does not exclude postal cards or envelopes indicating that the addressee is a "dead beat," from whom the sender is trying to collect an old bill. Ex parte Doran, 32 Fed. 76.

he pleases through the mails or to write anything he pleases upon the exterior cover of that which would otherwise be mailable. The power of Congress extends to the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. It may prescribe what can be carried in the mails and what shall be excluded. It may in its wisdom confine the use of the mails to sealed letters, excluding everything else, or it may extend it to papers, periodicals, and books, and to large packages of merchandise, as in the parcel post systems of other countries. It may even prescribe the size, shape, weight, and character of contents of every mailable packet, and limit the superscription to the bare name and address of the person for whom intended; and it may also declare a violation of its regulations a public offense and fix the punishment therefor. Its power over the particular subject is almost without limit except as respects unreasonable searches and seizures and the duty to treat all alike under the same circumstances and conditions. With this comprehensive control over the subject which Congress undoubtedly possesses, it is idle to say the liberty of the citizen and his freedom of speech, in the proper sense of those terms, are denied or abridged by the statute forbidding the deposit in the mails of anything upon the exposed surface of which appears language scurrilous, defamatory, or threatening, or calculating and obviously intended to reflect injuriously upon the character or conduct of others. Liberty and freedom of speech under the Constitution do not mean the unrestrained right to do and say what one pleases at all times and under all circumstances, and certainly they do not mean that, contrary to the will of Congress, one may make of the postoffice establishment of the United States an agency for the publication of his views of the character and conduct of others, as distinguished from the carriage of the mails. The very idea of government implies some imposition of restraint in the interest of the general welfare, peace, and good order. The statute under consideration is a part of a body of legislation which is being gradually enlarged, and which is designed to exclude from the mails that which tends to debauch the morals of the people, or is contrived to despoil them of their property, or is an apparent, visible attack upon their

The act was later amended and enlarged to cover matter calculated or obviously intended to reflect injuriously upon the character or conduct of another. And under the act as amended September 26, 1888, 25 Stat. at L. 496, chap. 1039, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2661, making it criminal to deposit for mailing any postal card containing delineations, epithets, terms, or language of an indecent, lewd, lascivious, obscene, libelous, scurrilous, defamatory, or threatening character, or calculated by the terms or manner or style of display, and obviously intended, to reflect injuriously upon the character or conduct of another, "You are sharp, all of you are on the beat," is a criminal expression. And where the card concerned the return of a patent model, the expression, "Tell that radical to send my book back as he agreed," coupled with angry, profane, indecent, and scurrilous language, was also held criminal. United States v. Davis, 38 Fed. 326.

A superscription on the envelope after the name of the addressee, "Room 32, Pease House, Front St., City, The Notorious," was held not within the act of 1888, as not necessarily intended for anything but the hotel, and as not necessarily intended to reflect injuriously upon anyone. United States v. Jarvis, 59 Fed. 357.

There are a number of cases where the efforts of collectors of debts have been complained of under this statute. Where there were three counts on three dunning postal cards for a long past due debt, the last two of which named the amount $1.80 and threatened collection, the last two were held within the act of 1888, but not the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

first. United States v. Bayle, 6 L.R.A. 742, 40 Fed. 664.

But in United States v. Elliott, 51 Fed. 807, it was held that a postal card was not within the statute, which was dated March 1, 1892, and stated: "Your rent was due Thursday, Feb'y 25th, 1892, and has not been paid. If the rent is not paid by Thursday, Mch. 3d, 1892, I will place the matter in the hands of an officer. Respectfully." The court distinguishes United States v. Bayle, supra, in the smallness of that debt and the succession of the cards.

The words "Excelsior Collection Agency," upon an envelope, in large letters separated from the return direction, and taking up more than half the envelope, are calculated to reflect injuriously upon the character and conduct of the person addressed, and are within the statute of 1888. United States v. Brown, 43 Fed. 135. See also United States v. Dodge, infra.

But in Re Barber, 75 Fed. 980, it was held that unsealed envelopes having upon the outside, "In five days return to E. L. Barber's Mercantile Protection and Collection Bureau, Green Bay, Wis.," printed in 10 points in long primer French Clarendon type, the most prominence in type being given to the name "E. L. Barber" and the place, were not within the statute.

In United States v. Smith, 69 Fed. 971, where the defendant had sent a postal card reading: "You must do something on your note. I wish you to pay the int. and one hundred dollars of the principal. You have been fighting time all along, and now at the end you remit nothing. If I do not hear from you, I must be around. I will good names. The competency of Congress is beyond question, and the courts have uniformly upheld the legislation and applied it in the light of its evident purpose.

The verdict of the jury confirms the averment in the indictment that the accused deposited the envelope in the postoffice, or caused it to be done, which legally is the same thing, and that the printed indorsement on the face of the envelope was of the character charged, and referred to William S. Taylor, a former governor of Kentucky. Congress having ample power to enact the statute, the only question remaining is whether the indorsement described in the indictment could as matter of law be within its prohibitions. It has been frequently held the statute covers mail matter from creditors and collection agencies addressed to debtors, and bearing externally visible charges or imputations of habitual refusal to pay just debts, threats of suit, etc., not alone because of a threatening character, but because calculated and obviously intended to reflect injuriously upon the character and conduct of others. United States v. Davis (C. C.) 38 Fed. 326; United States v. Bayle (D. C.) 6 L.R.A.

742, 40 Fed. 664; United States v. Brown (C. C.) 43 Fed. 135; United States v. Simmons (D. C.) 61 Fed. 640; United States v. Smith (D. C.) 69 Fed. 971; United States v. Dodge (D. C.) 70 Fed. 235; United States v. Burnell (D. C.) 75 Fed. 825. Aside from the question whether the language employed by the accused is scurrilous, defamatory, or threatening, it was clearly calculated and obviously intended to reflect injuriously on the character and conduct of the person named. It was an offer of reward in prominent characters for the kidnapping and return of Mr. Taylor to the Kentucky authorities. The common understanding of men has its place in law as in the other affairs of life, and according to it the accused plainly asserted that Mr. Taylor was charged with crime, and was a fugitive from the justice of the state of Kentucky. It needs no discussion to show that such a charge is calculated to reflect injuriously upon one's character and conduct. And, as a prosecution under the statute does not proceed as one for libel, it is immaterial whether the objectionable language be true or false, or whether the accused was actuated by public spirit or pri-garnishee and foreclose. But I do so dislike to do this if you will only be half white. Rep."—it was held that the clause about "half white" indicated dishonesty and lack of a spotless character, and was within the statute.

In United States v. Simmons, 61 Fed. 640, it was held of three postals sent by a collection attorney, that those merely dunning were not criminal, but the expression in one of them, "I see that you do not intend to pay any attention to your agreements," was within the statute of 1888. See also United States v. Burnell, infra.

Black envelopes addressed in white letters, well known by persons connected with the mails to be dunning letters of a certain collection agency, are within the expression "delineations" in the statute, as that includes representations by colors. United States v. Dodge, 70 Fed. 235.

In United States v. Gee, 45 Fed. 194, objectionable matter upon the outside pages of four page circulars, which had no separate wrapper or cover over them, but were folded twice in oblong shape, the postage stamps being placed on the circulars themselves, was held not to be on the "outside cover or wrapper" within the meaning of the statute.

But in United States v. Burnell, 75 Fed. 824, it was held that the outside of a printed paper was its outside cover within the statute, when there is no separate cover or wrapper. In this case circulars of an agency, containing on the front or exposed page warnings against individuals as non-payers of their debts, were held within the statute.

Miscellaneous.

Where the statute (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3893) prohibited the mailing, among other things, of "any article or thing" of a certain special character, and then made it a misdemeanor to deposit for mailing "any of the hereinbefore mentioned articles or things," the final clause was not limited to the "articles or things" of the certain special character first referred to, but included all articles or things in the prohibiting clause. United States v. Pratt, Fed. Cas No. 16,082.

In an action in a state court for malicious prosecution in falsely charging the plaintiff with an offense against the postal laws in sending a certain postal card, it appeared that the prosecution began before a United States commissioner, who bound the accused over to the United States grand jury, who found "no true bill," and the accused was discharged; in the state-court action it was held that the trial court erroneously permitted evidence to be given that the purpose of sending the card was harmless, and that there was a violation of the United States statute in mailing the card, which read: "My Dear Sir:—It is with regret that I once more ask you to take your choice. I will vindicate myself if I live. The truth, and the whole truth, must come out. Respectfully." Griffin v. Pembroke, 64 Mo. App. 263.

vate malice. The exterior surface of mail matter is not a lawful place for its publication. Were this not so, then everyone might with equal right bulletin upon the outside of his letters, etc., deposited in the mails such charges as "Mrs. A. is wanted by the customs officers of New York," or "Mr. B. has so far eluded the authorities of Illinois," and so on. Such a practice would be intolerable. Again, an injurious reflection on the character and conduct of Mr. Taylor naturally and necessarily followed from the indorsement on the envelope. It was an obvious, unavoidable consequence, and the accused is presumed to have intended it. It does not appear that the accused was a public officer charged with the enforcement of the laws and acting in the performance of his official duties. Nor were the words on the envelope designed to inform or assist the postal officials in the discharge of their functions. They had no relation whatever to the transmission of the envelope and contents through the mails, or their return to the sender if not delivered to the person addressed, nor to the business of the accused and its permissible advertisement. The indorsement was entirely foreign to the customary matter on envelopes, wrappers, etc., and nothing appears to deny or contradict the intention palpably evidenced by its context and manner of display. If there was an undisclosed and admissible purpose in the mind of the accused, as was argued at the hearing, an unlawful method was adopted to accomplish it.

The judgment is affirmed.

YAZOO & MISSISSIPPI VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

C. M. BROWN.

(— Miss. —, 54 So. 804.)

Water — restoration of stream to channel.

A railroad company into whose borrow pits a neighboring stream turned in time of flood may restore the same to its ancient channel without cleaning out such channel, even after the change has existed long enough to permit the old channel to be partially filled up so that restoration of the flow of water washes and injures riparian property, if the limitation period has not run.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wilkinson 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to his land alleged to have been caused by the construction of a dam by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. N. Burch, with Messrs. Mayes & Longstreet, for appellant:

A riparian proprietor has the right, by erecting barriers, where a new channel has been formed on his land, to return the waters from the new channel to the old one, and he is not responsible for any damages done to his neighbor so long as his operations tend to confine the waters within their original channel.

Messrs. J. M. Foreman and Shannon & Jones for appellee.

Anderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Brown, sued the appellant, the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, for damages claimed to have been sustained by him through the inundation of his land, caused by a dam built by the appellant to divert Foster's creek from its new channel on appellant's right of way to Note. — Right of riparian owner to restore stream which has changed its course by natural causes, to old channel.

The right of a riparian owner to restore the waters of a stream which has changed its course to the old channel is generally conceded. The decisions, at least in the case of a sudden change of channel due to unusual natural causes, are but applications of the maxim, Aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat. But where the changes are gradual and such as usually occur in natural streams, such principle would seem to warrant a conclusion to the contrary, and, as a matter of fact, the few decisions upon this phase of the question are conflicting.

Some conflict also arises as to the time within which the restoration must take place.

For cases expressly applying the maxim, Aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat, see Tutthill v. Scott, 43 Vt. 525, 5 Am. Rep. 301, and YAZOO & M. VALLEY R. Co. v. BROWN.

At the outset it may be stated, as a positive rule of law, that a riparian owner may restore to its former channel a stream which a flood has caused to flow in a new channel upon his land, provided he does so within its old channel on the land of appellee. From a judgment in favor of the appellee for $500, appellant prosecutes this appeal.

Appellee's land adjoins appellant's railroad right of way. Until some time in the spring of 1908, Foster's creek ran through appellee's land in the same general direction of, and only a short distance from, the railroad, being nearer at some points than at others. Appellant's road was constructed more than twenty years before the alleged injury complained of. In its construction, where it adjoins appellee's land, the railroad track is laid on an embankment or fill, which was made necessary on account of the land traversed being low. The building of this embankment necessitated excavations from the right of way on either side, leaving depressions. During an overflow in the spring of 1908, the waters of Foster's creek left their old channel on appellee's land, and broke over into the depression so made on the west side of appellant's track, forming a new channel on its right of way, where it has since continued to flow. By the flow of its waters through this new channel, it soon began to cut into and undermine the embankment on which appellant's track is located. For the purpose of diverting the waters of this stream back into the old channel, the appellant, during the year 1908, built dams across it, which were washed away. In 1909, by driving down piling, a dam was finally constructed, which stood for a while and forced the water into the old channel. The gravamen of a reasonable time after the new channel was formed. See Jones v. Turner, 46 Barb. 527; Morton v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 48 Or. 444, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 341, 120 Am. St. Rep. 827, 87 Pac. 151, 1046. And that the waters of a stream which, because of a sudden rise, changed its channel, may be restored to the ancient channel, if done "promptly," see dictum in Morningstar v. Young, 2 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 294.

A much broader rule was laid down in York County v. Rolls, 27 Ont. App. Rep. 72, wherein it was held that where a stream suddenly changes its course, the riparian proprietor upon whose land the change takes place may, at any time before a prescriptive right to have the stream flow in its new channel is acquired by limitations, turn the stream back to its original channel, provided he has not, by his acts, worked an estoppel against himself.

But it has been held that an upper riparian proprietor is estopped from returning the waters of a stream to its natural channel to the detriment of other proprietors, where he has, by his acts, induced such other proprietors to believe that the change in the channel would be permanent. Smith v. Musgrove, 32 Mo. App. 241.

And, of course, an upper owner who acquiesces in the change for the prescriptive period cannot thereafter restore the stream to its ancient channel. Ibid.

And where the stream was changed by a flood, and the proprietor of the land on which the change took place acquiesced in the change for ten years, during which new rights accrued, it was held in Woodbury v. Short, 17 Vt. 387, 44 Am. Dec. 344, that he could not restore the water to its ancient channel. The court said: "We may, in this case, well apply the doctrine of acquiescence, which is made the ground of acquiring property in the soil which, by the immediate and manifest power of a stream of water, is suddenly taken from one man's estate and carried upon that of another. If it is permitted to remain upon the land where it is carried until it cements and coalesces with the soil, the property is changed, and there is no right to reclaim 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the soil which had been carried away. The defendant, in this case, having, as it must be supposed, acquiesced in the running of this stream in its new channel, and in the creation of new interests, must not now be permitted to disturb them."

And in Morningstar v. Young, supra, where a stream by a sudden rise changed its channel, and was allowed to run in its new channel for nine years, and until the old bed had filled up in part and had been cultivated, it was held that the riparian owner on whose land the change in channel occurred could not restore the stream to its old channel to the injury of the owner thereon. The decision was based in part, at least, on the authority of Woodbury v. Short, supra, it being said that the difference of one year in the lapse of time between the change and the restoration of the channel (the elapsed time between the change and the restoration of the channel having been ten years in the Woodbury Case) can make no difference in the application of the principle applied, and that the decision, as before stated, was upon the ground of acquiescence in the change.

A lower riparian proprietor has no right to go upon an upper owner's land without consent, and restore to the old channel waters which had been suddenly diverted by the act of God so as to flow elsewhere, it being argued that if this were not so, the riparian proprietor would hold all land above him in extraordinary and perpetual servitude. Wholey v. Caldwell, 108 Cal. 95, 30 L.R.A. 820, 49 Am. St. Rep. 64, 41 Pac. 31.

But one interested in the navigation of a stream may, with the consent of the riparian owner upon whose land a stream breaks its banks, repair such break, thereby restoring the stream to its accustomed channel, when such restoration is necessary for the proper navigation of the stream, though the effect is to cast the water against the bank of other riparian owners to their damage. Slater v. Fox, 5 Hun, 544.

And a stranger, with the consent of the riparian owner, may restore a stream which, because of a flood, has changed its course, see Jones v. Turner, 46 Barb. 527.

appellee's suit is that the appellant had no right to construct this dam, and divert the waters back to the old channel; that, if it had such a right, it could not be exercised unless the appellant first cleaned out the bed of the old channel, which had, since the creek changed its course, been filled up to some extent by the deposit of sand and gravel, causing the waters, when turned back, to wash and destroy his land. The appellant assigned as error the refusal of the court below to instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor.

Where a stream has left its accustomed channel, and formed a new channel on the land of an adjoining riparian owner, the latter has the right, by the erection of barriers, to turn the waters of such stream back from the new to the old channel. The maxim, Aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat, applies. The waters of a stream ought to run in its old channel, and no one can justly complain that one who has the right to have them so run makes them run there. Tuthill v. Scott, 43 Vt. 525, 5 Am. Rep. 301; Pierce v. Kinney, 59 Barb. 56; Gould, Waters, 3d ed. § 204. And the riparian owner on whose land the new channel is formed may erect barriers and turn the waters of such stream back from the new to the old channel, without being required first to clean out such old channel, so as to restore it to the depth and condition it was in before the stream changed its course. Pierce v. Kinney, supra. The reason is the change in the course of the stream is the fault of neither owner. It is from natural causes. It is true in this case the depressions along appellant's roadbed made in the construction of its road, in connection with the high waters of the creek, caused the stream to leave its old channel and form a new one. But this was not appellant's fault. By condemnation of or deed to its right of way, it acquired the right to make the necessary excavations to build its roadbed, and if, in properly constructing such roadbed, it resulted in the creek leaving its old channel, still appellant had the right to turn it from its new back to its old channel.

It is contended by appellee that he acquired a right, by prescription, to have the creek flow in the new channel; that the excavations which, in connection with the overflow, caused the new channel, were made more than twenty years before the bringing of this suit. There is no foundation in fact for such contention, for the testimony, without conflict, shows that the creek never left its old channel until the spring of 1908.

Appellee has no cause of action. The court should have directed a verdict for the appellant.

Reversed and remanded.

Where the change has been gradual there is, as before stated, a conflict of authority.

Thus, in Holcomb v. Blair, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 974, 76 S. W. 843, it was held that where a river had gradually and naturally changed its course, the owner of the land encroached on could not thereafter erect a wall where the river bank originally stood, so as to return the river to its original channel. The court said that in such case the thread of the stream in law follows the center of the channel as it changes, and distinguished the case from those where the change was violent and arose from a sudden natural cause.

And in Withers v. Purchase, 60 L. T. N. S. 819, it was held that where the channel of the stream has gradually filled, so that it has become altered, a riparian owner cannot, by removing the accretion, restore the stream to its ancient course.

But in Farquharson v. Farquharson, cited in Menzies v. Breadalbane, 3 Blight, N. R. 421, which is one of the early cases upon the question, it was held that a riparian proprietor may embank so as to restore a stream to its original course, from which it had gradually departed.

And in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 41 C. C. A. 597, 101 Fed. 678, it was held that a riparian owner upon a river which has gradually changed its channel so as to encroach upon his land may use the necessary means to restore the stream to its original channel, and maintain his bank in its original condition, and to that extent, at least, protect his property from the incursions of the water.

Brymbo Water Co. v. Lester's Line Co. 8 Reports, 329, the report of which is not accessible, is cited in 30 Am. & Eng. Enc., Law, 2d ed. p. 364, to the general proposition that "where the channel of a water course is changed by natural causes, the riparian owner across whose land the new channel is formed may return the water to its old channel."

As to restoring the waters of a stream which has changed its course, where the old channel had become obstructed or filled, it is held that no duty rests upon the restoring riparian owner to open or clear the old channel.

Thus, in Pierce v. Kinney, 59 Barb. 56, it was held that a person on whose land the water of a stream leaves its banks and forms an old channel may erect barriers and return the stream to its new channel, without, at the same time, opening the original bed of the stream, which during the flood which caused the change had become filled with gravel and debris.

And that the one restoring the stream to its old channel need not first clean out its channel, see also Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Brown.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, NINTH CIRCUIT.

DAVID E. BURLEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA et al.

Water — irrigation — government project — private land.

1. The act of Congress of June 17, 1902, to provide for the construction of irrigation works, permits the irrigation of lands held in private ownership, by providing for a charge upon the lands which may be irrigated with waters from an irrigation project, and limiting the size of tract held in private ownership for which water may be sold.

Note. — Eminent domain: for purposes of irrigation.

The earlier cases on this subject are collected in the note to Nash v. Clark, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 208, where it is pointed out that in Nash v. Clark the doctrine of the right of eminent domain for the benefit of a private individual for irrigation purposes had been pushed far.

In State ex rel. Galbraith v. Superior Ct. 59 Wash. 621, 110 Pac. 429, the court, considering a constitutional provision that "private property shall not be taken for private use, except for private ways of necessity, and for drains, flumes, or ditches on or across the lands of others for agricultural, domestic, or sanitary purposes," said: "It is no strained construction of the provision to say that this includes ditches for irrigation purposes, in view of the vast extent of arid land within our state, and the benefits of irrigation thereto in the increase of its productiveness and value;" the Constitution further providing that "the use of the waters of this state for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes shall be deemed public use." And it was held that a company might acquire a right of way for water, although for its own private use.

In Schneider v. Schneider, 36 Colo. 518, 86 Pac. 347, where the plaintiff sought to condemn a right of way for a ditch extending from the lower end of a certain irrigating ditch upon the defendant's premises to the plaintiff's premises, it was held that all that was necessary to show in the condemnation proceeding was the necessity for the use of the water, that there was water being wasted which the plaintiff might obtain, and the amount of damages; and that the defendant could not raise rights of third persons as to whether there could be an appropriation of water not directly from the stream.

Eminent domain — irrigation — private lands.

2. The right of the Federal government to exercise the power of eminent domain to secure land within a state for the irrigation of public land which it owns there is not affected in a particular case by the fact that it intends to supply water from its plant for the irrigation of land which has passed into private ownership, at least where, under the laws of the state, such private owners might have secured property necessary for the irrigation of their lands by right of eminent domain.

United States — power to construct irrigation works.

3. The Federal government has the constitutional power to make available, for the reclamation of arid land by irrigation, the waste waters of rivers within its border for a writ of prohibition against a judge before whom was pending an action by another corporation, M., to condemn sufficient of P.'s canal and right of way by enlargement to carry sufficient water to irrigate 20,000 acres more lying under its canals, M. having contracted to irrigate these lands, it was conceded that the use was a public one, and the writ was refused.

Where the statute charges the recipient of power with duties to the public, or a right of use is secured to the public, as where water is to be supplied to the neighboring public generally, the use is public. Borden v. Trespalacios Rice & Irrig. Co. 98 Tex. 494, 107 Am. St. Rep. 640, 86 S. W. 11, affirmed in 204 U. S. 667, 51 L. ed. 671, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 785, without opinion further than to cite Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. 200 U. S. 527, 50 L. ed. 581, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1174, and Clark v. Nash, 198 U. S. 361, 49 L. ed. 1085, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1171. In this case the court said, as to the claim that the enabling statute was indefinite as to territory: "It is next urged that the act is void because of the indefiniteness of the designation of the territory in which it is to operate, the supposed designation being of 'those portions of the state of Texas in which, by reason of the insufficient rainfall or by reason of the irregularity of the rainfall, irrigation is beneficial for agricultural purposes.' We do not understand that it was the purpose of the legislature to designate any part of the state as a territory to which the act is to be restricted in its effect. It is to operate throughout the state wherever the conditions prescribed may exist. We do not know that this, of itself, invades any constitutional right of the citizens. The citizen's property cannot be taken except for public use, nor without compensation. The conditions under which this may be done must exist to justify a taking as for a public use, and, where they do exist, we do not see that the additional requirement that irrigation be beneficial to agriculture, because of the insufficient rainfall, prejudices the property owner."

ders, through the construction of works to impound and distribute such water.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Central Division of the District of Idaho to review a judgment directing condemnation of certain lands of defendant for reservoir purposes. Affirmed.

Statement by Morrow, Circuit Judge:

This action was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Idaho, by authority of the Attorney General of the United States, on behalf of the United States, pursuant to an application made therefor by the Secretary of the Interior, proceeding under § 7 of the act of June 17, 1902, chap. 1093, § 7, 32 Stat. at L. 388, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 600, entitled, "An Act Appropriating the Receipts from the Sale and Disposal of Public Lands in Certain States and Territories to the Construction of Irrigation Works for the Reclamation of Arid Lands." The state of Idaho is one of the states made subject to the provisions of this act. Section 7 provides as follows: "That where, in carrying out the provisions of this act, it becomes necessary to acquire any rights or property, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to acquire the same for the United States by purchase or by condemnation under judicial process, and to pay from the reclamation fund the sums which may be needed for that purpose, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General of the United States upon every application of the Secretary of the Interior under this act, to cause proceedings to be commenced for condemnation within thirty days from the receipt of the application at the department of justice."

The flooding of lands of others for the purpose of furnishing and selling to the public generally electrical power and water for irrigation of lands and other beneficial uses, is a public use under a Constitution providing: "The use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, distribution, or other beneficial use, and the right of way over the lands of others for all ditches, drains, flumes, canals, and aqueducts necessarily used in connection therewith, as well as the sites for reservoirs necessary for collecting and storing the same, shall be held to be a public use," and under a statute enumerating among public uses "sites for reservoirs necessary for collecting and storing water, . . . electric power lines." Helena Power Transmission Co. v. Spratt, 35 Mont. 108, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 567, 88 Pac. 773, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1055, where, however,

It is alleged in the amended complaint that the Secretary of the Interior had caused to be surveyed and located a certain irrigation project in the state of Idaho, known as the "Payette-Boise project," and had determined that the same was practicable, and had let the contracts for the construction thereof; that the said irrigation project included as a part thereof the construction of a reservoir in Canyon county, Idaho, commonly known and designated as the "Deer Flat reservoir;" that the site of the reservoir included two certain described tracts of land in Canyon county, Idaho, containing in the aggregate 296 acres, the title to which stood in the name of the defendant, Burley, who was capable of conveying title in fee to said premises free and clear of all encumbrances, except the interest therein of the county of Canyon, Idaho; that the county of Canyon claimed some interest, estate, or title in said premises; that the reservoir was, at the time of the filing of the complaint, in the actual course of construction, and when completed the water impounded by said reservoir would completely overflow the lands described in the complaint; that it had become necessary that the United States acquire title to the lands described in the complaint for use as a part of said reservoir site, and for such purpose the United States, acting through the Secretary of the Interior, had been and was desirous of purchasing and acquiring title in fee to said tract of land for that purpose; that the Secretary of the Interior was authorized by law to acquire said lands by condemnation, and in his opinion it was necessary and advantageous to the government that the said lands should be so acquired; that said irrigation project was being primarily constructed for the purpose of supplying water for irrigation to arid lands in Ada and ever, it was held that a foreign corporation could not take property by eminent domain.

In Spratt v. Helena Power Transmission Co. 37 Mont. 60, 94 Pac. 631, practically the same case came on again, with the exception that meantime the legislature had passed an act empowering corporations of the United States or of another state, authorized to engage in business in Montana, and so engaged, to acquire real property as if domestic; and it was held that this was a valid statute.

As stated in BURLEY V. UNITED STATES, the constitutionality of the U. S. act of June 17, 1902, was sustained in United States v. Hanson, 93 C. C. A. 371, 167 Fed. 881, where it was held that a settler on land withdrawn (from entry), for reclamation purposes, might be ejected by the United States without compensation.

B. B. B.

Canyon counties, in the state of Idaho, which were public lands of the United States, and that more than 50,000 acres of the public lands of the United States would be supplied with water for irrigation and reclamation from the said project by means of said Deer Flat reservoir; that the land described, the title to which was in the defendant, and which was included in said reservoir site, was absolutely necessary for the use of the government in the construction of said reservoir; that the reasonable value of said land did not exceed $10 per acre, amounting to $2,960, and the United States offered to purchase said lands at said valuation; that a disagreement had occurred and then existed between the defendant and the United States, concerning the purchase of said tracts of land by the United States, to wit, that the United States and defendant were unable to agree upon a price for the land which the United States considered to be reasonable; and that the defendant asked and demanded therefor a price which, in the opinion of the United States, was more than said land was worth. The United States prayed for judgment that it should be adjudged that the public use required the condemnation of the land described, and that the United States should be entitled to take and hold title in fee to said land for the public use specified, upon making compensation therefor, and that the court proceed to determine, in the manner prescribed by law, compensation to be paid by the United States for the said property.

To this amended complaint the defendant interposed a demurrer on various grounds of uncertainty, among others, that it did not appear therefrom whether it was the purpose of the United States to devote said irrigation project wholly and entirely to the irrigation of lands owned or possessed by the United States, or whether its purpose was to devote said reservoir and project in part or otherwise to furnishing water for the purpose of irrigating lands in which the United States had no title or possession, but which were owned and possessed by other persons. The demurrer upon the ground mentioned was overruled, and thereupon the defendant answered, in which he admitted, among other things, the allegation in the amended complaint that a disagreement had occurred and then existed between the defendant and the United States, concerning the purchase of said tracts of land by the United States, that is to say, the disagreement was as to the purchase price; but the defendant denied that he demanded or asked a price for said lands in excess of their worth. The defendant, further answering, and as a further defense to the cause of action, alleged that he was informed and believed, and therefore averred the fact to be, that it was the design, intention, and purpose of the United States to construct the irrigation project mentioned and described in said amended complaint, for the purpose of supplying water to lands not owned or possessed by the United States, or in which the United States had any interest of any kind of character, but which were owned and possessed by, and in which private individuals alone were interested, and that the proceeding was instituted for the purpose of, and it was the design and intention of the United States, if successful therein, to devote said land of defendant to said purposes, in order to enable the United States to irrigate such lands, the title to which was reposed in private ownership, and to further the interests of the owners thereof, and to use and devote defendant's lands in aid of private enterprises in the improvement of lands not owned, possessed, or controlled in any wise by the United States, or in which it had any right, title, interest, or possession of any kind or character whatsoever, of a public or governmental nature.

Upon the issues thus presented, the case was tried before the court and a jury, upon a stipulation between the parties to the action that all issues except that of the value of the land sought to be condemned should be heard before the court without a jury, and that the question of the value of the land should be submitted to the jury. Thereupon a jury was impaneled, and, the court having announced its decision upon the issues submitted to it, the jury, under the instructions, returned a verdict for the amount agreed upon by counsel for the respective parties, to wit, the sum of $5,920. The findings of the court upon the issues submitted to it were as follows:

"(1) That this action is brought by the authority of the Attorney General of the United States, on behalf of the United States, pursuant to an application made therefor by the honorable Secretary of the Interior of the United States, proceeding under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled, 'An Act Appropriating the Receipts from the Sale and Disposal of Public Lands in Certain States and Territories for the Construction of Irrigation Works for the Reclamation of Arid Lands,' approved June 17, 1902. 32 Stat. at L. 338, chap. 1093.

"(2) That long prior to the commencement of this action, the honorable Secretary of the Interior, proceeding under authority of said act, caused to be surveyed and located a certain irrigation project in the state of Idaho, known as the 'Pavette-

Boise project,' and determined that the same was practicable, and let contracts for the construction thereof; said project being situate in the counties of Ada and Canyon. That said project includes, as a part thereof, the construction of a reservoir in Canyon county, Idaho, commonly known and designated as the 'Deer Flat reservoir,' the site of which is a natural basin comprising approximately 10,000 acres of land. That the land described in the amended complaint as belonging to the defendant, the title to which the plaintiff seeks by this action to acquire, is situate within said basin, and will, if said basin is used as a reservoir site, be covered with water. That said reservoir was, at the time of the commencement of this action, in the actual course of construction. That both the lands embraced in said reservoir site and those in the vicinity thereof are arid in character, and cannot be profitably farmed without artificial irrigation. That, of the lands embraced within the reservoir site, the plaintiff owned only a small portion, but of the lands adjacent thereto and in the vicinity thereof, and susceptible of irrigation therefrom, the plaintiff was the owner of approximately 45,000 acres and approximately the same amount of lands had passed to patent and were in private ownership. That at the time said project was surveyed and its feasibility considered, all the natural flow of Boise river, the only available source of supply for the irrigation of said and other lands during a large portion of the irrigating season, had been appropriated, and was being diverted by private corporations for the irrigation of agricultural lands, and no considerable additional area could be irrigated, except by storing and conserving waters flowing in the river during the winter months, or during the high-water season. The project as finally decided upon by the honorable Secretary of the Interior contemplated the taking over of an existing canal, called the 'New York canal,' which was to be improved, enlarged, and extended, and through which water was to be carried to said reservoir for the supply thereof during the seasons of the year when there was an adequate supply of water in the river for such purpose, and for delivering water to parties who already had the right to receive water from said canal by reason of existing contracts, and also to furnish water for the irrigation of lands belonging to the plaintiff which were susceptible of irrigation from said canal, and for the irrigation of unclaimed lands belonging to private individuals, but the entire project was for the irrigation and reclamation of arid lands. That, after the government had made some investigation but before said project was decided upon, property owners and citizens of said counties of Ada and Canyon entered upon a systematic agitation of the project, and certain individuals, acting upon behalf of the public, and complying with the laws of the state of Idaho relative to securing permits for the appropriation of water, secured permits for such appropriation from the Boise river, and assigned the same to the United States, and the owners of arid lands, for the irrigation of which there was no available water, proffered to the government their co-operation and assistance, agreeing that if the government would undertake the project, and thereby furnish water for the irrigation of their lands, they would bear their proportion of the expense thereof. That, in consideration of the large tract of public land to be irrigated and reclaimed by means of said project, and such co-operation and assistance from private owners, the honorable Secretary of the Interior adopted said project and entered upon its construction. That, in order to irrigate some of the public lands lying in the vicinity of said reservoir, it is necessary to maintain the water in said reservoir at such a level as will cause the same to overflow the defendant's land. That, at the time said project was being investigated, the public lands lying in the vicinity of said reservoir site, and susceptible to irrigation from said reservoir, were withdrawn from entry under the public land laws, and since said withdrawal substantially all of said lands have been entered under and subject to the conditions of said reclamation act.

"(3) That the honorable Secretary of the Interior entered upon said project of the construction of said reservoir primarily for the purpose of irrigating public lands of the United States, and that the United States has a large and substantial interest in the successful execution of that project, in that thereby water will be rendered available for the irrigation of large tracts of its own lands, thus rendering them marketable; and that, for the purpose of carrying out said irrigation project, it is necessary that the plaintiff acquire the title to the defendant's lands, as the same are described in the amended complaint, in order that it may use them for a part of said reservoir site.

"(4) That the defendant, David E. Burley, is the sole owner of said lands, and the county of Canyon has no title thereto or interest therein.

"(5) That the plaintiff and the defendant, David E. Burley, were unable to agree upon the value of said lands, or the price to be paid therefor by the plaintiff.

"And, as conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, it is found that the plaintiff seeks to condemn said lands and to acquire title thereto for a lawful purpose, and that the honorable Secretary of the Interior, in entering upon said project, did not exceed the authority conferred upon him by the provisions of said act of June 17, 1902, and that said lands are necessary to such purpose, and that the plaintiff is entitled to expropriate them and acquire title thereto upon the payment to the defendant of a just compensation therefor, namely, the amount found by the jury."

The compensation agreed upon and found by the jury having been paid into court, the judgment and order of condemnation was made. The case comes here upon writ of error from the judgment.

Argued before Gilbert, Ross, and Morrow, Circuit Judges.

Mr. John G. Willis for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. C. H. Lingenfelter and B. E. Stoutemyer for defendants in error.

Morrow, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The allegation of the amended complaint that a disagreement had occurred and existed between the defendant and the United States concerning the purchase price of the land sought to be condemned, in this, that the parties were unable to agree upon a price for said land, the admission of the answer that this allegation was true, except that the defendant denied that he demanded or asked a price for the land in excess of its worth, the stipulation of the parties at the trial that the question of value of the land should be submitted to a jury, and the fact that the amount for which the jury was asked to render a verdict was agreed upon by counsel for the respective parties and paid into court, have the appearance of stating a single original subject of controversy, and come very nearly rendering other questions in the case feigned issues. But this feature of the proceeding was evidently not so intended, and will not be so considered. It will be treated, however, as showing conclusively that there is no claim on the part of the defendant that the United States is seeking to appropriate defendant's land without just and adequate compensation. A just and adequate compensation has been agreed upon and paid into court, and the defendant is not required to surrender his title or any rights that he may have therein without just and adequate compensation being first paid to him by the United States, as provided by law.

It is contended by the defendant that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained because of the insufficiency of the complaint and uncertainty of the allegation as to the purpose of the United States in acquiring title to defendant's property; that is to say, it is uncertain, because it does not appear whether it was the purpose of the United States to devote the proposed irrigation project wholly and entirely to irrigation of lands owned or possessed by the United States, or whether it was proposed to devote said reservoir and project, in part or otherwise, to furnishing water for the purpose of irrigating lands in which the United States had no title, interest, or possession, but which were owned and possessed by other persons.

The specific objection to the complaint is that it is uncertain, because it alleges "that said irrigation project is being primarily constructed for the purpose of supplying water for irrigation," etc., and that a statement as to secondary and other purposes is withheld, giving birth to a suspicion that the United States has a purpose which it does not disclose, lest such disclosure should work a failure of the proceeding. It appears from the opinion of the learned judge in the court below (United States v. Burley [C. C.] 172 Fed. 615, 618) that the original complaint was silent as to the ownership of the lands to be irrigated from the reservoir. A demurrer to the complaint was accordingly sustained by the court upon that ground, and, complying with the suggestion of the court, the attorney for the United States in the amended complaint alleged that the "project was being primarily constructed for the purpose of supplying water for irrigation to arid lands in Ada and Canyon counties, in the state of Idaho, which are public lands of the United States." There was a demurrer to this amended complaint on the ground of uncertainty, and the objection renewed that the allegation as to the "primary" purpose of the United States in appropriating this land was not sufficient. The demurrer was overruled, and the allegation of the complaint denied in defendant's answer; and upon the issue thus joined evidence was taken, a finding made, and judgment of condemnation entered in favor of the United States.

We need not stop to discuss the various meanings of the word "primarily." It will be sufficient to assign to it a meaning having reference to the subject-matter and the surrounding circumstances. This rule of interpretation permits us to refer to the findings of fact in this case, based upon the evidence admitted in support of the allegation concerning the primary purpose of the irrigation project described in the complaint. It was there found that the entire project was for the irrigation and reclamation of arid lands. It contemplated the taking over of an existing canal, called the "New York canal," which was to be improved, enlarged, and extended, and through which water was to be carried to a reservoir for the supply thereof during the seasons of the year when there was an adequate supply of water in the river for such purpose. The project so far appears to be entirely in accord with the act of June 17, 1902, which provides in § 1 that certain money received from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain states and territories, including the state of Idaho, shall be "reserved, set aside, and appropriated as a special fund in the treasury, to be known as the 'reclamation fund,' to be used in the examination and survey for, and the construction and maintenance of, irrigation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters for the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands in the said states and territories" named. [32 Stat. at L. 388, chap. 1093, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 600.]

But the findings go further, and find that the project contemplated: (1) The delivery of water to parties who already had the right to receive water from said canal by reason of existing contracts. (2) To furnish water for the irrigation of lands belonging to the United States which were susceptible of irrigation from said canal. (3) For the irrigation of unreclaimed lands belonging to private individuals. It was found, further, that the project of the construction of said reservoir was entered upon "primarily" for the purpose of irrigating public lands of the United States, and that the United States had a large and substantial interest in the successful execution of that project, in that thereby water would be rendered available for the irrigation of large tracts of its own land, thus rendering them marketable, and that, for the purpose of carrying out said irrigation project, it was necessary that the United States should acquire the title to the defendant's lands, as the same were described in the amended complaint, in order that it might use them for a part of said reservoir site.

We now have a clear understanding of the meaning of the word "primarily" as used in the complaint. It means that the entire project is for the irrigation and reclamation of arid lands, and that the dominating purpose of the United States is to store and supply water for the irrigation and reclamation of its own arid lands. But the use of the word "primarily" in describing the project and the dominating purpose concerning such lands admits the existence of a secondary or concomitant purpose, to deliver water to parties who already had the right to receive water from the existing canal, and also to furnish water for the irrigation of unreclaimed arid lands belonging to private individuals. The defendant contends that the United States has no right to take his property for a purpose which includes such secondary or concomitant purpose, and because the complaint has been framed in view of this construction, he contends that it is open to his demurrer for insufficiency and uncertainty.

In determining this question our first inquiry must be whether the irrigation of private lands of an arid character is authorized by the act of June 17, 1902. The title of the act is: "An Act Appropriating the Receipts from the Sale and Disposal of Public Lands in Certain States and Territories to the Construction of Irrigation Works for the Reclamation of Arid Lands."

In § 1 of that act there is a provision for the formation of a "reclamation fund" with the money received from the sale of public lands in certain states and territories. In § 3 the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to withdraw from public entry the lands required for irrigation works contemplated by the act, and also lands believed to be susceptible of irrigation from said works, and, upon the completion of surveys of such lands and of the necessary maps, plans, and estimates of cost, the Secretary of the Interior is required to determine whether or not the project is practicable and advisable, and, if found to be so, the public lands which it is proposed to irrigate by means of the contemplated works shall be subject to entry only under the homestead laws, in tracts of not less than 40 nor more than 160 acres, and shall be subject to the limitations, charges, terms, and conditions in the act provided. In § 4 an irrigation project determined by the Secretary of the Interior to be practicable may be constructed by contract, provided there are the necessary funds in the "reclamation fund" available for that purpose. If there is, the Secretary of the Interior is then required to give notice of the lands irrigable under such project, and, among other things, the charges which shall be made per acre upon the entries made under the provisions of the act, and "upon lands in private ownership which may be irrigated by the waters of the said irrigation project." In § 5 it is further provided that "no right to the use of water for land in private ownership shall be sold for a tract exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to any one landowner." The act clearly provides for the irrigation of private lands under the conditions therein specified, where such lands are arid and within the limits of an irrigation project deemed by the Secretary of the Interior to be practicable and advisable. We are therefore of the opinion that the complaint is not open to the defendant's demurrer on the ground of insufficiency or uncertainty, under the provisions of the act of Congress.

We come now to the consideration of the real question in this case, which is presented as a constitutional question, and may be stated in the following terms: Can the United States, owning arid lands within a state, organize and maintain a scheme or project whereby it will associate with itself other owners of arid lands for the purpose of reclaiming and improving such lands, and in that behalf exercise the right of eminent domain against another landowner for the purpose of obtaining the title and possession of land absolutely necessary in carrying the proposed scheme or project into effect?

It is contended by the defendant that this cannot be done, and the case of Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 92, 51 L. ed. 956, 972, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 655, 665, is cited as authority for such a limitation upon the power and authority of Congress. It is said that the court, referring to the statute under consideration, held in substance that article 4, § 3, of the Constitution of the United States, providing that "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory and other property belonging to the United States," did not authorize Congress to provide an irrigation project to be carried out within a state, for the reclamation of arid lands not the property of the United States. The controversy in that case was between the states of Kansas and Colorado, concerning the diversion of the waters of the Arkansas river for the irrigation of lands in Colorado. It was alleged that such diversion damaged certain riparian proprietors in Kansas, through which state the river flows. The case was decided against the state of Kansas, on the ground that the detriment to Kansas in the diminution of the flow of water by the diversion in Colorado, while substantial, was not so great as to make the appropriation of the water in Colorado an inequitable apportionment between the states. The United States intervened in the case for its interest, contending that the determination of the rights of the two states inter sese, in regard to the flow of water in the Arkansas river, was subordinate to the superior right on the part of the national government to control the whole system of reclamation of arid lands within the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

states. It was in answer to this contention that the court expressed the opinion, the substance of which has been stated. But the court said further concerning the national control of the arid regions: "It does not follow that the national government is entirely powerless in respect to this matter. These arid lands are largely within the territories, and over them, by virtue of the second paragraph of § 3 of article 4 heretofore quoted, or by virtue of the power vested in the national government to acquire territory by treaties, Congress has full power of legislation, subject to no restrictions other than those expressly named in the Constitution, and therefore it may legislate in respect to all arid lands within their limits. As to those lands within the limits of the states, at least of the western states, the national government is the most considerable owner, and has power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, its property. We do not mean that its legislation can override state laws in respect to the general subject of reclamation. While arid lands are to be found mainly, if not only, in the western and newer states, yet the powers of the national government within the limits of those states are the same (no greater and no less) than those within the limits of the original thirteen, and it would be strange if, in the absence of a definite grant of power, the national government could enter the territory of the states along the Atlantic, and legislate in respect to improving by irrigation or otherwise the lands within their borders. Nor do we understand that hitherto Congress has acted in disregard to this limitation."

That is to say, it would be strange if the national government could enter the territory of a state where there were no public lands of the United States requiring irrigation, and no public lands through which water flows necessary for the irrigation of arid lands, and by legislation provide a system of irrigation for the private lands within the state and control its administration. It would indeed be a strange proceeding, and obviously wholly outside of the authority of Congress. But in this case the United States is the owner of large tracts of land within the states named in the act of June 17, 1902. The public welfare requires that these lands, as well as those held in private ownership, should be reclaimed and made productive. To do this effectively and economically with the available water supply, large tracts must be brought into relation with a single system or project. These states having arid lands have accordingly acted upon the subject, and, in the state of Idaho, where the land is located in this case, it has been provided in § 14 of article 1 of the Constitution that "the necessary use of lands for the construction of reservoirs or storage basins for the purpose of irrigation, or for rights of way for the construction of canals, ditches, flumes, or pipes to convey water to the place of use, for any useful, beneficial, or necessary purpose, or for drainage, or for the drainage of mines, etc., is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state. Private property may be taken for public use, but not until a just compensation, to be ascertained in a manner prescribed by law, shall be paid therefor."

The act of June 17, 1902, not only recognizes the Constitution and laws of the state providing for the appropriation of its waters and the reclamation of its arid lands, but it requires that the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of the act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws. In what respect does such a proceeding contravene the Constitution of the United States? Has not the United States as a landowner the same rights within the state that any other landowner has? And when the land is of such a character that, to be useful, it must be irrigated and reclaimed in large tracts, may not the United States, co-operating with such other landowners, organize and establish an effective and economical system or project for such irrigation and reclamation? And, finally, if the necessary use of lands for such a purpose is made a public use by the state, is there any reason why the United States should not exercise its right of eminent domain to acquire title to lands absolutely necessary to such public use? We can think of no constitutional objection to such a proceeding, when it is clearly established that, with respect to surrounding circumstances and conditions, the use is a public use; and, while it has been held that the law of the state is not conclusive upon this subject, the Supreme Court of the United States in numerous cases has determined that such a use as here described in the project under consideration is a public use.

In Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 160, 41 L. ed. 369, 389, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56, 64, the Supreme Court had under consideration the validity of the law of the state of California providing for the organization and government of irrigation districts. It was contended that the proceedings under the act, with respect to an assessment upon certain land within the district, if upheld as constitutional, would result in the taking of the property of one person or class of persons, and giving it to another,—“an act,” it was said, “of pure spoliation.” It has been held by the supreme court of the state of California that the use of water for irrigation purposes, under the provision of the state act, was a public use, and a corporation organized by virtue of the act, for the purpose of irrigation, would be a municipal corporation, and organized for the promotion of the prosperity and welfare of the people. The Supreme Court of the United States, reviewing the provisions of the act and the considerations for its enactment, said: “Viewing the subject for ourselves and in the light of these considerations, we have very little difficulty in coming to the same conclusion reached by the courts of California. The use must be regarded as a public use, or else it would seem to follow that no general scheme of irrigation can be formed or carried into effect. In general, the water to be used must be carried for some distance and over or through private property, which cannot be taken in invitum if the use to which it is to be put be not public, and if there be no power to take property by condemnation, it may be impossible to acquire it at all. The use for which private property is to be taken must be a public one, whether the taking be by the exercise of the right of eminent domain or by that of taxation. Cole v. La Grange, 113 U. S. 1, 28 L. ed. 896, 5 Sup. St. Rep. 416. A private company or corporation without the power to acquire the land in invitum would be of no real benefit, and at any rate the cost of the undertaking would be so greatly enhanced by the knowledge that the land must be acquired by purchase, that it would be practically impossible to build the works or obtain the water. Individual enterprise would be equally ineffectual; no one owner would find it possible to construct and maintain waterworks and canals any better than private corporations or companies, and, unless they had the power of eminent domain, they could accomplish nothing. If that power could be conferred upon them, it could only be upon the ground that the property they took was to be taken for a public purpose. While the consideration that the work of irrigation must be abandoned if the use of the water may not be held to be or constitute a public use is not to be regarded as conclusive in favor of such use, yet that fact is in this case a most important consideration. Millions of acres of land otherwise cultivable must be left in their present arid and worthless condition, and an effectual obstacle will therefore remain in the way of the advance of a large portion of the state in material wealth and prosperity. To irrigate, and thus to bring into possible cultivation, these large masses of otherwise worthless lands, would seem to be a public purpose and a matter of public interest, not confined to the landowners, or even to any one section of the state."

The conditions referred to in that case are almost identical with the conditions in the present case, and the opinion of the court is peculiarly applicable to the question under consideration.

In Clark v. Nash, 198 U. S. 361, 49 L. ed. 1085, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1171, the action was brought in the state court of Utah by an individual landowner as plaintiff, to condemn a right of way to enable the plaintiff to enlarge a ditch belonging to the defendants, for the conveying of water across the land of the defendants for the purpose of irrigating plaintiff's land. The trial court found the facts to be that plaintiff's land was arid land, and would not produce without artificial irrigation, but that with artificial irrigation the same would produce abundantly of grain, vegetables, fruits, and hay; that the use of the surplus waters of a certain creek, which it was proposed to convey to plaintiff's land by the enlarged ditch, was a public use; and that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree condemning a right of way across defendants' land for the purpose of carrying such surplus waters to the plaintiff's land. The case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States as involving a constitutional question in the taking of defendants' land for a private use. Upon the facts stated in the findings of the trial court, and having reference to the conditions stated, it was held that the proceedings did not in any way violate the Constitution of the United States.

In Strickley v. Highland Boy Min. Co. 200 U. S. 527, 50 L. ed. 581, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1174, the action was also brought in a state court of Utah to condemn a right of way, under a statute of the state, for an aerial bucket line across defendant's placer mining claim. It was objected that the right of way was solely for private use, and that the taking of the land for that purpose was in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The statute was held to be constitutional, and the proceeding upheld by the supreme court of the state, and the decision affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the case of Bacon v. Walker, 204 U. S. 311, 316, 51 L. ed. 499, 501, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280, 290, it was said, with respect to the last-named case, that it "was the recognition of the power of the state to work out from the conditions existing in a mining region the largest welfare of the inhabitants." This is the theory upon which the laws relating to the irrigation and reclamation of arid lands are based, and justifies the laws of the states upon the subject, and the co-operation of the United States under the act of June 17, 1902.

The objection that the United States has no constitutional authority to enter into such co-operation, and engage in the business of organizing and maintaining irrigation and reclamation projects of the character provided by the act of June 17, 1902, is equally untenable. The act was held constitutional by this court in United States v. Hanson, 93 C. C. A. 371, 167 Fed. 881, and we can add but little to what was said in that case. But, considering the provisions of the act in view of the specific objections against its constitutionality in this case, we must say that our opinion is not shaken as to the correctness of that decision. The policy of reclaiming the arid region of the West for a beneficial use, open to all the people of the United States, is as much a national policy as the preservation of rivers and harbors for the benefit of navigation. President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress in 1901, in urging the legislation which resulted in the passage of the reclamation act, made use of language applicable here. He said: "It is as right for the national government to make the streams and rivers of the arid region useful by engineering works for water storage, as to make useful the rivers and harbors of the humid region by engineering works of another kind. The storing of the floods in reservoirs at the head waters of our rivers is but an enlargement of our present policy of river control, under which levees are built on the lower reaches of the same streams."

Again he says in the same message: "The reclamation and settlement of the arid lands will enrich every portion of our country, just as the settlement of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys brought prosperity to the Atlantic states. The increased demand for manufactured articles will stimulate industrial production, while wider home markets and the trade of Asia will consume the larger food supplies, and effectually prevent western competition with eastern agriculture. Indeed, the products of irrigation will be consumed chiefly in upbuilding local centers of mining and other industries, which would not otherwise come into existence at all. Our people as a whole will profit, for successful home making is but another name for the upbuilding of the nation."

That the United States may, where the circumstances and conditions require it, reserve the waters of a river flowing through its public lands, for a particular, beneficial purpose, was held by this court in Winters v. United States, 74 C. C. A. 666, 143 Fed. 740, and 78 C. C. A. 546, 148 Fed. 684. This decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Winters v. United States, 207 U. S. 564, 577, 52 L. ed. 340, 346, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207, 212, where the court said: "The power of the government to reserve the waters and exempt them from appropriation under the state laws is not denied, and could not be. United States v. Rio Grande Dam & Irrig. Co. 174 U. S. 690, 702, 43 L. ed. 1136, 1141, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 770; United States v. Winans, 198 U. S. 371, 49 L. ed. 1089, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 662." To the same effect was the decision of this court in Conrad Inv. Co. v. United States, 88 C. C. A. 647, 161 Fed. 829, 831.

The authority of the United States to reserve the waters of its streams in the arid region for a beneficial purpose has been recently extended to the settlement of a long-standing controversy between the United States and Mexico, respecting the use of the waters of the Rio Grande. By the act Feb. 25, 1905, chap. 798 (33 Stat. at L. 814), the provisions of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, were extended to the portion of the state of Texas bordering upon the Rio Grande which could be irrigated from a dam constructed near Engle, in the territory of New Mexico. This act was passed for the purpose of enabling the United States to carry into effect the terms of a proposed treaty or convention with Mexico, which was afterwards signed on May 21, 1906 (34 Stat. at L. 2953). This treaty or convention provided that "after the completion of the proposed storage dam near Engle, New Mexico, and the distributing system auxiliary thereto, and as soon as water shall be available in said system for the purpose, the United States shall deliver to Mexico a total of 60,000 acre-feet of water annually, in the bed of the Rio Grande at the point where the head works of the Acequia Madre, known as the Old Mexican canal, now exist above the city of Juarez, Mexico."

By the act March 4, 1907, chap. 2918 (34 Stat. at L. 1357), an appropriation of $1,000,000 was made available as needed, and to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the construction of the above-mentioned dam in connection with the irrigation project on the Rio Grande. By the act June 12, 1906, chap. 3288, 34 Stat. at L. 259, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 603, the provisions of the reclamation act were extended so as to include and apply to the state of Texas, where there never has been any public lands of the United States, but where such streams as the Pecos and the Rio Grande, rising in New Mexico, a territory of the United States, and flowing into Texas, have become important factors in the irrigation and reclamation of the arid lands of that state.

This legislation illustrates the scope of the reclamation act and its purpose in preserving the waters and reclaiming the arid lands of the Western states, where, as said in Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 91, 51 L. ed. 956, 972, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 655, 665, "The national government is the most considerable owner, and has power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, its property."

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

SALLY MEEKER, Resp't.,

v.

JENNIE DRAFFEN, Appt.,

and NELLIE MEEKER, Resp't.

Will — devise to widow of married man — construction.

A devise to the widow of a man who is married at the time the will is made is not limited to the wife then living, but belongs to the one who eventually becomes his widow as the result of death of the wife and remarriage of the man.

Note. — Who takes under gift to "husband," "wife," or "widow."

Stated more particularly, the question which forms the subject of this note is as to which of two or more persons who have at different times answered, or might have answered, to the description of "husband," "wife," or "widow," and who are not designated otherwise than by such relationship, is to be taken as the intended beneficiary of a testamentary gift, or of an insurance policy or benefit certificate. The note, therefore, does not include cases in which the beneficiary is definitely named and the relationship is mentioned by way of description; nor cases in which the ultimate question is as to whether the gift is conditioned upon the lawfulness or continuance of the relation. Certain aspects of the latter question are treated in a note in 69 L.R.A. 940, on "Effect of divorce to revoke gift by will;" a note in 50 L.R.A. 552, on "Divorce as affecting wife's right to insurance upon her husband's life," and a note in

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, modifying and affirming an interlocutory judgment of a Trial Term for Delaware County in plaintiff's favor and from a final judgment of a special term in an action brought to partition certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

By her complaint in this action the plaintiff alleged that herself and the "defendant Jennie Draffen are each seised and entitled in fee simple absolute to one undivided half" of certain premises in the county of Delaware, and the relief demanded is a partition of the same in the usual form. The defendant Nellie Meeker, by her answer, alleged that she is "the owner in fee simple absolute of an undivided fourth interest in" said premises, and she demanded judgment accordingly. The defendant Jennie Draffen by her answer to the complaint, "and to the claim of Nellie Meeker herein and in her answer set forth, denies that the said Nellie Meeker is the owner of any interest in the real estate described in the complaint." Each party in her pleading alleged facts tending to support her claim.

The trial resulted in an interlocutory judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of her complaint, and after a sale by the referee appointed for the purpose final judgment was entered, directing distribution of the fund accordingly. Upon

3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 478, on "Effect of divorce on rights of beneficiary in insurance policy."

Mr. Jarman, in attempting to formulate general propositions with reference to this subject, has said: "The distinctions upon the subject deducible from general principles, and the authorities just referred to, appear to be the following: First, that a devise or bequest to the wife of A, who has a wife at the date of the will, relates to that person, notwithstanding any change of circumstances which may render the description inapplicable at a subsequent period, and, by parity of reasoning, is under all circumstances confined to her; but that, secondly, if A have no wife at the date of the will, the gift embraces the individual sustaining that character at the death of the testator; and, thirdly, if there be no such person either at the date of the will or at the death of the testator, it applies to the woman who shall first answer the description of wife, at any subsequent period. There seems to be no ground, upon principle, for varying the construction where the gift to the wife is by way of remainder after the death of the husband; the rule being that the devise of an estate in remainder, to a person in a certain character, and by reference simply and exclusively to that character, vests in the person sustaining it at the death of the testator. The consequence would be that in case the person who was wife at the death of the testator, or who subsequently became such, died in the lifetime of her husband, the tenant for life, no after-taken wife surviving him would be entitled under the devise; since it would be impossible, consistently with the principle in question, to hold that it remained contingent until the death of the husband, or that it shifted from time to time to the several persons upon whom the character of wife successively devolved." 1 Jarman, Wills, *303.

The rules thus laid down, while doubtless as correct as generalizations upon the question of the construction of wills can be, are so likely to be superseded by a context containing indications of a different meaning, as to be of little practical value.

The same remark may be made upon the generalization attempted in the case reported as to the effect to be attributed to the employment of the word "widow." That its use is not alone sufficient to overcome the presumption that an existing wife is referred to, is shown by the cases of Beers v. Narramore, 61 Conn. 13, 22 Atl. 1061; Anshutz v. Miller, 81 Pa. 212; Re Coley [1903] 2 Ch. 102, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 502; 88 L. T. N. S. 517, hereinafter set forth.

It has been held in some cases, the chief of which is Re Lyne, L. R. 8 Eq. 65, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 471, 20 L. T. N. S. 735, 17 Week. Rep. 840, that the fact that a gift to the wife of a certain person is connected with a gift to his children, which is so expressed as to include his children by any wife, is sufficient to show that a future wife is intended to be benefited; but the weight of authority, especially in the more recent cases, is to the effect that such fact is not sufficient to overcome the presumption that an existing wife is intended.

From what has been said it will be perceived that the chief use of the cases is not as authorities by which the construction of any particular instrument may be determined, but to show the considerations which have proved effective with the courts. As remarked in Re Coley [1903] 2 Ch. 102, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 502, 88 L. T. N. S. 517, it cannot be said there is a conflict of authority when in the case of one will a particular conclusion is reached, and in the case of another will, very like it, a different conclusion is attained, as each case depends prima facie upon the words of the particular will plus the surrounding facts in the particular case.

Where former relation terminated by death.

The fact that the question under discussion has arisen in connection with a testamentary gift to the widow of testator himself in but few instances is largely due to the fact that in many jurisdictions a will is revoked by operation of law, upon a subsequent marriage.

In Garratt v. Niblock, 1 Russ. & M. 629,

an appeal by Nellie Meeker from the final judgment, with notice of intent to bring up for review the interlocutory judgment, the appellate division modified the latter by striking therefrom the part "declaring that the defendant Nellie Meeker has no interest in the property, and inserting in the place thereof that she has an undivided one-quarter interest therein." The defendant Jennie Draffen appealed to this court.

Mr. C. L. Andrus, for appellant:

The legacy in the will of Hiram Meeker of one half of his real estate to "my son's widow and child or children," referred to the wife of the son then living, and not to a widow who should be a subsequent wife.

Borcham v. Bignall, 8 Hare, 131, 19 L. J.

Ch. N. S. 461, 14 Jur. 265; Beers v. Narramore, 61 Conn. 13, 22 Atl. 1061; Johnson v. Webber, 65 Conn. 501, 33 Atl. 506; Anshutz v. Miller, 81 Pa. 212; Van Brunt v. Van Brunt, 111 N. Y. 178, 19 N. E. 60.

Messrs. O'Connor & O'Connor, for respondent Nellie Meeker:

A devise or bequest to the widow of a certain person is held to have reference, not necessarily to the wife at the time of the making of the will but to the wife who might survive the person designated."

29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 111; Bell v. Smalley, 45 N. J. Eq. 478, 18 Atl. 70; Schettler v. Smith, 41 N. Y. 337; Swallow v. Swallow, 27 N. J. Eq. 278.

The persons to whom and the event upon which the gift was limited to take effect a bequest by a husband to his "beloved wife," not mentioning her by name in any part of the will, was construed as applying to his then wife, and not to his second wife, who survived him, although the effect of such construction was to leave the widow entirely unprovided for.

In Johnson v. Johnson, 1 Tenn. Ch. 621, a devise to testator's "dear wife," not mentioning her name, was construed as a devise to the person who was his wife at the time of making the will, and not to a subsequent wife, the will not having been republished after the second marriage; the court saying: "The original intent of the testator, everyone will concede at once, was to give the property devised to his then existing wife. The words 'my dear wife' point to a person then existing, the qualifying adjective necessarily implying affection for an individual; such affection being, of course, inconceivable of a person not then occupying the designated relation. To substitute another object of the testator's bounty would be to violate his intent and to make a will for him. In the absence of all authority, I should consider it too plain for argument that the will does effectually designate the wife existing at the date of the will as the object of the testator's bounty, as if she had been mentioned by her Christian name."

For cases as to whether a husband or wife from whom testator has been separated or divorced may be considered as the object of a testamentary provision, the beneficiary of which is designated merely as bearing such relationship, see under heading, "Where former relation terminated by divorce or separation," infra.

Where the beneficiary of a testamentary gift is designated only as the husband or wife or widow of a certain person, and such person is married at the time of making the will, the evident inclination of the courts is toward a construction of such provision as referring to the person who, at the time of the will was made, bore, or might have born, the designated relationship.

where a testator gave an annuity to his nephew, who was married at the date of the will and at testator's death, for life, or until his bankruptcy or insolvency, with remainder to the wife of the nephew during the joint lives of the nephew and his wife and the life of the survivor, for the support of herself, her husband, and his children, with a provision, in case they or either of them should attempt to alienate the annuity, for its application for the support of their children.—Vice Chancellor Wigram reluctantly came to the conclusion that, although the real intention of testator was to insure some provision to the nephew and his family, which would include any wife, the testator had failed to use terms broad enough to cover the contingency of the nephew's second marriage, upon the ground that the nephew's interest might, by an attempt to alien, have been terminated during the lifetime of his first wife, in which case the trustees would have had power to apply the annuity to the benefit of the children of the nephew by his first wife, but not even for the benefit of that wife, such construction being further strengthened by the use of the word "their" in describing the children for whose support the trustees had power to apply the annuity in the event mentioned in the will, which was regarded as showing that one wife only of the nephew was in contemplation of the testator, and that wife must have been the one living, at the date of the will.

In Re Bryan, 2 Sim. N. S. 103, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 7, where a testatrix after giving legacies to her daughters, describing them as the wives of certain husbands, gave certain bank stock to a daughter for life and after her death to be equally divided "between the husbands of my said daughters, and my son, or such of them as may be living at the time of her decease," it was held that as testatrix had designated her son as a person who was to share in the gift with the husbands of the daughters, and as it was evident that she meant not any son of hers that might survive the tenant for life, but her son whom she had before remained uncertain until the death of the testator's son, and "my son's widow" could not be ascertained until the death of the son.

Clark v. Cammann, 160 N. Y. 316; 54 N. E. 709; Nathan v. Hendricks, 87 Hun, 483, 34 N. Y. Supp. 1016; Delaney v. McCormack, 88 N. Y. 174; Robinson v. Martin, 138 App. Div. 310, 123 N. Y. Supp. 146.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal depends on the construction of the fifth clause in the will of Hiram Meeker, who died on the 22d of March, 1889, leaving him surviving the plaintiff, his widow, Jennie Draffen, a granddaughter and his only heir at law, and Nellie Meeker, the widow of his deceased son. Charles G. Meeker. The will, which was promptly admitted to probate, bears the date of February 11, 1887, and, as the trial court found, "at the time of the execution thereof, said Hiram Meeker resided on the premises described in the complaint with his wife, Sally Meeker, the plaintiff herein, his son, Charles G. Meeker, and his wife, Isabella Meeker, and their daughter, Jennie, now Jennie Draffen, one of the defendants herein. In or about the year 1902 Isabella Meeker, the wife of Charles G. Meeker, died, and thereafter, and on or about January 26, 1906, said Charles G. Meeker was married to the defendant Nellie Meeker. Charles G. Meeker died on the 23d of March, 1908, leaving him surviving the de-named, the necessary inference was that by the words, "husbands of my said daughters," she meant the persons whom she had before named and described as such, and whom she knew and was probably attached to; and therefore that a second husband of one of the daughters was not entitled to participate in the provision.

In Franks v. Brooker, 27 Beav. 635, 29 L. J. Ch. S. N. 292, 6 Jur. N. S. 87, 8 Week. Rep. 205, testator gave a life interest in certain legacies to his five daughters, referring to each as the wife of a designated person, and after the decease of each or any of them during the life time of her or their husbands leaving issue surviving, "unto such husband or husbands for the term of his or their natural life or lives," with remainder to the children of such daughter, "either by the present or any future husband respectively." He further gave to each daughter, in the event of her dying without issue living, power to dispose of the property by will, subject to the life estate of their respective husbands, and, in default of such disposition, "to the use of the husband or husbands of any such daughter or daughters respectively so dying without issue as aforesaid, or their or his legal personal representative respectively." It was held that the testator's real meaning was to confine the gift of life interests to the then existing husbands, the reasoning adduced in support of such conclusion being that the testator mentioned all the husbands by name; and when he intended to refer to future husbands he expressed it, as in the gift to the children "either by the present or any future husband;" and that in making the ultimate gift to the legal personal representatives of the husbands, it cannot be supposed that he intended a share to be divided between the legal personal representatives of two husbands of a deceased daughter.

In Re Burrow, 10 L. T. N. S. 184, where a testator, after giving his brother a life estate in his property with remainder to his children, further directed: "If the wife of my aforesaid brother . . . shall him, my said brother, survive, she shall receive 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the rents, issues, and profits" arising from the property bequeathed during her natural life, Kindersley, V. C., without particularly stating the reasons for his conclusions, said that he felt no doubt that the gift to the wife of testator's brother was to the wife who was then living, and not to any wife with whom the brother might at any time afterward intermarry.

In Firth v. Fielden, 22 Week. Rep. 622, a gift to the wife of a certain person contained in a devise upon trust to pay the income to such person for life, and after his death leaving his wife him surviving to pay the rents to such wife for life, was held to be confined to the particular wife who was alive at the date of the will and at testator's death.

In Re Hancock [1896] 2 Ch. 173, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 690, 74 L. T. N. S. 658, 44 Week. Rep. 545, a husband settled certain funds upon trust to pay the income to himself until his death or bankruptcy or attempt to alienate or encumber such income, with power to appoint the fund after the determination of his own interest therein amongst his children, subject to a proviso empowering him by deed or will to appoint one fourth of the income to "his wife" for her life. During the lifetime of his first wife he irrevocably appointed one fourth of the income in her favor and for her life, and subject to the trust in her favor therebefore limited, if the same should take effect, he appointed the fund amongst his children without reserving any power to appoint to a subsequent wife. The court, although expressing the opinion that the power to appoint to his wife was only a power to appoint to his then wife, placed its decision that an appointment in favor of a subsequent wife was invalid upon the ground that the power had been exhausted by its first exercise.

In Re Coley [1903] 2 Ch. 102, a testatrix gave residuary estate to trustees to pay the income to her son for life, "and from and after his decease to pay the same into the proper hands of his wife for her life, if she shall continue his widow, . . . and from and after her decease or second mar-fendants Nellie Meeker, his widow, and Jennie Draffen, his only child."

The fifth clause of said will is as follows: "I do further provide that in case my son, Charles G. Meeker, should die before my wife, then and in that case it is my will that the property, real and personal, hereinafore devised and bequeathed to my said son in the third paragraph hereof, shall be equally divided between my said wife and my son's widow and child or children; that is, my wife to have one half thereof and my son's widow and child or children, the other one half, and then the legacy of $1,000 to my daughter Mary, the annuity of $100 to my wife, and the provision for her support, are all to be void and of no effect, but in case my son Charles survives his mother, then this fifth paragraph is of no effect." In construing this clause the trial court held that the devise to the widow of Charles G. Meeker "referred to and was intended to designate his son's then wife, Isabella Meeker, and not any subsequent wife." The appellate division, on the other hand, held that "it would be doing violence to the language of the testator to hold that no widow of Charles except Isabella could take the devise provided by the will."

We think the testator intended to provide for the widow of Charles, whoever she might be, simply because she was his widow and, being deprived of his support, would need something to live on. The provision took the place of a right of dower in the premises in question devised to Charles by riage, whichever shall first happen, I direct the trustees and trustee for the time being hereof to divide the said principal moneys and all other, if any, my residuary estate unto and among such of his children as shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years," and, in default of issue, "after the decease or second marriage of his said widow," to divide such estate among nephews and nieces. Power was also given to the trustees "after the decease or second marriage of any legatee entitled for life or during widowhood" and during the minority of any grandchild, nephew, or niece, to apply the interest of his or her presumptive share towards his or her maintenance and education. It was held that the phraseology, "if she shall continue his widow," "after the decease or second marriage of his said widow," the power of maintenance, and the fact that testatrix clearly included in the ultimate gift the children of her son by any wife, were not sufficient to overcome the presumption that testatrix meant to describe the particular person who was the wife of her son both at the date of the will and at her death, and not anyone else who might stand in such relation. With respect to the argument based upon the fact that the gift of the corpus in remainder is not limited to children of the existing wife, but extends to the children of any wife, Romer, L. J., said: "I cannot see why a testator should not wish to give a life interest to an existing person merely as the wife of another person, at the same time giving the corpus, after the death of that wife, to the children of that person by that or any other wife. To my mind, the two gifts are perfectly consistent one with the other, and there is no reason for giving to the word 'wife' in the first gift any meaning different from its prima facie meaning."

In Beers v. Narramore, 61 Conn. 13, 22 Atl. 1061, an objection having been raised to a testamentary provision for the widow of testator's son, upon the ground that if by that expression testator intended any person who at the death of the son sustained to him the relation of wife, and thereby became his widow, the statute 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

against perpetuities would be offended, as such person might be someone not born, and whose father and mother were not born, at the death of the testator, the court in overruling such objection held that, as there was at the time of the making of the will and at testator's death a person who would fully answer the description should she survive the son, such person must be understood as intended, especially as it was quite evident from the whole will that the testator was all along and throughout thinking of living persons, whenever expressing any specific purpose.

So, also, in Johnson v. Webber, 65 Conn. 501, 33 Atl. 506, where the same objection was made to a provision that if either of the granddaughters of testatrix, for whom she had previously provided in her will, should die leaving a husband surviving, such husband should receive during his life one half of the income which his wife would have received if living, it was held that the supposition that testatrix meant any husbands which the granddaughters might have was a very violent one, and should not be adopted if a more reasonable meaning may be given; and that as when she wrote the will the husbands had been married to her granddaughters for some years, and were doubtless well known to her and regarded by her with affection, the provision must be taken, in the light of such circumstances, as intending the then husbands of the granddaughters.

In Wolfe v. Hatheway, 81 Conn. 181, 70 Atl. 645, in which a testamentary provision was not directly, but only inferentially, for the benefit of the wives of testatrix's sons, it is said that the wives thus designated as beneficiaries would be only those women who occupied that position at the death of testatrix, and not any woman or women who since that time may have come into that position.

In Van Syckel v. Van Syckel, 51 N. J. Eq. 194, 26 Atl. 156, it was held that a provision giving certain property after the death of testator's son "to the children and wife of my said son" was for the benefit of the son's wife at the date of the will and the third clause of the will, which she would have had if the fifth clause had not gone into effect. When describing his own wife, the testator called her his wife, not his widow. Five times in the fifth clause he referred to her as "my wife," "my said wife," or as the mother of Charles. He did not speak of Charles's wife, which would have properly described Isabella, who was the wife of Charles at the date of the will, but of his widow, with nothing in either text or context to fasten the term to any particular person, but simply to the one who should be the widow of his son at the time of his son's death. The appellant relies on the situation at the date of the will; but the testator apparently did not have that in mind, as he wrote the clause in question for the future, and with reference to a particular date to be fixed by an event to happen in the future, by providing that on the death of his son prior to that of his mother, his son's widow should share in the devise. His language, according to its ordinary and natural meaning, includes the defendant Nellie, and excludes the deceased Isabella. He had in mind children who might be born to Charles in the future, and, as any child by the second wife would take under the words "my son's . . . child or children," why should not the second wife take under the words "my son's widow," occurring in the same sentence? If he meant Isabella, and no one else, why did he not refer to her by name or by some words of description? The fifth clause was of testator's death, and did not extend to a subsequent wife.

The question under discussion also arose, in connection with the inquiry whether the provision was void as unlawfully suspending the power of alienation, in Van Brunt v. Van Brunt, 111 N. Y. 178, 19 N. E. 60. There testatrix gave her residuary estate in trust for her children, seven of the eight whom she left being married at the time of her decease, for and during each of their natural lives, "and after their decease to their respective wives or husbands during their lives or until they remarry," adding: "If any of my said children should die without issue and without leaving a husband or wife him or her surviving, then I give, devise, and bequeath his or her share to the survivor or survivors of them share and share alike. If he or she leave a husband or wife him or her surviving then I give, devise, and bequeath his or her share to the survivor or survivors of my said children share and share alike after the decease or remarriage of the said husband or wife." It was contended that the portion of the testamentary provision last quoted evinced a purpose to postpone the vesting of the remainder in possession until the death or remarriage of any husband or wife who might survive, and not the husband or wife in being at the decease of testatrix. Finch, J., in rendering the opinion of the court overruling such contention, after remarking that the words "husband and wife" as first used in the testamentary provision under construction would naturally and ordinarily refer to a husband and wife living at the death of testatrix, and that such meaning and the purpose evidenced by it ought not to be surrendered and changed, with the consequence of a destruction of the trust, unless other language of the will clearly and unmistakably points to a different meaning and establishes a different intention, said: "The use of the indefinite article, and the expression, 'a husband or wife,' does not necessarily, or even fairly indicate an intention to provide a second life interest in a wife or husband becoming such after the death of the testatrix. The phrase is not any husband or wife, but a husband or wife living at the death of the first tenant for life, and should be taken to refer to the same husband or wife provided for in the previous limitation. Seven such husbands and wives were in fact living when the will was made, and when the testatrix died, and it was for them that the devise was made; and if the testatrix had intended a formal provision for their possible successors after her death, we should expect to find some definite disclosure of that purpose, and not one dependent upon a mere inference from a form of expression which might very well not have been so intended. For the use of the indefinite article in the phrase, 'a husband or wife,' was occasioned by the existence of several such persons answering the description, to any one of whom the provision was intended to apply. It means, therefore, any one of the seven in being at testator's death, who might be living at a child's death, or leave issue upon his or her decease, and should not be held to include some husband or wife becoming such after the testatrix's death."

In Anshutz v. Miller, 81 Pa. 212, where testator, after giving the husband of his niece the income of his estate for life, continued, "And after his death his widow is entitled to said income; after her death it shall be distributed to" certain others,—it was held that the phrase "his widow" had reference to the niece, and not to any wife which her husband might have, where throughout the will it was the manifest intention of the testator to provide for individuals within the circle of his sister's family, and all the other successive devisees were indicated with individual distinctness, and there was no attempt at classification, and no direction as to them that the gift should be dependent on any relations which they bore to testator or to each other. The court said: "Where an estate is given to a person described by relation either to the testator or to other devisees, on a contingency that may or may not happen, and a person is in being at the time of the execution of the will, to whom, on the happening of the contingency, the description to take effect only in case Charles should die before his mother, and in that event it was to a great extent to be substituted in place of the preceding provisions of the will. It cannot be read as of the date of the will, because the devise therein could take effect only upon the occurrence of an uncertain event, which might never happen, and unless it happened, and not until it happened, could the persons described as widow and child or children become definitely known. The sole question is, Who, then, answered the description of "my son's widow?" Isabella did not, for she never became a widow by surviving her husband. Nellie did, for she was married to Charles, and was living when he died.

We agree with the learned counsel for the appellant that the precise question here involved has not been determined in this state, but we think the cases tend to establish the rule laid down by the appellate division (137 App. Div. 537, 539, 121 N. Y. Supp. 1051, 1053), as follows: "Unless there be something in a will indicating the contrary, a gift to the 'wife' of a designated married man is a gift to the wife existing at the time of the making of the will, and not to one whom he may subsequently marry. Van Brunt v. Van Brunt, 111 N. Y. 178, 19 N. E. 60; Van Syckel v. Van Syckel, 51 N. J. Eq. 194, 26 Atl. 150. A gift to the 'widow' of a designated person, however, has a broader application, and includes such would apply, it is a safe general rule to hold such person as intended to be the devisee."

The presumption that an existing person is intended may, however, be overcome by indications, to be derived from the context of the will read in the light of surrounding circumstances, of an intention to benefit any husband or wife.

That it was testator's intention to benefit any wife, rather than the particular person answering the description at the time the will was made, was held by V. C. Malins in Re Lyne, L. R. 8 Eq. 65, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 471, 20 L. T. N. S. 735, 17 Week. Rep. 840, where testator bequeathed a sum of money upon trust to pay the income thereof to his son for life, and after his death, upon trust to pay and transfer the said sum unto and equally between and amongst the wife of his son (in case she should happen to survive him); and all and every child and children of his said son lawfully begotten, share and share alike. The reasoning on which this conclusion is based was, that the bequest being after the death of testator's son to the wife of his son and to the children of the son, not by his then wife but by any wife he might have, was therefore a bequest to the wife and the children as a class, including any children who might come into esse during the life of the son; that as the class could not be ascertained until the death of the son, that period was also to be the time when it should be ascertained whether the class was to be increased by one,—that is, by a surviving wife,—or not; and that as the second wife might have been the mother of his son's children who were to take, and would equally require a provision for her support whether she was the wife existing at the date of the will or a future wife, the provision was equally as consistent with an intention to benefit a future wife as with an intention to benefit a wife who was known to the testator.

This decision, however, has failed to meet with general approval, and has since been definitely repudiated by the English courts. See Re Griffiths [1903] 1 Ch. 739, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 330, 88 L. T. N. S. 547; Re Coley 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

[1903] 2 Ch. 102, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 502, 88 L. T. N. S. 517. It has been followed in Wilmot v. DeMill, 32 N. B. 8; and disapproved in Van Syckel v. Van Syckel, 51 N. J. Eq. 194, 26 Atl. 156.

In Longworth v. Bellamy, 40 L. J. Ch. N. S. 513, where testator left property in trust for each of his children for life with remainder to their issue, and with a gift over of the share of any child dying without issue to the other children and their issue; and further declared that if any of his sons should become bankrupt, his life estate should cease, and during the remainder of his life the trustees should apply the income to which he would otherwise have been entitled for the benefit of the wife and children of such son, in such manner as they should think fit,—it was held that the trust in favor of the wife and children of a son married at the time of testator's death, whose wife subsequently deceased revived in favor of a subsequent wife and children. Of this case it is remarked in Re Drew [1899] 1 Ch. 336, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 157, 47 Week. Rep. 265, 79 L. T. N. S. 656, that there were some legatees who were unmarried.

The presumption that where the wife of a person is spoken of by a testator, and that person is married at the date of the will, the wife existing at the date of the will is the person intended to take, was held in Re Drew, supra, to be overcome by the context of a will by which testator gave a share of his residuary estate upon trust to pay the income to a son for life, and after his decease "unto the wife of my said son for and during her natural life," and after her decease upon trust for the children of the son living at his decease; and further provided for the determination of the son's interest in the event of alienation or bankruptcy, in which event the trustees were to apply the income of the "share hereinbefore directed to be invested for my said son [name] and his family and every part thereof for the purpose of applying the same in or towards the maintenance and support of my said son [name] his wife and children," the court particularly relying upon the mode in which the testator wife as may survive him. Schettler v. Smith, 41 N. Y. 328; Swallow v. Swallow, 27 N. J. Eq. 278." Ordinarily the use of the word "wife" in a will means the person who, at the date thereof, is the wife of the man named. An existing fact is referred to, for the relation has already been created, and, as only one person sustained that relation, she is pointed out as well as if designated by name. The use of the word "widow," however, involves no fact in existence at the date of the will, and no fact which necessarily will ever come into existence. The relation of widow had not then been created, and might never be created; for the man might never leave a widow.

provided that the income should be dealt with during the lifetime of the son in case of attempted alienation by him.

In Wilmot v. DeMill, 32 N. B. 8, a will created certain trusts for the use and benefit of the nephew of testatrix "and his wife, and for the use and benefit of the survivor of them during their several natural lives, or during the widowhood of the wife of the said . . . [nephew] in case she shall survive her said husband, and at their decease or upon the second marriage of his said widow I give and devise the same to the children of the said . . . [nephew] or such of them as shall be living," etc. At the time the will was made the nephew had a wife and children living. The wife predeceased the testatrix, so that when the will took effect the nephew had no wife to whom the bequest could apply. It was held that the gift to the wife was not a gift to the particular individual answering the description at the time the will was made, but that the limitations over after the nephew's decease were to persons of a class then to be ascertained, and that as a child of the second marriage was entitled to share in the gift, there was no good reason for excluding the nephew's second wife, who survived him, from the benefit of the trust for the wife of the nephew.

A distinction between the use of the words "wife" and "widow" is taken in Swallow v. Swallow, 27 N. J. Eq. 278, in which a provision by which testator directed that if either of his sons should die without leaving lawful issue, the widow of the decedent should receive one third of the rents of the real estate devised to him by the will, so long as she should remain his widow, was construed as intending not the person who was the son's wife at the time of the making of the will and at testator's death, but the person who should answer the description at the death of the son, the court saying: "The testator, having given to his sons real estate in fee, directs that in case of the death of either of them without leaving lawful issue, the widow of the decedent shall have one third of the rents of the real estate devised to him, and that after her death the property shall be equally divided among the testator's

Hence the person meant could not be known until further events pointed her out.

It is difficult to formulate a general rule upon the subject, for "no will has a brother," and the language of every testator must be studied by itself in order to learn his intention. We think the rule announced by the appellate division, however, applies to this case, and affirm the judgment appealed from, with costs to the respondent Nellie Meeker, payable out of the proceeds of the sale.

Cullen, Ch. J., and Gray, Werner, Willard Bartlett, and Chase, JJ., concur. Haight, J., absent.

children then living. He evidently intended to provide by the devise in question, that the decedent's widow should have an equivalent to dower, notwithstanding the limitation over. It could not, of course, be ascertained until the death should have occurred, who would answer the description,—who would be the widow. The provision is not declared to be in favor of any person living at the date of the will; nor is the language employed, to be so construed. The gift is not to the wife of the decedent, but to his widow,—the person who should be his wife at the time of his death."

But, as hereinbefore pointed out, the use of the word "widow" is not invariably sufficient to overcome the presumption that an existing wife is intended. See for example Beers v. Narramore, 61 Conn. 13, 22 Atl. 1061; Anshutz v. Miller, 81 Pa. 212; Re Coley [1903] 2 Ch. 102, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 502, 88 L. T. N. S. 517; hereinbefore set forth.

In Schettler v. Smith, 41 N. Y. 328, in which the ultimate question was whether the provision was void for remoteness, a testator created a trust to pay the income to a son who had a wife living and issue living at the time of making the will and also at the death of the testator, "during his natural life; and on his decease, to pay said rents, issues, profits, and income to his wife, during her natural life, and on her decease, if he leave a widow; or if he leave no widow, then, on his decease, to convey" to his issue, etc. It was held that the son having a wife at the time of making the will and also at the death of testator, the gift to his wife would have been confined to his then wife had there not been added to the bequest the words, "and on her decease, if he leave a widow, or if he leave no widow, then, on his decease, to convey," to his issue, etc.; such direction to convey to the issue not being limited to the death of the son's then wife, but to the decease of his widow, if he left a widow, plainly including any wife that might survive him. The court also points out in support of its conclusion that the testator in another clause of the will made provision for the wife of a son not married.

In Cogan v. McCabe, 23 Misc. 739, 52 N.

Y. Supp. 48, a will the general scheme of which was that testator's real estate should be kept intact during his widow's life, and the rents applied to her support, and upon her death the proceeds thereof should be divided into as many shares as the testator had children, contained the following provision as to one of such shares: "To invest the remaining share or fourth part of said net proceeds of said sale, and to apply and pay the net income thereof towards the support and maintenance of the wife and children of my son Henry Cogan, free from his control or interference, until his youngest child shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, when the said one-fourth part is to be divided equally between the children of said Henry." At the time the will was made Henry had a wife and child, both of whom died in testator's lifetime. Prior to testator's death Henry had married again. It was held that whatever embarrassment under the earlier cases and text-books might be found in the way of holding the second wife of the son Henry to have been substituted by the force of her marriage, as a legatee under the testator's will, in the place of the first wife living at the time of its execution, any doubt was removed by the fact that as under the provisions of the will the children of the second wife were undoubtedly entitled to take, their taking must involve the sharing with their mother also in testator's provision for the support of the family during their minority.

Where the person in favor of whose husband or wife a testamentary provision is made is unmarried at the time the will is made, it is Mr. Jarman's contention that the first person answering the description should take. The cases, however, seem equally to lend themselves to the generalization that ordinarily, in the absence of special considerations which would induce the court to give such provision a different construction, any future wife or husband may be taken as having been intended.

In Peppin v. Bickford, 3 Ves. Jr. 570, a testamentary provision by which a nephew, then unmarried and whose marriage was not in immediate contemplation, was given a sum of money which testator directed should not be paid or payable until the date of the lawful solemnization of his marriage, when it was to be laid out in lands which should be settled upon such nephew and his assigns for life, and from and after his decease then to be for the "wife" of the nephew for life, with remainders in tail to the sons and daughters of the nephew by such wife, was held to give a life estate to a second wife, the Lord Chancellor saying: "If the wife had died within a month after the marriage there could have been no issue to take the provision, and the legacy of £8,000, except as to the life interest of the nephew, would in effect have elapsed. It is impossible to ascribe such an intention to the testator."

This case is admitted by Mr. Jarman to be apparently counter to his general statement that if there should be no person sustaining 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the character of wife of a designated person either at the date of the will, or at the death of testator, it applies to the woman who shall first answer such description at any subsequent period; but is explained by him as referable to the special circumstance of the trust being executory, which authorized the court to give it a liberal construction, and to the argument that by restricting the trust in favor of the wife to the first person standing in that relation, the limitation to the issue would have been restricted to her children, which could hardly be the intention of testator, who was the husband's relation. 1 Jarman, Wills, *305.

In Radford v. Willis, L. R. 12 Eq. 105, a testator having two daughters, both unmarried, gave his estate upon trust for them during their lives, and from and after their respective decease to convey to their respective husbands, further providing that if either should happen to depart this life unmarried, her share should go to the survivor for life, with remainder to her husband. One of the daughters having died leaving a husband, and the other having survived her husband, who by his will devised to her whatever interest he might have in her father's estate, the question arose as to whether the surviving daughter and her sister's husband could give a title such as a purchaser might be required to accept. Wickens, V. C., expressed the opinion that the rule stated in Jarman on Wills, that a devise to an unmarried person for life, with remainder to the husband or wife of such person, gives an absolute interest to the first person answering the description, is not supported by authority; and that as in the present case the testator had directed a conveyance to be made at a future time to a person answering a description which may at or before that time have perfectly attached to numerous persons, directing it in terms which showed that he was contemplating a person living at the time of conveyance, it was not unreasonable to hold that as between the several persons who might equally answer the character of his daughter's husband, the testator meant the trustees to convey to the living one, if there should be a living one; but that owing to the form in which the question was presented, it was necessary only to hold that the title which the surviving daughter could give was not such as a purchaser could be compelled to take.

In Re Sharon, 12 Ont. L. Rep. 605, it was held that under a devise to a son for life and, if he should marry, after his decease to his surviving wife, and on the demise of such wife to their children, the son being unmarried at the date of the will, that any person answering the description at the son's death would be entitled to a life estate, the reasoning of the court being that the son being unmarried at the date of the will, the testator must have referred to a future wife, and there was nothing to show that he did not mean any future wife.

In Jossey v. Brown, 119 Ga. 758, 47 S. E. 350, a testator devised property in trust for a daughter, who was then unmarried, for life, with remainder to her children, if any, and if none, or those born should die before reaching maturity, then over to any man with whom the daughter might intermarry. The daughter soon after married, and although surviving her husband did not marry again. It was contended that as there was an uncertainty as to who the husband should be, the case was within the rule in Civil Code 1895, § 3101, which provides that if the contingency be as to the person, and that person be not in case at the time when the contingency happens, his heirs are not entitled. It was held that the first person answering to the description of testator's husband was to be considered to have been intended by the testator as the recipient of his bounty.

In Dean v. Mumford, 102 Mich. 510, 61 N. W. 7, where a testator directed that property given to his sons should be held in trust for such sons, their wives and children, during the lives of the said sons and their wives, and upon their death to become the property of their children, it was suggested that as one of the sons was unmarried at the time the will took effect, it should be construed to relate to any wife whom he might in the future marry, and so construed, the estate would not vest in the children or heirs until after the expiration of two lives in being. It was held that the will was not open to this construction, but was intended to mean any wife of the son living at the time of the decease of testator.

In Re Browne [1903] 1 Ch. 188, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 85, 51 Week. Rep. 364, 87 L. T. N. S. 588, 19 Times L. R. 98, where a man having a wife and children effected a policy of assurance on his life, expressed to be "for the benefit of his wife and children," it was held that the presumption that a married man speaking of his wife intends his wife at that time, and does not contemplate one whom he may marry after her death, loses weight in construing an instrument intended to make provision for a wife after the husband's death, and is countervailed by the presumption that he in all probability intended to provide for her who survives and for that reason stood in need of the provision; that a similar line of reasoning points to the conclusion that he intended to benefit all the children, which is strengthened by the reflection that he cannot reasonably be supposed to have intended to benefit only the children living at the date of the policy, to the exclusion of afterborn children by the then existing wife, and therefore that a second wife and her child were entitled to participate jointly with the children of the first marriage.

So, also, in Re Parker [1906] 1 Ch. 526, 75 L. J. Ch. N. S. 297, 54 Week. Rep. 329, 94 L. T. N. S. 477, 22 Times L. R. 259, it was held that the word "widow" in a policy of assurance designating as the beneficiaries the "widow, or widow and children, or someone or more of them" as insured should appoint, did not refer to the then wife of the insured should she survive him, but to the person who at his death should become his widow.

The Browne Case is distinguished in Re Griffiths [1903] 1 Ch. 739, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 330, 88 L. T. N. S. 547, where a man having a wife and children effected insurance expressed to be "for the benefit of his wife, or, if she be dead, between his children in equal proportions," upon the ground that the policy in the Browne Case was expressed to be for the benefit of wife and children, and not as in the case under construction, for the benefit of wife or children. It was held that the presumption above referred to was strengthened by the words "if she be dead," which seem to point to the wife who was living when the policy was effected; and consequently that a subsequent wife was not entitled to take.

In Day v. Case, 43 Hun, 179, 5 N. Y. S. R. 397, the designation of the beneficiary in a certificate of benefit insurance obtained by one H. M. Case, providing that "all payments or benefits that may accrue or become due to the heirs of the persons insured, by virtue of his policy, will be payable to Mrs. H. M. Case, or lawful heirs," was held to refer to the wife of the insured at the time the certificate was issued, and not to the person who was his wife at the time of his death.

In Given v. Wisconsin Odd Fellows' Mut. L. Ins. Co. 71 Wis. 547, 37 N. W. 817, it was held that insurance in a mutual benefit association the by-laws of which provided that on the death of a member "the person designated before death, or his widow, child, or children, mother, sister, or sisters," etc., "as the case may be and in the order named," should receive the insurance, was payable to the widow of the insured, although when the certificate was issued, in the lifetime of a former wife, the insured had directed that the insurance be paid to her, her appointment as beneficiary being held to have been revoked by her death.

So, also, in Riley v. Riley, 75 Wis. 464, 44 N. W. 112, it was held that the word "widow" in the by-laws of a benefit association by which it was provided that the business and object of the association should be to afford financial aid and benefit to the widows, orphans, and heirs of deceased members, or such other persons as might be designated by the insured member, and that at the death of a member his widow or designated heirs should receive the specified sum,—does not refer to the wife of the member at the time he obtained his certificate of insurance, if she survive her husband, but that it means the person who was his widow at the time of his death.

And see also Masonic Mut. Relief Asso. v. McAuley, 2 Mackey, 70, in which the person who was the widow of a member of a benefit association the by-laws of which provided that on the death of the member "his widow, orphan, heir, assignee, or legatee shall be entitled to receive as many dollars as there are members in the association at the time of death," was held entitled to the benefit as against the administrators of the first wife, who was the original beneficiary, and the husband's estate.

Where former relation terminated by divorce or separation.

It seems to be generally held that where a testamentary provision is in favor of "husband" or "wife" or "widow" of the person making such provision, such terms will be taken as having been used in their colloquial sense as applying to the person then sustaining such relationship, although there may be a former husband or wife in existence whom the maker of the will has deserted or divorced.

Thus, in Re Howe, 33 Week. Rep. 48, 48 J. P. 743, where a testator, who had separated from his wife by mutual consent and in her lifetime had gone through the ceremony of marriage with another woman whom he always treated as his wife, gave certain property to "my wife for her own use, to bring up the children," directing it to be divided between the children after her death, it was held that the second wife was the person intended.

And in Hardy v. Smith, 136 Mass. 328, where a testatrix by a will in which she described herself as the wife of a certain person, though she was not his lawful wife, her divorce from her former husband being invalid, gave to her "husband" personal property, and authorized her "husband" to remain in possession of her house for three months after her death, and further appointed her "husband" and sister executors, it was held that there was no conclusive and irrebuttable presumption that by the word "husband" in her will the testatrix meant her lawful husband, but that it was a question of the intention of the testatrix, and that the will itself showed clearly that she did not intend to designate the man who was her lawful husband by the use of such word in her will.

So, also, in Pastene v. Bonini, 166 Mass. 85, 44 N. E. 246, it was held that, taking the attendant circumstances in connection with the will, there was no doubt that testator intended by the words "my wife" to designate as the beneficiary of certain provisions made therein the woman to whom he had been married and with whom he had lived for thirty-five years down to the time of his death, and whom he had held out to the world as his wife, and not his lawful wife, whom he had deserted in Italy forty years before he died, where the person mentioned by him in the will as his stepdaughter was the daughter of the woman with whom he lived, by a former husband, and the will gave to his wife, among other things, "provisions and consumable stores," and made a provision for children by his lawful wife, who were described as "my only children by my first wife,"—notwithstanding the statement, "said provisions in favor of my wife are made to her in lieu of her 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) legal rights," as the testator must have supposed that the woman whom he had married and who had been held out to the world as his wife had some legal rights in his property.

In Powers v. McEachern, 7 S. C. 290, a testator who had legitimate children by a wife from whom he had been separated many years, and a family of illegitimate children by a woman with whom he was cohabiting at the time he made his will, directed that his estate should be kept together until his youngest living son should attain the age of twenty-one, that until that event should happen his "wife" and all his children be permitted to live upon his plantation, and that when his youngest living child should attain the age of twenty-one his estate should be divided among his "wife" and all of his then living children equally. It was held that extrinsic evidence was admissible as to the identity of the persons designated as testator's wife and children; and that even if it was not, an intention to designate the woman with whom he was living and her children was manifest by the provisions of the will that the wife and children should continue to live upon his plantation, and that division of the property should be postponed until the youngest child should attain twenty-one, where the youngest child of the first marriage must have attained that age long before the execution of the will.

In Marks v. Marks, 40 Can. S. C. 210, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 751, testator gave an annuity to his wife, describing the legatee merely by the words "my wife" and "my said wife." Twenty-six years before the making of his will he had formed some sort of a matrimonial alliance, but about five years later left his alleged wife finally, and never saw her again, although he entered into correspondence with her about the time he made his will. In the meantime he wandered out West, and ten years before making his will married another woman, with whom he lived up to the time of his death. His former wife, about ten years after he left her, was supposed to have married another man, with whom she lived for many years as his wife, receiving his property after his death and retaining his name. In the correspondence between testator and his former wife, he addressed her as "dear friend," while about the same time he addressed his then wife in his letters to her as "dear wife." It was held by Idington, J., that the court was not bound in law to apply the description of "wife" to the one who should prove to have been testator's lawful wife, but that they were at liberty to ascertain his intention from the facts and surrounding circumstances; that there was ample ground for testator supposing that if he had ever married the alleged former wife she had obtained a divorce and become the lawful wife of another, and was no longer his wife; and that he should not be held to have intended the words "my wife," when used in his will, to designate any other than the one who then sustained that relation to him. It should be noted, however, that this cannot be regarded as a decision of the court, the chief justice concurring in the result without stating the grounds for his conclusion, and another justice concurring in the result upon the ground that the first marriage was not sufficiently proved. The two justices who dissented from the result did so on the ground that the first marriage was sufficiently proved, and that no evidence was admissible to show that the expressions "my wife" and "my said wife," contained in the will as descriptive of the legatee, meant any other person than her who was testator's legal wife.

No generalization appears to be possible as to the construction of a testamentary provision where the "husband," "wife," or "widow" of some third person who before the vesting of the gift in possession has been divorced, as there appears to be but one decision upon this phase of the question. This is the case of Davis v. Kerr, 3 App. Div. 322, 38 N. Y. Supp. 387, where a will provided for the payment of an income to a son for life, and, in case he should die "leaving his wife surviving him," for the payment of such income "to the widow of my said son for the benefit of herself and her children as long as she shall live and remain the widow of my said son," and in which it was held that there was nothing in the language of the will anywhere to suggest that the testatrix ever contemplated that her son might enter into any other marriage than that which then existed, and since to construe the word "widow" as applicable to any widow would be to invalidate the testamentary provision, which was perfectly good if it applied only to the first wife, the words "his wife" and "his widow" referred to the woman who occupied that relation at the time the will was made and at the time of testatrix's death, notwithstanding she was subsequently divorced and the son has married another woman, who survived him. The case of Schettler v. Smith, 41 N. Y. 328, elsewhere set forth, is distinguished upon the ground that the words "a widow" and "no widow" used therein are much more general in their scope than the expression, "the widow of my said son" in the will under construction, and upon the further ground that in the will under construction in the Schettler Case there was also a clause making provision for the wife of a son not yet married, which indicated an intention to make the direction to convey dependent upon the death of any person who might become the son's widow.

The cases appear to support the statement that the lawful husband or wife, and not the one with whom the insured was living at the time of obtaining the insurance, is entitled to the benefits of insurance in favor of the "husband," "wife," or "widow" of the insured.

Thus, it has been held that the lawful 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

widow, and not a person with whom the member of a mutual benefit association has gone through the form of marriage, is entitled to the benefit which under the by-laws of the association is "payable to the widow of the deceased member," although at the time of his joining the association the member may be living with his so-called second wife. Bolton v. Bolton, 73 Me. 299, in which the conclusion is reached by holding that the terms of the contract are not sufficiently ambiguous to warrant the admission of extrinsic evidence as to who was intended by the designation of the word "widow."

The same conclusion was reached upon a similar state of facts in Tutt v. Jackson, 87 Miss. 207, 39 So. 420, in which the benefit certificate was payable, upon the death of the member, to his "widow or other heirs;" and in Grand Lodge, O. H. S. v. Elsner, 26 Mo. App. 108, in which the laws of the order provided for the payment to the member's "widow who has lived with him in lawful union."

And in Rice v. Rice, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 635, 63 S. W. 586, it was held that under a policy of insurance providing: "In case of the death of the insured, the company may pay the amount due under the policy to either the executor or administrator, husband or wife, or any relation by blood, or lawful beneficiary of the insured," a wife from whom the insured had never been legally divorced, and not the woman with whom he was living as his wife at the time of effecting the insurance, was entitled thereto, although the latter was designated as the beneficiary in an application which, not being attached to the policy, formed no part of it.

But see Woodson v. Colored Grand Lodge, K. H. — Miss. —, 52 So. 457, in which the first wife was held estopped by her conduct in acquiescing in the remarriage of her husband and by forming a second matrimonial alliance herself, to claim as his widow the benefits of insurance payable to his "widow or heir," which was effected twenty-four years after the separation from the first wife and nineteen years after his marriage with his second wife, and while he was living with the second wife.

OKLAHOMA CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

E. P. JAMES et al., Appts.,

v.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

(— Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 113 Pac. 226.)

Gaming — statute — purpose.

1. It was the purpose of the legislature in adopting § 2422, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, to effectually suppress the keeping of every kind of public gaming house, room, or place in the state of Oklahoma; not only those then in existence, but also those that might subsequently be devised and practised.

Same — construction of statute — “any device.”

2. The words “or any device,” used in said section, include every scheme, plan, or conception by which the person who conducts such house, room, or place for betting, induces and enables the public to bet or lay wagers upon any kind of game whatsoever.

Same — definition.

3. The word “gaming” has no technical meaning, but includes every contrivance or institution which has for its object any sport, recreation, or amusement for the public upon which money or any other article of value can be won or lost by the result of such contrivance or institution.

Same — bets or wagers.

4. “Gaming” includes bets or wagers made upon any physical contest, whether of man or beast, when practised for the purpose of deciding such bets or wagers.

Same — betting on horse race.

5. Betting on a horse race is gaming within the meaning of the law. If any person opens or conducts a house, room, or place where the public are invited to assemble and by means of any plan, device, or scheme bet or lay wagers upon the results of horse racing, such persons are guilty of violating § 242z, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909.

Same — punishment.

6. Section 2422, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, does not provide for the punishment of those who bet or lay wagers upon any game or device for gaming; but its penalties are alone for those who open and conduct places where the public can assemble, and where they are invited and afforded an opportunity to bet and lay wagers upon any game or gaming device.

Note. — Horse racing as a game within gambling statutes.

This subject was treated in the note to State v. Vaughan, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 899, to which the present note is supplementary.

A note on oral betting as a violation of statute against bookmaking is to be found appended to People ex rel. Lichtenstein v. Langan, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 479.

And the power of the state to prohibit or regulate horse racing is discussed in a note to State Racing Commission v. Latonia Agri. Asso. 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 905.

“We do not think,” said Mr. Chief Justice English, in State v. Rorie, 23 Ark. 726, “that the legislature intended to embrace horse racing by the words, ‘any game of hazard or skill,’ ‘played,’ etc., however vicious betting at such sports may be.”

But in McLain v. Huffman, 30 Ark. 428, it was held that one could not recover money won on a horse race, because a later statute (Gantt's Dig. § 2987) renders all gaming and wagering contracts void.

In State v. Lemon, 46 Mo. 375, it was held that horse racing is not a gambling device within the meaning of the statute.

A house or place kept for the purpose of enabling persons to place bets or wagers upon horse races is a common gambling house and a nuisance per se. James v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 112 Pac. 944.

In State v. Shanklin, 51 Wash. 35, 97 Pac. 969, it was held that one who keeps a place where selling of pools upon horse races is conducted maintains a place “where gambling is carried on or permitted” as defined by statute. It was said: “The terms ‘gaming’ and ‘gambling’ in the administration and interpretation of criminal laws are usually regarded as synonymous.”

To be guilty of violating § 2422, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, said the court, in James v. State, supra, the accused must deal, play, carry on, open, or conduct the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

game upon which money or other representative of value is wagered, and the game which he so deals, plays, carries on, opens, or conducts must be one of those specially mentioned in said section, or some banking or percentage game played with dice, cards, or some other device, and therefore a conviction cannot be had upon proof that the accused conducted a “turf exchange” where his patrons congregated and bet upon horse races run at another place. Richardson, J., said: “The authorities [among them JAMES v. STATE] are to the effect that running a horse race is a game, but in this case the games were not played at the turf exchange, and were not conducted by plaintiffs in error. They did not conduct the races, and therefore did not conduct the game. Neither was the game played by means of the devices alleged in the information [a blackboard and telegraph connections, together with tickets with the names of the supposed horses and the amounts wagered on them, for money, checks, etc.]; that is, the races upon which the money, checks, credits, or representatives of value were wagered and were won or lost were not run in any sense by means of telegraph wires, telegraph instruments, blackboards, or tickets. The game—the horse race—was run and played by means of horses. All that was done in the turf exchange was to make bets upon the result of the races. The tickets given the gamblers were only memoranda of their bets, and the telegraph wire and instrument and the blackboard were merely means of showing what horses were to run, the odds placed, and of making known the result of the race. They furnished advance information in regard to the game, and made known the result as determined upon the track.”

So, the decision in James v. State, 63 Md. 242, seems to be in accord with the preceding case.

It has been uniformly held that the conducting of a turf exchange or the selling of APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Canadian County Court convicting them of carrying on a gambling game in violation of a statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Libbey & Gillett for appellants.

Messrs. Charles West, Attorney General, and Smith C. Matson, for the State:

The intention was not to restrict the crime to such games as are played with devices used solely for gambling.

Jones v. Territory, 5 Okla. 540, 49 Pac. 934; State v. Purdon, 3 Mo. 114; State v. Bates, 10 Mo. 166; Eubanks v. State, 5 Mo. 450; State v. Herryford, 19 Mo. 377; Miller v. United States, 6 App. D. C. 10.

Whether the game or contest upon which the wager is made be a horse race, foot race, baseball game, or what else, it is quite immaterial, if the thing or contest upon which the bet or wager is made by a game of chance.

Goodburn v. Marley, 2 Strange, 1159; Blaxton v. Pye, 2 Wils. 309; Grace v. M'Elroy, 1 Allen, 563; Lynall v. Longbotham, 2 Wils. 36; People v. Weithoff, 51 Mich. 203, 47 Am. Rep. 557, 16 N. W. 442; Tollett v. Thomas, L. R. 6 Q. B. 515, 40 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 209, 24 L. T. N. S. 508, 19 Week. Rep. 890; Joseph v. Miller, 1 N. M. 621; Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 536, 31 Am. Dec. 189.

Furman, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case appellants filed a demurrer to pools upon races in the manner shown in James v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 112 Pac. 944, is not a violation of such a statute as is therein referred to, or of a similar statute.

Thus it is said in State v. Hayden, 31 Mo. 35: "It is a great perversion of language to call a horse race a gambling device. If the legislature desire to prohibit horse races, it is easy for them to say so in plain terms. No one would even suppose that penalties inflicted upon keepers of faro banks and tables and such like gaming devices were intended to apply to horse races or foot races or boat races. A criminal code cannot be so loosely interpreted." And in this case it was said that Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 536, 31 Am. Dec. 189 [cited and set out fully in note in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 899] was not applicable.

The same question was before the supreme court of New York in the case of People v. Engeman, 129 App. Div. 462, 114 N. Y. Supp. 174. Here it was held that a sheet of paper called "Advanced Information," and which contained "information as to the horses entered [in certain races], the names of the jockeys who were to ride them, and names of the horses which had been withdrawn, the length of the race to be run, and its number," but "which contained no scheme for gambling upon its face, and which gave no directions where gambling could be done," did not constitute a "device or apparatus for gambling" within § 344 of the Penal Code. In the body of the opinion it was said: "This is the test, whether the implement or device is used in determining who shall win or lose, whether it is an integral part of the actual gambling. A gambling device is defined (20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 871) as an invention often used to determine the question as to who wins and who loses, that risk their money on a contest or chance of any kind; anything which is used as a means of playing for money or other thing of value, so that the result depends more largely on chance than skill; and again (14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 684), it is defined as 'any invention 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

or contrivance to determine who wins or loses money on a contest of chance. It will include only such instruments or contrivances as are intended for the purpose of gaming and such as are used to determine the result of the contest on which the wager is laid.' An apparatus is defined as being 'implements; an equipment of things provided and adapted as a means to some end; any complex instrument or appliance for a specific action or operation.' (2 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 473). Certainly this slip of paper, with the information which it contained, was not a device or apparatus for gambling in any possible sense. It did not on its face pretend to relate to gambling; it was such a slip as any individual might make out for his own information or for the information of those who were interested in the races, and the mere fact that it might afford facts which would be useful to the man of sporting proclivities in making up his mind how he desired to place his wager does not constitute it a device for gambling under any of the definitions which we have been able to find." And this decision was affirmed by the court of appeals of New York in 195 N. Y. 591, 89 N. E. 1107.

In State v. Stripling, 113 Ala. 120, 36 L.R.A. 81, 21 So. 409, pool selling on a horse race was held to be clearly within the title of an act for the better suppression of gambling.

The question may arise under statutes providing for the recovery of money or property bet and lost on games.

But in Deaver v. Bennett, 29 Neb. 812, 26 Am. St. Rep. 415, 46 N. W. 161, where the plaintiff insisted that he was entitled to recover his money under a certain statute, claiming that horse racing is a "game of hazard," the court did not decide the case under the statute, because there was a proviso therein within which the case at bar did not come.

In McQuesten v. Steinmetz, 73 N. H. 9, 111 Am. St. Rep. 592, 58 Atl. 876, it was said: "It is conceded that this action [for rent of premises] cannot be maintained if the defendant, with the plaintiff's knowl-to the information upon two grounds: First, that the information did not state facts sufficient to constitute the crime charged; second, that the allegations of the information show that the crime attempted to be charged is not a crime under the statutes of Oklahoma.

The information is as follows:

The State of Oklahoma } ss.:
Canadian County }

In County Court, before H. L. Fogg, County Judge in and for said County and State.

The State of Oklahoma

v.

E. P. James, Ollie James, C. E. Hilswick, and Gale Pendleton.

Now comes John W. Clark, county attorney, who prosecutes on behalf of the state, and gives the court to know and be informed that one E. P. James, Ollie James, C. E. Hilswick, and Gale Pendleton late of the county of Canadian and state of Oklahoma, on or about the 30th day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight, at and within the said edge and consent, carried on a gambling business upon the leased premises; and that a bet or wager on a horse race is a gambling contract within the meaning of our statute."

And since a horse race is gaming in Illinois it has been held that one cannot recover for services rendered in training a horse for the purpose of gaming, i. e., a race. Mosher v. Griffin, 51 Ill. 184, 99 Am. Dec. 541.

In Haley v. Cridge, 1 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 433, bookmaking was declared to be only another name for gambling, and one was not permitted to recover for certain services rendered on the race courses in "ascertaining from the owners and others the condition of the horses about to enter upon the race, so that the defendant might regulate his book and his betting upon the result."

Betting money on a horse race is gaming, and in violation of law, and a contract in aid of the offense of gaming, which is prohibited by statute, is void, and cannot be recovered upon. Shaffner v. Pinchback, 133 Ill. 410, 23 Am. St. Rep. 624, 24 N. E. 867.

As the word "gaming" as used in the statute of Charles included betting on horse races, and as the statute of Anne was passed for the purpose of better preventing the evils of gaming, such betting, and the giving of notes for money thereby lost, have been held to be embraced within the general words "other game or games" as therein used. Blaxton v. Pye, 2 Wils. 309; Goodburn v. Marley, 2 Strange, 1159.

Sometimes the question comes up under statutes making obligations void when given for money lost at gaming.

county and state, did then and there, maintain and conduct a gambling house in the manner and form as follows: That the said defendants E. P. James, Ollie James, C. E. Hilswick, and Gale Pendleton, did then and there unlawfully conduct as owners and for hire a certain banking and percentage game, played with and by means of a certain device, to wit, a blackboard and telegraph connections, together with tickets with the names of the supposed horses and the amount wagered on them, or money, checks, and other representatives of value. And the said defendants above named, did then and there conduct said gambling device in the manner and form aforesaid for money, checks, and other representatives of value, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

John W. Clark, County Attorney.

This information was based on § 2422, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, which is as follows: "That every person who deals, plays, or carries on, or opens or causes to be opened, or who conducts, either as owner or employee, whether for hire or not, any game of faro, monte, poker,

But in Bailey v. McDuffee, 18 N. B. 26, it was held that a statute rendering void "all notes, bill, etc., given . . . for money or goods won by gambling, or betting on persons gambling, or to repay any money lent or advanced for gambling or betting," did not apply to betting on a horse race, and that a bill of sale of a horse by way of mortgage to secure money used in betting was not void.

In McDevitt v. Thomas, 130 Ky. 805, 114 S. W. 273, it was held that betting on a horse race is not gaming, within the meaning of the statute (Ky. Stat. 1903, § 1955), which provides that "every contract . . . for the consideration of money, property, or other thing lent or advanced for the purpose of gaming . . . shall be void." The court said: "The word 'gaming,' as used in the statute, has a rather restricted meaning, and applies only to betting upon the result of some game played with cards, dice, machine, wheel, or other contrivance." But since the action was one for the recovery of money bet on horse races, and another inhibition of the statute, supra, provided that every contract for the consideration of money lent or advanced at the time of any betting or gaming or wagering, etc., was wholly void, a recovery was not permitted, because the words "betting" and "wagering" have a much broader and more comprehensive meaning than the word "gaming."

roulette, craps, or any banking or percentage game played with dice, cards, or any device, for money, checks, credit, or any representative of value, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and is punishable by fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and by imprisonment in the county jail for a term of not less than thirty days nor more than six months." This section was included in a bill entitled, "An Act Declaring Gaming Illegal, and Providing Penalties for Violation thereof, and Repealing Article 35 of Chapter 25 of the Statutes of Oklahoma Entitled 'Gaming,'" which was passed by the legislature of Oklahoma territory in 1893. Sections 2426 and 2427, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, under the article of "Gaming," are as follows:

"Sec. 2426. Every person who shall permit any gaming table, bank, or gaming device prohibited by § 2422 and 2424 of this act, to be set up or used for the purpose of gambling in any house, building, shed, shelter, booth, lot, or other premises to him belonging, or by him occupied, or of which he hath, at the time, possession or control, shall be, on conviction thereof, adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by a fine not exceeding $200, nor less than $100, or by imprisonment in the county jail for a term not exceeding six months nor less than thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 2427. Every person who shall knowingly lease or rent to another any house, building, or premises for the purpose of setting up or keeping therein, any of the gambling devices prohibited by the preceding provisions of this act is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Under the common-law doctrine of a strict construction of penal statutes, no act would constitute an offense unless it was necessarily included within the express letter of the statute, although it might be clearly contrary to the spirit of the statute. In other words, to construe a statute strictly was to construe it according to its letter, rather than according to its spirit. The doctrine of a liberal construction of penal statutes requires the courts, where it can be reasonably done, to place such a construction upon them as will enable the law to reach and destroy the mischief at which it was aimed. In other words, the court must look to the spirit rather than to the letter of the law. This is in harmony with the Divine law which declares, "For the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." In the second edition of Lewis's Sutherland, Statutory Construction (vol. 2, p. 1077), when speaking of the doctrine of a liberal construction of statutes, the author says: "The courts follow the reason and spirit of 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such statutes till they overtake and destroy the mischief which the legislature intended to suppress. In doing so they go far beyond the letter of the statute."

Under § 6489, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, we are forbidden to apply the common-law rule of a strict construction to the penal statutes of this state, and are required to construe such statutes liberally for the purpose of promoting their objects and in furtherance of justice. It is therefore our duty to determine, if we can, the intention of the legislature in enacting § 2422, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909. If we can reasonably do so, we must place such a construction upon this statute as will reach and destroy the mischief at which it was aimed. To our minds it is clear that it was the purpose of the legislature, in enacting this section of our statutes, to make it an offense for any person to open and conduct a house or place where any kind of public gaming whatsoever was carried on. If there was any doubt upon this subject, when we consider the other portions of the act, this doubt will be removed. By reading §§ 2426 and 2427 it will be seen that it was clearly the intention of the legislature not to allow any gaming table, bank, or gaming device to be opened and conducted within the state.

Mr. Webster defines a "device" as follows: "That which is devised, or formed by design; a contrivance; an invention; a project; a scheme; often, a scheme to deceive; a stratagem; an artifice."

The information alleged, that the defendants conducted a certain banking or percentage game, played with and by means of a certain device, to wit, a blackboard and telegraph connections, together with tickets with the name of the supposed horses and the amounts wagered on them, for money, checks, and other representatives of value. The substance of this information is that the blackboard and telegraph connections, together with tickets with the name of the supposed horses and the amounts wagered on them, constituted a device; that is, a plan or scheme which enabled people to bet or wager money upon such supposed horse races.

Counsel for the defendants say that there is no law in Oklahoma making it a crime to bet on horse races. They might with equal propriety have said that there is no law in Oklahoma subjecting a person who may purchase intoxicating liquors to punishment for such purchase. But this would be no defense to the seller of such liquor. There is no penalty for visiting a house of prostitution, but that does not exempt the keeper of such house from punishment. The mere fact that the law has not imposed a penalty for betting on horse races will not make it legal for any person to open and conduct a banking or percentage game, played by means of any device, scheme, or plan, by which the public can assemble and bet on such horse races. In other words, while betting on horse races may not subject persons who make such bets to punishment, yet the opening of a house or place where the public can assemble for the purpose of such betting may be criminal. At common law gaming in and of itself was not a crime, but a common gaming house was looked upon as a nuisance in the eye of the law on account of the great temptation which it offered to the public for idleness, and because such houses were calculated to draw together great numbers of disorderly persons, which could not be other than an inconvenience to the neighborhood, and demoralizing to society and good morals. Owing to the pernicious and destructive consequences following excessive gaming, the common law looked with abhorrence upon gaming houses, and held them to be a nuisance, although no penalty was imposed upon the persons who might bet on the game therein exhibited. See Bacon's Abr. title "Gaming," p. 451, and United States v. Willis, 1 Cranch, C. C. 511, Fed. Cas. No. 16,728. The word "gaming" has no technical meaning. It means any contrivance or institution which has for its object any sport, recreation, or amusement for the public, and upon which money or other articles of value are wagered, which will be won or lost by such contrivance or institution. One of the necessary elements of gaming is a contest or event upon which a bet or wager is laid. A game is any sport or amusement, public or private. It includes any physical contest, whether of man or beast, and, when practised for the purpose of deciding bets or wagers, such bets or wagers become gaming. Sec. 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 880, 881. According to the weight of authorities, a horse race is a game within the meaning of the law. See 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 884.

The supreme court of Illinois declares that horse racing is gaming, and that selling pools, or making books upon the result of a horse race, is gaming, because it is betting on a game, and is unlawful, although the game itself is not unlawful. See Swigart v. People, 50 Ill. App. 181.

The sale of a pool on a horse race run upon a track outside of the state is gaming. Edwards v. State, 8 Lea, 411.

"The word 'gambling' is a word of very general application, and is not restricted to wagering upon the result of any particular game or games of chance. In the adjudicated cases on this subject, we find that judges often have applied this word indiscriminately to wagering of all kinds. We are unable to discover any distinction in general principle between the various methods that may be adopted for determining by chance who is the winner and who the loser of a bet,—whether it be by throwing dice, flipping a copper, turning a card, or running a race. In either case it is gambling. This is the popular understanding of the term 'gambling device,' and does not exclude any scheme, plan, or contrivance for determining by chance which of the parties has won and which has lost a valuable stake. That a horse race, when adopted for such a purpose, is a 'gambling device,' there can be no doubt. Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 536, 31 Am. Dec. 189, and cases there referred to." Joseph v. Miller, 1 N. M. 626.

In the case of Jones v. Territory, 5 Okla. 537, 49 Pac. 934, Judge Tarsney, speaking for the court, held that a table adapted to the use, and necessarily used, in carrying on any game upon which bets or wagers were laid, is a gambling device in contemplation of law, although such table may have been originally designed for and ordinarily adapted for lawful uses.

We might continue to cite authorities to the same effect; but do not deem it necessary to do so. We think that by the use of the words "or any device" in § 2422, Snyder's Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, the legislature meant to include every scheme or plan or conception by which the person who opened or conducted a house, room, or place for betting, induced and enabled persons to bet or lay wagers upon any kind of game whatsoever; and that the charge contained in the information constituted a violation of this section of our law; and that the purpose of this statute was not aimed exclusively at any particular game or species of games, but was intended more effectually to suppress every kind of public gaming in the state of Oklahoma, not only those then in existence, but also those that might subsequently be devised and practised. The great evil and vice aimed at was not the horse races, but the seductive allurements held out to the people, young and old, to frequent gaming tables and indulge in excessive gaming, and thereby become the victims of the professional gambler. The keeping of such a house or place of resort is clearly contrary to public policy. Its object and purpose is to induce men to gather there and gamble. Its tendency is to tempt men to gamble, destroy fortunes, ruin characters, and wreck lives. Establishments of this kind often ripen into crime. They are hotbeds, and bring about infinite loss and demoralization to those who frequent them. We cannot escape the conclusion that it was to protect the public against such establishments as that described in the information, as well as against the keepers of games of faro, monte, poker, roulette, craps, or any other games played with dice and cards, that § 2422 was passed by the legislature. It is therefore our plain duty to so declare the law.

Our views are clearly and fully expressed in the case of Miller v. United States, 6 App. D. C. 11. The court of appeals of the District of Columbia there said:

"The act of Congress under which this indictment is framed is the act of January 31st, 1883, and is entitled, 'An Act More Effectually to Suppress Gaming in the District of Columbia. [22 Stat. at L. 411, chap. 40.] By its 1st section it is provided 'that every person who shall, in the District of Columbia, set up or keep any gaming table, or any house, vessel, or place, on land or water, for the purpose of gaming, of gambling device, commonly known as A. B. C., faro bank, E. O., roulette, equality, keno, thimbles, or "little joker," or any kind of gambling table or gambling device, adapted, devised, and designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance for money or property, or who shall induce, entice, or permit any person to bet or play, at or upon any such gaming table or gambling device, or on the side or against the keeper thereof, shall, on conviction, be adjudged.' etc. The 2d section is directed against any person who shall permit any gaming table, bank, or device to be set up or used for purposes of gaming; and the 3d section is directed against persons practicing certain swindling games therein mentioned. And by the 4th section it is declared 'that all games, devices, or contrivances at which money or any other thing shall be bet or wagered, shall be deemed a gaming table within the meaning of this act.' The demurrer was entered to the indictment generally, and is to be taken as a concession of the truth of all the facts properly alleged. And, if either of the counts be sufficient, the court below was not in error in overruling the demurrer, as the indictment may be good in part, though defective or insufficient in other parts of it. 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 443; Wheeler v. State, 42 Md. 563, 566.

"The defendant insists that the court below erred: First, in holding that there was any law in force in the District of Columbia upon which the indictment could be founded; second, in holding that either of the counts of the indictment charged an indictable offense; and, third, in holding that bookmaking, as charged in the indictment, is unlawful in the District of Columbia.

"1. With respect to the first count in the indictment, charging, as we have seen, the offense of setting up and keeping a gaming table, two questions are presented: First, what constitutes a gaming table within the meaning of the act of Congress of 1883? And, second, whether bookmaking on a horse race is a game of chance, within the meaning of the statute. In regard to the first of these questions, it is unnecessary to go to other authority for definition than to the statute itself. Any games, devices, or contrivances set up or kept for the purpose of gaming, or any gambling device, so set up and kept, adapted, devised, and designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance for money or property, and to which the public may resort to bet or wager money, is a gaming table within the meaning of the statute. The definition of a gaming table under the statute does not involve the ordinary mechanical definition of a table, but depends for its statutory meaning upon the means or contrivances adopted for playing the game. If any doubt could arise upon the construction of the terms of the 1st section of the act of 1883, that doubt would seem to be entirely and completely removed by the very explicit terms of the 4th section of the act, which was inserted ex industria for the manifest purpose of repelling ingenious attempts to evade the real scope and policy of the act, by subtle and refined distinctions and definitions. The 4th section declares 'that all games, devices, or contrivances at which money or any other thing shall be bet or wagered, shall be deemed a gaming table within the meaning of this act; and the courts shall construe the preceding sections liberally, so as to prevent the mischief intended to be guarded against.' This section must, of course, be construed in connection with the 1st section of the act, and, being so construed, any device, scheme, or contrivance set up or kept for the purpose of gaming, at which any person may bet or play for money, is a gaming table, and the party so setting up or keeping the same is liable under the statute. It is wholly immaterial to the offense under this statute of 1883, whether the party setting up or keeping the gaming table, or house or other place for gaming, plays or bets at the games or not; it is for keeping the table, or place for gambling, that he incurs the penalty of the statute, and not for the act of betting at such table or place. Seeing, then, what constitutes a gaming table within the meaning of the statute, the next question is whether book-

"This statute of 1883 was not aimed exclusively at any particular game or species of device for gaming, but was intended, as its title and its broad comprehensive provisions declare, more effectually to suppress gaming in this district. The reason and policy of the law, as well as its comprehensive language, apply as well to all games and devices then existing, as to all that might be subsequently devised and practised. That being the object to be accomplished, what could be more grossly obnoxious to the provisions of the statute, or more demoralizing to the community, than the existence of places for the making and selling of books and pools upon horse races, baseball games, foot races, dog fights, cock fights, and all other conceivable contents upon which money may be bet or wagered? The great evil and vice of the thing is not in the horse race, the foot race, or the baseball game, but in the seductive allurements held out to people, young and old, to frequent the gaming table, or the gambling device, and to indulge in excessive betting, and thereby become the victims of the wily and scheming professional gambler. Whether the game or contest upon which the wager is made be a horse race, foot race, baseball game, or what else, it is quite immaterial, if the thing or contests upon which the bet or wager is made be a game of chance. It has from an early time been held that a horse race is a game of chance, and so is a game of baseball, and so a foot race, where wagers have been made upon them. Goodburn v. Marley, 2 Strange, 1159; Blaxton v. Pye, 2 Wils. 309; Grace v. McElroy, 1 Allen, 563; Lynall v. Longbothom, 2 Wils. 36; People v. Weithoff, 51 Mich. 203, 47 Am. Rep. 557, 16 N. W. 442. And a horse race being a game, within the meaning of the Stat. Anne, chap. 14, against gaming, though not specially mentioned, but being embraced in the general words, 'other game or games' (2 Wils. 309), there can be no reason for excluding horse races from the games contemplated or fairly embraced by the terms of the act of 1883. The pooling or bookmaking schemes are only particular methods of making the bets or wagers on the result of the race. They all contemplate putting money at stake upon the issue of the race or game. In the case of Scollans v. Flynn, 120 Mass. 271, the court, in speaking of pool selling, said: 'The selling of pools is admitted to be an illegal and gaming transaction;' and it has been held in several cases, and by eminent judges, that the pooling scheme is to be considered a game, and hence it 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) is within the very letter of the statute. It was so held by the court of Queen's bench, in Tollett v. Thomas, L. R. 6 Q. B. 515, 40 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 209, 24 L. T. N. S. 508, 19 Week. Rep. 890, and also in the case of Edwards v. State, 8 Lea, 411. And the whole subject has been most carefully considered by Mr. Justice Cooley, concurred in by his able associates, in the case of People v. Weithoff, 51 Mich. 203, 47 Am. Rep. 557, 16 N. W. 442. In that case the question turned upon the meaning of the word 'gaming room' as used in the statute; and it was held, upon review of all the previous cases upon the subject, that pools on horse races or baseball games are 'games' within the statute against gaming. In view, therefore, of the authorities to which we have referred, and especially of the strong and comprehensive language employed in the statute, we are of opinion that there is no sufficient ground for demurrer to the first count in the indictment."

We think that the case of Thrower v. State, 117 Ga. 753, 45 S. E. 126, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 315, is directly in point, and is applicable not only to the information in this case, but also to the testimony which we find in the record. That court said:

"The defendant was indicted under the Penal Code 1895, § 398, for 'keeping a gaming house,' and upon the trial was found guilty. It appears that he was the proprietor of what is called a 'turf exchange,' at which large numbers of persons daily congregated for the purpose of betting on horse races, run in distant states, but reported at the exchange by telegraphic despatches. The odds against every horse in any race were posted on a blackboard in the room. While not given in detail, we understand, from what is stated as to the method of posting, that the following would illustrate what is placed on the board: 2 to 1 against horse A. 2 to 1 against horse B. 3 to 1 against horse C. 3 to 1 against horse D. 4 to 1 against horse E. Persons desiring to bet would select a horse, pay $1, and receive a ticket showing the sum to which he would be entitled in case that horse won. The proprietor was in effect a bookmaker, and backed the field, being bound to win if he could get takers enough to make the book on each race, and could keep the amount of his heaviest odds less than the total stakes put up by the individual betters in each race. 3 Enc. Britannica, 518. The details would be changed because single 'books' were not made; but the principle would be the same where money bets were made or tickets sold. In the instance above given he received $5; his heaviest loss could be only $4, and he might lose only $2. At any rate, one of the witnesses lost $7,000 at this exchange, and many other smaller amounts. The evidence is that many attended, and the betting was constant, those backing the successful horse winning in each race often heavy odds, but the greater number, of course, being bound to lose, and the exchange to gain; these gains being sure and certain if only takers enough were to be had and all the odds sold. This being an element of uncertainty against the proprietor, it was desirable to have a clearing house or place in which to gather a crowd, and the 'turf exchange' is the modern expedient to secure that result. But the plaintiff in error insists that he was not keeping a gaming house, because no game was played; the races occurred in distant states; and, betting on a horse race not being itself a criminal offense, it cannot be an offense to maintain a place where such betting is allowed.

"The act as published in Cobb's Dig. p. 815, and in Code 1863, § 4423, is subdivided by a semicolon, and makes even clearer what is apparent upon an investigation of the statute as now published in the Penal Code 1895, § 398. It creates three separate offenses: (1) Whoever keeps a gaming house is guilty of a misdemeanor. (2) If he does not keep and control the house, but merely permits it to be used by other persons as a place where betting on games or devices is carried on, he is guilty of a misdemeanor. (3) If he knowingly rents the house to be used for such purpose, he is guilty of a misdemeanor. And in § 392 it is further provided that, if he keeps a house to the encouragement of gaming, he is guilty. Keeping a gaming house is a separate, well-defined offense, and entirely independent of the criminality of the betting carried on therein. The statute is aimed at the place, not at the players, nor at the game, nor at the subject-matter of the wager. At common law keeping a gaming house was an offense before any sort of game was prohibited, and was punished when gaming was not even against public policy, when the courts recognized such contracts, and by solemn judgment made the loser pay his bet. But to maintain a place for the purpose of inducing men to gather and game was a common nuisance, because of its tendency to corrupt morals and ruin fortunes. United States v. Dixon, 4 Cranch, C. C. 107, Fed. Cas. No. 14,970. The game might be harmless, or, if in private, only the immediate actors would be affected; but when the public were invited, when there were always present those ready and anxious to stake, when the gains of one excited others to participate, when the pride of public success stimulated the winner, and the loser attempted to hide the mortification of defeat by a bold front until the last coin was gone, the law was bound to interfere. The English rule and our own statute are both based on the recognition of the cumulative evil which may inhere in a multiplicity of acts not themselves criminal. Idleness is not a crime, but an aggression of innocent idleness may culminate in the crime of vagrancy. Penal Code, § 453. To allow liquor to be drunk on one's premises on Sunday is not made an offense, but to keep a place where persons may congregate for that purpose is to convert the building into a tippling house. The noncriminality of the drinking does not save the housekeeper. Penal Code, § 390. A single act of noise may be innocent, but continued too long the harmless disorder makes the owner the keeper of a disorderly house. Penal Code, § 392. Betting on a game or an event not made penal is not an offense, but to keep a house for that very purpose will ripen into a crime. Keeping a gaming house, a tippling house, or a disorderly house are all made offenses by the Penal Code, because, while acts done therein are not crimes, they lead to crime. Such places are hotbeds; and the maintenance thereof is prohibited in pursuance of the preventive policy of the law, in an endeavor to save the idle and dissolute from themselves, and to prevent the misery and loss which wait on those who frequent such places. The wholesale gaming and the evil consequences arising from the keeping of a 'turf exchange' are as great, if not greater, than those flowing from maintenance of any other gaming place; and the proprietor can only escape the consequences by showing that his is not a gaming house within the meaning of the statute.

"The words 'wagering,' 'playing,' 'gaming,' and 'betting,' though each having a meaning more or less different from the other, are often used one for the other. The statute in prohibiting gaming does not intend to prohibit amusement, sport, recreation, or diversion, but is aimed at the hazarding of money on certain prohibited games and devices. In prohibiting a gaming house it is intended to prevent the maintenance of a place at which persons come together for the purpose of hazarding and betting money, whether the subject-matter of a single bet is or is not made equal. There is a difference between gambling and gaming. In defining gaming contracts the Code refers to contracts in which money has been wagered, although there may be no sport, no skill, no element of contest between those betting; and therefore, while some few courts rule that betting on a horse race is not even gaming, most others (14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 682, note 1, 2) decide it to be gaming, and our own court has held that 'betting on a horse race is gaming in the sense of the Code.' Dyer v. Benson, 69 Ga. 609. It may not be gambling, but it is gaming; and, if so, a person who maintains a place where such betting is carried on as a business is keeping a gaming house. The gaming or betting goes on therein although the race itself may be conducted elsewhere. No one will deny that the young man who lost his $7,000 could have recovered it had he sued in time under the provisions of Civ. Code, § 3671, even though it were lost in gaming on races run in New York, Saratoga, or Sheepshead. It was gaming, and gaming in this very house, and the owner was keeping a gaming house even if betting on a horse race is not itself punished under the Penal Code. To the decisions cited by counsel may be added that of State v. Savannah, T. U. P. Charlt. (Ga.) 238, 4 Am. Dec. 708, decided in 1809, from which it appears that, long before our first Penal Code, 'keeping a gaming house' was recognized as 'a nuisance and an offense against the public police, and a part of that law which our ancestors brought from England, and not impaired by our fundamental laws.' It is true that since 1833 we have had only statutory offenses. White v. State, 51 Ga. 288. But where the common-law crime has been adopted, and common-law terms used in its definition, the construction previously placed thereon by the English courts becomes by intendment a part of the adopting statute. Penal Code, §§ 1, 4 (9). It would seem clear, therefore, that when the legislature, in concise but comprehensive language, declared that 'keeping a gaming house is a misdemeanor,' it had in mind the English law on the same subject, under which the crime was committed when the house was kept for the purpose of gaming, regardless of the criminality or character of game, wagering, or betting carried on therein."

We deem it useless to make further argument or cite additional authorities in support of our views. We therefore hold that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the information. The evidence overwhelmingly sustains every allegation contained in the information, and the instructions given to the jury are in harmony with the views herein contained.

The judgment of the lower court is therefore affirmed, with directions to the County Court of Canadian County to proceed 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

with the execution of the judgment and sentence of the court.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

J. M. LEPLEY, Respt.,
v.

A. N. ANDERSEN, Appt.

Evidence — parol to explain contract.

1. Parol evidence is admissible to show that a writing purporting to fix compensation for collecting a debt was in fact made to aid the collection of the debt by concealing the creditor's interest in the recovery, and that the collector was attempting to use the instrument for the dishonest purpose of retaining an amount in excess of the compensation to which he was entitled.

Contract — writing — parol control — evidence.

2. To establish fraud which will permit the controlling of a written contract by a contemporaneous parol agreement, the evidence must be clear and satisfactory.

Appeal — reversal — instructions — failure to request.

3. A reversal may be had to prevent injustice because of insufficient instructions to the jury, although the losing party did not except to those given, or request others.

Note. — Degree of certainty necessary to establish fraud in a civil action.

This note is limited to setting out the forms of expression used by the courts to describe the degree of proof required to establish fraud in civil actions. The question whether or not the evidence produced in particular cases was sufficient to establish fraud is not considered.

While the degree of proof required to establish fraud is affected by the nature of the action in some of the cases, a large part of them seem to treat the question from the standpoint of fraud alone. To attempt to set out the nature of the action in each case treated would, therefore, be confusing, and in many cases misleading, and for that reason it is deemed advisable to merely collect the cases and group them according to the particular form of expression used to describe the degree of proof required to establish fraud.

Cases in which, though the proof of fraud was involved, it appears that the discussion of the degree of proof required turned upon other considerations, as, for instance, the fact that a crime was charged, rather than upon the proof of fraud, have not been included.

In the arrangement of the note, while APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rusk County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover certain moneys alleged to have been collected by defendant for plaintiff. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action to recover $500, money had and received. Complaint in the usual form. The defendant answered admitting receipt of the money, but claiming that it was received as collecting agent under an agreement that he should have half for making the collection and the right to apply the other half on a claim he had for collection for another party against the plaintiff.

Defendant established his defense, prima facie, by introducing in evidence a written contract between himself and a former partner, on one side, and plaintiff, on the other, to the effect that in case the former should collect the $500 claim of one Arnold the proceeds should be disposed of as stated in the answer. Plaintiff was permitted to rebut that by evidence that the claim was put into the hands of defendant and his partner for collection upon the usual terms, and that, some time thereafter, plaintiff was induced to sign the written contract by representations made by defendant that it would be used only to prevent Arnold from collecting a judgment he had charge of against the plaintiff, and to avoid Arnold's disinclination to pay the claim so that any of the proceeds would go to enrich

Not to be presumed, but must be proved, etc.

Expressions to the general effect that fraud is not to be presumed, but must be proved, have been used or approved by the courts as follows:

—not presumed, but must be proved. Ferguson v. Little Rock Trust Co. — Ark. —, 137 S. W. 555; Mears v. Waples, 3 Houst. (Del.) 581; Ruby v. Jamison, 143 Ky. 486, 136 S. W. 909; Western Horse & Cattle Ins. Co. v. Putnam, 20 Neb. 331, 30 N. W. 246; Buchanan v. Buchanan, 73 N. J. Eq. 544, 68 Atl. 780, reverse on other grounds in 75 N. J. Eq. 274, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 454, 71 Atl. 745; Shultz v. Hoagland, 85 N. Y. 467;

—not inferred, but must be proved. Wright v. Grover, 27 Ill. 426; Long v. West, 31 Kan. 298, 1 Pac. 545;

—must be distinctly alleged and proved. Bailey v. Litten, 52 Ala. 282; —must be averred with certainty, and proved as averred. Manning v. Pippen, 95 Ala. 537, 11 So. 56; —must be proved, and not found on mere suspicion. Redpath Bros v. Lawrence, 48 Mo. App. 427; Braddock v. Louchheim, 87 Fed. 287; —must be proved, but may be proved by presumptive evidence. Kaine v. Weigley, 22 Pa. 179; —not presumed, but must be proved, though it may be inferred from circumstances. Renney v. Williams, 89 Mo. 139, 1 S. W. 227; Colquitt v. Thomas, 8 Ga. 258;

—must be proven with some degree of certainty, and cannot be inferred or presumed from ambiguous evidence. Denoyer v. First Nat. Acci. Co. 145 Wis. 450, 130 N. W. 475;

Priest v. Way, 87 Mo. 16; Mapes v. Burns, 72 Mo. App. 411.

However, in Kendall v. Hughes, 7 B. Mon. 368, it was held that to instruct that fraud will not be presumed, but must be proven, is misleading, as it may be presumed if there is sufficient evidence of other facts to justify the inference of fraud.

In Pickitt v. Pipkin, 64 Ala. 520, the court said: "Courts, while not indulging presumptions that it is imputable, cannot refuse to draw from uncontroverted facts the inferences flowing from them logically and naturally."

In McDaniel v. Baca, 2 Cal. 326, 56 Am. Dec. 339, it is held that express proof is not required, but may be inferred from strong presumptive circumstances.

And in Lowry v. Beckner, 5 B. Mon. 41, the court said: "Fraud may be presumed, as well as other higher offenses, from facts and circumstances proven."

While in Denton v. McKenzie, 1 Desauss. Eq. 289, 1 Am. Dec. 664, the court held that fraud may be presumed in equity, and need not be proved as at law.

By a preponderance of testimony, etc.

A large number of cases show approval of some form of expression indicating the sufficiency of a preponderance of evidence to establish fraud. Thus it may be proved:

—by a preponderance of the evidence. Ford v. Chambers, 19 Cal. 143; Bullard v. His Creditors, 56 Cal. 600; Allen v. Elrick, 29 Colo. 118, 66 Pac. 891; Eames v. Morgan, 37 Ill. 260; Hewett v. Johnson, 72 Ill. 513; Schroeder v. Walsh, 120 Ill. 403, 11 N. E. 70; Kingman v. Reinemer, 166 Ill. 208, 46 N. E. 786; Prentice v. Crane, 234 Ill. 302, 84 N. E. 916; Hughes v. Lockington, 221 Ill. 571, 77 N. E. 1105; Geneser v. Telgman, 37 Ill. App. 374; Means v. Flanagan, 79 Ill. App. 296; Smith v. Edelstein, 92 Ill. App. 38; Haberer v. Walzer, 109 Ill. App. 371; American Hoist & Derrick Co. v. Hall, 110 Ill. App. 463, affirmed in 208 Ill. 597, 70 N. E. 581; Crane v. Schaefer, 140 Ill. App. 647; Continental Ins. Co. v. Jachnichen, 110 Ind. 59, 59 Am. Rep. 194, 10 plaintiff. There was further proof on the part of plaintiff as to the services rendered in collecting the claim. The evidence as to the oral understanding that the writing should not be used according to its tenor was contradicted by evidence on defendant's part. There was also evidence in his behalf that the claim he had for collection was stale and of a class permitting 50 per cent as a customary fee. The evidence was all one way, that one half of the $500 collected was actually applied on the claim defendant and his partner had for collection against plaintiff. There was evidence tending to show that the writing corresponded to the verbal understanding. Exceptions were saved to the ruling permitting proof of the contemporaneous or prior verbal contract.

The jury, considering the case as submitted by the court, allowed defendant 10 per cent of the $500, for his services as collector, and found for plaintiff in the sum of $200. Judgment was rendered accordingly, with costs.

Messrs. Andersen & Leahy, J. W. Soderberg, and Richmond, Jackman, & Swansen, for appellant:

In the absence of fraud or mistake, proof of antecedent or contemporaneous verbal agreements between contracting parties cannot be received to alter or control a written agreement.

Beyond reasonable doubt.

Proof of fraud beyond a reasonable doubt has been held to be too high a degree in: Sweeney v. Devens, 72 Mich. 301, 40 N. W. 454; Burr v. Willson, 22 Minn. 206; Dare County v. Smith Constr. Co. 152 N. C. 23, 67 S. E. 37; McComihe v. Sawyer, 12 N. H. 396; United States Home & Dower Asso. v. Reams, 8 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 272.

But in Weissenfels v. Cable, 208 Mo. 515, 106 S. W. 1028, proof beyond reasonable doubt was required.

And in Mayberry v. Nichol, — Tenn. —, 39 S. W. 881, the court used the phrase, "beyond a reasonable controversy," as describing the proper degree of proof.

Consistent with honest purpose.

In the following cases the courts have said that fraud should not be found when the facts and circumstances proven may as well consist with honesty of purpose. Smith v. Branch Bank, 21 Ala. 125; Alabama Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Pettway, 24 Ala. 544; Stiles v. Lightfoot, 26 Ala. 443; Thames v. Rembert, 63 Ala. 561; Cromelin v. McCauley, 67 Ala. 542; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Moog, 81 Ala. 335, 1 So. 108; Lyman v. Cessford, 15 Iowa. 229; Schofield v. Blind, 33 Iowa, 175; Drummond v. Couse, 39 Iowa, 442; Raymond v. Morrison, 59 Iowa, 371, 13 N. W. 332; Ley v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 120 Iowa, 203, 94 N. W. 568; Connors v. Chingren, 111 Iowa, 437, 82 N. W. 934; Pierce v. Pierce, 55 Mich. 629, 22 N. Bank*, 11 Wash. 559, 40 Pac. 225;

In State Sav. Bank v. Emge, — Iowa, —, 108 N. W. 530, it was held that fraud should not be inferred unless the showing is so Donaldson v. Eaton, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1168, 125 Am. St. Rep. 275, 114 N. W. 19.

A presumption of undue influence arises when attorney and client enter into a contract for compensation, unless the contract was entered into before the relation began.

Dockery v. McLellan, 93 Wis. 381, 67 N. W. 733, 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 961.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal point made on the appeal is that the rule permitting respondent to testify to the verbal agreement, contradicting the writing which purported to fix the rights of the parties regarding appellant's compensation, was erroneous, since by a familiar principle, a written contract clear as to exclude all reasonable hypothesis of good faith.

In Shinnabarger v. Shelton, 41 Mo. App. 147, the court said that if the evidence comports as well with honesty as dishonesty, so that there is a reasonable doubt as to which preponderates, the doubt should be resolved in favor of the party charged with fraud.

And in Alter v. Bank of Stockham, 53 Neb. 223, 73 N. W. 667, the court said that if from the entire evidence good faith, or an honest mistake even, may be as rationally and reasonably inferred as fraud, then the law leans to the side of innocence.

But in Adams v. Thornton, 78 Ala. 489, 56 Am. Rep. 49, a rule adopted in Steele v. Kinkle, 3 Ala. 352, and Tompkins v. Nichols, 53 Ala. 197, that to establish fraud the facts must be such as are not explicable on any other reasonable hypothesis, was expressly disapproved as requiring too high a degree of proof, and it was held that when a party shows facts which are not fairly or reasonably reconcilable with fair dealing and honesty of purpose he is entitled to judgment.

The courts presume that a man acts honestly in his dealings with his fellow man, and to establish fraud it is necessary that the evidence be strong enough to overcome this presumption. Marksburly v. Taylor, 10 Bush, 519; S. Rose Co. v. Hasenzahl, 141 Ky. 676, 133 S. W. 547; Hatch v. Bayley, 12 Cush. 27; Fort v. Metayer, 10 Mort. (La.) 436; Cobb v. Fogelman, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 440; Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Hogue, 105 Va. 355, 54 S. E. 8:

To the satisfaction of the jury or court.

Various expressions involving the idea of requiring that fraud be proved to the satisfaction of the jury or the judge have been used as follows:

—to the satisfaction of the jury. Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 1, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, 9 S. E. 445; cannot be varied or contradicted by evidence of verbal communications prior to the making thereof or contemporaneous therewith.

The rule invoked by counsel, like most judicial rules, is subject to exceptions. One is this: Where there is a distinct oral agreement which, under ordinary circumstances, cannot be efficiently established in the face of a written one covering the subject, or which is inconsistent therewith, for the purpose of giving effect to the former notwithstanding the latter, it may be, in an action between the parties, as a matter of defense to a claim under the writing, in case of the adverse party seeking to use such writing for a dishonest purpose. the satisfaction of the jury. Moses v. Katzenberger, 84 Ala. 95, 4 So. 237; Supreme Conclave, K. D. v. Wood, 120 Ga. 328, 47 S. E. 940; Dare County v. Smith Constr. Co. 152 N. C. 23, 67 S. E. 37;

—by a preponderance of evidence, sufficient to reasonably satisfy the minds of the jury. Golden v. Parmalee, 15 Gray, 413; Hitchcock v. Baughan, 36 Mo. App. 216;

—a fair preponderance of evidence, sufficient to satisfy the minds of the jurors. Bixby v. Carskaddon, 55 Iowa, 533, 8 N. W. 354; —must be sufficient to satisfy the jury, by a fair and reasonable preponderance of evidence. O'Connell v. Supreme Conclave, K. D. 102 Ga. 143, 66 Am. St. Rep. 159, 28 S. E. 282;

—clearly and conclusively established to the satisfaction of the jury. Boyce v. Cannon, 5 Houst. (Del.) 409;

—by satisfactory proof, i. e., proof to the satisfaction of the jury. Walker v. Collins, 8 C. C. A. 1, 19 U. S. App. 307, 59 Fed. 70, reversed on other grounds in 167 U. S. 57, 42 L. ed. 76, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 738; —sufficient if all the facts proven satisfy the jury that fraud existed. Reed v. Noxon, 48 Ill. 323;

—any evidence which will satisfy the jury that there was fraud. Hoffman v. Western M. & F. Ins. Co. 1 La. Ann. 216;

—the jury must be satisfied of fraudulent intent. Painter v. Drum, 40 Pa. 467; —sufficient to satisfy the minds and consciences of the jury. Linn v. Wright, 18 Tex. 317, 70 Am. Dec. 282;

—only such proof as will convince the jury of the truth of the allegation. Doe ex dem. Rice v. Dignowitty, 4 Smedes & M. 57;

—such evidence as the jury could reasonably and safely rest their consciences upon. Abbey v. Dewey, 25 Pa. 413; —sufficient if the evidence creates in the mind of the jury, a belief that the allegation is true. Lee v. Pearce, 68 N. C. 76;

—not to be inferred from slight circumstances, but such as to satisfy the jury that fraud exists. Walsh v. Taft, 142 Mich. 127, 105 N. W. 544;

—must satisfy the conscience of the N. W. 69; Julliard v. Chaffee, 92 N. Y. 529. That is a very valuable principle in the administration of justice, yet its use is so fraught with danger of rendering written agreements less certain of fixing the rights of parties than in general they are designed to be, and danger of promoting attempts to commit fraud by varying or abrogating written contracts by verbal communications which, in contemplation of law, are merged in the former, it should not be applied except in a clear case, and the claim of fraud should not be allowed to prevail unless established by clear and satisfactory evidence. In this respect the familiar rule applies that he who alleges fraud in a civil action, to prevail, must establish his claim with more than that ordinary degree of certainty which suffices as to the party on whom the burden of proof rests in a civil case. That degree of certainty is something less than beyond a reasonable doubt, as in a criminal case, yet something more than mere reasonable certainty which may be grounded on a bare preponderance of the evidence; that degree which is contemplated by an instruction that the party on whom the burden of proof rests must establish the truth of his claim by a preponderance of the evidence. The distinction may be a little shadowy, yet it is believed to be substantial. At any rate, it is firmly grounded in our jurisprudence and is characterized as that degree of certainty which is produced by clear and satisfactory evidence. Maldaner v. Smith, 102 Wis. 30, 78 N. W. 140; Lockwood v. Allen, 113 Wis. 474, 89 N. W. 492; Bowe v. Gage, 127 Wis. 245, 115 Am. St. Rep. 1010, 106 N. W. 1074.

In the last case cited the court said, in effect, notwithstanding a mere preponderance of evidence, which, ordinarily, is sufficient upon which to base a finding of fact in favor of the party upon whom the burden of proof rests, not so when to lift that burden fraud must be established. Then the finding should not be made unless the jury are satisfied by evidence which is clear, satisfactory, and convincing. A court in submitting the issue of fact to a jury does not perform its duty without making that distinction. In respect to an instruction, as in this case, the court added: "The instruction given would correctly enough have defined the jury's duty upon an ordinary issue of fact; . . . but it was incomplete as a guide in passing upon fraud."

We should say, in passing, to avoid confusion because of variations in stating the rule referred to, "clear and satisfactory evidence" being used in some instances, and "clear, satisfactory, and convincing evidence" in others, it is not understood here that the latter goes any further than the court. Armstrong v. Lachman, 84 Va. 726, 6 S. E. 129;

—so strong and clear as to satisfy the conscience of the chancellor. Saunders v. Parrish, 86 Va. 592, 10 S. E. 748; —clear and convincing and such as to satisfy the conscience of the chancellor. Redwood v. Rogers, 105 Va. 155, 53 S. E. 6.

However, in Granrud v. Rea, 24 Tex. Civ. Rep. 299, 59 S. W. 841, proof of fraud to the satisfaction of jury was held to be too high a standard.

And in American Hoist & Derrick Co. v. Hall, 110 Ill. App. 463, affirmed in 208 Ill. 597, 70 N. E. 581, the same was held as to proof to the satisfaction of the court.

Sufficient to satisfy the mind, etc.

In the following cases it is held that the proof of fraud must be:

—strong and cogent, such as to satisfy a man of sound judgment of the truth of the allegation. Henry v. Henry, 8 Barb. 588;

—such that it satisfies the mind. Evans v. Mansur & T. Implement Co. 30 C. C. A. 640, 58 U. S. App. 261, 87 Fed. 275;

—such as will satisfy a reasonable mind. Shegog v. Shegog, Riley, L. 270; Williams v. Harris, 4 S. D. 22, 46 Am. St. Rep. 753, 54 N. W. 926;

—so clear and conclusive as to leave no rational doubt upon the mind as to its existence. Buck v. Sherman, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 176; —of such a character as to lead a fair-minded man to the conclusion that fraud exists. Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87; Hunter v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 321.

But in Carter v. Gunnels, 67 Ill. 270, it was held that a statement that fraud must be proved directly, or by such facts and circumstances as would make the conclusion reasonable and irresistible in the mind of a fair-minded and reasonable person, was erroneous as requiring too high a degree of proof.

Miscellaneous cases.

In the following cases, which do not fall within any of the above group, the courts have held that the evidence to establish fraud:

—may be presumptive, though such evidence might not be sufficient in courts of law. Hempstead v. Johnston, 18 Ark. 123, 65 Am. Dec. 458; Lester v. Mahan, 25 Ala. 445, 60 Am. Dec. 530;

—is sufficient if it agrees with and supports the hypothesis which it is adduced to prove. Seligman v. Kalkman, 8 Cal. 207; Phelan v. Dalson, 14 Ark. 79;

—need not be sufficient to prove any one of the essentials of the claim beyond doubt. Wollner v. Lehman, 85 Ala. 274, 4 So. 643; —must be such as generates a belief, not merely raises a suspicion. Lewin v. Thurber, 62 Ga. 25;

former. That is, to tell the jury the claim of fraud, in order to prevail, must be established by clear and satisfactory evidence, is all-sufficient, though it may be that the more emphatic expression, "clear, satisfactory, and convincing evidence" would be more likely than the somewhat milder expression,—especially where fraud is claimed to avoid a written contract unquestionably executed with knowledge of its contents and with all usual formalities,—to challenge the minds of jurors to the distinction between the two degrees of certainty, and the importance of holding to the higher one as the safest way of reaching a right result with the greatest practicable certainty.

The case, from the standpoint of the respondent, involved, very plainly, the conditions requiring the rule in Corbett v. Joannes, supra, to be considered. On the one side there was a written contract, in plain terms, fixing the rights of the parties. On the other, there was the claim that the writing was not made for the purpose its terms would indicate; that the real contract relating to compensation for doing the work, apparently fixed by the writing, rested in parol, and that the attempt to use the writing for a purpose not within the contemplation of the parties when it was made was dishonest. The adversaries only testified on the subject. Each apparently testified as positively to his claim, as the other. Neither seems to have been corroborated by any other witness or circumstance, except appellant had the advantage of the writing. That gave him the benefit of the rule casting upon respondent the burden of satisfying the jury by "clear and satisfactory evidence," or "clear, satisfactory, and convincing evidence," of the truth of his claim. The rule was peculiarly important, in that the case had to turn solely upon the question of which of the two interested parties testified to the truth. There was no opportunity for conflict consistent with good faith. One or the other must necessarily have told the truth, and the other testified wilfully false. The presumption against perjury was in favor of one as much as the other. So the jury had only differentiation between the reasonableness of the two stories and the manner of the two parties in giving their testimony. The jury had the benefit of the latter element, and so did the trial court in approving of their finding as being warranted by some reasonable view of the evidence, under all the circumstances.

The manner of witnesses while testifying before a jury sometimes is a valuable guide in solving conflicts. That guide, in the every nature of things, an appellate court cannot have the benefit of, hence the rule —is sufficient if the inference of fraud is natural and irresistible. Bullock v. Narrott, 49 Ill. 62;

—is sufficient when the circumstances are so strong as to produce conviction of the truth of the charge, although there may remain some doubt. Bryant v. Simoneau, 51 Ill. 324;

—if fairly tending to prove fraud, is sufficient to require its submission to the jury. Lindauer v. Gray, 18 Ill. App. 209;

—need not be conclusive, but only such as will produce a rational belief. Watkins v. Wallace, 19 Mich. 57;

—need not be positive, but is sufficient if it consists of circumstances from which the inference of fraud might be drawn. Freedman v. Campfield, 92 Mich. 118, 52 N. W. 630;

—is sufficient if it creates a belief that a fraud has been perpetrated. Gumberg v. Treusch, 103 Mich. 543, 61 N. W. 872;

—need not establish all of the false representations alleged. Pinch v. Hotaling, 142 Mich. 521, 106 N. W. 69;

—need only establish it by facts necessarily ly tending to establish probability of guilt, although a crime was imputed. Sommer v. Oppenheim, 19 Misc. 605, 44 N. Y. Supp. 396; —will not prevail over the presumption of honesty, unless established by irresistible evidence of double dealings. Snow v. Wathen, 127 App. Div. 948, 112 N. Y. Supp. 41;

—should do so to a reasonable degree of certainty. Darling v. Klock, 33 App. Div. 270, 53 N. Y. Supp. 593, Affirmed in 165 N. Y. 623, 59 N. E. 1121;

—must necessarily tend to establish the probability of guilt. Hatch v. Spooner, 37 N. Y. S. R. 151, 13 N. Y. Supp. 642; Morris v. Talcott, 96 N. Y. 100; —need not amount to positive and express proofs of fraud. Buchanan v. Buchanan, 73 N. J. Eq. 544, 68 Atl. 780, reversed on other grounds in 75 N. J. Eq. 274, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 454, 71 Atl. 745;

—may be circumstantial if the circumstances are strong and pregnant, from which no other reasonable conclusion could be drawn. Paxton v. Boyce, 1 Tex. 317;

—need only show circumstances from which the inference of fraud is natural and irresistible. Tacoma v. Tacoma Light & Water Co. 16 Wash. 288, 47 Pac. 738; —need not be express and positive, but must amount to more than a mere suspicion. Waddingham v. Loker, 44 Mo. 132, 100 Am. Dec. 260.

that the finding of a jury, approved by the trial court, will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears to be unwarranted in any reasonable view of the evidence, giving due weight in its favor to those circumstances which are legitimate aids to the jury and judge in discovering truth, but are not to the reviewing court.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the rulings on the objections to evidence as to a verbal agreement having been made which was inconsistent with the writing, tending to show that the writing was put forward for a fraudulent purpose, were proper. Was the evidence to prove such purpose sufficient to warrant the jury in finding in favor of the claim of fraud? That is the serious question.

Looking at the printed record alone, it does not seem that the evidence of respondent was sufficient to outweigh the equally positive, and so far as appears, equally credible, evidence of appellant and the writing besides, so as to establish clearly and satisfactorily, or in other words, clearly, satisfactorily, and convincingly, that appellant's use of the writing was dishonest. It may possibly be, as we have seen, that circumstances existed which were entitled to weight by the jury, but which we cannot have the benefit of; and which were sufficient, as the jury so thought, to point to the requisite degree of certainty of the truth to justify finding in respondent's favor. Had the jury been carefully instructed in respect to the matter, it may be that they would not have found as they did. It seems quite probable that they would not. Had they done so with an appreciation of the rule as to establishing fraud, it may be that the verdict could not be disturbed here, though that is not clear.

Neither counsel for the plaintiff, nor counsel for the defendant, nor the circuit judge, seems to have appreciated the distinction between proving fraud and proving any ordinary fact in issue in a civil case. The judge in the instruction, phrased by himself, informed the jury that the burden was upon plaintiff to establish his claim of fraud to their satisfaction by a fair preponderance of the evidence, instead of making it plain that he should establish it to such satisfaction by clear and satisfactory evidence.

Instructions given at the request of appellant, so far as they touched the subject at all, were in harmony with the main instruction. The court said to the jury, at the request of counsel for appellant, in effect, that the claim of fraud could not prevail unless proved with a reasonable degree of certainty.

True, counsel for appellant did not except to the instructions given on the subject we have discussed, nor request any different instruction in respect to the matter, but on the contrary, as we have seen, requested and obtained somewhat similar instructions. So appellant is in no position to complain of errors in that respect, but, in the absence of a finding, in effect that the claim of fraud was established by clear and satisfactory evidence, and there is none here, especially without evidence of some convincing evidentiary circumstance stronger than it seems probable there could have been, which could not be spread upon the record, but which must have been before the jury,—it is considered that it is too probable injustice may have been done appellant, to allow the verdict to stand. So, it is the opinion of the court that, on the record as it stands, the evidence does not warrant the verdict, giving due weight, reasonably, to the manner of adversaries before the jury, which may have, to some extent, influenced them, nor does the verdict support the judgment.

In view of the foregoing, many questions discussed by counsel are immaterial. The case as it should be tried and submitted to a jury, if submitted at all, is a very simple one.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

And such fees not being recoverable in an action upon an injunction bond given in a United States court and sued upon there, they cannot be recovered in an action on such bond in a state court, although recoverable if the bond had been given in an action in the state court. *National Soc. So, where an injunction bond had been filed in a territorial court of the Indian territory before the admission of Oklahoma, it was held that the United States rule would be followed, and that the services of attorneys were not a proper element of damage under the old territorial statute, as construed by the Arkansas courts, and under the Federal rule, although there was an Oklahoma statute allowing them as part of the damages. Revell v. Smith, — Okla. —, 106 Pac. 863.

As is shown in the earlier note, the rule in Texas is similar to that of the Federal courts. Thus, in Carpenter v. First Nat. Bank, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 114 S. W. 904, the court said: "It is well settled that attorneys' fees in defending an injunction suit are not recoverable as damages upon the dissolution of the injunction, either by cross action in the injunction suit, or by suit subsequently brought on injunction bond." In the Carpenter Case judgment debtors brought an action to restrain the sale of land on execution, and procured an injunction, giving a bond conditioned, among other things, that they would abide the decision in the suit. The injunction being dissolved, they did not appeal, but brought a new action for the same purpose, in which they were defeated, and this decision was sustained on appeal. In an action on the bond given in the first injunction suit, it being sought to recover for the services of the judgment creditor's attorneys in defending the second injunction suit both in the lower court and on the appeal, it 33 L.R.A. In most jurisdictions, however, the reasonable attorneys' fees incurred in obtaining the dissolution of the injunction are recoverable in a suit upon the injunction bond. See Fidelity & D. Co. v. Walker, 158 Ala. 129, 48 So. 600; Princeton v. Gustavson, 241 Ill. 566, 89 N. E. 653; Augur v. Gulfport Land Improv. Co. 95 Miss. 292, 48 So. 722. See also cases cited infra.

Preliminary work.

The counsel fees recoverable are limited to those for dissolution of the injunction, and it is error to include preliminary matters. Dictum in Baldwin Star Coal Co. v. Quinn, 46 Colo. 590, 105 Pac. 1101, affirming 19 Colo. App. 497, 76 Pac. 552.

Where the bond is conditioned that the obligor should "pay all damages which may be adjudged against him by reason of said injunction or restraining order," it does not include services by attorneys, rendered before the bond was given. Chicago. A. & N. R. Co. v. Whitney, 143 Iowa, 506, 121 N. W. 1043.

Where a restraining order was issued which contained an order to show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue pendente lite, and on the return, defendant simply sought to prevent the issue of such injunction, and the services thereafter were upon the trial of the issue in the main case, which resulted merely incidentally in the dissolution of the injunction, it was held that, as there were no services by reason of the injunction, separate and distinct from the other issues in the case, nothing could be recovered as damages for attorneys' fees. *Collins v. Mayes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 15th day of December, 1909, the

But where a preliminary injunction was issued directing the defendant to show cause why it should not continue during the action, and the motion for an injunction pendente lite was denied, and the preliminary injunction dissolved, it was held that the services of counsel on the motion upon the return of the order to show cause were proper elements of damages, the court distinguishing the case where the original order was limited to expire on the hearing and determination of the motion to continue, as in that case no motion to dissolve the preliminary injunction was necessary. Reeves v. Sullivan, 117 App. Div. 814, 102 N. Y. Supp. 1003.

Restriction to services in dissolving injunction.

Recovery for attorney's services is limited to those in dissolving the injunction. Lanum v. Patterson, 143 Ill. App. 255. On a further appeal the damages for services had been so limited and the decree was affirmed. Lanum v. Patterson, 151 Ill. App. 143.

Conversely, where services of counsel have been rendered exclusively upon the trial of the case on the merits, counsel fees for dissolving the injunction are not recoverable. Lee Lumber Co. v. Hotard, 122 La. 850, 129 Am. St. Rep. 368, 48 So. 286.

Services only in dissolving the injunction are allowable, but in some cases it is impossible to separate such services with absolute exactness from the other services rendered; in which cases all that can be done is to try to separate the services as fairly as possible. Akin v. Rice, 137 Mo. App. 147, 117 S. W. 655.

In some of the courts where injunctive relief is the sole or chief object of the action, the reasonable amount of counsel fees in defending it are recoverable as damages; but where the injunction is merely ancillary, the recovery for counsel fees is limited to those for services in dissolving the injunction. See State ex rel. Tully v. Taylor, 67 W. Va. 585, 68 S. E. 379, where it was held that "when counsel fees and personal expenses are sought to be recovered

Vicksburg Waterworks Company applied for and obtained an injunction against the city of Vicksburg, enjoining the city from opening the fire hydrants located in the city and belonging to the waterworks company, and from taking therefrom water for the purpose of cleaning and flushing the new sanitary sewers then being installed in the city. At the time the injunction was issued the waterworks company executed an injunction bond in the sum of $1,000, with the Empire State Security Company as security thereon; the condition of same being: "In case the said injunction shall be dissolved, shall within thirty days thereafter well and truly pay and satisfy all such costs and damages as shall wrongfully result from suing out this injunction, and as damages on an injunction bond, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show either that injunction was the sole relief to which the suit pertained, or that the fees and expenses were paid out solely for the purpose of procuring a dissolution of the injunction, as distinguished from expenditures for the hearing of the principal issues involved in the case."

Thus, where a bill purely for injunctive relief was dismissed on complainant's own motion after defendant's answer, the defendant was held entitled on the bond to his counsel fees for defending against it. East Lake v. DeVore, — Ala. —, 53 So. 1018.

And where the plaintiff sued a corporation to restrain it from collecting the unpaid balance of his subscription to its capital stock, and incidentally to recover certain sums claimed for rent and salary, and an injunction pendente lite was granted, it was held that the defendant was forced to trial to get rid of the injunction, and that therefore the counsel fees for services generally in the action were recoverable as damages. Brooks v. Racich Asbestos Mfg. Co. 137 App. Div. 280, 121 N. Y. Supp. 850.

In Chicago, A. & N. Co. v. Whitney, 143 Iowa, 506, 121 N. W. 1043, the court said: "It is the rule of this court that, when an injunction is asked and granted in an action, auxiliary to other relief, attorneys' fees and expenses in defending the action are not recoverable. But where the injunction is the only relief sought, and dissolution is procured upon final hearing, necessary costs and expenses in procuring the dissolution are recoverable. The test laid down by this court is this: Strike the prayer and the allegations upon which it is asked from the petition, and unless there is a completed cause of action left, the injunction is the main case." And it was held that as the defendant in the injunction must have appeared on the plaintiff's appeal, there was no further burden on account of the injunction, or restraining order issued in aid of the appeal from the order dissolving the injunction.

Where, in an action for a divorce, an injunction was issued against the defendant's shall abide by and perform the decree of said chancery court, then this obligation shall be void; otherwise, the same shall remain in full force and virtue." In due time an answer was filed on the 31st day of December, 1909, a motion was made to dissolve the injunction, and accompanying the motion notice was filed that $3,500 damages would be claimed for the wrongful suing out of the injunction. On the 21st day of March, 1910, the motion to dissolve the injunction was heard, and the court decreed that the injunction stand dissolved, and made this further order, viz.: "It is further ordered that the claim for damages on account of the wrongful suing out of the said injunction, interposed by the defendants hereto, be and it is hereby passed for hearing at a future time." On the 25th day of March the matter of the allowance of damage seems to have been taken up again by the court, and on that day the waterworks company, by way of answer to the application for the allowance of damage for the wrongful suing out of the injunction, stated in a written pleading, filed and sworn to by counsel for the waterworks company, substantially that the only authority of the court to allow damage is to be found in § 624 of the Code of 1906, and that under that section of the Code the damage must be allowed, if at all, on the motion to dissolve, and not afterwards; that, if damage is not awarded at the time the injunction is dissolved, it cannot afterwards be done, except at the final hearing disposing of certain property, it was held that the injunction being merely ancillary to the divorce, all that could be recovered for attorneys' services in an action on the bond was for services rendered in dissolving the injunction. Darling v. McBride, 86 Neb. 481, 125 N. W. 1088 (following Trester v. Pike, 60 Neb. 510, 83 N. W. 676).

Rule in Kentucky.

As shown in the earlier note, in Kentucky, if the injunction is merely ancillary, counsel fees in dissolving it are recoverable; but where it is the sole object of the action, they are not recoverable.

Thus, in an action brought by a remainderman against the life tenant and his lessee, to recover the land, on the ground that the life estate was forfeited by waste, and also to recover treble damages for the waste, it was held that an injunction against further waste was merely auxiliary, and therefore that, on its dissolution, attorneys' fees for services in securing such dissolution were recoverable in an action on the injunction bond. Green v. Quisenberry, 133 Ky. 561, 118 S. W. 361.

Where the action is to recover possession of land and to quiet title and to recover cut timber, in which an injunction is issued restraining the removal of such timber, the injunction is auxiliary, and counsel fees in dissolving it are recoverable as damages in an action on the bond. Bartram v. Ohio & B. S. R. Co. 141 Ky. 100, 132 S. W. 188.

In Citizens' Trust & G. Co. v. Ohio Valley Tie Co. 138 Ky. 421, 128 S. W. 317, the court, in laying down rules for a new trial, said: "The allowance must be confined to the services rendered in defending the injunction; and only the fair value, not exceeding the amount paid, is to be allowed. If the injunction was the relief sought in the former action, and in fact gave the relief if sustained, an attorney's fee cannot be recovered in an action on the injunction bond. Tyler v. Hamilton, 108 Ky. 120, 55 S. W. 920. Whether the attorneys' fee may be recovered is a question of law for the court, and is to be determined ordinarily from the record of the former suit. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

What is a reasonable attorneys' fee is a question for the jury."

Services by regular officials and gratuitous.

In VICKSBURG WATERWORKS CO. v. VICKSBURG it will be observed that the court held that the fact that a municipal corporation had a regular salaried counsel did not prevent it from recovering the amount of counsel fees of special counsel for services in dissolving the injunction.

So, where the bond was given in an action to enjoin the collection of a tax, the court said: "It is also insisted that some of these defendants were county officials, and, as it was the duty of the state's attorney to appear for them, it was not lawful to allow solicitors' fees to counsel here in question. While it is true the statute makes it the duty of the state's attorney to appear for county officials, there is no law precluding the employment of other counsel." Howard v. Burke, 248 Ill. 224, 93 N. E. 775.

In a suit against the county clerk and county treasurer to enjoin them from making a payment ordered by the board of supervisors, the defendants hired two solicitors, and their fees were allowed as damages on dissolving the injunction, they not having been paid. To an objection that the state's attorney should have defended, the court, while not deciding that question, stated that there was no proof that he could have done so, as he might have been ill, or interested in sustaining the injunction. Fordham v. Thompson, 144 Ill. App. 342.

Where an injunction against the police jury and the school board was dissolved, the court allowed the defendants an attorneys' fee as damages, and said: "True, the police jury and the school board have their counsel. For that reason, we are not inclined to hold that the defendants ought to be treated differently than the client in other cases who has regular retained counsel. In either case, it is evident that services have been rendered for which defendants in injunction are entitled to recover, of the cause. Other reasons were given in the answer as to why the court should not take up the question of damage at that time, even though the reasons already assigned were not sufficient; but the latter reasons are predicated on certain facts stated and not necessary to be here repeated.

if not for the attorneys, for themselves. It is sufficient if the services have been rendered for which there should be compensation. Luchini v. Police Jury, 126 La. 972, 53 So. 68, where, however, it is not entirely clear whether the regular counsel appeared or not.

Where the bond was conditioned to pay the defendants all damages and costs which any person might sustain by the suing out of the injunction, in an action by all the obligees under the bond, for the use of R. (one of them), it was held that the court properly refused to instruct the jury that if the same counsel acted for both R. and M. of the obligees in the same service, and acted gratuitously for the latter, that only the amount of one half of a reasonable fee could be recovered. Babcock v. Reeves, 149 Ala. 665, 43 So. 21.

Final decree as prerequisite.

It is held in VICKSBURG WATERWORKS Co. v. VICKSBURG that an action will not lie upon the bond until a final decree in the suit in which it was given.

So, in Jewel Tea Co. v. Stewart, 142 Iowa, 353, 120 N. W. 962, the court said: "No action can be maintained upon the injunction bond for attorney fees until the final disposition of the main case. If, upon a final hearing on the merits, the trial court should find that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction at the time it brought its action, such finding would be a defense to an action on the injunction bond for attorney fees, notwithstanding the dissolution of the temporary injunction. Bank of Monroe v. Gifford, 65 Iowa, 648, 22 N. W. 913."

But where the damages are allowed in the action in which the bond is filed, it has been held that the court may enter a decree for damages for the fees of solicitors and counsel prior to the final hearing on the merits. Chicago Wire Chair Co. v. Kennedy & W. Co. 141 Ill. App. 196. The same was held in Sanganois Club v. Lane, 145 Ill. App. 475, the court saying the fees were for services solely on the motion to dissolve.

Miscellaneous.

The right to recover as part of the damages counsel fees for services upon a reference to ascertain damages is well settled in New York. Brooks v. Racich Asbestos Mfg. Co. 137 App. Div. 280, 121 N. Y. Supp. 850.

Where "instead of hearing evidence as to the amount of the damages, a stipulation was filed by which it was agreed that the evidence, if heard, would show that the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

On the same day—that is, on March 25th—by consent of the parties it was ordered that the application for the fixation of damage by the court should be continued until April 15, 1910. In April there seems to have been a decree made by the chancellor, though the decree is unsigned, dismissing damages for the defendants, by reason of solicitors' fees, etc., would be in the sum of $250," it was held that this was equivalent to evidence on the question of damages. Howard v. Burke, supra.

Where the statute requires the court on dissolving an injunction against a money judgment, to aggregate principal, interest, and costs, and on the total sum to give damages at 10 per cent per annum from the time the injunction took effect until its dissolution, "in lieu of interest," such allowance of damages does not prevent further damages being allowed for counsel fees in dissolving the injunction. State ex rel. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Graham, — W. Va. —, 69 S. E. 301, where it was also held that services on the appeal are allowed for as well as those in the lower court.

In State ex rel. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Graham, supra, it was held that the fact that the amount of a judgment collected by execution from the judgment debtor, exceeds the penalty of a bond given under an injunction against the judgment will not preclude the recovery of counsel fees for services in procuring a dissolution of the injunction in an action on such bond.

In Louisiana the judge is directed by the statute, on the dissolution of an injunction against the execution of a judgment for money, to condemn the plaintiff and his surety to pay to the defendant "not more than 20 per cent" as damages, unless damages to a greater amount be proved. Code Prac. art. 304. Where damages are claimed for attorney fees, the judge may allow the same without proof, to an amount not exceeding 20 per cent upon the judgment enjoined. Rivet v. George M. Murrell Planting & Mfg. Co. 121 La. 201, 126 Am. St. Rep. 320, 46 So. 210.

In Schwann v. Sanders, 121 La. 461, 46 So. 573, the court, in holding that there was error in allowing $250 attorneys' fees by way of damages, in addition to the 20 per cent statutory damages, said: "Damages of any kind over and above the 20 per cent are allowed only where 'damages to a greater amount are proved.' There was proof of the attorneys' fees, but there was no proof of the defendant in injunction having suffered damages in the amount of these attorneys' fees over and above the amount of the 20 per cent statutory damages."

It was held in Howcott v. Smart, 125 La. 50, 51 So. 64, that the statutory attorney fees and penalties provided by § 56, act, No. 170, p. 373, of 1898, on the dissolution of an injunction restraining the collection of taxes, are recoverable on parish as well as state taxes. B. B. B.

the application for damages, "without prejudice to the rights of said defendants to sue for such damage as they have sustained because of the wrongful suing out of the said injunction, at law upon the injunction bond."

It appears from the proceedings set out above that, although the injunction had been dissolved, the bill had not been dismissed, nor had the court undertaken to allow damage on the bond at the time the decree dissolving the injunction was made, as was done in the case of Derdeyn v. Donovan, 81 Miss. 696, 33 So. 652. In this condition of the chancery suit, with the bill still pending and not finally dismissed, and on the 26th day of March, 1910, the city of Vicksburg, through its proper officers, instituted a suit in the circuit court of Warren county on the bond executed by the waterworks company, with the Empire State Security Company as security thereon, seeking to recover the sum of $3,500 as damage for the wrongful suing out of the injunction. The declaration substantially alleges that on a certain day the Vicksburg Waterworks Company wrongfully procured an injunction restraining the city of Vicksburg from using water from the hydrants of the waterworks company for the purpose of testing a certain sewerage system then being installed; that the injunction so wrongfully issued was dissolved by the chancery court on the 21st day of March, 1910; that at the time the injunction was procured the waterworks company gave a bond payable to the city of Vicksburg, conditioned for the payment of all damages occurring by the wrongful suing out of the injunction. The declaration avers the dissolution of the injunction by the chancery court and the accrual of the right thereby to sue on the bond. The bond is made an exhibit to the bill. The declaration nowhere alleges a final disposition of the injunction suit, or dismissal of the bill, nor is any such disposition shown in any of the exhibits or pleadings in the case. When the declaration was filed, appellants filed a demurrer, setting up substantially that the declaration did not allege that the decree dissolving the injunction was a final decree, or that the injunction suit had been finally disposed of. The demurrer was overruled by the court, and at a subsequent date during the same term of court the appellants filed several pleas to the declaration. We shall not set out all the pleas, but give the substance of all. The first plea denied the dissolution of the injunction; the second plea denied that the decree of dissolution was a final decree, and alleged that the injunction suit was still pending in the chancery court; the third and fourth pleas put in issue the question of the alleged damage; the fifth plea denies the right of the city to claim any counsel fees as damages, because of the fact that the city had regular retained salaried counsel. Proof was taken on the issue thus raised, and the cause tried, resulting in a verdict in favor of the city of Vicksburg for the sum of $1,000, and from this judgment an appeal is prosecuted.

The appellants asked for and were refused a request for a peremptory instruction. The errors assigned in this court are, first, that the court erred in overruling the demurrer; second, that the court erred in holding that the suit on the injunction bond could be maintained before final decree dissolving the injunction; and, third, that the court erred in refusing a peremptory instruction for defendant. There are other errors assigned, but the whole of this case is comprehended under the above assignments of error.

The first contention of counsel for appellants that we will notice is the contention that, because the city had regularly employed counsel on a salary, it could not employ any additional counsel to assist in this cause, so as to make the bond liable for such counsel fees. In support of this contention the case of Nixon v. Biloxi, 76 Miss. 810, 25 So. 664, is cited, as also other authorities which we shall advert to later. A city has the same power to protect its civil rights that an individual has. A city may make a valid contract to employ associate counsel to assist its regularly retained counsel, in any case where, in the wisdom of its authorities, it deems it necessary. Individuals do this, and we can see no reason why a city may not do the same thing. In cases of sufficient gravity different firms of lawyers are employed in the same case and to represent the same cause; in cases of serious illness, consulting physicians are called to the same patient. Each is entitled to his pay, and in every such case the necessity of so doing must be left to the discretion of the party or authority calling in the help. Of course, if bad faith is shown, no liability would attach; but the city is not charged with bad faith, nor does the proof in the case even hint at that. The case of Nixon v. Biloxi, supra, and all other authorities cited on this point by appellants, have no application under the facts of this case. The authorities cited merely hold that where there is a dissolution of the injunction, and the services rendered are by a salaried officer, and no additional fees are actually paid, but the service is rendered in the official capacity of the person rendering same and as a part of his duty, there can be no recovery on the injunction bond for counsel fees for such service. But the facts of this case do not bring it within the rule declared by the cases cited. See cases cited in the note on page 75 of 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) in the case of Littleton v. Burgess. In the case of Warren County v. Booth, 81 Miss. 267, 32 So. 1000, this court held that boards of supervisors may employ other counsel in cases in which the county is interested, even though the board have regular counsel employed at an annual salary.

We can perceive no good reason why it should be held that either a county or a municipality must in all cases rely for its prosecution or defense on its retained counsel, and not be allowed to employ associate counsel when, in their judgment, the necessity arises. If they can employ such additional counsel in any case, they may do so in an injunction suit as well as in any other, and the injunction bond can be made to respond in damages to any reasonable amount necessary to compensate the additional counsel so employed. An inspection of this record convinces us that the city of Vicksburg had employed associate counsel under a valid contract, and that under this contract of employment, as shown in the record, if this injunction suit is finally dismissed, the bond given in that suit is liable for a reasonable attorneys' fee as compensation to the associate counsel. The city attorney seems not to have rendered any service in this suit, and is certainly not claiming any fees on account of any service rendered by him. The city attorney states that at the time this suit arose he was so busy that it was necessary for associate counsel to be employed, and, as stated by counsel for appellee, "there is not a suggestion in the record that additional counsel was employed merely for the purpose of aggravating the damage."

In setting out the appellants' assignments of error in a former part of this opinion, it will be noted that one of the arguments made here is that the court below erred in overruling the demurrer to the declaration. Appellee insists that this argument cannot be insisted upon in this court, because it is claimed that any right to object to the judgment of the court was waived by appellants when they pleaded to the declaration after the demurrer was overruled. Appellee says: "When a demurrer to a declaration is overruled, two courses are open to the defendant. He can either stand on his demurrer, and let judgment be entered in favor of the plaintiff, and rely upon reversing the judgment on appeal, or he can plead to the merits, in 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) which case he can usually present the same questions by plea which were decided adversely to him on demurrer. Should he pursue this course, he cannot assign as error in the appellate court the action of the trial court in overruling his demurrer. By pleading over he is held to have waived his demurrer, and can only complain of errors committed in the determination of the issues presented by his pleas." Again, counsel for appellee state that "it is contended by appellants that the present action, having been brought, as is claimed, before the rendition of a final decree in the chancery cause, was premature."

We have quoted from brief of counsel for appellee for the purpose of emphasizing the contention made in the case. Before proceeding to discuss the questions involved on the authorities which we shall call attention to a little later, we will say that our view of the contention made by counsel for appellants is not that the suit instituted on the bond was merely prematurely brought, but that at the time of its institution no cause of action existed, because no final decree of dismissal had been made. It is quite true that in appellants' brief the question is asked: "Was the plaintiff's suit premature?" But further on in the brief counsel for appellants state: "We contend that no right of action on the injunction bond had accrued." But it can make no difference what appellants' counsel stated in the brief as to whether or not he challenged the declaration because premature, or because it failed, to state a cause of action. The court, in determining this question, will look to the pleading itself for an interpretation of its legal effect.

It appears from the record that the injunction suit was tried on a mere motion to dissolve the injunction. The cause was not set down for final hearing, and the decree of the court extended only to a dissolution of the injunction, and did not attempt to make any final disposition of the cause. Counsel for appellee makes no contention that there was any final judgment dismissing the bill. Section 621 of the Code of 1906 provides that "when, on motion, an injunction shall be wholly dissolved, the bill of complaint shall be dismissed of course with costs, unless sufficient cause be shown against its dismissal at the next succeeding term of the court." The statute has been practically the same since the Code of 1857. See Code of 1857, art. 69, p. 551. In the case of Pickle v. Holland, 24 Miss. 566, this court held that an order dissolving an injunction on motion for that purpose did not of itself dismiss the bill.

It might be argued, with some force, that since the only relief sought by the bill of complaint was an injunction, and since the court had denied that relief and dissolved the injunction, the court had the power to dismiss the bill, since the record shows that full proof was made, and no suggestion was made that further testimony was desired to be taken, or any improvement or addition desired to be made in the case by way of amendment. But the court did not dismiss the bill, as was done in the case of Bass v. Nelms, 56 Miss. 502, and the case of Derdeyn v. Donovan, 81 Miss. 696, 33 So. 652. In both of the cases just cited the court dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill, but not so here.

In the case of Penny v. Holberg, 53 Miss. 567, this court held: "It is undoubtedly true, as insisted by counsel for the appellee, that a suit may be maintained, upon a partial dissolution of an injunction, for the recovery of such damages as were sustained by reason of its being sued out, to the extent that the same was wrongful, but that this cannot be done until there has been a final disposition of the suit in which the bond was given. Nor will it make any difference that the order of dissolution has been appealed from and affirmed, if the case has by the appellate court been remanded for further proceedings. The reason of this is obvious. So long as the suit remains in court undetermined, it is always possible, however improbable, that cause may be shown to reinstate and render perpetual the injunction in whole; and the lower court would not be deprived of the power to do this in a proper case, by the affirmance here of the partial dissolution. It follows, therefore, that, until there has been a final determination of the suit in which the injunction bond was executed, no action at law can be maintained upon it. High, Inj. § 981; Gray v. Veirs, 33 Md. 159; Hanserd v. Gray, 46 Miss. 75."

In the case of Goodbar v. Dunn, 61 Miss. 624, it was argued that the rule announced in Penny v. Holberg, 53 Miss. 567, was abrogated by the adoption of § 1919 of the Code of 1880, which section in the Code of 1880 is practically the same as § 624 of the Code of 1906; but the court said: "Section 1919 of the Code of 1880 does not change the rule announced in Penny v. Holberg, supra, that an action cannot be maintained on an injunction bond until the final determination of the case. The only purpose and effect of the last clause of the section was to exclude the conclusion that the remedy provided by the section was a denial of the right before recognized to sue on the bond."

The rule announced in Penny v. Holberg, supra, is again redeclared in Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Adams, 78 Miss. 977, 30 So. 44, and in addition to redeclaring this rule the court says: "As we have seen, the right of the plaintiff to sue in this case is dependent upon the final determination of the suit in which the bond is given, . . . and it follows that at the time this suit was instituted no cause of action existed upon the bonds,"—it appearing in the above case that no final judgment or dismissal had been rendered. We thus see that we have a declaration of this court that until final judgment there is no cause of action; and this is as it should be, since, until final dismissal, the bill is subject to amendment, and a case warranting the injunction may be stated.

It is conceded by appellee that, if the declaration is so defective as that it fails to state a cause of action, a demurrer to the declaration is not waived, where there is a judgment overruling same, followed by pleading to the merits, and this is but a concession of what all the authorities hold. Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242, 28 L. ed. 415, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 420; 31 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 746. In the case of Southern R. Co. v. Grace, 95 Miss. 611, 49 So. 835, this court, speaking through Justice Smith, said: "Where a declaration fails to state a cause of action, as in the case at bar, the defect may be reached by a general demurrer, the ground of which is never waived. It can be raised at any time and in any place." We do not think it necessary to further protract the discussion in this case. The requirement that an injunction bond shall not be placed in suit until a final judgment dismissing the bill is based upon just and sound principles of law. The givers of the bond only agree that it shall become liable for damages in the event the person suing out the injunction shall wrongfully do so. Until there has been a final determination of the suit in which the bond is given, it cannot be definitely ascertained as to whether or not there is, or will be, any liability on the bond. Until liability has accrued on the bond, it is merely contingent on the part of the makers, and may never be a real liability. The mere giving of the bond creates no liability, and until there is a liability there is no cause of action, and any declaration failing to state sufficient facts to show liability fails to state a cause of action. The declaration must show the giving of the bond and the final determination of the injunction suit. See 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1045, note 35.

Reversed and remanded.

BASSICK GOLD MINE COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
GEORGE B. BEARDSLEY.

Interest — monthly settlements — entire account.

1. Under a contract to pay on the 15th of each month for services and supplies furnished during the previous month, interest runs upon each month's items from the time payments for them become payable, and not merely from the time the last item is entered in the account, although the entire transaction becomes the subject of one book account.

Accord and satisfaction — accepting check — failure to include interest.

2. One who accepts in payment of overdue accounts upon which interest is due, which is not provided in the contract, checks containing a statement of the account, without interest, and bearing the announcement "in full payment of above account," waives his right subsequently to claim the interest, although he understands that the question of right to interest was left open, and as to the portion of the interest claimed so notified the one making the payment.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Custer County in plaintiff's favor in an action on a book account for services and materials furnished to defendant by plaintiff and for interest upon the same. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cranston, Pitkin, & Moore, for appellant:

In the absence of a contract to pay interest, interest is recoverable only in the cases specifically enumerated in the statute.

Hill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The right to collect interest under certain conditions is the question involved. The action is upon a book account provided for by a written contract, by which it was agreed that the appellee should furnish certain supplies and perform certain services to and for the appellant at certain fixed prices and under certain conditions. In consideration therefor the appellant agreed and bound itself to pay, on or before the 15th day of each and every calendar month, the amount due and owing to the appellee for such supplies furnished and services rendered during the preceding month. Under this contract a large amount of coal was furnished and freight hauled during a period of about four years. Statements were regularly rendered upon the first of each month, and, with the exceptions of the last three or four, they were paid, but at periods considerably after the 15th of the month. This action was brought to recover the amount left unpaid in the aggregate of $1,442.53, with interest, and also to recover interest upon the amounts included in all statements theretofore rendered from the 15th of each month, when they were due, until the date of payment. Judgment was for the amount claimed.

The appellant's first contention is that the transaction constitutes but one book account; that the suit was brought upon it as such; hence no interest could be charged until the date of the last item. We cannot accept this conclusion. The written contract provides that the bills for each month shall be paid upon the 15th of the following month; in default thereof under our statutes the appellee was entitled to interest on the amount then due. Florence Oil & Ref. Co. v. McRae, 40 Colo. 303, 90 Pac. 507.

The second assignment pertains to the interest allowed upon the monthly payments from the dates they were due until paid. These payments had all been made long prior to the bringing of this action, some of them nearly four years prior thereto. As we understand, the law governing such cases, and which the appellant seeks to invoke, is, that where interest is due because the debtor has expressly agreed to pay it, the interest is considered as an integral part of the debt, and the right to recover it may remain, even after the principal has been paid. But where interest is claimed as damages by virtue of the nonpayment of a debt when due, and for that reason is allowed by law, it is then considered not an integral part of the debt, but merely as an incident to the debt, and in such cases, when the principal is paid and accepted without interest, the right to interest is extinguished. Stewart v. Barnes, 153 U. S. 456, 38 L. ed. 781, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 849; Southern R. Co. v. Dunlop Mills, 22 C. C. A. 302, 42 U. S. App. 169, 76 Fed. 505; Chandler v. People's Sav. Bank, 61 Cal. 401; Canfield v. Eleventh School Dist. 19 Conn. 529; Davis v. Harrington, 160 Mass. 278, 35 N. E. 771; American Bible Soc. v. Wells, 68 Me. 572, 28 Am. Rep. 82; Arnold v. Sedalia Nat. Bank, 100 Mo. App. 474, 74 S. W. 1038; King v. Phillips, 95 N. C. 245, 59 Am. Rep. 238. Some cases hold that a protest for the nonpayment of the interest does not change this rule. Cutter v. New York, 92 N. Y. 166; Graves v. Saline County, 43 C. C. A. 414, 104 Fed. 61, 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1573; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 1030-1033.

Counsel for the appellee contend that this interest can be recovered, provided there was, either before or after the supplies were furnished, an express agreement to pay it. We agree with this but do not think the record shows the existence of such an agreement. The only testimony concerning interest was given by the appellee, who admits that there was nothing said upon the subject at the time of the execution of the contract, and that the question was not mentioned for over two years thereafter, at which time the greater portion of the interest claimed had accrued, if at all. He also stated that he never made a claim for interest on the bills rendered, and that he never did present a bill to the company which contained an item of interest; that no items of interest were charged against the defendant upon his books of account. He stated the reason he did not carry this item of interest on the next bill rendered, etc., was, "Well, I had not been in the habit of doing that, and it was a matter of whether—I expected to collect the interest all in a bunch when I got through with them—if I could collect the interest." Another reason he gave for his delay in the presentations of bills for interest was that he was not so anxious to have the interest paid as to have the other items paid, as the others were larger.

The evidence shows that these statements were paid by voucher checks of the company, upon which was a copy of the original statement as rendered by the appellee. At the bottom of this voucher was a receipt which the appellee signed. They read: "Received [with date inserted] from the Bassick Gold Mine Co. [amount inserted] dollars, in full payment of above account." 'Tis true, the appellee testified that the matter of interest was left open, and he expected to collect it all at once, if he could collect it at all. He also stated that he spoke to the superintendent several times concerning the question of interest, and when this action was brought to recover the balance of the principal due upon this book account, he included the interest upon each of the items covered in the statements theretofore rendered, which items had been paid. He further said that during this time the question of their liability for interest was kept open between him and the defendant company. He says: "I asserted the right to get this interest two or three times to Mr. Radel. I made that claim a couple of years ago, probably earlier in this course of dealings. I cannot say that he understood that I was claiming this right to collect interest on these past due statements. I say I do not know whether he agreed to it or not. I told him that the interest up to such a date was so much money; he could not have misunderstood that the question of interest and my right to recover it was left open." Referring to his receipts, he said: "When I signed these voucher checks the question of this unpaid interest on these balances was an open matter between myself and the defendant. I think it was so to their knowledge, so far as I understood it." We do not think his testimony sufficient to overcome the rule laid down in the foregoing authorities, and his receipts, wherein he has said that it was "in full payment of above account."

A somewhat similar state of facts are those in the case of Ryan Drug Co. v. Hvambzahl, 92 Wis. 62, 65 N. W. 873, where goods were sold on sixty days' time, and statements rendered from time to time, in which no interest was included. These statements were kept by the vendee, and drafts were drawn upon him at intervals and paid. No other demand or payment was ever made. Later a certain amount was due, for which an action was brought. A verdict was directed to include interest on the monthly balances throughout the whole period of account. This ruling was held erroneous and the rule above quoted approved, and it was held that no interest should have been allowed, except upon the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) items of account included in the action, which were then unpaid.

It is true, the appellee claims that there were no settlements of this interest account, and the evidence shows that some two years after the account was started, and after a large portion of it had been made and paid, he made lead pencil memorandums concerning interest upon the margin of his books. We cannot agree that this or his statements disprove a settlement of these monthly accounts at the time of their payment. When one party presents to another a bill for a book account of a certain amount, and the other thereafter returns the bill with his check in payment, which is accepted, and the bill returned with the indorsement thereon that he receives the amount as payment in full of above account, we think this establishes a complete settlement of the account (barring fraud and mistakes). The fact that the appellee admits he never mentioned the question of interest to the officer of the appellant until two years after these accounts had been running and at least over half of them had been paid, which he now seeks to collect interest upon, to our minds, is conclusive that so far as the greater portion of this interest is concerned it was an afterthought, and was not intended to be charged or collected at the time the bills were paid.

In the case of Chandler v. People's Sav. Bank, 61 Cal., at page 403, that court said: "When parties themselves settle their accounts without charging each other with interest, it is not in accordance with law or equity to go behind such settlements for the purpose of allowing interest in favor of one party against the other. Such settlements are considered conclusive, unless impeachable for mistake or fraud. . . . Transactions anterior to them, and included in them, are not interest-bearing."

Referring to the cases above cited, which hold that even where the amount is accepted under protest, it is not sufficient to reserve the question; also to the following: Chase v. Manhardt, 1 Bland, Ch. 333; Burr v. Burch, 5 Cranch, C. C. 506, Fed. Cas. No. 2,187; Snowden v. Thomas, 4 Harr. & J. 335; National Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 437, 24 L. ed. 176,—which hold that where it is clearly established that the question is expressly reserved for future disposition, it can be thereafter litigated or adjusted,—it is unnecessary here for this court to approve or disapprove either ruling, and we express no opinion pertaining thereto, as it is only necessary to hold that in this action interest cannot be collected upon these paid items, unless there was an express contract to that effect; and from our examination of the record we find no agreement of this kind, nor one which comes within the rule of the authorities last referred to,—that the question was expressly reserved for future disposition. The evidence is insufficient to support the contention that there was an agreement upon the question at all.

It follows that the findings and judgment of the court as to the items of the unpaid principal in the sum of $1,442.53 and the interest thereon are right; the remainder of the findings and judgment, which was for interest upon that portion of the account which had been paid, is erroneous. The judgment should be modified. The cause will be remanded, with directions to modify the judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed, and, as so modified, it will stand affirmed. The appellant is entitled to recover its costs for this appeal.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN, & SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

RUSH WOODS.

(— Ark. —, 131 S. W. 869.)

Railroads — unusual speed — negligence — matter of law.

1. The court cannot declare that a railroad company is negligent as matter of law in running a train into a station at an unusual speed, which results in striking an animal and throwing it against a person waiting to take a train, to his injury, where there is no limitation, by statute or ordinance, on the speed which trains may maintain.

Note. — Degree of care toward passenger at station.

If the drawing of meridians upon the "surface" of negligence was designed to facilitate the navigation of its turbulent seas, it was, to a large extent, unsuccessful. It is the writer's notion that the mere contention that the "care" which one must exercise in a certain relation to another can be divided into degrees so as to afford fixed criteria for the determination of the ultimate question of negligence in every case carries its own refutation; and that if there are degrees, standards, or kinds of care, they are as innumerable as the various and distinctive situations which call for the exercise of care. For, let it be supposed that "care" may, with propriety, be divided into two degrees which may be called "extraordinary" and "ordinary;" and that all instances of required duty may, with Appeal — conflicting instructions — error.

2. The giving of an erroneous prejudicial instruction is not cured by a conflicting one which announces the correct rule, if the former is allowed to stand.

Trial — abstract instruction — prejudice.

3. In an action to hold a railroad company liable for striking an animal with its train and throwing it against a person waiting at its station to take the train, to his injury, an instruction that railroad companies are required to provide all things necessary to the security of passengers reasonably consistent with their business and appropriate to the means of conveyance employed is abstract and prejudicial.

Carrier — passenger on platform — care required.

4. A railroad company is not bound to use the utmost care and foresight to prevent injuring a person standing on its platform waiting to take a train, by striking an animal on the track with an engine and throwing it against him.

(October 31, 1910.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bradley County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. E. Hemingway, E. B. Kinsworthy, E. A. Bolton, and James H. Stevenson, for appellant:

A railway company is not held to the same high degree of care, in providing safe stations and places for passengers not actually on its trains, as in the case of passengers who are actually in transit on its trains; but its duty is discharged by the exercise of ordinary care.

equal propriety, be placed within the category of the one or the other. The result is merely that you have two thistles where one grew before. That is to say, the consideration which moved the courts in the first instance to resolve "care" into degrees,—namely, the principle that the acts which constitute an exercise of due care in one situation may be quite inadequate in another,—thrives with no less vigor under each division, for under each there must necessarily be numerous and varying situations calling for the exercise of care. Whether "extraordinary care" has been exercised must depend upon circumstances, and the same is true of "ordinary care."

Care is not the expenditure of a fixed measure of mental effort, nor the enlistment of a certain number of foot pounds of physical energy, in behalf of the safety of others. It is doing what a reasonably prudent man would do in like circumstances. Care falls between recklessness and impeccability, and it would seem that "a reasonably prudent man" is the man of average prudence. True it is that some men are much more prudent than the vast majority, and for this very reason it would seem manifestly unfair, in laying down rules against the carelessness of mankind in general, to impose obligations that are higher than the measure of average prudence. But it is said that in the operation of trains upon which passengers are being transported, the carrier shall exercise "extraordinary care." Of course, the operation of a train is attended by uncommon dangers,—is an extraordinary condition, let it be said. Does, then, the obligation to exercise "extraordinary care" require the doing of what a man of "extraordinary prudence" would do under "extraordinary conditions"? Obviously, that is imposing too high a standard. That it requires the doing of what a man of "extraordinary prudence" would do under "ordinary conditions" should scarcely be suggested in a serious discussion. What, then, can it require but the exercise of that care and vigilance which a man of reasonable, ordinary, or average prudence would exercise in such extraordinary circumstances? By the same token, what is "ordinary care," but doing what the same person would do under "ordinary conditions"?

It is not negligence, per se, for a railway company to run a train, even through a city, at a high rate of speed.

Elliott, Railroads, § 1160; Ford v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 66 Ark. 366, 50 S. W. 864; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Kimberlain, 76 Ark. 100, 88 S. W. 599.

It is only in cases where it is apparent,

In this connection, the court said in Bacon v. Casco Bay S. B. Co. 90 Me. 46, 37 Atl. 328: "The force of the distinction between common or ordinary care and extraordinary care, the highest degree of care, a distinction found in the civil law and adopted by English and American courts principally as applicable to the law of bailments, has been greatly diminished in modern times for the reason that extraordinary diligence is no more than an ordinary requirement in extreme situations and conditions. The tendency with many courts to call all cases of the kind simply cases of negligence, ignoring the ancient classification. In all cases the amount of care bestowed must be equal to the emergency, however the standard be denominated." 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) ed. We do not mean to say that the distinction between ordinary and gross negligence, or between ordinary and extraordinary care, does not still exist, but, in reply to the suggestion made by the plaintiff's counsel that the same extreme degree of care should be exercised by the defendants when wharfingers, or tenants of a wharf used in conjunction with their boats, as is imposed on them while common carriers of passengers, we do mean to say that we perceive no reason for imposing so extreme an obligation upon the defendants when they have completed their trip and ceased to be longer performing the duties of common carriers; and the authorities do not support any such application of the rule of extraordinary care as is contended for. In fact, the tendency of decision is, as before intimated, more likely to be the other way, if there be any solid difference between negligence of one degree and negligence of another degree, or between reasonable care and extraordinary care." The precise position of the Maine court, that "ordinary care" measured by the requirements of special circumstances is the criterion in each case, is, perhaps, more clearly indicated in Maxfield v. Maine C. R. Co. 100 Me. 79, 60 Atl. 710, declaring that a very high degree of vigilance, foresight, and skill is required to fill the measure of ordinary care in the transportation of passengers, whereas, the requirement of ordinary care for the safety of passengers on station platforms is satisfied by the exercise of a lesser degree of skill and foresight, the court citing with approval the statement in 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 532, that with respect to station appointments the carrier is bound to exercise ordinary care in view of the danger to be apprehended.

It is not extravagant to say that the first impression left by a survey of the cases is that they disclose an almost hopeless condition of loose judicial utterances, which admit of no reconciliation or rationalization. The value of the cases lies in the clearness with which they show the necessity for the adoption of some rule capable of being understood and applied. Their net or should in the exercise of reasonable prudence have been apparent, to those in charge of a train, that an animal beside or on the track will be struck or injured if the train is not stopped, that there can be said to be any duty to stop it.

result, if they are held at arm's length and regarded as a whole, seems to be about the same as would have followed from an application of the rule that carriers of passengers must, at all times, exercise the care which a reasonably or ordinarily prudent man would exercise in like circumstances. By way of suggesting an additional reason why such is the proper rule, the opinion is hazarded that it comes very near defining the considerations which govern juries in reaching their verdicts, irrespective of what the courts may charge.

It will be understood that this note purports to deal only with the abstract question of the degree of care owed to a passenger at a station. More concrete questions as to the duty and liability of a carrier with respect to the safety of passengers in certain situations, or under enumerated conditions, have already been annotated in this work, and references to them may readily be found in the Indexes to L.R.A. Notes.

The cases involving the duty of the carrier in taking on, or setting down, passengers, seem so clearly to involve a condition that differs materially from what is ordinarily regarded as the situation of the passenger at the station, that they have been excluded from this note. Indeed, there are cases which declare that the high duty with which a carrier is charged in the actual transportation of passengers devolves upon it with respect to the safety of passengers getting on and off its cars. For a single example of such cases, reference may be had to Rearden v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 215 Mo. 106, 114 S. W. 961, where it is pointed out that the duty of exercising extraordinary care is imposed by law on carriers of passengers, and begins when the contract of carriage takes effect, and continues until the contract ends with deposit at destination; and that part of this duty to safeguard passengers while leaving a car or other vehicle consists in taking care to put them off at a reasonably safe place. It was declared, however, that this rule was to be distinguished from the one holding a carrier only to ordinary diligence in respect of platforms and approaches.

There are many cases which declare it to be the duty of a carrier to guard passengers against injury at its stations, and do so in language which, per se, imports an absolute duty. However, in such cases, the statements are not made in connection with the question of degree of care, and in reality, they mean little, if anything, more than would have meant a declaration of the court that to passengers at its stations the carrier owes a certain duty, the measure of which need not be discussed at that time. Since, therefore, such cases do not really touch the question here considered, only a very few of them are herein cited, and it is only by way of illustration that attention is directed to the following cases declaring that railroad companies are bound to keep in a safe condition all portions of their platforms and approaches thereto, and all portions of their station grounds reasonably near to the platform, where passengers or those who have purchased tickets with a view to take passage on the cars, or to debark therefrom, would naturally or ordinarily be likely to go (Texas & St. L. R. Co. v. Orr, 46 Ark. 182; Pennsylvania Co. v. Marion, 123 Ind. 415, 7 L.R.A. 687, 18 Am. St. Rep. 330, 23 N. E. 973; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Treadway, 142 Ind. 475, 143 Ind. 689, 40 N. St. Rep. 856, 53 S. E. 297); that when a station platform becomes slippery from ice and snow, it is the company's duty to make it safe again within a reasonable time by removal of the source of danger (Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Smith, 59 Ill. App. 242, affirmed in 162 Ill. 185, 44 N. E. 390); that it is the duty of the carrier to have its station lighted for the accommodation and safety of passengers arriving or departing upon their trains (Fordyce v. Merrill, 49

All the instructions given by the court must be taken and considered together, and if as a whole they correctly state the law of the case this is sufficient.

Ann. 694; that this requires the lights to be maintained for a reasonable time before and after the arrival and departure of trains (St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Battle, 69 Ark. 369, 63 S. W. 805; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Treadway, 142 Ind. 475, 143 Ind. 689, 40 N. E. 807, 41 N. E. 794; Waller v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 59 Mo. App. 410); and that this duty applies to a flag station at which the carrier knows that passengers will congregate on a certain night (Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Harvey, — Ind. App. —, 90 N. E. 318).

In this connection attention is directed to Wood v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 181 Mo. 433, 81 S. W. 152, where the court said that it is the duty of a carrier to keep its station platforms and approaches in such a condition that passengers who have occasion to use them can do so in safety; but at another point in its opinion, the court seems to indicate that the proper criterion for determining whether the carrier took the proper precaution to maintain its platform in such a condition as to prevent its collapse was that of ordinary care and reasonable inspection.

The measure of care imposed upon the carrier has, in a few cases, apparently been limited by restricting its application to certain persons, that is, to persons exercising a certain degree of care for their own safety. Such cases, of course, mean little, if anything, more than that the carrier's duty to protect the passenger against injury is not absolute, and obtains only in favor of persons not contributorily negligent. For instance, it has been held that a passenger alighting from a train at a place where he must cross a track to reach the public highway may, in the absence of warning, presume that trains will not be so operated as to impose on him the same degree of care which he would be obliged to exercise if he were not a passenger (Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. King, 49 L.R.A. 102, 40 C. C. A. 432, 99 Fed. 251); and, on the other hand, that, in the construction and maintenance of its stations and platforms, the carrier is not required to provide against accidents resulting either from the reckless disregard by passengers of its reasonable rules, or through their negligent heedlessness of their personal safety, but is bound only to exercise such a degree of care and prudence as is sufficient to protect the ordinary passenger using ordinary care (Lauterer v. Manhattan R. Co. 63 C. C. A. 38, 128 Fed. 540); and an application of this rule, in one case, led to the result that the fact of the intoxication of a passenger who fell into an open stairway in the night on a station platform, does not excuse the carrier for maintaining a dangerous place, if persons in the exercise of ordinary care might have been injured thereby (Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Lawrence, 98 Ill. App. 635). This duty toward persons exercising ordinary care has been held to devolve upon the carrier, not only in respect of the physical condition of its premises (Grimes v. Pennsylvania Co. 36 Fed. 72; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 404 abstract); but also in respect of lighting them (Grimes v. Pennsylvania Co. supra; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ricketts, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 687, 37 S. W. 952, subsequent appeal 21 Ky. L. Rep. 662, 52 S. W. 939; Sargent v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 114 Mo. 348, 19 L.R.A. 460, 21 S. W. 823).

Degree of care—highest or extraordinary care.

In a very few instances carriers have been held to the exercise of the same high degree of care for the safety of passengers at stations, as for their safety during transportation.

Thus, it was declared in Knight v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co. 56 Me. 234, 96 Am. Dec. 449, that carriers of passengers are bound to the most exact care and diligence, not only in the management of their trains and cars, but also in the structure and care of their tracks, and in all subsidiary arrangements necessary to the safety of passengers; and that a safe passageway to somewhat unusual manner, though alleged to be the result of negligence on the part of defendant's servants in the operation of its train. On the night of January 2, 1908, he was standing on the company's platform at Morrell, Arkansas, awaiting the approach of a passenger train on which he expected to embark, when the engine of that train struck a mule, knocking it over against plaintiff and severely injuring him. Negligence of defendant's servants is alleged in running the train at an excessive and unusual rate of speed when approaching the station, and in failing to exercise care to prevent striking the mule after its presence was discovered on the track. There was a trial before a jury resulting in a verdict in favor of plaintiff.

The train was several hours behind schedule time when it reached Morrell, and evidence was adduced to the effect that, when it approached the station, the rate of speed was greater than usual, and that it ran nearly 200 feet beyond the customary stopping place. The engine struck the mule. The mule, with others, came out from behind a seed house or platform near the station. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the engineer and fireman were prevented, by reason of the curved track, from seeing the stock ahead, near the track, in time to slow up the train. Evidence was also adduced to the effect that no stock alarm was sounded, though it was proved beyond dispute that the engine whistled at the proper place for the

And in Fremont E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Hagblad, 72 Neb. 773, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 254, 101 N. W. 1033, 106 N. W. 1041, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1096, it was held that the duty of the carrier to provide the passenger safe egress from, and ingress to, its eating houses, from its trains, which it invites them to visit, is no less stringent than the duty to furnish the passengers safe passage on its cars.

And in Brackett v. Southern R. Co. — S. C. —, 70 S. E. 1026, the court, in justifying its position that the carrier is bound to exercise the same high degree of care with respect to the arrangement and comfort of its stations as with respect to the operation of its trains and the maintenance of cars and roadbeds, said: "Counsel for defendant submitted the following important request to charge, which was refused: 'I charge and instruct you that a railroad company does not owe the same high degree of care to persons who are in its station or waiting room as passengers, in so far as the arrangement and comfort of such station or waiting rooms are concerned, as it does to persons who are passengers on one of its trains. In other words, a railroad company is not bound to exercise extraordinary care in reference to the arrangements of its station or waiting rooms; it is only required to exercise reasonable care; that is, such care as men of ordinary prudence would exercise under the same circumstances.' There is much strong authority supporting this proposition, and the argument in its favor has often been forcibly stated in textbooks and judicial decisions. But we think the weight of reason and authority sustains the rule . . . that the burden of extraordinary care is on the carrier in the management of its stations, as well as in the operation of its cars. . . . The public business of carrying passengers is now so controlled by a few persons or corporations, that those who travel must, of necessity, use their stations and waiting rooms, and with increasing population the number of persons using these stations is constant—33 L.R.A. (N.S.) ly on the increase. The arrangements for the comfort and health of all classes of the general public—women and children, the old and the feeble, the ignorant and inexperienced—are under the exclusive control of the carriers, and it seems but reasonable that they should be held to a very high degree of care in providing at their stations for the safety and comfort of those whom they impliedly invite to use their stations and waiting rooms."

So, it has been contended that although a railroad company is not bound to foresee and provide against accidents that no one could by the highest degree of practicable care anticipate, yet it is bound to use the highest degree of practicable care to provide against injury to passengers that may be foreseen and prevented, and a railroad company which leaves the platform of its depot in an unsafe condition will be held to have contemplated the general nature of any injuries to a passenger, and it is not necessary that precisely such an accident as actually occurred might have been anticipated. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. v. Lucas, 119 Ind. 583, 6 L.R.A. 193, 21 N. E. 968.

In Waldman v. Brooklyn Union Elev. R. Co. 136 App. Div. 376, 120 N. Y. Supp. 1017, involving an action by one who was injured by a falling window while waiting for a train on the defendant's platform, was declared that the defendant was charged to exercise that high degree of care which is owed to passengers, in order to provide a safe platform.

In a few cases the imposition of a high degree of care upon the company seems to be the result, more of the special circumstances of the case, than of any expressed inclination of the courts to lay down any general proposition of law. This may fairly be said of cases holding that the extraordinary care required of a railroad company in respect of passengers on trains is required in respect of a bridge or elevated platform on the railroad property, which is used for an approach to the station, and over which passengers are invited to enter the premises for the purpose of taking passage, where it station. Morrell is an incorporated town containing from 300 to 500 inhabitants.

The trial court gave, over the objection of defendant, the following among other instructions: "(5) If you find from the evidence that the defendant was operating its train at an unusual speed in the town of Morrell, and by reason thereof struck a mule, and if you find that, by the exercise of ordinary care, defendant could have avoided striking said mule and injuring plaintiff, had it been operating said train at its usual rate of speed, the defendant is liable." The effect of that instruction was to declare the running of the train at an unusual rate of speed in the town of Morrell to be negligence per se, and that the defendant was liable if the injury would not have occurred otherwise. This is not correct, for it should have been submitted to the jury to determine whether or not the running of the train at the unusual rate of speed, under the circumstances, constituted negligence. Judge Elliott correctly states the rule on the subject as follows: "In the absence of any statute or ordinance upon the subject, no rate of speed is negligence per se. But, when considered in connection with other circumstances, as it must be in some cases, the court may sometimes be justified in declaring that the company was guilty of negligence in running its train at an excessive and dangerous rate of speed under the circumstances of the particular case. Ordinarily, however, the question is one of fact for the jury." 3 Elliott, Rail-joins an open trestle on the same level into which persons are liable to walk while crossing the bridge (Johns v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 39 S. C. 162, 20 L.R.A. 520, 39 Am. St. Rep. 709, 17 S. E. 698); that the same high degree of care which a carrier owes to its passengers while on its trains devolves upon it with respect to the safety of a passenger, and in guarding him against pitfalls, where, in company with, and upon the invitation of, the conductor of a train which has stopped at some distance from the station, he is taking the course indicated by the conductor, to reach the train for the purpose of boarding it (San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Turney, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 626, 78 S. W. 256); that if, at the very threshold of a gate guarding the entrance to its station, a carrier places a log against which its passengers will be in danger of stumbling in the dark, it is bound to do everything in its power to guard against the danger; and omission to do so is negligence (Osborn v. Union Ferry Co. 53 Barb. 629); that where the injury was sustained by falling through a hole in the floor of a dark toilet room in the station, the defendant owed the passenger the highest degree of care consistent with the proper management of the business in which it was engaged (Jordan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 165 Mass. 346, 32 L.R.A. 101, 52 Am. St. Rep. 522, 43 N. E. 111). See also in this connection Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Harrison, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 120 S. W. 254, where the court, in affirming a recovery for injuries resulting when a person upon a station platform was struck by an incoming train while he was attempting to pass around a depression in the platform filled with water, and was thrown against the plaintiff, declared on the question whether suffering the depression to exist in the platform was negligence, that it was the carrier's duty to exercise the highest degree of care that a very cautious, competent, and prudent person would exercise in similar circumstances to provide its passengers a safe approach to its trains.

In Dilleshaw v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 85 S. C. 334, 67 S. E. 304, the court declared that, in holding a carrier to the highest degree of care for the safety of its passengers, it could not lay it down as a rule of law that the highest degree of care required the carrier to see that the station grounds were kept free from any depressions or irregularities.

—less care at station than in transportation generally.

The cases holding the carrier to the exercise of the same degree of care for the safety of passengers at stations as in their transportation are in the minority, for while the majority of the cases differ verbally as to the so-called measure of care required at stations, they require, in one form of expression or another, a lesser measure than is usually imposed upon the carrier while in the act of transportation.

The degree of care is not fixed solely by the relation of carrier and passenger, but is measured by the consequences which may follow the want of care. A railroad company is held to the highest degree of care in respect of the condition and management of its engines and cars, because negligence in that respect involves extreme peril to passengers, against which they cannot protect themselves; and it would not act reasonably if it did not exercise greater care in equipping and running its trains, than in regard to the condition of its station grounds. Moreland v. Boston & P. R. Corp. 141 Mass. 31, 6 N. E. 225. This doctrine is based upon the ground that the dangers to be apprehended, and the liability to accidents, and the inability of travelers to guard against or escape them in the one case, are infinitely greater than in the other (Kirby v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 20 App. Div. 473, 46 N. Y. Supp. 777); and is merely a result of applying the rule that care shall be commensurate with the danger (Taylor v. Pennsylvania Co. 50 Fed. 755).

One who is attempting to board a train of one of several railroad companies using common tracks through a station, for the purpose of taking passage thereon, is a pas-roads, § 1160. This is the rule adopted by this court. Ford v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 66 Ark. 363, 50 S. W. 864; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Kimberlain, 76 Ark. 100, 88 S. W. 599. The court gave another instruction at defendant's request, telling the jury that running the train at an excessive and unusual rate of speed is not negligence per se, but this did not cure the error of the former instruction, as the two were directly conflicting.

The giving of the following instruction is also assigned as error: "(6) Railroad companies in operating trains are required to use the utmost care and foresight, and are held responsible for the slightest negligence. The first and most important duty incumbent upon them is to provide for safety of their passengers. To this end, they are required to provide all things necessary to their security, reasonably consistent with their business, and appropriate to the means of conveyance employed by them, and to exercise the highest degree of practicable care and diligence and skill in the operation of their trains." The objection to the instruction is that it is abstract in this case, and also that it is an incorrect statement of the law applicable to the case. The declaration that railroad companies are required to provide all things necessary to the security of passengers reasonably consistent with their business and appropriate to the means of conveyance employed by them is abstract, and is inapplicable to the facts of this case, for the reason that the senger as to all roads using those tracks, for the purpose of determining the measure of care which they owe him. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Stepp, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 350, 90 C. C. A. 431, 164 Fed. 785.

And with respect to the safety of a hotel temporarily used by a carrier for use by its passengers during the rebuilding of its burned station, the measure of its duty is no greater and no less than its duty in respect of stations constructed and maintained by it. Kirby v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. supra.

But, only in case of gross negligence can a carrier be held liable for injury to one who departs from the way provided for egress from its station, and takes another way, whose use is forbidden by danger signs. Perego v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 158 Mich. 225, 122 N. W. 535.

And the fact that a person who was struck and injured by the body of a person killed by a passing train was standing on a station platform, waiting for a train, after purchasing a ticket, gives him no greater right of action against the company than if he had been injured at any other place where he had a right to be. Wood v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 177 Pa. 306, 35 L.R.A. 199, 55 Am. St. Rep. 728, 35 Atl. 689.

A carrier which, by advertisements and reduced rates, induces a large number of persons to collect at its terminal station, is bound to take such precautions for the safety of passengers as the increased dangers attendant upon the collection of a large crowd render reasonably necessary under the circumstances. Taylor v. Pennsylvania Co. supra.

So, it has been held that evidence that the carrier had advertised an excursion, that the train was late, and that a crowd had assembled at the station, was properly introduced, because it was material upon the question of the amount of care and diligence to be exercised by the carrier in handling engines and trains at and about the station. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Foster, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 497, 63 S. W. 952.

It respect of lighting its platforms for use by passengers, a carrier is not required to exercise "a high degree of care," it being required only to provide a reasonably safe means of ingress and egress to and from its station (McCormick v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 141 Mich. 17, 104 N. W. 390); and the character and the extent of the lights must depend upon the character and extent of the business transacted in the particular station (Sargent v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 114 Mo. 348, 19 L.R.A. 460, 21 S. W. 823); the carrier's duty being determined in the light of the rule that precautionary requirements increase in the ratio that danger becomes more threatening (Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Arnold, 84 Ala. 159, 5 Am. St. Rep. 354, 4 So. 359); and measured by what a prudent man, engaged in like business, would regard as necessary to render the platform reasonably safe for use by passengers exercising ordinary care (Cleveland, A. & C. R. Co. v. Anderson, 21 Ohio C. C. 288, 11 Ohio C. D. 765).

Where a carrier deposits freight upon its platform in the daytime, it must use care in an added and commensurate degree to the end that the platform shall be reasonably safe for the use of passengers. Matthieson v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 125 Iowa, 90, 100 N. W. 51.

The view has been taken that the duty respecting the construction and maintenance of station buildings and platforms, and the lighting of the same, is not so rigorous as that imposed upon carriers in relation to roadbeds, tracks, cars, appliances, and the like; and that in the construction, maintenance, and lighting of its premises for use by passengers, it is held to no higher degree of care than an individual owner of premises used for ordinary purposes (Randolph v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 106 Mo. App. 646, 79 S. W. 1170); that is, its duty has been regarded as neither greater nor less than that of any person question of failure to provide the things necessary to the security of passengers is not involved in the controversy, and the failure to provide things for their safety had nothing to do with plaintiff's injury. The jury might have inferred from it that it was the duty of defendant to provide some means of security against the happening of such an occurrence as this. There is no proof that the platform or waiting room at the station was unsafe, or that the company omitted anything reasonably necessary for the security of passengers. The instruction is incorrect, because it places too high a degree of care upon the company as to passengers waiting at stations. The exercise of ordinary care is the measure of the duty of a public carrier to protect passengers while at stations. Hutchinson, Car. §§ 935, 941; 3 Thomp. Neg. §§ 274, 278; Huddleston v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Ark. 378, 119 S. W. 280; St. Louis, I.

M. & S. R. Co. v. Wilson, 70 Ark. 136, 91 Am. St. Rep. 74, 66 S. W. 661; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Barnett, 65 Ark. 255, 45 S. W. 550. The higher degree of care is exacted only during the time in which the passenger has given himself wholly in charge of the carrier,—while on the train or getting on or off, for then only is the passenger subjected to the peculiar hazards of that mode of travel, against which the carrier must exercise the highest degree of skill and care. Falls v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. 97 Cal. 114, 31 Pac. 901. But when those extraordinary hazards have ceased, or before they have begun, the degree of care is relaxed as the necessity for it ceases.

The errors in giving the two instructions hereinbefore mentioned were prejudicial, and for this reason the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

to another who, by invitation or inducement, express or implied, has come upon his premises for the purpose of transacting business (Chase v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 134 Mo. App. 655, 114 S. W. 1141); and this obligation is said to require the exercise of only a reasonable degree of care (Gunderman v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 58 Mo. App. 370); having regard for the nature of the business (Pennsylvania Co. v. Marion, 104 Ind. 239, 3 N. E. 874); and it is therefore error to charge the jury that it is the carrier's duty to make the platform "as reasonably safe as possible" (Finseth v. City & Suburban R. Co. 32 Or. 1, 39 L.R.A. 517, 51 Pac. 84). One court has inclined to the view that, in respect of keeping its sidewalks safe for use by passengers, the carrier's duty is of the same standard as that of a municipality with respect to its sidewalks. Bateman v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 47 Hun, 429.

Other cases declare that since a passenger's entrance to the carrier's station is characterized by none of the hazards incident to the journey itself. (Falls v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. 97 Cal. 114, 31 Pac. 901); and that since a rule properly ceases with the reason for it (Taylor v. Pennsylvania Co. 50 Fed. 755); the degree of care owed to the passenger is justly lessened to the extent that, in such a place and at such a time, the carrier is bound to exercise only a reasonable degree of care for the protection of its passengers (Ibid.); in view of the dangers to be apprehended (Falls v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. supra).

The averment in a declaration against a carrier, that it is charged with the duty to furnish safe ingress and egress to and from its cars, is too broad, for the literal signification of such a statement is that the carrier is an insurer in this respect. (Falk v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 56 N. J. L. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 380, 29 Atl. 157); and the carrier does not insure the safety of passengers under such conditions (Renneker v. South Carolina R. Co. 20 S. C. 219); nor, indeed, is it required to exercise the highest degree of care (Hart v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 37 Wash. 424, 79 Pac. 954); but if it suffers dangerous conditions or practices to exist or prevail upon those portions of its premises to which passengers are expected to resort, it may be held responsible for injuries resulting therefrom which might reasonably have been expected (Gascoigne v. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. 143 Ill. App. 547; Galloway v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 56 Minn. 346, 23 L.R.A. 442, 45 Am. St. Rep. 468, 57 N. W. 1058).

While the cases which measure the carrier's duty by what is "reasonable" have enunciated the rule in different forms, they appear, as a matter of fact, to mean about the same. Thus, one form in which the rule has been stated is that the carrier is bound to do what is reasonably necessary on the station premises to insure their safety for proper use by passengers (Beard v. Connecticut & P. River R. Co. 48 Vt. 101); while in other cases it has been declared that the carrier must make reasonable efforts and take reasonable precautions to keep its approaches in a safe condition (Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Wilson, 63 Ill. 167; Townsend v. Boston, 187 Mass. 283, 72 N. E. 991); or, what is the same thing, that a passenger has the right to assume that every necessary and reasonable precaution will be taken for his safety (Campbell v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 95 Miss. 309, 48 So. 618); but the greater number of cases which make reasonableness the criterion, state, in terms, that the carrier must exercise reasonable care for the safety and protection of passengers who are properly using its stations, platforms, and approaches (Pere Marquette R. Co. v. Strange, 171 Ind. 160, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1041, 84 N. E. 819, 85 N. E. 1026; Atchi- son, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holloway, 71 Kan. 1, 114 Am. St. Rep. 462, 80 Pac. 31; Falk v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 56 N. J. L. 380, 29 Atl. 157; Exton v. Central R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 356, 56 L.R.A. 508, 46 Atl. 1099; Redner v. Lehigh & H. River R. Co. 73 Hun, 562, 26 N. Y. Supp. 1059; Scholtz v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 48 Misc. 619, 95 N. Y. Supp. 557; Renneker v. South Carolina R. Co. 20 S. C. 219; Hart v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 37 Wash. 424, 79 Pac. 954; and a few cases declare that the rule is that of reasonable care, to be determined by the situation and the probable dangers (Crowe v. Michigan C. R. Co. 142 Mich. 692, 106 N. W. 395; Renneker v. South Carolina R. Co. 20 S. C. 219) together with the circumstances of the case, including the nature of the road, the character of the traffic, and the place where the accident occurred. (Falls v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. 97 Cal. 114, 31 Pac. 901); and that this measure of care does not stop short of every reasonable provision for the safety of the passengers, having a regard for such conditions (Glenn v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. — Ind. App. —, 73 N. E. 861).

It has been held that in respect of sidewalks maintained by carriers for use by its passengers, between its station and the public streets, its duty is the same as that of a municipality,—the duty of exercising reasonable care (O'Reilly v. Long Island R. Co. 15 App. Div. 79, 44 N. Y. Supp. 264, former appeal, 4 App. Div. 139, 38 N. Y. Supp. 779); but it seems that for the purpose of determining whether reasonable care has been exercised, the rule in the case of a city, that a reasonable time must elapse before notice of a dangerous condition will be imparted, cannot be applied where, during the continuance of a snow storm, the carrier stationed an employee upon its platform to keep it free from snow and ice (McGuire v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co. 104 App. Div. 105, 93 N. Y. Supp. 316).

Although the duty to exercise reasonable care does not apply where a passenger, waiting at a station used for both freight and passengers, goes to a platform of higher elevation than the other platform, and which he knows is used exclusively for the handling of freight, and is injured by falling through a hole therein (Gunderman v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 58 Mo. App. 370; its application to the condition of an approach cannot be refused because the approach may have been adopted, instead of constructed, by the carrier (Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Glenk, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 590, 30 S. W. 278); nor because it may have been constructed and owned by other persons, if it is constantly and notoriously used by passengers as a means of approach (Schlessinger v. Manhattan R. Co. 49 Misc. 504, 98 N. Y. Supp. 840).

A railroad company is not only bound to exercise reasonable care to protect its passengers from assault and injury by strangers (Exton v. Central R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 356, 56 L.R.A. (N.S.)

56 L.R.A. 508, 46 Atl. 1099); but, if it is engaged in the transportation of large numbers of passengers to and from stations, it must exercise reasonable care to limit the number of passengers who shall be permitted to go upon the platform at one time, and to regulate the movements and disposition of those admitted (Dittmar v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 91 App. Div. 378, 86 N. Y. Supp. 878; McGearty v. Manhattan R. Co. 15 App. Div. 2, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1086); and the duty to exercise reasonable care also extends to the lighting of the premises at night (Toledo, St. L. & W. R. Co. v. Stevenson, 122 Ill. App. 654; Buemann v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 32 Minn. 390, 20 N. W. 379; Abbot v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 46 Or. 549, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 851, 114 Am. St. Rep. 885, 80 Pac. 1012, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 961).

Then there are cases which make "reasonable safety" the criterion. Whether the duty to keep the premises "reasonably safe" is the same as the obligation to exercise "reasonable care" to keep them safe may, at the least, be said to admit of argument. But the possibility that these phrases may, in many instances, have been regarded as interchangeable, or, at least, the likelihood that the one may have been inadvertently used as a substitute for the other, is illustrated by the case of Fullerton v. Fordyce, 121 Mo. 1, 42 Am. St. Rep. 516, 25 S. W. 587, where the court, after declaring that it was the duty of a carrier to keep its station platforms "in a reasonably safe condition for convenient use," went on to say that since it was the duty of the carrier "to use reasonable care" to see that the platform was kept in a safe condition, it was gross negligence to allow a hole 8 inches wide and 6 feet long to remain in the floor of the platform for a period of four days.

On the other hand it might be objected that to say that the carrier is bound to keep the premises reasonably safe, is erroneously to impose an absolute duty in terms. Some such objection probably prevailed where it was held that the duty of a carrier in respect of the condition of its waiting room is only to exercise ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition, and its duty is not "to keep its waiting room in a reasonably safe condition." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Grimsley, 90 Ark. 64, 117 S. W. 1064.

But, however this may be, there are numerous cases declaring that it is the carrier's duty to keep its stations, platforms, and approaches, not absolutely safe (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Woods, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 612, 40 S. W. 846), but in a reasonably safe condition for use by its passengers (Scanlan v. Tenney, 72 Fed. 225; Matthieson v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 125 Iowa, 90, 100 N. W. 51; Irvin v. Missouri P. R. Co. 81 Kan. 649, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 739, 106 Pac. 1063; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Giboney, 124 Ky. 806, 100 S. W. 216; MacLaren v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 197 Mass. 490, 83 N. E. 1088; Robertson v. Wabash R. Co. 162 Mo. 382, 53 S. W. 1082; Gunderman v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 58 Mo. App. 370; Union P. R. Co. v. Evans, 52 Neb. 50, 71 N. W. 1062; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Trautwein, 52 N. J. L. 169, 7 L.R.A. 435, 19 Am. St. Rep. 442, 19 Atl. 178; Gilmore v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 154 Pa. 375, 25 Atl. 774; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Woods, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 612, 40 S. W. 846; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Smith, 103 Va. 326, 49 S. E. 487; Herman v. Great Northern R. Co. 27 Wash. 472, 57 L.R.A. 300, 68 Pac. 82; White v. Seattle, E. & T. Nav. Co. 36 Wash. 281, 104 Am. St. Rep. 948, 78 Pac. 909; Barker v. Ohio River R. Co. 51 W. Va. 423, 90 Am. St. Rep. 808, 41 S. E. 148). Or, as was remarked in one case, the duty of a carrier to a passenger who has alighted from its train is only to see that he is afforded a reasonable protection and immunity from danger in getting away from the point at which he alighted (Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 80 Ga. 526, 5 S. E. 772); or, stating it in a different form: When a passenger alights from the train by invitation and at a point selected by the carrier, he is entitled to assume that a reasonably safe means of exit has been provided for him (Burnham v. Wabash Western R. Co. 91 Mich. 523, 52 N. W. 14). So, it has been held that the maintenance by a railroad company of a door like those in common use is not negligence merely because it is not all made of glass above the middle, so persons on opposite sides can see each other, nor because a screw eye 4 feet 10 inches from the bottom projects nine-sixteenths of an inch beyond the surface and causes injury to a person against whom it is violently pushed by another hurrying to a train, for the carrier is not bound to take precaution against the unusual and negligent use of its appliances by strangers; but if the appliances are reasonably safe when used with ordinary care, the duty of the carrier who supplies them is performed (Graeff v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 161 Pa. 230, 23 L.R.A. 606, 41 Am. St. Rep. 885, 28 Atl. 1107).

This duty to keep the premises reasonably safe has been held to devolve upon the company in the maintenance of a baggage room for use by passengers who go there to identify their baggage (Bates v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 140 Wis. 235, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1069, 122 N. W. 745); and it has been held to extend not only to the physical condition of the platform, but also to the manner in which the carrier allows it to be used (Mangum v. North Carolina R. Co. 145 N. C. 152, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 689, 122 Am. St. Rep. 437, 58 S. E. 913); so that where, in order to reach a train, it is necessary for a passenger to cross over tracks intervening between the train and the station, the carrier is charged with the positive duty to provide a reasonably safe passage over intervening tracks, and not to permit locomotives or trains to pass over them while passengers are so 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) crossing (Keifner v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 223 Pa. 50, 70 Atl. 253).

The railway company must provide reasonable accommodations and appointments at their stations for their passengers (Stewart v. International & G. N. R. Co. 53 Tex. 289, 37 Am. Rep. 753); and this includes not only, the obligation to maintain a fire in the waiting room if necessary to make it comfortable (Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Mounts, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1162, 104 S. W. 748); but also the duty to keep the premises reasonably lighted for a sufficient time before and after the arrival and departure of trains, to enable passengers to avoid danger (Hall v. Bessemer & L. E. R. Co. 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 556); or, according to one case, to afford passengers a reasonable opportunity or time to reach a public highway or other safe thoroughfare, by the aid of such lighting, if it is needed for that purpose (Wallace v. Wilmington & N. R. Co. 8 Houst. [Del.] 529, 18 Atl. 818); or, as was said in another case, the carrier's duty is not discharged unless it so lights the place as to enable the traveling public to approach and leave its stations and trains with a reasonable degree of safety, though this principle only applies to the duty of lighting such platforms and approaches as are reasonably necessary to the ingress and egress to and from these stations and trains, and not necessarily to all platforms and approaches (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Reich, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 32 S. W. 817); but no lesser duty, in this respect, devolves upon the company in favor of persons arriving upon a special train out of the usual time of regular trains (Gerhart v. Wabash R. Co. 110 Mo. App. 105, 84 S. W. 100). It has been held that whether this duty has been performed in a particular case, depends upon the character of the station and the extent of the business there transacted, for, it is said, if many passengers are to be taken on and discharged from trains, and much baggage, mail, and express is to be handled by many employees, confusion and accident at night can be prevented only by the aid of the lighting system much more extensive than would be required under other circumstances (St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Marshall, 71 Kan. 866, 81 Pac. 169).

So, it has been held that whether the carrier builds the platform itself or adopts one built by someone else, it is required to maintain it in a reasonably safe condition (Haselton v. Portsmouth, K. & Y. Street R. Co. 71 N. H. 589, 53 Atl. 1016).

Likewise it is held that a carrier is bound to keep "a recognized way" to and from its station in a reasonably safe condition for use by its passengers, by setting up barriers or lights to protect them from falling into holes in close proximity thereto (Cross v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 69 Mich. 363, 13 Am. St. Rep. 399, 37 N. W. 361); and that if, with full knowledge of the facts, it permits an unsafe and dangerous means of approach to its station to be provided by another and used, it is as much liable for the injury as if it had itself set up and maintained the dangerous way (Collins v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. 80 Mich. 390, 45 N. W. 178); and that, in the absence of knowledge of a passenger that only one path has been provided by the carrier for the purpose of enabling passengers to leave its station, and in the absence of any direction or notice from the carrier to use a particular path, the passenger is at liberty to use any path which appears to be designed for such use, and as to him it is the carrier's duty to see that all such paths are reasonably safe and convenient (Cazneau v. Fitchburg R. Co. 161 Mass. 355, 37 N. E. 311); while, by way of limitation, it has been pointed out that the carrier's duty to maintain in a reasonably safe condition the approaches to and from its station does not apply to every cross or short cut over neighboring property, which individuals may adopt in reaching the station, although the use is sufficient to create a visible path, if the carrier does nothing to induce the public to believe that it has provided the path, or holds it out as safe (Woods v. White Star Line, 160 Mich. 540, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 992, 125 N. W. 396).

Again, there are cases which impose upon the carrier the duty of exercising "ordinary care" for the safety of passengers at its stations; and, from a practical view point at least, this seems about the same as the rule of "reasonable care." The likelihood that the two forms of expression may be used interchangeably may, perhaps, be illustrated by the case of MacFeat v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 52, 62 Atl. 808, where the court declared that common carriers of passengers are responsible for any negligence resulting in injury to passengers, and are required, in the preparation, conduct, and management of their means of conveyance, to exercise every degree of care, diligence, and skill which a "reasonable man" would use in like circumstances; and then afterwards said that the term "ordinary care" when applied to the management of railroad engines and cars in motion imports all the care which the peculiar circumstances of the place or occasion reasonably require, and that this will be increased or diminished according as the ordinary liability to danger and accident is increased or diminished by circumstances.

Cases making "ordinary care" the criterion declare that the carrier is bound, neither so to maintain its premises as to make accidents to passengers using the same impossible (Lycett v. Manhattan R. Co. 12 App. Div. 326, 42 N. Y. Supp. 431); that is, to keep them absolutely safe (Skottowe v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. 22 Or. 430, 16 L.R.A. 593, 30 Pac. 222); for it is not an insurer in this regard (Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gross, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 21 S. W. 186); nor to exercise extraordinary diligence in this respect (Georgia, C. & N. R. Co. v. Brown, 120 Ga. 380, 47 S. E. 942); and that a lesser degree of care is required in regard to the condition of the approaches to its cars, such as platforms, halls, stairways, etc., than in respect of the roadbed, machinery, etc. (Kelly v. Manhattan R. Co. 112 N. Y. 443, 3 L.R.A. 74, 20 N. E. 383). It's duty is stated to be that of exercising, in view of the dangers to be apprehended, as said in some cases (Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Stewart, 77 Ill. App. 66; Laffin v. Buffalo & S. W. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 136, 60 Am. Rep. 433, 12 N. E. 599; Kelly v. Manhattan R. Co. 112 N. Y. 443, 3 L.R.A. 74, 20 N. E. 383; Lycett v. Manhattan R. Co. 12 App. Div. 326, 42 N. Y. Supp. 431; Skottowe v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. 22 Or. 430, 16 L.R.A. 593, 30 Pac. 222), ordinary care for the safety and comfort of passengers at its stations (St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wilson, 70 Ark. 136, 91 Am. St. Rep. 74, 66 S. W. 661; Arkansas Midland R. Co. v. Robinson, — Ark. —, 130 S. W. 536; Southern R. Co. v. Reeves, 116 Ga. 743, 42 S. E. 1015; Georgia, C. & N. R. Co. v. Brown, 120 Ga. 380, 47 S. E. 942; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Keegan, 210 Ill. 150, 71 N. E. 321; Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Stewart, 77 Ill. App. 66; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Harris, 38 Ind. App. 77, 77 N. E. 1051; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wolfe, 80 Ky. 82; Bacon v. Casco Bay S. B. Co. 90 Me. 46, 37 Atl. 328; Burke v. St. Louis & S. W. R. Co. 120 Mo. App. 683, 97 S. W. 981; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Mann, 78 Neb. 541, 111 N. W. 379; Laffin v. Buffalo & S. W. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 136, 60 Am. Rep. 433, 12 N. E. 599; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Criswell, 101 Tex. 399, 108 S. W. 806; Texas Midland R. Co. v. Brown, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 58 S. W. 44; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Barrett, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 366, 80 S. W. 660). Stated a little more elaborately, its duty is to provide a reasonably safe place for the accommodation of those awaiting the arrival and departure of trains, and to take such precaution for their safety as would naturally occur to ordinarily prudent and careful men, and to guard against such dangers of accidents as are likely to occur or are reasonably to be apprehended by prudent men (Kirby v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 20 App. Div. 473, 46 N. Y. Supp. 777).

On the other hand, in Weston v. New York Elev. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 595, where a passenger was injured by slipping upon an icy platform, the court held that it is not sufficient that the carrier does what ordinary care and prudence require of any individual over whose premises the public are permitted to go, and that while the company is not bound, on the other hand, to keep its platform in such a condition that it would have been impossible for any passenger to slip, it should so maintain it as to avoid injury to a person using the ordinary care which people use when not apprised of danger. And it was held in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Butcher, 83 Tex.

309, 18 S. W. 583, that the carrier was not bound to have its platform absolutely safe, but only reasonably so under the circumstances; but that in accomplishing this result it was bound to use more than ordinary care and precaution, the court apparently being of the opinion that the degree of care which the carrier was bound to exercise in the circumstances was that which a very prudent person would have used in his own case under the same or similar circumstances. These two cases are, of course, overwhelmed by those declaring in favor of the rule of ordinary care.

This duty to exercise ordinary care has been held to require the premises to be kept free from traps and pitfalls such as are likely to cause injury to passengers (McNaughton v. Illinois C. R. Co. 136 Iowa, 177, 113 N. W. 844); although one seeking to recover for injury thereby must prove that the carrier or its servants knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the defect in time to have reasonable opportunity to repair it (Munro v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. — Mo. App. —, 135 S. W. 1016).

So, while the carrier is not primarily liable for the negligence of a mail agent, it must exercise ordinary care to protect passengers against injuries by mail sacks thrown from its trains, either by requiring the sacks to be thrown at a certain place, or by notices of warning, or other suitable means. Huddleston v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Ark. 378, 119 S. W. 280.

And in Trinity & S. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 690, 46 S. W. 389, involving an action for injuries received in defendant's railway station by being bitten by a dog alleged to have been improperly fastened by the defendant's servant, it was held that the jury should have been charged that the degree of care devolving upon the defendant was that employed by reasonably prudent persons, and not that which would be exercised by "very prudent persons" in such situations.

While it has been held that a carrier cannot escape liability for injury to a passenger who tripped over the brace of a semaphore pole on the platform, by showing that the semaphore and its attachments were constructed in the manner usually followed by railway companies, but that the criterion in determining its responsibility is whether ordinary care was exercised in its construction and maintenance (Vance v. Great Northern R. Co. 106 Minn. 172, 118 N. W. 674), it has, on the other hand, been held, in applying the rule of ordinary care, that the adoption of a method of platform construction which accords with that in general use by well-regulated railroad companies, and which is approved by experience, is a due performance of the duty which the carrier owes to its passengers (Feil v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 77 N. J. L. 502, 72 Atl. 362).

With respect to heating its stations, during cold weather, for use by passengers, the carrier is not charged with the duty owed by an innkeeper to his guest, but he must exercise ordinary care for the accommodation and comfort of the passengers (International & G. N. R. Co. v. Doolan, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 120 S. W. 1118); and it is not relieved of this duty with respect to a person compelled to wait several hours for a delayed train, by the adoption of a statute requiring the carrier to keep its station lighted and warm for a period of not less than one hour before the arrival and after the departure of all trains (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cornelius, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 125, 30 S. W. 720; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Doolin, supra).

The rule that ordinary care only is required was applied where the defendant alleged that she was injured by falling over a man engaged in posting bills in a passageway leading to the defendant's ticket office (Lycett v. Manhattan R. Co. 12 App. Div. 326, 42 N. Y. Supp. 431); and it is held to apply to the removal of ice or snow from the platform (Waterbury v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 104 Iowa, 32, 73 N. W. 341); and also to the lighting of the station, platforms, and approaches (St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Battle, 69 Ark. 369, 63 S. W. 805; Hiatt v. Des Moines, N. & W. R. Co. 96 Iowa, 169, 64 N. W. 766; Texas C. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 603, 116 S. W. 83).

A carrier which attracts unusually large crowds to its station is bound to exercise ordinary and reasonable care for their safety, having due regard to the numbers and character of those on its premises and for the risks and dangers to which they are exposed. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Treat, 75 Ill. App. 327, affirmed in 179 Ill. 576, 54 N. E. 290. Ordinary prudence, in such circumstances, requires the carrier to protect its passengers against injuries resulting from dangers that attend the congregation of persons in large numbers (Cousineau v. Muskegon Traction & Lighting Co. 145 Mich. 314, 108 N. W. 720).

To render the rule of ordinary care applicable, the use which a passenger makes of the premises must be exercised in conformity with the manifest purposes for which they were intended. Dotson v. Erie R. Co. 68 N. J. L. 679, 54 Atl. 827.

So, no duty toward a passenger of exercising ordinary care devolves upon a carrier in respect of a portion of its platform used exclusively for the handling of freight, where it is not a place to which the public would naturally or ordinarily resort, and there is nothing from which consent or invitation to do so can be implied. Houston E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Grubbs, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 367, 67 S. W. 519.

But the carrier's duty to exercise ordinary care to keep and maintain its platform in a reasonably safe condition obtains irrespective of whether it was built by, and was under the control of, a third person, if it is used by the carrier, or by its passengers with its knowledge and consent. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. McCarty, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 364, 89 S. W. 805.

And a railway company which, expressly or by implication, invites its passengers to use a stile over a wire fence in leaving its grounds, is bound to use at least ordinary care in seeing that it is fit for the purpose intended, although the stile was not erected by it, and the defective part is not on its property, and notwithstanding it has no right to go upon the adjoining premises to make inspection or repairs. Cotant v. Boone Suburban R. Co. 125 Iowa, 46, 69 L.R.A. 982, 99 N. W. 115.

So, the fact that an approach to a passenger station was constructed by town authorities does not excuse the railroad company from its duty to exercise ordinary care to keep it free from danger to its patrons. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Caldwell, 93 Ark. 286, 124 S. W. 1034.

And a carrier's duty to exercise ordinary care in respect of the physical condition and proper lighting of a walk leading to a boat landing is not defeated by the fact that the walk is upon a public street, where the street has never been opened as such, nor used except by the carrier and those doing business with it. *Skottowe v. KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY,
Appt.,

FRANK HUTTI.

(141 Ky. 511, 133 S. W. 200.)

Carrier — transfer a condition to paying fare.

1. A passenger on a street car who is entitled to transfer on payment of fare cannot make the simultaneous issuance of the transfer a condition of paying the fare, and in case he attempts to do so, and refuses to pay his fare without receiving his transfer, he may be ejected from the car, although experience has shown that, if the transfer is not issued when the fare is paid, but after the conductor has finished collecting all fares in the car, he will reach his transfer point before receiving the transfer.

False arrest — probable cause — fine.

2. An action cannot be maintained for

Note.—A question similar to that involved in LOUISVILLE R. Co. v. HUTTI was raised in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cotten-gim, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 624, where a passenger tendered a larger sum of money than the amount of his fare, and demanded a return of the proper change as a condition for giving up the larger sum, it being held that this was an insufficient tender.

As to what will amount to a sufficient tender of fare to prevent ejection, see Kirk v. Seattle Electric Co. 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 991, and the note appended thereto. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

false arrest if a fine has been imposed by a police court for the conduct which caused the arrest.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Third Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, overruling the defendant's motion for a peremptory instruction in an action for an assault by defendant's servant, and for false arrest and imprisonment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fairleigh, Straus, & Fairleigh and Howard B. Lee for appellant.

Messrs. Edwards, Ogden, & Peak for appellee.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee took passage on one of appellant's street cars on Fourth street, in Louisville. He wanted to transfer to another car going down Oak street. When approached for his fare on the Fourth street car, he held out his hand containing the fare, a nickel, and offered to pay it, but demanded as a condition that he be then and there handed a transfer ticket. The rule of the company was that conductors should issue and deliver transfer tickets when fares were paid. The conductor did not refuse to give a transfer ticket. According to some of the witnesses, he said that he would issue all transfers after he had collected all fares. According to other testimony, he said that he would issue the transfer to appellee after he had paid his fare. Appellee insisted that he had failed on previous occasions to get his transfer, as the car would pass Oak street before the conductor would pass through issuing transfer slips after he had finished collecting all fares. The conductor insisted upon payment of the fare. He did not refuse to give the transfer ticket, but insisted on the fares being paid first. Appellee insisted on the transfer ticket's being handed him simultaneously with the payment of the fare. The altercation between the conductor and the passenger maintained that form; appellee retaining his fare in his hand, but offering it upon the condition that the transfer ticket be then and there handed to him. The conductor stopped the car and told appellee to get off. He refused. The conductor then took hold of him and tried to put him off, but failed. A policeman was called by the conductor, who arrested appellee on the conductor's complaint, charged with disorderly conduct. He was fined in the police court. He thereupon instituted this proceeding against appellant for the assault upon him by the conductor, and for false arrest and imprisonment. Upon the disclosure of the foregoing facts the court struck out the cause of action based on the false arrest, as the judgment of the police court was conclusive of the existence of reasonable grounds therefor. The ruling was proper. Upon the other branch of the case the circuit court overruled appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction, and submitted the question to the jury, who returned a verdict for appellee for $250 damages.

The ground of complaint on this appeal is the refusal of the trial court to grant appellant's motion for peremptory instruction. The propriety of the ruling depends on the nature of the contract to carry the passenger and the rights of the parties upon its breach. It may be assumed that appellee was entitled to a transfer, under his contract, entitling him to continue his journey upon the Oak street car, provided the contract was consummated. But before he was entitled either to continue his passage on the Fourth street car, or to transfer to the Oak street car, he must first have paid or tendered the necessary fare, which was 5 cents. He did not pay it. He tendered it, but tendered it conditionally; and from what he then said, and from his conduct as well, it is inferable that, unless the conductor had complied with his demand to deliver simultaneously the transfer ticket, he would not have paid the fare tendered. In this appellee misconceived his right. It was his duty to pay his fare, or to tender it, without condition. If thereupon the conductor refused to allow him to proceed upon the car, and ejected him, he had his demand for damages. Or if the conductor should have received his fare, and have allowed him to remain on the Fourth street car, but failed to give him in time a transfer ticket entitling him to continue his journey on the Oak street car, he was entitled to his damages, which would be the sum which he might have been compelled to pay on the Oak street car in order to complete his passage. But, though the conductor wrongfully intended not to issue appellee a transfer slip, that did not entitle appellee to ride on the Fourth street car without paying the fare. The conductor had the right to demand the payment of the fare before either allowing appellee to continue upon the car or issuing him a transfer slip. The contract began only upon the payment or tender of the consideration. The acts could not well be simultaneous—at least, are not required to be. One must precede, and that is payment. Possibly a more courteous and patient treatment and explanation by the conductor might have averted the trouble.

But, whether so or not, the conductor was within his legal rights in demanding the payment of the fare first, and refusing a conditional tender of it. When appellee refused either to pay or tender the fare unconditionally, he had not the right to remain on the car. He had not the right to ride there without paying the fare. When requested to leave the car after it stopped for that purpose, he was in the wrong in failing to do so; and it was lawful for the conductor to eject him, using no more force than was reasonably necessary for that purpose. It is not complained that the conductor used excessive force.

Under the facts shown, the court erred in not granting appellant's motion for peremptory instruction.

Reversed and remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

RE GUARDIANSHIP OF ELLENA MAY CROCHERON et al.

A. B. CROCHERON, Appt.,
v.

JOSEPH BABINGTON, Respt.

Guardian — surviving parent — rights.

1. Under the provisions of § 5774, Rev. Codes, the surviving parent who is competent to transact his own business, and not otherwise unsuitable, is entitled to the guardianship of his minor children.

Same — facts — conclusion.

2. Held, under the facts of this case, it appears that the father is competent to transact his own business, and that he is not otherwise unsuitable to have the guardianship of his minor children.

APPEAL by protestant from a judgment of the District Court for Owyhee County affirming a judgment of the Probate Court appointing Joseph Babington guardian of the estates and persons of Ellena May and Letha Joan Crocheron, and denying protestant's application to be himself appointed. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. P. McCarthy and T. D. Cahalan, for appellant:

The father has a legal right to guardianship which cannot be set aside unless it is affirmatively clear and positively shown that the father is not competent to transact his own business, or is otherwise unsuitable.

As to right of parent to appoint a testamentary guardian for minor children, see note to Hernandez v. Thomas, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 203.

II. General rights of father.

By the great weight of statutory and judicial authority, the father of a minor is entitled to appointment as guardian of such child in preference to any other person, provided only that he is fit and suitable to be intrusted with the welfare of the infant's person and the custody of its property. Re Galleher, 2 Cal. App. 364, 84 Pac. 352; RE CROCHERON; Andrino v. Yates, 12 Idaho, 618, 87 Pac. 787; Gill v. Riley, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 639, 90 S. W. 2; Griffin v. Sarsfield, 2 Dem. 4; Re McChesney, 106 Wis. 315, 82 N. W. 149.

And the putative father, if otherwise competent, is, on the death of the mother of an illegitimate child, impliedly entitled to appointment as guardian under a statute providing that the father while living, and where there is no lawful father, the mother, if living, shall be entitled to the guardianship of their minor children. Barela v. Roberts, 34 Tex. 554.

And in Ex parte Bond, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 147, 11 Jur. 114, a father, upon satisfactory proof to the court on means and condition in life, and the giving of a bond by two sureties, was appointed guardian of the estate of his minor daughter. The right of the father to such appointment was not otherwise discussed.

But in Senseman's Appeal, 21 Pa. 331, it was said that "it is deemed improper to appoint the father the guardian of his child's estate." The court stated the reasons as follows:

"It is the duty of a father to maintain, protect, and educate his offspring. His power over them is derived from that duty. The latter could not be performed without the existence of the former. The authority of a guardian bears a near resemblance to that of a father, and is plainly derived out of it; the guardian being only a temporary parent. He usually performs the office of both tutor and curator of the Roman law: the former of which had charge of the maintenance and education of the minor, and the latter the care of his fortune. From the existence of the parent's authority, and the just obligations the child is under to him for his care and protection, he is apt to forget that his only compensation is its affection, obedience, and services. He has no right to the estate which it may have received from the bounty of others. To place its property or money in his hands has been found unfavorable to the interests and happiness of both. It throws obstacles in the way of enforcing the rights of the minor, not likely to be encountered in a contest with a stranger."

The early Alabama cases are confusing, and in part, at least, conflict with the general rule. Thus, in Hall v. Lay, 2 Ala. 529, it was said that the statement in Huie v. Nixon, 6 Port. (Ala.) 77, to the effect that the relation of parent forms no exclusive claim to the wardship of a minor child, and that such a claim might be set aside in favor of a stranger if the parent was unfit, was erroneous. In fact, it has been held in Alabama that a guardian cannot be appointed for an infant under fourteen years of age if its father be alive, except under very peculiar circumstances, as the father, as natural guardian, was, as such, held entitled to its custody and control. Hall v. Lay, supra; Wood v. Wood, 3 Ala. 756 (holding that this rule extends to the property of the minor child. But that this is not good law, see Lang v. Pettus, 11 Ala. 37, and Nelson v. Goree, 34 Ala. 565). But the later law of Alabama seems to accord with the general rule in that it is provided by statute, that when a minor has a father living, and has an estate in his own right, a guardian must be appointed, and his father, if suitable, is entitled to a preference; and, if dead, the mother is entitled to the same rights as the father when living. Striplin v. Ware, 36 Ala. 87.

In Louisiana it is provided by statute that the father cannot, for any cause whatever, be excused from the obligation of the tutorship of his minor children, and held that the appointment of any other person is null. Watt's Succession, 111 La. 937, 36 So. 31. And under the early Louisiana law, the father could not be excused from the tutorship (which included personal care and control and administration of the child's property) of his minor child by an appointment by the child's adopted mother of a testamentary tutor, as, under the Code, tutorship of a minor child belonged of right to the surviving father or mother, and the right of the natural parent to control was not entirely lost by adoption. But under later statutes which have broadened the rights of adopting parents, it is held that the natural parent is not entitled to appointment as against a testamentary tutor appointed by the adopting mother. Haley's Succession, 49 La. Ann. 709, 22 So. 251.

III. General rights of mother.

The general rule is to the effect that if the father of a minor is dead, the mother is entitled to the same preference as regards appointment as guardian of her minor children as the father would be entitled to were he alive. And in King v. Seals, 45 Ala. 415, it was held that a mother during her widowhood may become the guardian of her minor children, where there are no statutory restrictions as to sex.

So, the mother of an illegitimate child, if deemed a fit and proper person, may be appointed its guardian. Ramsay v. Thompson, 71 Md. 315, 6 L.R.A. 705, 18 Atl. 592.

And in Wallis v. Campbell, 13 Ves. Jr. 517, a married woman was appointed guardian of the estate of her illegitimate child.

In Re Allsop, C. P. Cooper, 44, 7 L. J. Ch. N. S. 194, a mother, upon the death of her husband, was appointed guardian of the estate of her infant son; but the question of her right to such appointment was not discussed.

But in Re Cook, 20 L. J. Ch. N. S. 392, 15 Jur. 836, it was said that in no rank of life would the court appoint a mother to be the guardian of her minor children without having information as to the deceased father's family. (No further explanation is given in the report of the case.)

And in Courtois v. Vincent, Jacob, 268, another person than the mother was appointed guardian of her minor children, although she petitioned for such appointment. The case as reported does not show the reasons for the decision, or upon what it was based.

And where, in addition to the provision that the custody shall go to father or mother, if competent, the statute further provides that the father and mother, if living apart, have equal rights, the mother, living apart from her husband, if competent, is entitled to the custody of her child, as against a paternal grandparent. Bad reputation once established is presumed to continue.

And in Louisiana, the appointment of any other than the mother, where the natural father is dead, is void, as a tutor dative cannot be appointed where a legitimate tutor exists. Magdeleine v. Mayor, 1 Mart. (La.) 200.

But a mother's right to appointment as tutrix of her minor children was unknown to the Roman law until the promulgation of the 118th Novel of Justinian, chapter 5 of which conferred tutorship on her as the nearest relation when the father had appointed no tutor by will, but upon the express condition that she renounce the right to remarry. Berlucaux v. Berlucaux, 7 La. 545.

IV. Rights as between parents.

As before shown, other things being equal, the father is the first to be preferred and the mother the second in line of preference in selecting a guardian for a minor child.

But as between a mother of good character who has remarried after obtaining a divorce, and a father of questionable character who has remarried one whose character is seriously attacked, the guardianship of minor girls should be awarded to the mother. Re Austerhaudt Minors, Myrick, Prob. Ct. Rep. (Cal.) 18. See also Re Van Loan, supra, III. for statutory provision regulating rights when parents are living apart.

V. Welfare of child as affecting parents' rights.

As between a father and a grandparent, a mere finding that the appointment of the grandparent is for the best interests of the minor in respect of the temporal, monetary, and moral welfare is insufficient to warrant giving the custody of the minor to the grandparent, where by statute it is made the duty of the court to appoint the father or the mother if found competent to discharge the duties of guardianship. Re Campbell, 130 Cal. 380, 62 Pac. 613. And 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under such statute the right of the father, he being competent to have the custody and control of his child, is not affected by the fact that the child is in delicate health, and would have better opportunity for fresh air and exercise at the home of his grandparent than at the city residence of his father. Re Salter, 142 Cal. 412, 76 Pac. 51. And see Weisne's Appeal, 39 Conn. 537, to the effect that the fact that the minor is in such a condition of health that removal would not be safe is not entitled to consideration in determining the right of a mother to her child as against a stranger who had been appointed its guardian upon application stating that the mother was unfit to have the custody.

And the fact that the father's financial ability is not as great as another's does not warrant granting letters of guardianship of minor children to such other in preference to their father, if he is otherwise suitable. Re Tully Infants, 54 Misc. 184, 105 N. Y. Supp. 858.

So it has been held that, as against strangers, the father, however humble and poor, if of good moral character and able to support the child in his own style of life, cannot be deprived of its guardianship, however brilliant the advantages others may offer. Hernandez v. Thomas, 50 Fla. 522, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 203, 111 Am. St. Rep. 137, 39 So. 641, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 446. See also RE CROCHERON.

And where the statute entitles first the mother and then the next of kin to be appointed guardians of a minor under fourteen years of age, the right of the mother cannot be disregarded unless for satisfactory reasons. But such right must be held in subordination to, and exercised in consistency with, the rights, the moral training, and the highest welfare of the child. Albert v. Perry, 14 N. J. Eq. 540. See also Re Winans, 5 N. J. L. J. 250.

In some cases it is said that the welfare of the child is a paramount consideration (Griffin v. Sarsfield, 2 Dem. 4; Re Meech, 1 Connoly, 535, 7 N. Y. Supp. 257); and in others, that the controlling consideration is the welfare of the child (Re John-Mynatt v. Hudson, 66 Tex. 66, 17 S. W. 396; Snow v. Grace, 29 Ark. 138; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 461, 462; Com. v. Billings, 97 Mass. 405; Rathbun v. Ross, 46 Barb. 127; State v. Lanier, 79 N. C. 622.

Sullivan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves the guardianship of Ellena May and Letha Joan Crocheron, minor daughters of A. B. Crocheron. Said children are about eight and ten years of age, respectively, at the present time. It appears that the mother of these children, Mrs. Millie Crocheron, died about November 9, 1907, in Nampa, Idaho, and thereafter, on December 24, 1907, Joseph Babington, the stepfather of the mother, filed his petition in the probate court of Owyhee county, praying that he be appointed guardian of said minors. Said petition sets forth the death of the mother, and, among other facts, states as follows: "That A. B. Crocheron, father of said Ellena May and Letha Joan Crocheron, is an unsuitable person to be appointed their guardian, by reason of his indigent condition and incapacity to properly provide for and educate them; by reason of his insobriety and lack of integrity; by reason of the fact he abandoned said children in 1903, and has failed and neglected to provide for their support since said time; and by reason of his immorality. Supp. 932; while in still others it is said that the best interests of the minor are alone to be consulted (Holley v. Chamberlain, 1 Redf. 333). But that it is not enough to consider the interests of the child alone, and that the natural rights of the parent must be considered, see Hernandez v. Thomas, 50 Fla. 525, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 203, 111 Am. St. Rep. 137, 39 So. 641, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 446, as set out in RE CROCHERON.

However, where the right of the parent, because of evidence tending to show abandonment, forfeiture, or unsuitableness, is not clear, it has been held that the best interests of the child will govern. Andrino v. Yates, 12 Idaho, 618, 87 Pac. 787; Smidt v. Bennga, 140 Iowa, 399, 118 N. W. 439.

VI. Suitableness of parents.

a. In general.

The question of the competency or incompetency of the petitioning parent is largely one of discretion in the trial court. Re Bedford, 158 Cal. 145, 110 Pac. 302.

Under statutes which provide that the parent, if competent, is entitled to the guardianship of his or her children, the prima facie presumption is that the parent is competent, and the fact of competency or incompetency is the controlling question, and custody of a minor cannot be awarded to another unless the parent or parents are actually found incompetent. Campbell v. Wright, 130 Cal. 380, 62 Pac. 613; Re Salter, 142 Cal. 412, 76 Pac. 51; Re Galleher, 2 Cal. App. 364, 84 Pac. 352. And that the reason for the appointment of another than the parent must be urgent and the grounds clearly sustained, see Gill v. Riley, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 639, 90 S. W. 2.

b. Father.

Proof that the father has for a considerable period owed meat and grocery bills and for medical attendance for and burial expenses of his deceased wife does not indicate a lacking in integrity sufficient to justify a refusal to appoint him guardian of his minor child under a statute securing that right to him at common law. Re Galleher, 2 Cal. App. 364, 84 Pac. 352. And that lack of integrity of itself is not a legal ground for depriving a father of his child, see RE CROCHERON. And that failure or inability to pay his debts does not of itself render a father incompetent, see RE CROCHERON.

And where notorious bad conduct or unfaithfulness in the administration of the minor's property are the only causes for which a father can be excluded from the tutorship of his minor children, proof that a father is improvident, careless in pecuniary matters, and wanting in habits of industry, is not sufficient to preclude him from so acting. Segura v. Prados, 2 La. Ann. 751.

But a judgment of divorce in favor of the wife for cruel and inhuman treatment of herself and children by the husband, together with the expression of a doubt by the petitioning father as to the paternity of the child, which is of tender years, and whose guardianship he is seeking, sufficiently shows unsuitableness of the father to receive appointment as guardian. Especially where the deceased mother expressed a testamentary wish that another be appointed, and it appears that such other could do much more for the comfort and welfare of the child. Griffin v. Sarsfield, 2 Dem. 4. (As to effect of death of parent to whom custody of child was awarded in a divorce suit upon right of surviving parent, see note in 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 171.)

And in Wellesley v. Beaufort, 2 Russ. Ch. 1, affirmed in Wellesley v. Wellesley, 2 Bligh, N. R. 124, 1 Dowl. N. S. 152, Lord Eldon refused to award the custody and control of the person and property of minors to their father where it appeared that he had lived in open adultery with a married woman both before and after the death of his wife, and had expressed desires that his children learn to swear and use indecent language and associate with people of the lowest moral type.

convenient that a guardian be appointed to the persons and estates of said minors." On January 4, 1908, A. B. Crocheron, the father of said minor children, presented his petition to said probate court, showing that said minor children had a certain interest in the estate of their deceased mother, and prayed that he be appointed guardian of said minors, and thereafter, on January 13, 1908, filed his objections in said probate court to the appointment of Joseph Babington as guardian of said minors, alleging that he is the father of said minors, and denying that he is an unsuitable person to be appointed guardian of them, and denying all of the material allegations of the petition of Babington which go to show that he is not competent to transact the business of the minors, and not otherwise suitable to become the guardian of said minors. After hearing said matter the probate court granted the petition of Babington, and appointed him guardian of said minors, and issued letters of guardianship to him. He thereupon took the oath of office as such guardian, and was given custody of said minors. From that action of the probate court the father appealed to the district court. A hearing was there had, and a number of witnesses testified and documentary evidence was introduced on the trial. The court thereafter made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered judgment against the appellant, and sustained the action of the probate court. A motion for a new trial was thereafter made and overruled by

And a father who was divorced for cruel and inhuman treatment and immoral relations extending over a long period, who utterly ignored not only the sickness and death and funeral of his son, although he had been afforded an opportunity to visit him and to attend the funeral, and who has expressed a suspicion as to the paternity of his minor children, is not a suitable person to act as guardian of such children, within a statute entitling him so to act if suitable, although he has remarried, has considerable property, a good home, enjoys the confidence and respect of his neighbors, and has been of good conduct aside from ignoring his children since his second marriage. Re McChesney, 106 Wis. 315, 82 N. W. 149.

So the father will be denied guardianship of his son's estate and person, although the son is over fourteen years of age, and petitions for the appointment, where it appears that the father had mismanaged the infant's estate, and had been fined and imprisoned for contempt of court in connection with court orders as to the management of such property. Re White, 40 App. Div. 165, 57 N. Y. Supp. 802, affirmed on opinion below in 160 N. Y. 685, 55 N. E. 1101.

And the claims of the father will be disregarded where an infant over fourteen years of age petitions for the appointment of another as his guardian, and the father is a resident of a distant state, and it appears that there exists such a feeling of antagonism between the father and son as to induce the belief that the petitioner's welfare would be best subserved by the appointment of another than the father. Johnson v. Borden, 4 Dem. 36.

Proof that a father four years previous did drink some and at times became a "little hilarious," and has at times failed to or is unable to pay his debts, is not sufficient to deprive him of the guardianship of his children as incompetent to transact business or otherwise unsuitable, where it appears that he is neither indigent nor

But where intemperate habits and the resulting conduct render it not only improper, but rash and dangerous to intrust the father as guardian with the care and custody of his minor children, he must be denied letters; but if he, by continuous maintenance of habits of strict sobriety, can show that no further danger exists, the court will revoke letters granted to another, and appoint the father if he is otherwise suitable. Re Raborg, 3 N. Y. S. R. 323.

And convictions of petit larceny and of intoxication are sufficient to warrant an appointment of one other than the convicted father as the guardian of the minor children. Re Jacquet, 40 Misc. 575, 82 N. Y. Supp. 986.

And a father who has been divorced for nonsupport is not entitled to the guardianship of his minor children after the death of their mother, where it appears that he has no home, that he uses liquor freely and is often drunk, although not an habitual drunkard, that he is a night waiter in a basement saloon, and that he has given the children, aged one, two, and five, respectively, liquor until they have acquired an appetite for it, as against the maternal grandmother, who is found to be a suitable person. Russner v. McMillan, 37 Wash. 416, 79 Pac. 988.

And that whenever a man becomes so addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors that he can be classed as an inebriate or habitual drunkard, or as dangerous to the physical or moral welfare of his children by reason of his violent character or of his immoral habits and person, he is unsuitable to have the custody of his children, see Re CROCHERON.

But evidence of quarrels of the parents of infants, together with the fact that the father was intoxicated once or twice, is not sufficient to warrant denying the father appointment as guardian of such infants, the court. This appeal is from the judgment, and the order overruling the motion for a new trial.

Only one error is assigned, and that is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of facts and conclusions of law, and the decision made by the court. Under the provisions of § 5774, Rev. Codes 1909, the father is entitled to the guardianship of his minor children if he is competent to transact his own business, and not otherwise unsuitable for that trust. Said section is as follows: "Either the father or mother of a minor, being themselves respectively competent to transact their own business, and not otherwise unsuitable, must be entitled to the guardianship of the minor." The second finding of fact made by the court is as follows: "That the said A. B. Crocheron is the father of said minors, and is not indigent or incapable of properly providing for said minors, or of educating them;" and the third is as follows: "That the said Crocheron is not an immoral man." By the fourth finding the court found: "That said Crocheron is a man of insobriety and intemperate habits, that he is addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, and that he is lacking in integrity." The evidence amply supports said findings 2 and 3, but the evidence does not support the fourth finding of fact, and there is no evidence whatever to show that said Crocheron is lacking in integrity. The fact that a father is lacking in integrity—does not pay his debts—is no cause for depriving him of the guardianship of his especially where he is a steady and consistent worker. Re Tully Infants, 54 Misc. 184, 105 N. Y. Supp. 858.

But in Re Kershaw, 5 Rob. (La.) 488, it was held that evidence that the father of a minor frequently got drunk, together with the testimony based on suspicion of two or three witnesses that he kept a slave as a concubine, is not sufficient to show notorious bad conduct within the Louisiana statute, especially where it appears by the testimony of several witnesses that the father is inoffensive when drunk, that at other times he is quiet and a good citizen, that he does not drink as frequently as formerly, and that he manifests the warmest affection for his child, and is boarding her in a respectable family, the court saying that a finding of notorious bad conduct cannot be based upon light or doubtful testimony, but that, on the other hand, the case must be a very strong one.

That the father never is competent to act as guardian of his minor child, see Senseman's Appeal, 21 Pa. 331, as set out supra, II.

c. Mother.

1. In general.

It may safely be stated that the courts generally require clear and convincing proof of the fitness, for, as before stated, the presumption is that the parent is a suitable person for appointment as guardian, and the courts are reluctant to decree a separation of parent and child. Re Snowball, 156 Cal. 240, 104 Pac. 444; Re Lindner, 13 Cal. App. 208, 109 Pac. 101; Eldridge v. Lippincott, 1 N. J. L. 397. But notoriously bad conduct is sufficient to exclude a mother from appointment to the tutorship of her minor children. Hoyle's Succession, 109 La. 623, 33 So. 625.

In the following cases a question of fact as to the suitability of the mother has arisen.

Thus, it has been held that the fact that the mother has no means to support and maintain her minor child will not prevent her appointment as guardian of such child, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

where she is otherwise entitled thereto. Ramsay v. Ramsay, 20 Wis. 507.

And in Louisiana, it is held that non-residence of itself is not a bar to the appointment of a widow as tutrix of her minor son, where he has interests in the state. Gaine's Succession, 42 La. Ann. 699, 7 So. 788.

The fact that a mother of minors twelve years before, and while the wife of their father, had for a short time sustained immoral relations with a third person, is not of itself sufficient to render her unfit to act as guardian to such children, where such acts were condoned by her husband, and thereafter she lived a virtuous and blameless life. Re Tank, 129 Wis. 629, 109 N. W. 565.

Nor do general statements by manifestly unfriendly witnesses that the child was always filthy, and that the widowed mother did not keep her house clean, without any showing as to real knowledge possessed by such witnesses, warrant a finding that the mother is not a fit person to have the care of her child, there being nothing tending to show any loose or immoral conduct upon her part, or any neglect which has ever injured the health or physical well-being of the child. Re Lindner, 13 Cal. App. 208, 109 Pac. 101.

But where the mother seeking guardianship of her infant child has confessedly led a disreputable life from early girlhood, has exhibited no affection or anxiety for the child, although living apart from it for seven years, has an illegitimate child in an orphan asylum, and evidently seeks not so much the custody of the child, as the patrimony provided it by the deceased father, her petition will be denied on the ground of unfitness. Re Meech, 1 Connolly, 535, 7 N. Y. Supp. 257.

And a widow who has lived in concubinage with a man from whom she has had children during her widowhood, and who is considered by her class as depraved, is amenable to the charge of "notorious bad conduct" sufficient to exclude her from the tutorship of her minor children under the Louisiana statute, although she has ceased children. The evidence shows conclusively that he is a man of honor and strict integrity in his dealings with his fellow men. The petitioner undertook by his evidence to cast some reflection on Crocheron's integrity by showing that he had been elected assessor and tax collector for two terms in Owyhee county, and that he was short in his accounts as such officer. The evidence also shows that when the matter was called to his attention, he at once put up sufficient money with the clerk of the board of county commissioners of said county to cover all shortage that could in any manner occur, and that the clerk failed to pay over said money on any shortage that was found against him; that he thereafter paid said shortage, whatever it was, a second time.

So far as his insobriety and intemperate habits are concerned, the evidence shows that he did drink some; that he at times became a little hilarious; but the evidence fails to show that because of his intemperate habits he was ever unfitted to perform his duties as an officer, or attend to his own business affairs. The evidence does not show that he was incompetent at any time to transact his own business, and nowhere shows that he is unsuitable to act as the guardian of said two minor children.

It appears from the record that Joseph Babington, the guardian appointed by the probate court, was the stepfather of Crocheron's deceased wife; that Crocheron was married to her in October, 1897, in Owyhee all intimate intercourse with her paramour and lived an exemplary life for eighteen months, such circumstances being insufficient to show reformation, and to warrant intrusting her with the custody and control of the persons and property of the minor children of the marriage. Le Blanc's Succession, 37 La. Ann. 546.

And where it appears that the mother of an infant had been separated from the father for several years for her fault, and that she was engaged in a disreputable business and kept a disreputable house, such mother will be deemed an unsuitable person to be appointed guardian of such infant, as against one who is a suitable person, and with whom the child has been living for three years at the request of the father. Burmeister v. Orth, 5 Redf. 259.

And under a statute entitling the parents to the guardianship of their minor children when competent to transact business and not otherwise unsuitable, the mother of a child which had resided with another from the age of two and one half to nearly twelve years without having seen its mother is "unsuitable," where the conditions are such, because of acts of the parent, that the care and custody of the child cannot be changed without endangering its happiness and welfare. Andrino v. Yates, 12 Idaho, 618, 87 Pac. 787.

And it has been held that a mother demonstrates herself to be an unfit person to have the custody and care of her minor children by committing them to an almshouse and abandoning her right as natural mother. Phillips's Petition, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 745. See also Com. ex rel. Philips v. Klemesen, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 165.

So the natural mother of a minor, by consenting to an adoption of such child under a statute divesting her of all rights, waives any preference to appointment as guardian of such child upon the death of its adopted parents, to which she might otherwise have been entitled under a statute providing that the mother is entitled to the guardianship of her minor children in case of the decease of the father. Re Mas- terson, 45 Wash. 48, 122 Am. St. Rep. 886, 87 Pac. 1047.

And a mother will be denied guardianship of the property of her son, who lacks but one and one-half years of majority, where the sole object and motive of her application for appointment was to demonstrate to him her maternal rights, and enforce complete obedience to her during minority as to all his matters. Re Wyckoff, 67 Misc. 1, 124 N. Y. Supp. 625

2. Effect of remarriage.

In California, before its annexation to the United States, the mother of an infant by a former marriage, under the prevailing Mexican law, could not be appointed guardian after her second marriage. Brady v. Reese, 51 Cal. 457.

And where the common-law limitations on the rights of married women have not been removed, it is held that the mother of a minor, living with a second husband, though otherwise competent, cannot be appointed guardian of the minor's estate. Holley v. Chamberlain, 1 Redf. 333. See also Swartwout v. Swartwout, 2 Redf. 52.

But where the common-law restrictions have been removed, it is held that the fact that the mother of an infant whose father is dead is living with a second husband furnishes no objection to her appointment as general guardian of such child. Re Hermance, 2 Dem. 1. And under guardianship statutes which do not specify disabilities as to married women, an intelligent and worthy woman, although remarried, is, with the consent of her husband, competent to be appointed guardian of her minor children, provided the husband also is a suitable person. Ex parte Maxwell, 19 Ind. 88; Palmer v. Oakley, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 433, 47 Am. Dec. 41 (in this case the question of the suitability of the husband was not raised); Goss v. Stone, 63 Mich. 319, 29 N. W. 735 (suitableness of husband not discussed). And see Re X, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 265 [1899] 1 Ch. 526, 80 L. T. N. S. 311, 47 Week. Rep. 345, wherein it was held county; that she was the daughter of Mrs. Babington by a former husband; that the Babingtons have resided in Owyhee county for forty-odd years. It appears that Crocheron was assessor of said county for two terms, commencing in 1891 and 1892, and also in 1895 and 1896, and was elected sheriff of that county in the fall of 1896, and held that office for two years; that thereafter he was for a time connected with a saloon in Silver City. Thereafter he removed to Bruneau in said county with his family, and was appointed postmaster there. Thereafter he went to his mother's ranch on Sinkers creek in that county, and remained there for a time. It appears that his wife was very much attached to her mother and her stepfather, the Babingtons, and that the mother had been opposed to the marriage of Crocheron to her daughter; that they quite frequently visited the Crocheron ranch, and often took Mrs. Crocheron home with them, without consulting her husband. It appears that the Babingtons were very much prejudiced against Crocheron, and that during his term of office he was addicted to strong drink to some extent. All of the evidence as to his habit of drinking applies to his conduct some four years prior to the commencement of these proceedings, and the record contains no evidence showing that he has been addicted to the drink habit for about four years immediately preceding the commencement of these proceedings. Crocheron became discontented, and was not pleased with the influence the Babingtons had over his wife, and he urged his wife to go with him to Pocatello, Idaho, or elsewhere, and make a home, but she absolutely refused to leave her stepfather and mother. This condition continued up to March, 1904, when appellant left his wife, on his mother's ranch, and went to Pocatello and sought employment there. He was out of employment for some time, then worked in the railroad yards there, and then with a fence and bridge gang; also cut timbers for a coal mine, and worked for a time near Minidoka and Twin Falls in Idaho, and on June 23, 1906, he went to work for his brother-in-law, a Mr. Hyde, at Thousand Springs, in this state, and continued to work for him until July 20, 1907. He thereafter went to Nevada on a prospecting trip, and was at Elko in that state when informed of his wife's death. He immediately returned to Nampa, where his wife died, attended the funeral, paid all funeral expenses, and desired at that time to take charge of his children, but through the importunities of Mr. Babington, the step-grandfather of his children, and his wife, consented that they remain with them until the holidays of 1907 and 1908.

After Crocheron left his mother's ranch in March, 1904, Mrs. Crocheron and the children remained on the ranch for some months, and then went to her old home, the Babington ranch on Reynolds' creek, in Owyhee county, and remained there for about fifteen months. She then went to Nampa in October, 1905, to place said children in school. The Babingtons purchased a house for her to live in at Nampa, and some articles of furniture, and Mrs. Crocheron resided there with her children from that time until her death, in November, 1907, except during school vacations, which she spent on the Babington ranch at Reynolds' creek. It appears from the evidence that during the time that Crocheron was absent from his family he wrote his wife frequently, and urged her to come and live with him. She positively refused to do so. It also appears that during said time appellant sent her, from month to month, on an average about $30 per month. Besides, she sold some horses that were on the ranch when Crocheron left, and also received the proceeds of the sale of a few head of cattle from Crocheron's brother. The evidence shows that he sent her all of the money he earned during his absence, except what was necessary for his own maintenance. If a month during that time went by without his sending her that remarriage of the mother did not of itself disqualify her from acting as guardian of her minor child, and that the mere fact that the second husband was of a different religion from that of the father was not sufficient to disqualify the mother, where the infant was not interfered with, and was being brought up properly.

In Villareal v. Mellish, 2 Swanst. 533, a mother, although remarried, was appointed guardian of her infant children.

And in Corbet v. Tottenham, 1 Ball & B. 59, 2 Molloy, 319, it was held that a mother is not rendered incompetent to be guardian of the children of her first marriage by the fact that she has children by a second marriage.

tutorship from the civil law, a widow who remarries without being continued in the tutorship of her minor children by a family meeting forfeits such tutorship and cannot be reinstated as natural tutrix, but upon giving bond can be appointed dative tutrix. Re Mossy, 3 Rob. (La.) 390; Webb v. Webb, 5 La. Ann. 595; Puck's Succession, 9 La. Ann. 307; Re Foley, 34 La. Ann. 130; Carbajal's Succession, 111 La. 944, 36 So. 41. See also Marinovich's Succession, 105 La. 106, 29 So. 500.

But under the Roman law (chap. 5, 118th Novel of Justinian) a mother could be appointed tutrix of her minor children only upon renouncing the right to contract a second marriage. Berluchaux v. Berluchaux, 7 La. 545.

G. J. C.

money, it was because he was not earning more than sufficient for his own support. The record fails to show that there was any trouble or dissension between Crocheron and his wife during her lifetime, except that caused by the wife's mother and her stepfather. They were evidently very much prejudiced against Crocheron, perhaps because of his being addicted, to some extent, to the drink habit during the time that he held the offices above mentioned, and up to the time he left his family. Because of their prejudice and influence over his wife the evidence shows that Crocheron was very anxious to take his family from Owyhee county, and away from the influence of the stepfather and mother. There is no evidence in the record that would justify the appellant in leaving his family for forty-four months, and we cannot justify his conduct in that regard, although he furnished them all the money he earned, except what was necessary to maintain himself. The fact of his leaving his family for that length of time, however, would not alone be sufficient to show that he was unfit to have the guardianship of his own children. There is nothing in the record to show that he has not a tender regard for said children, and that it would be against their interests to give him the guardianship of them. The record shows that he desires to place them with his sister, Mrs. Hyde, who, it is conceded by counsel for respondent, is among the very best women of Owyhee county. Mrs. Hyde was a warm friend of the deceased mother during her lifetime, and it also appears that the deceased mother stated to Mrs. Hyde that she desired, in case anything happened to her, that she (Mrs. Hyde) should take charge of the children. And it sufficiently appears that the children would be educated and well cared for if the father had control of them. A brother-in-law and two brothers, and I think the mother of the defendant, reside in Owyhee county, and are among the most respectable people of that county. No valid reason appears why the father should not be given the control of his children. Mr. Babington, the step-grandfather of said children and Mrs. Babington, their grandmother, are respected and honored people, and no doubt have a great affection for the children, but that is no reason, under the law, why the father, he being ready, able, and willing to properly care for and educate them, should be deprived of their guardianship.

The trial court found as a fact that said father was not indigent or incapable of properly providing for said minors and educating them, and that he is not an immoral man. Those findings, as before stated, are amply sustained by the evidence, but there.

is no evidence to show that he is so intemperate in his habits, and so addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, as would deprive him, under the law, of the right to the guardianship of his daughters, and there is no evidence whatever to show that he is not a fit, proper, and competent person to have the guardianship of them. The evidence clearly shows that the appellant is competent to transact his own business, and that he is otherwise suitable to have the guardianship of said children. Therefore, under the provisions of said § 5774, he is entitled to their care and custody.

In Hernandez v. Thomas, 50 Fla. 522, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 203, 111 Am. St. Rep. 137, 39 So. 641, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 446, the court said: "We have held, . . . in accordance with the prevailing rule in American courts, that in awarding the custody of children the paramount consideration is the welfare of the child, rather than the technical legal right of the parent. While this is true, yet the court should not lightly and without good cause invade the natural right of the parent to the custody, care, and control of his infant child." In Re Galleher, 2 Cal. App. 384, 84 Pac. 352, the court said: "It is well settled in this state that a parent is entitled to the guardianship of his child under the age of fourteen years, if he is a fit, proper, and competent person, in preference to any other person." See also Markwell v. Pereles, 95 Wis. 406, 69 N. W. 798. In Ex parte Davidge, 72 S. C. 16, 51 S. E. 269, the court holds that the welfare of the children must be considered, but that the parent's right to the love and influence of his children, and the happiness they bring him, must also be recognized and considered along with the interest of the children, and says: "To separate a child from its parent is therefore a very strong measure, justified only by convincing proof of the parent's unfitness. No inflexible rule can be laid down by which unfitness may be determined. Each case must be decided on its own peculiar facts; but manifestly it is not sufficient to prove the poverty of the parent, and that financial benefit will come to the child from separation, or that the parent has faults of disposition and behavior somewhat unusual and trying. The condition in life, or the character and habits of the parent, must be shown to be such that provision for the child's ordinary comfort and contentment, or for its intellectual and moral development, cannot be reasonably expected at his hands." In Watts v. Lively, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 60 S. W. 676, the court said: "As aptly said by the trial court, the issue was to what is for the best interest of the child is not determined by showing in whose custody it would likely be more comfortably reared. In order to overcome the presumption of law that the best interest of the child would be subserved by placing it in the custody of the father, who is responsible for its being, and who, under the laws of God and man, is held responsible for its care and protection, it must plainly appear that the father is unworthy of the trust." The supreme court of Indiana, in Gilmore v. Kitson, 165 Ind. 402, 74 N. E. 1083, said: "Courts must not be tempted to interfere with the natural order of family life, except in special cases of extreme urgency. . . . Paternal control of the family has been a fundamental principle in the history of mankind, and its free exercise, restricted only in the interest of humanity and good morals, is essential to the highest development of the race. What influence more likely to lead to despondency and self-destruction than the unnatural separation of a parent from his child, and what greater stimulus to worthy ambition and noble endeavor on the part of a father than the care and companionship of his motherless girl?" In Weir v. Marley, 99 Mo. 484, 6 L.R.A. 672, 12 S. W. 798, the court held that, where it was sought to deprive a father of the custody of his child, the burden is upon him who avers such unfitness; that the presumptions are against it. In Rust v. Vanvactor, 9 W. Va. 600, the court said: "The father is the natural guardian of his infant children, and, in the absence of good and sufficient reasons shown to the judge or court, such as ill usage, grossly immoral principles or habits, want of ability, etc., is entitled to their custody, care, and education. It seems that all the authorities concur on this point. [Cites many authorities.] The custody of the minor will be assigned to the person having the right, unless it appears he is an improper person to take it." In Andrino v. Yates, 12 Idaho, 618, 87 Pac. 787, this court held that, where the legal right of a parent to the guardianship of a child is not clear, the best interests of the child will govern the decision of the court. In the case at bar, however, the legal right of the father to the guardianship of said minors clearly appears, and under the law he is entitled to the guardianship of them.

The decision of the lower court must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the District Court to make findings of fact and conclusions of law in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion, and to certify the same back to the Probate Court, with directions to appoint the said A. B. Crocheron guardian of said minor children. Costs are awarded to appellant.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Stewart, J., on May 17, 1909, handed down the following additional opinion:

A petition for a rehearing has been filed in this case, and counsel urges, with much zeal and vigor, that the court failed to give due consideration to the evidence under the former decisions of this court. The argument of counsel is based upon two propositions: First, that the district court, in appointing a guardian under the statute, is vested with discretion; second, that there was a conflict in the evidence in this case as to the fitness and suitability of Crocheron for appointment as guardian; and, there being a conflict, the findings of the trial court should not be set aside. Were the members of this court unacquainted with the usual zeal and enthusiasm with which counsel for the respondent always presents the cause of his client, the court would be unable to fully account for the extreme views counsel has taken as to what is shown by the record in this case. From counsel's contention we must at once conclude that the parent of a minor child has no natural right to the care and custody of such child, and that in the selection of a guardian for a minor the probate court is vested with the discretion to take the custody of a minor away from its parents, and give such custody to another, from the simple fact that in so doing the child may be surrounded with greater material comforts than if given to the parent, and by so doing may give effect to the wishes of the child, although only eight or nine years of age. Such, however, is not the law.

The application for the appointment of a guardian of a minor under the laws of this state is a statutory proceeding, and the power of the court is fixed and determined by the statute. The usual powers exercised by courts of equity are not given to the court in making an appointment of a guardian under the laws of this state. Re Campbell, 130 Cal. 380, 62 Pac. 613. By the provisions of § 5770, Rev. Codes, the power of the court to appoint a guardian is limited to cases "of minors who have no guardian legally appointed by will or deed." In making such appointment, § 5774, Rev. Codes, requires the court to appoint the father or mother as such guardian, if competent to transact his own business, and not otherwise unsuitable. This section is compulsory as to requiring the father or mother to be appointed if competent to transact his own business, and not otherwise unsuitable. The statute leaves open for investigation the competency of the father or mother to transact his own business, and, if thus competent, whether he is otherwise unsuitable. In this case there is no contention whatever, and no evidence was offered to the effect that Crocheron, the father, was not competent to transact his own business. It is claimed, however, by respondent, and it is upon this point counsel so earnestly argue, that the evidence shows that Crocheron was otherwise unsuitable. Counsel seems to be able to gather great consolation from the case of Andrino v. Yates, 12 Idaho, 618, 87 Pac. 787, and seems to think that that case is decisive of the question under consideration. In that case this court held: "Of course the legal rights of the parent must be respected, and the law contemplates that those rights may have been abandoned, surrendered, transferred, or forfeited;" and, in that case throughout, this court clearly recognized the legal right of the parent, but held that, under the facts of that case, the parent had abandoned, surrendered, and forfeited her right to the custody of such child. But such is not the finding of the court or the proof in this case.

Counsel often quotes in his petition for a rehearing, as he did in his brief, that the "welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided." This expression is not intended to convey the impression that in appointing a guardian the court can ignore the requirements of the statute, and appoint a person other than the father and mother, unless such father or mother are incompetent to transact their own business, or are otherwise unsuitable. This expression, as well as the statute, does not mean that the father is unsuitable because he is poor, or because he is unable to provide as palatial a home or surroundings as some other person, or because at times he indulges in the use of intoxicating liquors, or because at times he is unable to, or does not, pay his debts. If the court has the discretion of taking away from the parent his legal right to the custody of a child from the mere fact that the parent is poor or unable at times to pay his debts when due, or that he indulges at times in the use of intoxicating liquors, then the legal right of the parent would be of but little force, and the courts might be kept busy transferring the custody of minors from their natural guardian, the parent, to strangers. The supreme court of California in the case of Re Salter, 142 Cal. 412, 76 Pac. 51, in discussing this question, says: "But even if the father were poor and unable to provide for the child as comfortably as his grandmother could, or would be compelled to maintain him at his place of abode in Los Angeles under the circumstances found by the lower court, these considerations would furnish no legal ground for depriving him of the custody of the child. They apply merely to its material temporal welfare; and, if such considerations were controlling, they could, in every instance where poverty was the misfortune of a parent, be invoked to deprive him of his child in favor of one more fortunately situated and better able to minister to its material comfort. Common humanity would be shocked at the serious maintenance of such a proposition."

In this case the court finds that the father is not indigent, and is capable of properly providing for said minors and educating them; that he is not an immoral man, but he is a man of insobriety and intemperate habits, and is addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors and lacking in integrity. It will thus be seen, as stated in the former opinion, that the only finding which could be construed as supporting the conclusion reached by the court that Crocheron was an unsuitable person to be appointed guardian is the finding that he is a man of "insobriety and intemperate habits, and lacking in integrity." This finding, however, does not satisfy the requirements of the statute. In the first place, lack of integrity is not a legal ground for depriving a father of his child. "Integrity," as defined in the Standard Dictionary, means: "Uprightness of character and soundness of moral principle; honesty; probity; as, his business career showed his integrity." In this finding the court evidently did not use the word "integrity" in the sense that it meant upright-ness of character and soundness of moral principle, for the court has expressly found that the father is not an immoral man. The court must have used the word "integrity" in the sense that the father was not honest in his business transactions. But we know of no principle of law which would authorize a court to take a child away from a father because there was evidence of the father's dishonesty in his business transactions.

So, the only matter left for consideration is the finding that the father is a man of insobriety and intemperate habits, and is addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors. Just what the court meant by this statement it is difficult to understand; but, reading the finding in connection with the evidence, the latter shows that certain parties testified that about four years prior to the time the case was tried in the probate court, the father's reputation for sobriety was bad. There was some evidence that at times he became a little hilarious, but this was all. There was no evidence that the father drank to excess, or that his drinking had a demoralizing or degrading effect upon him, or that it unfitted him to associate with his children, or would in any way degrade them. Intemperance might unfit a person to have the custody of his minor children, but to do so it should clearly appear that the parent was so intemperate that he was an habitual drunkard, and that his conduct would have a tendency to demoralize and degrade his children. This, however, the court does not find, and there is no evidence whatever to support such conclusion. On the contrary, the court did find that the father was not immoral, and was capable of providing for his minor children and educating them. This finding, taken in connection with the finding that the father was intemperate, would clearly indicate that such intemperance did not render the father unfit to provide for and educate his children, and did not result in immorality. If so, there was no legal reason why the father should be denied the custody of his children.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Sullivan, Ch. J., concurs.

Allshtle, J., concurring:

In concurring in the order denying a rehearing in this case I desire to make some special reference to the case of Andrino v. Yates, 12 Idaho, 618, 87 Pac. 787, on which case petitioner appears to have placed his reliance for an affirmance of the judgment in the present case. Being not only familiar with the opinion in that case, but with the record made on which the opinion was written, I desire to call special attention to the salient features of that case, which are radically different from the facts in the case at bar. In that case the mother, who had deserted two husbands, and was living with the third, and who had been somewhat of a rambler herself, abandoned her infant daughter at the age of about eight months, and did not thereafter see her, or demand or undertake to resume her custody, for nearly twelve years; neither did she contribute anything more than a few pittance toward the maintenance, care, or comfort of the child. When she first left the child, she made some temporary provision for its care, but very soon neglected that entirely, and the child was thereafter left to the care of strangers, and such care as the father could give it for the couple of years he lived. Thereafter the child was in the care and custody of its aunt, Mrs. Yates, who was finally appointed its guardian by the probate court. Subsequent to the appointment of Mrs. Yates as guardian of the child, the mother, Mrs. Andrino, applied to this court for a writ of habeas corpus. This court examined both the mother and child in open court, and heard other witnesses. It there appeared clearly and satisfactorily to the court, as stated in that opinion, that "her original legal right as mother was abandoned, forfeited or surrendered" by her continuous conduct, running through a period of nearly a dozen years, and that she could not, at that late date, be heard to reassert her maternal right as the natural guardian of the child "to the manifest injury of the child;" that "her strict legal custody has ceased to be a rightful custody, and she is equitably estopped from asserting it as a legal right." In that case the principle of both abandonment and estoppel were invoked against the mother. Her alleged unfitness on other grounds, and for other reasons was considered merely as incidental and cumulative reasons for not restoring to her the custody of a child, then a dozen years old, that she had for more than eleven years abandoned to the mercies, charity, and good offices of strangers and relatives. Her actual unfitness for its custody at the time was not the real reason for denying her its custody. Upon consideration of these questions, and of the decisive points upon which the Andrino Case turned, it must at once be apparent that the case at bar differs essentially and materially from that case. Here the father never abandoned the children. The fact that he left his wife for a time in no sense constituted an abandonment of his minor children. They were in the custody of their mother, who appears to have taken the best of care of them. He had no quarrel with the mother, but his quarrel was with the mother-in-law, and father-in-law. During all this time he was contributing abundantly, and in fact all of his earnings, for the care and maintenance of the mother and children. As soon as the mother died, he at once asserted his natural and legal right to the care and custody of his minor children.

Passing briefly to the grounds of incompetency urged in this case, I will say that no case has ever been called to my attention where a parent was denied the custody of his or her minor children on the grounds of dishonesty in business dealings, or of untruthfulness or failure to pay debts and legal obligations. If that were a legal ground for taking a man's child away from him, it would certainly play havoc with the homes of some very prominent men in the business, commercial, and social world, if we can rightly judge from the records that are daily brought before us in civil actions. I have no doubt, on the other hand, but that drunkenness is a ground for depriving a father of the custody of his children. The question of the degree and extent of the habit must determine in every case the fitness or unfitness of the parent to continue the care and custody of his children. What to my mind might seem to disqualify one from continuing the care and custody of his children might not be considered sufficient by someone else. But it is clear to me that whenever a man becomes so addicted to the use of intoxicating drink that he can be classed as an inebriate or habitual drunkard, or as dangerous to the physical or moral welfare of his children by reason of his violent character or of his immoral habits and practices, he is no longer fit to have the custody of children. In this case, however, the evidence does not show that the father is a drunkard, or that he is addicted to the use of intoxicating drink at the present time, or ever has been, except occasionally. It is true a doctor testified that he had seen him when he was drinking, and that Crocheron became "hilarious." Now if this word "hilarious" does not have a barroom meaning that differs from its ordinary English meaning as defined in the lexicons, it does not imply that he was in a drunken condition. It should also be remembered that in this kind of case the question is not a man's reputation, but his actual conduct, that must be the test.

Lassing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 5, 1889, George E. Phillips, a resident of the state of Wisconsin, made application for a policy of insurance in the Union Central Life Insurance Company, through its local agent at Oshkosh, in that state. This application was forwarded by the local agent to the home office of the company in Cincinnati, Ohio, and was accepted by the company, and a policy issued according to the terms set out in the application, insuring the life of said Phillips for $2,000 for an annual premium of $58.18. At the request of the applicant, his wife, Laura B. Phillips, was named as the beneficiary therein. The policy was sent to the agent at Oshkosh, by him delivered to Phillips, and the first premium paid to said agent. Thereafter the insured and his wife removed to the state of Illinois, where they separated in 1891. Following their separation, the insured moved to Paducah, Kentucky, where he resided until his death in 1906. In 1893, Phillips instituted a suit for divorce against his wife, Laura B. Phillips, and upon final hearing a decree was entered, granting him an absolute divorce from her. In the course of time, he married again, and his former wife, who continued to make Illinois her home, intermarried with one Clarey, and still resides in that state. After his separation and divorce from his wife, the insured presented the policy to the company for its consent to an assignment by his former wife to himself of all her interest therein; and he later borrowed money on this policy from the company and pledged it as security.

The insured died May 17, 1906. His wife qualified as administratrix, and upon making proof of her husband's death collected the amount due on the policy, after deducting the amount of her husband's indebtedness to the company. After the lapse of more than a year from the death of the insured, his former wife, Laura B. Clarey, instituted a suit in the McCracken circuit court against the insurance company, in which she sought to recover the amount of this policy, upon the theory that, as she was named beneficiary therein, the company had no right to pay it to anyone else.

The company pleaded the facts, the separation from her husband, the assignment and transfer of her interest in the policy to him, and the settlement with his administratrix. It further pleaded the provision of the policy to the effect that no suit to recover under it should be brought after one year from the death of the insured, that the contract was entered into and to be performed in the state of Wisconsin, and that, under the laws of Wisconsin, where the contract was made, and the laws of the state of Ohio as well, where the policy was issued, such a condition is valid, binding, and enforceable. The plaintiff traversed all of the material allegations of the answer, except that she admitted that under the laws of the states of Wisconsin and Ohio the clause in the contract, providing that no suit should be brought to recover under the policy after one year from the death of the insured, was a binding, legal, and enforceable obligation. But she pleaded that, as the insured died in Kentucky, the contract should be construed according to the laws of this state, and not of the state where the contract was made or to be performed. Several issues of law and fact were made by the pleadings, and upon motion the case was transferred to equity and 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tried by the chancellor. Upon a full consideration he adjudged that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and dismissed her suit. From that judgment, she appeals.

It is stated in brief that the chancellor was of opinion that the clause in the contract, denying the right of the plaintiff to maintain a suit on the contract after one year from the death of the insured, was a binding and enforceable provision, and as the suit was not instituted within the year plaintiff could not maintain it. We will dispose of this question first.

There is no dispute whatever as to the facts. At the time the contract was entered into, the plaintiff resided in Wisconsin, and the insurance company is an Ohio corporation. It is conceded that, under the laws of both Wisconsin and Ohio, the provision under consideration is a valid, binding, and enforceable provision, so that, if this contract is to be controlled, either by the laws of the state of Wisconsin, where it was made, or the laws of the state of Ohio, the residence of the insurance company, plaintiff lost any right that she had to maintain the suit by permitting more than a year to run before instituting same. On the other hand, if the contract is to be construed according to the laws of this state, where the insured died, then, under the rule announced by this court, in Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Spinks, 119 Ky. 261, 69 L.R.A. 264, 83 S.W. 615, 84 S.W. 1160, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 913, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 453, 85 S.W. 719, such provision cannot be accepted as a bar to plaintiff's right to prosecute the suit, for the reason that in the Spinks Case it was expressly held that such a provision was against the public policy of this state, and for that reason void. The contract in the Spinks Case was controlled by the laws of this state, for the reason that it was made and entered into in this state, Spinks being a resident of this state at the time. For the appellant it is insisted that, inasmuch as the insured had made Kentucky his home for several years prior to his death, and died here and his estate was administered here, the rule announced in the Spinks Case must control. For appellee it is insisted that the contract must be controlled by the laws of the place where it was made and entered into or to be performed, and that, for the purposes of this case, it is immaterial whether it is controlled by the laws of the state of Wisconsin or the state of Ohio, and that it is entirely immaterial where the insured resided after the contract was made and entered into, or where he died and his estate was administered.

where it is made. In 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 582, it is stated that: "The law of the place where the contract is entered into at the time of making the same is as much a part of the contract as though it were expressed therein." Again, in 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 667, it is stated that prima facie the "proper law of the contract is presumed to be the law of the country where the contract is made (lex loci contractus); this presumption applies with special force when the contract is to be performed wholly in the country where it is made, or may be performed anywhere, but it may apply to a contract partly or even wholly to be performed in another country. In other words, the proper law of a contract is the law of the place where it is made. This law . . . governs not only as to its execution, authentication, and construction, but also as to the legal obligations arising from it, and as to what is to be deemed a performance, satisfaction, or discharge."

The decisions of this court are in harmony and accord with the principle thus announced, and in Ford v. Buckeye State Ins. Co. 6 Bush, 133, 99 Am. Dec. 663, this court held that where a contract, made in Indiana, was not enforceable under the laws of that state, it would not be enforced in this state. And in Jameson v. Gregory, 4 Met. (Ky.) 363, it was held that the legality of a contract must be decided by the laws of the state in which it was made. In Archer v. National Ins. Co. 2 Bush, 226, it was held that the validity and legality of a contract executed in Indiana must be determined by the laws of that state. In Young v. Harris, 14 B. Mon. 556, 61 Am. Dec. 170, this court, through Chief Justice Marshall, said: "The general principle determining the law by which a contract is to be construed is that, unless the place appointed for its payment be different from that in which it is made, it is to be governed by the law of the place where it is made, which is the lex loci contractus." In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Eubanks, 100 Ky. 591, 36 L.R.A. 711, 66 Am. St. Rep. 361, 38 S. W. 1068, it is said that "the general rule is that the law of the place where the contract is to be performed governs, subject, of course, to the rule that a contract which is void by the law of the place where made is void everywhere." And in Hyatt v. Bank of Kentucky, 8 Bush, 193, it was held, where a note was executed in Louisiana, that as between the maker of the note and the payee its legal effect must be determined by the law of that state.

It will thus be seen to be the law of this state that in construing contracts made and to be performed in another state, the law of the state where the contract is made and to be performed controls; but this law, like any other fact, must be proven. In the case at bar it is admitted in the pleading.

Applying the foregoing principles to the case under consideration, whether this contract is to be construed and governed by the laws of the state of Wisconsin, where it was made, or the laws of the state of Ohio, where it is claimed it was to be performed, is wholly immaterial, for it certainly must be construed, and the rights of the parties thereunder determined, by the laws of one or the other of these states, and in either event the contention of appellee must be upheld. As plaintiff had no right to prosecute the suit, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the other questions raised.

Judgment affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN B. FLOYD

v.

J. B. DUFFY, Admr., etc., of Patrick Duffy, et al., Appts.

Trust — creation — necessity of writing.

1. Creations and declarations of trusts in lands may be made and proved in this state as they could be in England, before, the English statute of frauds; the 7th section of that statute, requiring the proof of such creations and declarations to be in writing, never having been in force in this state.

Constructive trust — establishment — absence of writing.

2. Though no contract for the sale of land is enforceable, either at law or in equity, unless it be in writing, and no estate in land for more than five years can pass except by deed or will, there are many instances in which courts of equity except

Headnotes by POTTENBARGER, J.

Note. — Validity of parol partnership to deal in land.

This note supplements the notes to Bates v. Babcock, 16 L.R.A. 745, and Scheuer v. Cochem, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 427.

The rule that partnership agreements for the purchase and sale of real estate are not within the statute of frauds is sustained by the majority of the cases in point decided since those notes.

In Garth v. Davis, 120 Ky. 106, 117 Am. St. Rep. 571, 85 S. W. 692, it is held that a verbal agreement to become partners to deal in real estate is not within the statute of frauds.

So, in Buckley v. Doige, 188 N. Y. 238, transactions relating to land from the operation of these provisions, on the ground that they stand upon equities independent of the contracts attending them, and establish constructive trusts in favor of grantors, as well as persons not mentioned in the deed.

Statute of frauds — agreement to subdivide and sell land — common purpose.

3. A conveyance of the legal title to land obtained by the grantee in pursuance of a verbal agreement between himself and a third party, prior in date to the deed or contemporaneous therewith, for their common benefit, no purchase money having been paid by either of them, and it having been the intention and agreement of the parties to sell the land in small portions, and pay for the same out of the proceeds thereof as sold, and reconvey all that should remain unsold after a certain date, is not within the statute of frauds; and, by virtue thereof, the grantee took the legal title in trust for himself, the grantor, and such third party.

Same — partnership agreement — trust.

4. If, in pursuance of a prior or contemporaneous agreement of copartnership to purchase and sell land for profit, one of the parties obtain a conveyance of the land to himself, proof of such agreement and conveyance, pursuant thereto, establishes a trust in the lands in favor of the other partner, not inhibited by the statute of frauds.

80 N. E. 913, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 263, and in Stitt v. Rat Portage Lumber Co. 98 Minn. 52, 107 N. W. 824, a copartnership for dealing in real estate may be created by parol.

In Vaught v. Hogue, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1061, 107 S. W. 757, it is held that where it is agreed that one should furnish another money to buy a certain tract of land, and that the latter should repay the money so furnished, and that all the profit made on the transaction should be divided equally between them, the contract is not within the statute of frauds, whether the parties be regarded as partners in the transaction or jointly interested in the venture.

So, in Mallon v. Buster, 121 Ky. 379, 123 Am. St. Rep. 201, 89 S. W. 257, it is held that a parol partnership formed by bidders at a judicial sale, to buy and divide the land, is not within the statute of frauds.

And in Griffin v. Schlenk, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 422, 102 S. W. 837, it is held that a parol contract between joint owners of real property, that one is to bid at a public sale of it for the benefit of all, is valid.

An agreement between two parties to purchase real estate at commissioners' sale, one to advance the purchase money by way of loan, and the property to be taken by them on shares, is not within the statute. Wiedemann v. Crawford, 142 Ky. 303, 134 S. W. 495.

So, an agreement between two persons to purchase, develop, and sell lands on joint Pleading — proof — agreement — equity.

5. While, in equity, the allegata and probata must correspond, the rules for the enforcement of this principle in courts of equity are more liberal than those applied in actions at law, and an agreement in matters of substance only is required; it being sufficient that the cause of action made out by the bill and the evidence is substantially the same.

Appeal — failure to mature bill — effect.

6. If on appeal it appears that the original bill is broad enough to admit the evidence and sustain the decree pronounced, the decree will not be reversed for failure to mature an amended bill unnecessarily filed.

Pleading — amendment — meeting case.

7. The trial court may properly allow an amended bill to be filed, after the evidence taken has developed a state of facts variant from those set up in the original bill, but not constituting a departure as defined by the courts, nor a new cause of action.

Appeal — allowing amendment — interference.

8. The exercise of the discretion of the trial court in permitting an amended bill to be filed will not be disturbed by an appellate court, except in cases of abuse of such discretion.

account, and share equally in the profits and losses of the venture, is not within the statute of frauds, but constitutes them partners to the extent of the undertaking governed by it. Morgart v. Smouse, 103 Md. 463, 115 Am. St. Rep. 367, 63 Atl. 1070, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1140.

And a parol partnership for the purchase and sale of land for speculation, the profits to be divided among the partners, is not within the statute. Miller v. Ferguson, 107 Va. 249, 122 Am. St. Rep. 840, 57 S. E. 649, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 138.

So, a parol agreement for a joint mining venture, in which both parties stipulated to contribute services and money for their joint and equal benefit, is not within the statute. Cascaden v. Dunbar, 84 C. C. A. 556, 157 Fed. 62.

So, a contract, upon sufficient consideration, to divide the profits of a purchase and sale of land, need not be in writing. Rice v. Parrott, 76 Neb. 501, 107 N. W. 840, affirmed on rehearing in 76 Neb. 505, 111 N. W. 583.

And a verbal agreement made by parties, to share in the profits of a contemplated speculation in mining property, does not involve such an interest in real estate as to bring it within the statute of frauds. Jones v. Patrick, 140 Fed. 403.

In Rauch v. Donovan, 126 App. Div. 52, 110 N. Y. Supp. 690, it is held that an agreement for a joint venture with respect to a parcel of land, title to be taken in one of the parties, to be held on their joint ac-

24 S. E. 569; Spurgin v. Spurgin, 47 W. Va. 38, 34 S. E. 750.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of the bill in this cause was an accounting by the estate of Patrick F. Duffy, deceased, for one half of the proceeds of the sale of a large number of town lots, and partition of a few lots remaining unsold out of the property, all of which the bill alleges was conveyed to Duffy, to hold in trust for himself and the plaintiff, John B. Floyd.

The plaintiff proceeds upon the theory of a purchase of 137 lots, constituting what is known as the McClung addition to the city of Charleston, at the price of $30,000, none of which was paid or intended to be paid at the date of the conveyance, but all to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the lots, at prices per lot agreed upon between McClung, the grantor in the deed to Duffy, on the one hand, and Duffy and Floyd on the other, if the lots could be sold within a specified time, and, if not, the balance to be paid or settled by a reconveyance of the unsold lots at the prices agreed upon in the collateral agreement. While the deed from McClung to Duffy recites the payment of $6,000 in cash and the execution of three promissory notes for $8,000 each, the concount and sold and the profits divided, is not an agreement for the sale of property or for the conveyance of an interest in land, within the statute of frauds, and need not be in writing.

And in Pounds v. Egbert, 117 App. Div. 756, 102 N. Y. Supp. 1079, it is held that while an agreement to form a copartnership to deal in lands does not involve any element violative of the statute of frauds, yet, if such agreement also provides for a conveyance of real property from one partner to another or to the copartnership, it then provides for the creation of an estate or interest in lands, and comes directly within the statute of frauds.

On the other hand, the following cases adopt the rule that such agreements are contracts respecting an interest in land, and void by the statute of frauds if not in writing:

A parol contract by which two persons enter into a partnership to purchase real estate, one to furnish the money and take the title, and convey a half interest to the other upon receiving his share of the purchase price, is void under the statute of frauds. Scheuer v. Cochem, 126 Wis. 209, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 427, 105 N. W. 573.

So, a parol promise to conduct partnership dealings in real estate is void under the statute of frauds. Langley v. Sanborn, 135 Wis. 178, 114 N. W. 787.

An a parol agreement that a third party should furnish one member of a partnership dealing in real estate money to purchase in his own name his copartner's interest, and hold it for said third party's benefit, is invalid as being within the statute. Butts v. Cooper, 152 Ala. 375, 44 So. 616.

And an oral agreement to purchase and sell real estate in partnership, and divide the profits, with the understanding that each person shall have an interest in the property, is, although applying to a series of transactions, invalid under the statute of frauds, where no performance takes place except the payment of the necessary incidental expense, the one advancing money for any parcel of land taking the title thereto. Nester v. Sullivan, 147 Mich. 493, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1106, 111 N. W. 85, modified in 147 Mich. 508, 111 N. W. 1033.

In Norton v. Brink, 75 Neb. 566, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 945, 121 Am. St. Rep. 822, 106 N. W. 668, 110 N. W. 669, and in Mancuso v. Rosso, 81 Neb. 786, 116 N. W. 679, it is held that a parol agreement between two persons to purchase a single tract of land together or "in partnership," where the purchase is finally made by one of them, who pays the whole of the purchase price and takes the title to himself, the other simply agreeing to pay him one half thereof on demand, does not create a partnership between such persons, and is within the statute of frauds.

tention of the plaintiff is that no money was paid nor any notes executed at the inception of the transaction, and that no interest on the purchase money was contemplated or paid for a period of three years after the date of the deed, at which time all purchase money was to be paid out of the sales of lots and by reconveyances of the unsold lots, if any. The deed from McClung to Duffy bears date May 7, 1890. Lots were conveyed by Duffy as early as July, 1890, and he continued to make conveyances for a number of years, but, having later become financially embarrassed, and his creditors having acquired liens on the property, he was unable to proceed further with the enterprise. Two of the lots were judicially sold, at the instance of his creditors. About the year 1901, a friend of his purchased a number of the judgments and allowed him to make private sales of sufficient property, through an attorney in fact, appointed for the purpose, to pay off all, or practically all, of his debts. In this way, all of the McClung property, except about thirty-three lots, was sold, and the proceeds went into the hands of Duffy or to his creditors. In March, 1905, Duffy died. At and immediately before the conveyance to Duffy, and from that time until he became financially embarrassed, Floyd undoubtedly had relations with him respecting the property. He was active in effecting sales of the lots. He seems to have incurred some expense in cutting a ditch for the benefit of the property, and otherwise interested himself in the promotion of the enterprise. W. E. R. Byrne, the attorney in fact, and Duffy's heirs, deny all knowledge of any claim on the part of Floyd to any interest in the property until after the death of P. F. Duffy, and say they understood from the latter that Floyd was selling the lots on a commission. Declarations of P. F. Duffy to this effect are put in evidence by witnesses. A large amount of testimony was taken on both sides, and the circuit court of Kanawha county rendered a decree declaring that Duffy took title to the lots in trust for himself and the plaintiff, and referred the cause to a commissioner to state an account between the parties as a basis for a decree giving the relief prayed for in the bill. Pending the suit, the lots remaining unsold at the institution thereof were conveyed by Duffy's heirs to Isaac Loewenstein, in consideration of $27,000; the purchaser paying $7,000 in cash and executing notes for the residue.

As the trust alleged in the bill is predicated on parol evidence, it becomes necessary to determine, in the first instance, whether it can be so established. Assuming the agreement between Floyd and Duffy to have been made before the deed was executed and delivered to the latter, it nevertheless remains that no money was paid on the purchase price by the plaintiff, nor, indeed, anything more than a nominal sum by Duffy. All that was ever paid on the property seems to have been paid after the delivery of the deed. There was no agreement to pay anything otherwise than out of the proceeds of the sale of lots, as such sales should be made; Duffy and Floyd taking the excess of purchase money over the prices named in the collateral agreement, as their profit. Counsel for the appellee frankly admit that the trust is not in writing. They assert it is not a resulting trust, nor a constructive trust, but is an express trust, which the law permits without writing. At common law no particular form of creation or declaration of a trust or use was required. It could be by deed or will, or writing not under seal, or by mere word of mouth. Uses and trusts were simply averred and proved like any other facts, and writing was not required. Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 370, 27 S. E. 329; 28 Am. and Eng. Enc. Law, p. 869; Saunders, Uses & Tr. 152, * 210; Perry, Tr. § 75. In 1676, the English statute of frauds was passed, the 7th section of which required all declarations or creations of trusts or confidences in any land, tenements, or hereditaments to be proved by some writing signed by the party, enabled to declare such trust, or by his last will in writing. Saunders, Uses & Tr. Id.; Perry, Tr. Id. Not being made expressly applicable to the colonies, this statute was never in effect in Virginia (28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 873), but in 1787, Virginia enacted a statute of frauds, the same in many respects as that of England, but omitting said 7th section, relating to declarations of trust. Nor has it ever been incorporated in the statutes of this state. Hence, trusts in land may be declared in this state as at common law. Currence v. Ward, cited. However, every contract relating to land is not a declaration or creation of a trust. There is no pretense that Floyd obtained the legal title to the land. The utmost that he could have had was an equitable title, based upon his parol contract. If he had paid money, his right would have rested not upon the agreement, but upon the payment, upon a fact of which the agreement was a mere attendant. Under the principles declared in Currence v. Ward, it suffices that the payment be made at or before the vesting of the legal title in the trustee. That did not occur in this case. No purchase money was ever paid until after the delivery of the deed. As to this, there is neither controversy nor doubt.

It is insisted, however, that an express oral agreement on the part of the grantee to hold in trust for a third party, antedating the vesting of the legal title, and to which the grantor was not a party, creates an express trust, permissible in this state because our statute of frauds does not require the creation or declaration of a trust to be in writing. Would such an agreement be anything more than a contract to sell land? The purchaser takes the whole title in himself. Nothing is paid by the third party, and, consequently, his claim is based solely upon the agreement, and that agreement calls for the beneficial ownership of all, or a portion, of the property, giving a right to call, in a court of equity, for the conveyance of the legal title. Such third person has no interest whatever in the land. Having had no previous right in it, and not having paid anything, there seems to be nothing upon which a court of equity can predicate relief, resting in conscience, and not upon contract alone.

This seems to put the case within another provision of the English statute of frauds, substantially incorporated in our law, denying remedy upon any agreement or contract for the sale of land, unless it, or a memorandum thereof, is in writing. Code 1906, § 3438. Another statutory provision declares that no estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than five years, in lands, shall be conveyed unless by deed or will. Code 1906, § 3020. These provisions absolutely prevent the acquisition of any estate in land for more than five years by means of a mere verbal contract. There must be something more; an equity outside and independent of, or in addition to, the contract. There are numerous instances of such equities. If one person pay all or part of the purchase money, and the conveyance is made to another, a resulting trust in favor of the party who paid the money arises. If one person has an equity of redemption in land, and another purchases it at forced sale for the benefit of the debtor, taking the title in his own name as a mere security, and so stepping into the shoes of the creditor, the debtor may have the title back on repaying the purchase money; or, if an absolute deed is found to be, under the peculiar circumstances of the transaction, in fact only a mortgage, there is a trust relation.

In all these instances and others to be found in the books, the cestui que trust either put money into the property or had an antecedent interest in the land, constituting substantially the basis of an equity. It is this, not the verbal agreement, that confers right to invoke the aid of a court of equity, notwithstanding the statute of 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

frauds. Such cases are held not to have been within the legislative intent, since to include them would make the statute work injustice, wrong, and oppression. On the same principle, certain cases are excluded, in equity, from its operation, on the ground of actual fraud, since, in that forum, fraud vitiates everything in which it is found. Thus, many of the decisions say the mere intention of a grantee in a voluntary conveyance, that is, a conveyance not made upon a valuable consideration, not to hold in trust for the grantor, if such intention exist at the time of the conveyance, constitutes such fraud as to render the grantee a constructive trustee; he having previously agreed so to hold it. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1194. In cases of this class, the true rule seems to be that there must have been an original misrepresentation by means of which the legal title was obtained; an original intention to circumvent, and get the better bargain, by the confidence reposed (Browne, Stat. Fr. § 94); though some courts say the mere refusal to execute the trust suffices to establish fraud. Here, the ground of equitable relief and immunity from the statute is the fraud perpetrated, not the agreement to hold in trust. All the instances named are designated constructive, not actual, trusts. In some the fraud is constructive; in others it is actual; in all, courts of equity say it is against conscience to permit the holder of the legal title to deny the cestui que trust the benefit intended for him, and the conclusion and determination rest upon the facts and circumstances, not upon the mere sanctity of an agreement. Unless some such circumstances exist, a court of equity looks upon a contract exactly as it is viewed in a court of law. An agreement valid in law is valid in equity, and one not valid at law will not be enforced in equity.

By the great weight of authority, if not, indeed, by all courts, an agreement on the part of one purchasing land with his own money, and taking the conveyance in his own name, to hold it in trust for another person, or to reconvey it to the grantor, is within the statute of frauds. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1188. Likewise, if a voluntary grantee in a conveyance orally agree to hold the land in trust for the grantor, or reconvey it upon demand, or to hold in trust for, or convey to, a third person, the agreement is generally held to be within the statute of frauds, unless circumstances exist constituting an equity, such as confidential relationship between the parties, or fraud in the procurement of the conveyance. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1192. As to this, the authorities are not uniform. Our leading case on this subject is Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567. There, the minority rule seems to have commended itself to the court, as, in the fourth point of the syllabus, it is said that a volunteer will be held to the performance of the parol trust, because to allow him to hold the land obtained by his promise to take it in trust for third parties would permit him to commit a fraud. Hardman v. Orr, in 5 W. Va. 71, permits the establishment of such a trust, and enforces it, but the authorities relied upon in the opinion are not, in a single instance, applicable to the question we are discussing. Hardman, in his lifetime, purchased land with money furnished by Hickman, who directed the conveyance to be made to Hardman, and orally declared the land was to be held by him for the use and benefit of Mrs. Orr, Hickman's natural daughter, and, after a reasonable time, conveyed to her. No reference is made in the opinion to the statute of frauds. The court merely said: "When the land was paid for with the money furnished by Hickman, and the legal title vested in Hardman, the trustee, for the benefit of Mrs. Orr, a perfected and complete gift was made to Mrs. Orr, which may be enforced against the trustee or his heirs." This is followed by the observation that it is competent to prove the objects of a trust by parol evidence. All the cases cited to sustain the first proposition involved trusts created by deed or written contracts, and nowhere in the opinion is the statute of frauds mentioned. The doctrine of Troll v. Carter, above stated, is reiterated in Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 693, 715, and Titchenell v. Jackson, 26 W. Va. 460, 467, 468. The decisions of this court above referred to leave undecided the question whether an agreement on the part of the grantee who has paid a valuable consideration for the land, to hold it in trust for a third party, is within the statute; but, as we have shown, it is held by the great weight of authority to be so, and we think this conclusion accords with reason and principle. If such a case is not within the statute, a trust may be ingrafted, by parol evidence, upon almost any conveyance. Proof of such an agreement is, as we have said, nothing short of a contract to sell and convey land. While the earlier cases do not decide it, Nash v. Jones, 41 W. Va. 769, 24 S. E. 592; Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 367, 27 S. E. 329; and Woods v. Ward, 48 W. Va. 652, 37 S. E. 520, seem to settle the question in accordance with the view here expressed.

In Pennsylvania, where this question has received much learned attention, a distinction has been marked between declarations of trust on the part of the grantor and like declarations on the part of the grantee. In 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Kisler v. Kisler, 2 Watts, 323-325, 27 Am. Dec. 308, Chief Justice Gibson brought his great analytical powers to bear upon it. He said: "That an express trust may be declared by parol, I am not disposed to deny; but if declared by the grantee, and not the grantor, of the legal estate, where its object is not to indicate a beneficiary purpose by the grantor in favor of the cestui que trust, it must, to be binding, be made in consideration of payment of the purchase money by the cestui que trust; and then it would produce no other effect than the law would produce without it. Probably, it was the object of the statute to sustain a gift of the land by the grantor to a person not named in the conveyance; but not a gift by the party purchasing, the execution of which could not be enforced for want of a consideration. If I proclaim that I hold my house for B it is evidence of a trust, which may, however, be rebutted by proof that the beneficial ownership is not in him; for such a declaration is not binding as a gift even of a chattel. But if I convey my house to A, with parol direction to hold it for B, a confidence arises which it would be unconscionable in A to violate; and this would constitute that species of express parol trust which it was the object of our statute to sustain. But if I proclaim that I hold my house for B, on terms of conveying it to him when he shall reimburse me what I paid for it, this is not a trust, but a contract of sale within the operation of the prohibitory clause." See, also, Robertson v. Robertson, 9 Watts, 32; Haines v. O'Conner, 10 Watts, 313, 30 Am. Dec. 180; Fox v. Heffner, 1 Watts & S. 372; Jackman v. Ringland, 4 Watts & S. 149; Blyholder v. Gilson, 18 Pa. 134; Freeman v. Freeman, 2 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 81.

No doubt the McClungs could have declared a parol trust in favor of Floyd, under the principles just stated; but there is no evidence of any such declaration. They dealt with Duffy alone. Floyd was not a party to the deed, nor does it appear that he was a party to the alleged collateral agreement. He dealt with Duffy, and had no prior interest in the land. Hence the case does not fall within that class in which land conveyed for a specific purpose comes back to the grantor upon the failure or accomplishment of such purpose, on the theory of a resulting trust, resting upon implication. In such cases, there is an independent equity in the grantor, growing out of a former beneficial interest in him, which has passed from him only partially or not at all, as in the case of a mortgage in the form of a deed absolute on its face, or the conveyance of land for a specific purpose which fails or has been accomplished, leaving a surplus or residue in the hands of the trustee, or the declaration of a trust by the grantor in favor of a third person. This original beneficial interest, an established fact, shown by parol evidence to have been conveyed only as security for a debt, or to have been placed in the hands of the grantee as trustee for the execution of certain purposes of the grantor, the full accomplishment of which has required the use of only a portion of the property, or which have wholly failed for some reason, constitutes the basis of an equity outside of the deed and measurably independent of it. A state of facts is thus disclosed which makes a claim of absolute ownership on the part of the grantee contrary to conscience, and variant from principles of justice and equity. Hess' Appeal, 112 Pa. 168, 4 Atl. 340; Rice v. Rice, 107 Mich. 241, 65 N. W. 103; Thompson v. Thompson, 30 Neb. 489, 46 N. W. 638; Pierson v. Pierson, 5 Del. Ch. 11; Haigh v. Kaye, L. R. 7 Ch. 469, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 567, 26 L. T. N. S. 675, 20 Week. Rep. 597; Lincoln v. Wright, 4 DeG. & J. 16, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 705, 7 Week. Rep. 350; Booth v. Turle, L. R. 16 Eq. 182; Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567, 577, 578; Sadler v. Taylor, 49 W. Va. 104, 38 S. E. 583; Thacker v. Morris, 52 W. Va. 220, 94 Am. St. Rep. 928, 43 S. E. 141; Vangilder v. Hoffman, 22 W. Va. 1; Lawrence v. Du Bois, 16 W. Va. 443; Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 246.

Though the evidence gives no support to the theory of a declaration of trust by the grantors in favor of Floyd, and the bills cannot be read as asserting one, and it is clear that the latter never had any prior interest in the land, it seems reasonably clear that he may invoke the general principle declared and illustrated by the authorities just cited, if he has established a state of facts constituting an independent equity, a right in respect to the property resting in justice, equity, and good conscience, and not denied to him by the statute of frauds. An agreement between him and Duffy, made prior to the conveyance or contemporaneously therewith, to have the legal title to the land conveyed to the latter for the joint benefit of both, and subsequently to acquire the beneficial ownership by sales of the land in small portions and payment of the purchase money out of the proceeds of the same, would constitute, in our opinion, such an equity. Assuming this to have been their understanding and arrangement, the agreement was to buy and pay for the land. It was not a purchase by one and a resale to the other. In so far as it was a purchase at all, it was a joint one for their common benefit. Neither of them paid anything, nor bound himself to pay anything, except contingently or conditionally. The legal title was taken by Duffy in pursuance of a prior or contemporaneous agreement between himself and Floyd, to enable them to execute the agreement and effectuate its purposes. It was taken for their common benefit. That the statute of frauds does not inhibit such a contract seems to have been unequivocally asserted in Currence v. Ward, 43 W. Va. 367, 27 S. E. 329; and that Ludwick v. Johnson, 67 W. Va. 499, 68 S. E. 117, and Id. 58 W. Va. 464, 52 S. E. 489, places such an agreement outside of the statute, there can be no doubt. Thus, treated as a mere contract of purchase of land creating an equitable interest therein, on the part of a third person, antedating the vesting of the legal title in the trustee or ostensible purchaser, or contemporaneous therewith, the agreement is not under the ban of the statute.

But the theory of this bill goes even beyond that. Floyd and Duffy may be said to have formed a partnership for the purchase and resale of this land, imposing upon each an equal burden for purchase money and expenses, and conferring upon each the right to an equal share of the profits, in pursuance of which Duffy took the legal title in his own name for their common benefit. That such a purchase is not within the statute is attested by an abundance of authority. Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare, 369; Essex v. Essex, 20 Beav. 442; Miller v. Ferguson, 107 Va. 249, 122 Am. St. Rep. 840, 57 S. E. 649, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 138; Chester v. Dickerson, 54 N. Y. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 550; Fairchild v. Fairchild, 64 N. Y. 471; Traphagen v. Burt, 67 N. Y. 30; Clagett v. Kilbourne, 1 Black, 346, 17 L. ed. 213; Bunnel v. Taintor, 4 Conn. 568; Holmes v. McCray, 51 Ind. 358, 19 Am. Rep. 735; Hirbour v. Reeding, 3 Mont. 15, 11 Mor. Min. Rep. 514; Welland v. Huber, 8 Nev. 203, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 363; Reagan v. McKibben, 11 S. D. 270, 76 N. W. 943, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 550; Moore v. Hamerstag, 109 Cal. 122, 41 Pac. 805, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 256; Moritz v. Lavelle, 77 Cal. 10, 11 Am. St. Rep. 229, 18 Pac. 803, 16 Mor. Min. Rep. 236. After having analyzed a number of cases, to determine whether proof of the acquisition of the legal title to land by a member of a copartnership, for the purposes of the partnership and in pursuance of the partnership agreement, constitutes an independent equity lying beyond the scope and influence of the statute of frauds, Sir James Wigram, the vice chancellor, in Dale v. Hamilton, said: "The principle upon which I presume the above cases have proceeded has been partly the jurisdiction of the court in cases between partners touching the partnership property, and partly its jurisdiction to relieve against the fraud of a partner who should avail himself of his legal rights in violation of his partnership contract, a fraud as against which no remedy, or no adequate remedy, could be had at law."

We think the evidence is sufficient to sustain Floyd's claim to an equal interest with Duffy in the land. Numerous witnesses testify to admissions by the latter. Some of these witnesses go so far as to say he admitted that they were equally interested in the land. This evidence is re-enforced by the conduct of the parties. Floyd was associated with Duffy in the very inception of the enterprise. He seems to have devised or arranged the plan under which the lots sold were to be disposed of. He was active in the sale of them. Other persons were employed to make the sales on a commission, and there is no intimation in the evidence that Floyd got any share of the commissions allowed them on the sales. Prospective purchasers were referred to him, upon disagreements as to price. He and Duffy together indorsed paper for McClung, and, in one instance, Duffy refused to indorse a note for McClung, because Floyd declined to do so. A ditch was made for the benefit of these lots and to promote the sale of them. It was agreed that the cost of the construction of this ditch should be divided equally among McClung, Duffy, and Floyd. Opposed to all this evidence is some conduct on the part of Floyd which counsel for the appellants regard as sufficient to outweigh it. While sales were being made by Duffy's attorney in fact, Floyd did not interfere, nor set up any claim to the land. These sales did not continue for a long period of time. The power of attorney was executed in November, 1901, and enough lots had been sold by July, 1902, to pay off Duffy's debts. There is no evidence of express disclaimer of interest on the part of Floyd. The evidence is that he made no claim of title, and said he was cultivating some of the lots by permission of Duffy, and desired protection of his crops in case of sale thereof. We do not see that he was under a positive duty to assert his title. The lots had been purchased for resale. He may have deemed Duffy's estate amply sufficient to reimburse him for such of his money as was appropriated to the payment of Duffy's debts; and he may have thought it the better policy to allow fair sales to be made; and he may have thought the rights of Duffy's creditors superior to his. An attempt was also made to weaken the testimony of some of the witnesses by showing conduct on their part inconsistent with their testimony. Here we have direct conflict in the testimony of witnesses, but it arises in respect to matters somewhat remote. The witnesses whose conduct is said to be inconsistent with their testimony adhere to their statements, and deny the conduct. Moreover, all of the witnesses for the plaintiff are not so affected. Documentary evidence is introduced to prove that Duffy paid McClung a large part of the purchase money by assignments to him of stocks, bonds, notes, and otherwise; and, on May 18, 1894, executed his note for $6,697.96, covering the balance due on account of purchase money, and, on March 19, 1896, took a receipt in full from McClung. Checks given by Duffy to McClung and wife and others for them, or in payment of their debts, put in evidence, aggregate more than $10,000. These facts are to be considered, of course, but they are by no means conclusive against Floyd. The sale money went into Duffy's hands, and he, in the nature of things, would pay McClung. If he could induce the latter to take stocks, bonds, notes, and property in lieu of money, that was perhaps to his advantage, and not to the detriment of Floyd. McClung says he had a tacit, if not express, agreement with Duffy to take equal interests with the latter in all his enterprises, and that Duffy took back from him some of the stocks and other property. As to the note for the balance, Duffy seems to have been already bound for the amount by indorsements of McClung's paper, but if he was not, his reluctance to reconvey the lots, and his confidence in their value, constituted a strong motive for extinction of McClung's equitable right for the common benefit of himself and Floyd. These transactions between Duffy and McClung, to which Floyd is not shown to have been a party, cannot alter or affect the original agreement, long antedating them. They are mere circumstances bearing upon the question of original intent, purpose, and agreement, and are not necessarily inconsistent with what the other testimony, facts, and circumstances indicate it to have been. On the whole, we think the evidence sustains Floyd's claim. In reaching this conclusion, we have not considered his testimony which we think is inadmissible. That the agreement between him and Duffy was either prior to the date of the deed, or coincident therewith, appears from the testimony of McClung and the circumstances he discloses.

Laches is also relied upon; but we think this defense not applicable under the circumstances. The trust was not repudiated nor disavowed until a very short time before the suit was brought, and this was before all the property had been sold. The trust had not then been fully executed.

A question of practice, remaining for disposition, has been postponed until now, under the belief that consideration thereof will be aided and simplified by the foregoing discussion of the facts and principles involved. The original bill sought an accounting for money arising from the sale of lots, and partition of the unsold lots. The object of the amended bill was to correct certain errors of fact in the original bill, relating to the consideration for the deed to Duffy and the physical condition of the property, to make it conform more nearly to the evidence. The latter did not mention the collateral agreement. It exhibited the deed, reciting payment of $6,000 in cash and the execution of three notes for $8,000 each as the consideration, without any express statement as to who paid the money or executed the notes. The bill alleged that Floyd and Duffy had agreed to purchase the land, for which they were to pay $6,000 and execute three such notes. It alleged a joint purchase, and also a conveyance to Duffy for convenience. It also described the land conveyed as a tract of land. The amended bill, correcting these errors, did not change the nature of the demand, nor materially alter the basis thereof. The original bill set up an absolute joint purchase. As corrected, it set up a conditional joint purchase. In both instances, a joint purchase was alleged, establishing the same relation between the parties as regards the relief sought, the land having been fully paid for. Two of the defendants were nonresidents. As to them, there was an executed order of publication on the original bill, and process was served on one of them in the state. All the others were served. There was no process of any kind on the amended bill, but the administrator, as such, and in his own right as an heir, and two of the other heirs, appeared to it. Assuming that the original bill is not broad enough to let in the evidence and sustain the decree, failure to mature the amended bill is assigned as error, calling for reversal. We are of the opinion, however, that the variance of the evidence from the original bill is not material, and that the amended bill was not essential to the admissibility of the evidence or the decree. While, in equity, the allegata and probata must correspond, the rules for the enforcement of the principle are more liberal than those applied in actions at law. Agreement in matters of substance only is required in equity. If the cause made out by the bill and the evidence is substantially the same, relief will not be denied on the theory of a variance. Time and space need not be consumed here in stating the reasons for this liberality, or the distinction between the practice at law and in equity. It suffices to refer to the authorities. Wetherill v. McCloskey Bros. 28 W. Va. 195; Doonan v. Glynn, 26 W. Va. 225; Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 675; Floyd v. Jones, 19 W. Va. 350; Zane v. Zane, 6 Munf. 406-416; Anthony v. Leftwich, 3 Rand. (Va.) 238, 263 (opinion of Judge Green). In some of the cases here cited, relief was denied on the ground of a total variance of the evidence from the bill, but they assert the general rule here applied. In others, it is both asserted and applied. See also Hogg's Eq. Pro. §§ 550, 551, and Barton, Ch. Pr. p. 276. For the proposition that the filing of an unnecessary amended bill does not preclude relief on a sufficient original bill, Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412, is authority.

An assignment of error is based on the allowance of the amendment of plaintiff's bill. An amendment of a bill or declaration will always be allowed when substantial justice will be thereby advanced. Even in this court cases are remanded with leave to amend, when the bill is bad and the evidence shows a good cause of action. The strict rule imposing duty to set up all known facts in an answer is not applied to bills, except in those instances in which an offer to amend comes after submission or decision. There the rule is somewhat strict, but this amendment was made before submission. The principal limitation upon the right of a plaintiff to amend his bill in this state, before submission, is that he shall not depart from the original cause of action or make a new case. That has not been done here. He may correct mistakes in his original bill by an amendment. Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108; Piercy v. Beckett, 15 W. Va. 444; Doonan v. Glynn, 26 W. Va. 225; Ratliff v. Sommers, 55 W. Va. 30, 46 S. E. 712, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 970. As to diligence, the degree required is in the discretion of the trial court, subject to review for abuse thereof. No abuse has occurred. While, as we have said, the amended bill is not essential to relief, no reason why the plaintiff should not be permitted to mature it is perceived. Hence this response to the objection to the filing thereof.

Perceiving no error in the decree complained of, we affirm it.

GEORGE N. SMITH, Respt.,

v.

RUDOLPH DOTTERWEICH, Appt.

Promissory note — condition — failure to meet — effect.

1. The maker of a promissory note may defeat an action thereon by the original payee by showing that it was executed as a premium for a life insurance policy, and that neither policy nor note was to be valid unless the payee secured for the maker a loan upon the policy, which was not done.

Evidence — condition for promissory note — admissibility.

2. Parol evidence is admissible to show that a promissory note which was signed and delivered was not to take effect until the payee had secured a loan for the maker.

Evidence — admissions of agent — admissibility.

3. Evidence is admissible in a suit on a renewal note of declarations and admissions of one having possession of the original, which was signed and delivered subject to a condition, made at the time he secured the renewal, to the effect that the condition existed, although it was made in the absence of the payee, and there is no proof that he had any authority to do anything except to get an unconditional renewal.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Cattaugus County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain promissory notes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Adelbert Moot and Helen Z. M. Rodgers, with Mr. Allen J. Hastings, for appellant:

The notes in suit were delivered upon a condition precedent which has not been performed.

Mr. William R. Daniels, for respondent:

The evidence of the defendant shows that the notes were delivered upon a condition subsequent, and as part of a collateral agreement not in writing; the evidence thus received tending to vary the terms of the contract in writing between the parties, the court was right in directing the verdict for the plaintiff.

Barnard, 77 Hun, 554, 28 N. Y. Supp. 922.

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 28th day of February, 1901, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff a promissory note for $3,740, payable in six months. When this note became due it was renewed by the four notes in suit, which were dated August 28, 1901, and payable in six months from that date. These renewal notes were not paid at maturity, and the plaintiff brought this action upon a complaint in the usual form. Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced evidence to show that the original note was given in payment of premiums upon two life insurance policies issued to the defendant by the John Hancock Life Insurance Company through the plaintiff, as its general agent.

The defendant interposed an answer, denying that the notes were given for value received and that the plaintiff was the lawful holder and owner thereof, and alleging an oral agreement under which neither the notes nor the insurance policies were to become valid and enforceable obligations unless the plaintiff should secure for the defendant a certain loan of money. The defendant's testimony in support of these allegations was to the effect that in February, 1901, he was visited in Olean by two insurance brokers named Marvin and Larabee, who solicited him to take some life insurance; that he at first replied that he did not want any; that he afterwards called Larabee into his private office in the Dotterweich Brewery and told him that he had an option to buy the stock of the brewing company, and wanted to raise $70,000 to pay for it; that, if he could get a loan for that amount on the life insurance and the brewing company's stock as collateral, he would take the insurance; that Larabee assured him that it could be done, and cited instances in which certain department stores in Buffalo had made loans under similar conditions. The defendant further testified that a week later the plaintiff, Larabee, and Marvin called; that after he had been introduced, the plaintiff said: "The boys have been talking—Mr. Larabee and Mr. Marvin have been talking—to you about taking out an insurance for a loan," and I said, "Yes." He says, "Do you want it?" I said, "I do, providing you can make the loan." "And Mr. Smith said that if I would take out an insurance he could make the loan for me, and that this company could take at least 50,000 and he knew where he could place the other 20. They even advised me to split up the policy, so that they wouldn't have any trouble making the loan." The defendant further testified that he met the plaintiff in Olean about ten days later, at which time the latter produced the policies; that he then told the plaintiff "that under no consideration could I take out a policy of that kind without he could guarantee to make me a loan;" that when the plaintiff handed the original note to the defendant, "I told him there was no use of my signing that note for a policy at the wages I was getting. I was getting $75 a month, and I couldn't pay no $100,000 insurance on $75 a month, and he said, 'You sign this note, and I will hold it in my safe until this deal is closed, and if it is not closed, I return you the note and you return me the policy. I will hold this note in my safe and won't try to sell it.' He was to loan me $70,000 at 5 per cent for five years or ten, and with the privilege of having it longer. He said, 'I can get you the $70,000 loan, and I can get it for you at 5 per cent for five years or ten, with the privilege of having it longer.' He said unless I would sign the note to show that everything was in good faith, he couldn't make me the loan on the policy. He said there wouldn't be any effect in the policy; the policy would be null and void if he didn't get me the loan; that they would take the same chance as I."

These are the circumstances in which the defendant says he executed the original note and delivered it to the plaintiff, receiving at the same time two policies issued by the John Hancock Life Insurance Company for $70,000 and $30,000, respectively, together with receipts showing that the premiums for the first year had been paid.

The defendant sought to show what took place in August, 1901, between Marvin and himself, regarding the renewal of the original note, but the learned trial court excluded the proffered evidence, upon the ground that Marvin's declarations and admissions could not bind the plaintiff, as there was no proof that Marvin had authority to do anything except to get an unconditional renewal. Then the defendant further testified that the plaintiff never procured the loan for him; that soon after the notes in suit became due, and before this action was commenced, he went to the plaintiff's office in Buffalo, and asked for a return of the notes and tendered back the policies.

When the defendant rested his case the learned trial court granted the plaintiff's motion for the direction of a verdict, and to this ruling the defendant duly excepted. The defendant also asked the court to submit to the jury the question whether the insurance policies were accepted by the defendant, and the original note was delivered to the plaintiff, upon condition that the same should be returned in case the plaintiff did not within a year procure a loan of $70,000 for the plaintiff, with the insurance policies and the brewery stock as collateral. This motion was also denied, and the defendant took an exception.

We have quoted or cited only such parts of the evidence as bear directly upon the question whether the learned trial court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. The case is characterized by a number of peculiarities which may, or may not, be influential in determining the ultimate result, but with these we have no present concern. The question now before us is whether the testimony of the defendant, supplemented by such legitimate inferences therefrom as are most favorable to him, is of sufficient weight and probative force to create a question of fact for the jury; and that question obviously depends upon the nature and effect of the oral agreement to which he testified. If that agreement, which for present purposes must be assumed to have been made, created a condition precedent, without the performance of which the notes never became valid obligations in favor of the plaintiff, then there is a question of fact for the arbitration of a jury. The converse of the proposition is equally simple. If the effect of that agreement was to ingraft upon a valid contract a condition subsequent, the learned trial justice was right in ruling that the issue was one of law for his decision. A careful analysis of the defendant's testimony has convinced us that he is right in the contention that the case should have been sent to the jury. He testified that he told the plaintiff that under no consideration would he take the insurance unless the plaintiff would guarantee to make him the loan; that the plaintiff told him to sign the note, which would be held in the plaintiff's safe until the deal was closed; that if it was not closed, the note would be returned to the defendant and the policy would be returned to the plaintiff; that the policy would be null and void if the plaintiff did not get the loan for the defendant, and that both of them would be taking the same chance. If these statements mean anything, they plainly import a condition which was to be performed before the transaction, witnessed by the delivery of the note to the plaintiff and the delivery of the policies and receipts to the defendant, was to be regarded as consummated and binding. That condition was the procurement of the loan, which, concededly, was never made. Giving to the defendant's story a fair, natural, and unstrained interpretation, we have a case in which there is failure of the precise condition which must determine the existence or nonexistence of any contract between him and the plaintiff. We are not unmindful of the opposing facts and antagonistic inferences which other features of the transaction may suggest. These are not proper subjects for present discussion. We simply emphasize the controlling circumstance that, if the defendant's story is true, there is no binding contract between him and the plaintiff, and the issue of its truth or falsity is for the jury, and not for the court.

There is no subtlety or ambiguity in the law of the subject; but there is difficulty in applying it to some cases in which there may be uncertainty as to the effect of oral testimony upon contracts which are wholly or partly reduced to writing. When the oral testimony goes directly to the question whether there is a written contract or not, it is always competent; but when the effect of the oral testimony is to establish the existence of a written contract, which it is designed to contradict or change by parol, then the spoken word must yield to the written compact.

There are many decided cases upon this branch of the law, both in this state and in other jurisdictions, but we shall refer to only a few, as illustrating the line of cleavage between the case at bar and the case of Jamestown Business College Assn. v. Allen, 172 N. Y. 291, 92 Am. St. Rep. 740, 64 N. E. 952, upon which the respondent relies to support his contentions. In Benton v. Martin, 52 N. Y. 570, this court very clearly enunciated the rule which has always obtained in this state: "Instruments not under seal may be delivered to the one to whom upon their face they are made payable, or who by their terms is entitled to some interest or benefit under them, upon conditions the observance of which is essential to their validity. And the annexing of such conditions to the delivery is not an oral contradiction of the written obligation, though negotiable, as between the parties to it, or others having notice. It needs a delivery to make the obligation operative at all, and the effect of the delivery and the extent of the operation of the instrument may be limited by the conditions with which delivery is made. And so also, as between the original parties and others having notice, the want of consideration may be shown." Page 574. This quotation sums up the whole of the law applicable to the case at bar in its present state, and outlines comprehensively the rule which has been followed in Bookstaver v. Jayne, 60 N. Y. 146, Grierson v. Mason, 60 N. Y. 394, Reynolds v. Robinson, 110 N. Y. 654, 18 N. E. 127, Schmittler v. Simon, 114 N. Y. 176, 11 Am. St. Rep. 621, 21 N. E. 162, and other cases, under a variety of circumstances.

The case of Jamestown Business College Assn. v. Allen, supra, is a salient illustration of the converse of this rule. There the promissory note was rendered effective and complete by an unconditional delivery. The payee agreed to release the maker, and to cancel the note, upon a future contingency which might or might not arise. That was clearly a condition subsequent, which brought the case within the general rule that a contract reduced to writing, and complete in its terms, cannot be varied and contradicted by oral testimony. Eighmie v. Taylor, 98 N. Y. 288; Thomas v. Scutt, 127 N. Y. 133, 27 N. E. 961; Stowell v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 163 N. Y. 298, 67 N. E. 480; Mead v. Dunlevie, 174 N. Y. 108, 66 N. E. 658. Thus, to state the difference most concretely, the case at bar is one in which the oral testimony tends to show that the writing purporting to be a contract is in fact no contract at all; while in the case of the Jamestown Business College the oral testimony was in direct contradiction of the written contract, as to the existence and validity of which there was no controversy.

We think the court erred in excluding the evidence offered by the defendant to show what took place between him and Marvin at the time when the original note was renewed by the notes in suit. It needs no argument to demonstrate that, if it was competent for the defendant to show under what conditions he delivered the original note, he must logically be permitted to show that the renewal notes were affected by the same conditions. Quite aside from this, there is enough in the record to make it a question for the jury whether Marvin was or was not the alter ego of the plaintiff in the dealings with the defendant.

As there must be another trial, we have eliminated from this discussion everything that is not germane to the questions which are before us on this appeal. We have not referred to the defendant's counterclaim, which is manifestly inconsistent with his defense, or to the evidence relating to his asserted possession of options for the purchase of the brewery stock. These and various other features of the case may be of importance in determining the verdict of a jury, but they cannot affect our decision.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to the appellant to abide the event.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

JOHN B. EDWARDS, Trustee, etc., of Schillinger Brothers Asphalt Company,
v.

GUSTAV A. SCHILLINGER et al., Pliffs.

(245 Ill. 231, 91 N. E. 1048.)

Pleading — demurrer — foreign law.

1. A demurrer admits an allegation concerning the laws of another state, since such allegation is one of fact.

Contract — to pay for corporate stock — right to enforce.

2. A corporation may enforce the promise of an assignee of its stock to his assignor, to pay unpaid subscriptions to the stock,

Note.—Right to enforce stockholders' liability outside of state of incorporation.

The earlier cases on this subject are given in a note to Cushing v. Perot, 34 L.R.A. 737. Only later cases are here included.

As to effect of assessment on stockholders made under order of court in another state, as res judicata, see note to Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Phoenix Furniture Co. 34 L.R.A. 694.

The right to enforce the liability of members of mutual insurance companies is not considered. The right of a stockholder to set off a debt of the corporation due him is also omitted.

Right to enforce liability for unpaid subscription.

The liability of a stockholder on his subscription or the unpaid portion thereof being contractual (see Fish v. Smith, 73 Conn. 377, 84 Am. St. Rep. 161, 47 Atl.

whether liability for such subscriptions is imposed by the laws of the state or not.

Corporation — calls for stock subscriptions — necessity.

3. No call for unpaid subscriptions need be made by the corporation or the bankruptcy court, to enable a trustee in bankruptcy to maintain a suit against stockholders for unpaid subscriptions which are necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors.

Parties — omission of insolvent defendants — right to complain.

4. A stockholder of an insolvent corporation cannot complain that suit to enforce his unpaid stock subscriptions was not brought in a court where he could compel contribution by other stockholders, if they were insolvent so that they could not have been made to contribute even if they were brought into the proceeding.

Courts — jurisdiction — foreign corporations — suit to collect subscriptions.

5. Holders of unpaid stock in a foreign corporation cannot defeat an action by its trustee in bankruptcy to set aside a fraudulent dividend applied in satisfaction of such subscriptions, and compel their payment, on the theory that it is an attempt to regulate the internal affairs of such corporation, which is not a party to the proceeding, where all solvent stockholders are parties, since the corporation and creditors are represented by the trustee, and all necessary parties are therefore before the court.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment affirming a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enforce payment of unpaid stock subscriptions. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

711; Stoddard v. Lum, 159 N. Y. 265, 45 L.R.A. 551, 70 Am. St. Rep. 541, 53 N. E. 1108; Mountain Lake Land Co. v. Blair, 109 Va. 147, 63 S. E. 751), suit may be maintained to recover the amount of the subscription or the unpaid portion thereof, wherever the stockholder resides, even in the state courts of another state. Fish v. Smith, 73 Conn. 377, 84 Am. St. Rep. 161, 47 Atl. 711 (action at law by receiver); Lewisohn v. Stoddard, 78 Conn. 575, 63 Atl. 621 (suit in equity by creditor); Mountain Lake Land Co. v. Blair, 109 Va. 147, 63 S. E. 751.

A foreign corporation may maintain an action to recover unpaid calls against a resident stockholder personally served, although a temporary receiver pendente lite has been appointed for it in the state of its domicile. Signa Iron Co. v. Brown, 171 N. Y. 488, 64 N. E. 194.

In an action by an English corporation to recover from a stockholder residing in this country an unpaid subscription for stock, an express promise of such stockholder to pay need not be proved, since a promise is implied, in view of an English statute providing that all moneys payable by any member in pursuance of the articles of the company shall be deemed a debt due from such member of the company. Nashua Sav. Bank v. Anglo-American Land, Mortg. & Agency Co. 189 U. S. 221, 47 L. ed. 782, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 517.

The liability of a stockholder of a foreign corporation on his unpaid subscription, to creditors of that company, must be determined by the laws of the state of incorporation. Mountain Lake Land Co. v. Blair, 109 Va. 147, 63 S. E. 751.

Where, by the laws of a state where a corporation is organized, a stockholder is 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

personally and individually liable to creditors of the corporation holding judgments against it, execution on which has been returned unsatisfied, such liability may be enforced by a creditor against a stockholder living in a different state. Williams v. Chamberlain, 123 Ky. 150, 94 S. W. 29.

Where the statutes of a state where a corporation is incorporated provide that "each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable for the debts of the corporation, to the extent of the amount that is unpaid upon the stock held by him," and that "any creditor of the corporation may institute joint and several actions against any of the stockholders that have not wholly paid the capital stock held by him," such personal liability may be enforced in such an action in other states against stockholders living there. Latimer v. Citizens' State Bank, 102 Iowa, 162, 71 N. W. 225.

A suit in equity by the creditors of a dissolved corporation organized under the laws of one state, against its stockholders, to reach unpaid subscriptions, may be maintained in another state in which the majority of the stockholders reside. Lewisohn v. Stoddard, 78 Conn. 575, 63 Atl. 621.

The right of a creditor of a corporation to proceed individually against stockholders on their unpaid subscriptions is merged in a decree obtained by such creditor in a court of the state chartering the corporation, directing the collection of such claims by a receiver; nor does the creditor obtain the right to sue individually by joining the receiver as defendant, and by obtaining the latter's consent to the payment of the obligation to the creditor.

The unpaid subscription of a resident stockholder of a foreign corporation is property of such corporation, and as such liable to attachment by a creditor of the —action by receivers and assignees.

Where the laws of a state under which a corporation was created provided for the winding up of insolvent corporations through the agency of receivers, and for the calling in by the court of any unpaid balance of the capital stock which the corporations had neglected to call, the receiver becomes, in effect, the statutory successor of an insolvent corporation, and substituted promisee in the subscription contract, and can maintain an action to recover the unpaid balance on such subscription in the courts of another state. Fish v. Smith, 73 Conn. 377, 84 Am. St. Rep. 161, 47 Atl. 711; Stoddard v. Lum, 159 N. Y. 265, 45 L.R.A. 551, 70 Am. St. Rep. 541, 53 N. E. 1108.

An assignee in insolvency of a corporation, given by statute the right to wind up its affairs, and to maintain actions against stockholders to recover unpaid subscriptions, may maintain such action in a Federal court of another jurisdiction. Dunn v. Howe, 96 Fed. 160, reversed on different question in 47 C. C. A. 13, 107 Fed. 849.

But a receiver of a corporation appointed in another state should not be allowed, by an exercise of comity, to sue for the enforcement of the liability of stockholders on their unpaid subscriptions, when it would be in contravention of the rights of 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the citizens of the state, and operate to their injury. Wyman v. Eaton, 107 Iowa, 214, 43 L.R.A. 695, 70 Am. St. Rep. 193, 77 N. W. 865.

On the ground that comity did not require it, a receiver was not allowed, in Wyman v. Eaton, supra, to sue to enforce payment of the unpaid subscription in a foreign corporation, where the stock had previously been sold bona fide to another, and the indebtedness was not incurred in reliance on the subscription.

In Castleman v. Templeman, 87 Md. 549, 41 L.R.A. 367, 67 Am. St. Rep. 363, 40 Atl. 275, the court held that a receiver of a foreign corporation appointed by a court of the state of its domicile will be permitted by comity to enforce the payment of unpaid subscriptions where there are no creditors of the corporation residing in the state where suit is brought, and the rights of its own citizens would not be adversely affected.

An action against all the domestic shareholders of an Illinois corporation, who are the only solvent shareholders, to recover the unpaid balance of their subscriptions to the stock, or such pro rata share thereof as is necessary to pay the debts of the company, may be brought in New York by the Illinois assignee for creditors, since the cause of action is a contract liability which has for its foundation the principles of the common law, and is independent of the Illinois statute which provides for a suit in equity against all delinquent stockholders. Stoddard v. Lum, 159 N. Y. 265, 45 L.R.A. 551, 70 Am. St. Rep. 541, 53 N. E. 1108.

A receiver will not be appointed in the state of incorporation at the instance of a judgment creditor, to bring suit in a foreign state to enforce unpaid subscriptions to an insolvent corporation, where, by the law of the state of incorporation, creditors can enforce such liabilities by suit in their own names, and there is no allegation that they have not the same right in the foreign state. Stockholders of an insolvent corporation are, to the extent of their unpaid subscriptions, liable for all its debts, and not merely its contractual debts.

Moore v. United States One Stave Barrel Co. 238 Ill. 544, 128 Am. St. Rep. 153, 87 N. E. 536; Coleman v. Howe, 154 Ill. 458, 45 Am. St. Rep. 133, 39 N. E. 725; Alling v. Wenzel, 133 Ill. 264, 24 N. E. 551.

The rule that all parties interested in the subject-matter of the litigation should be joined as parties to a suit in equity is a rule of convenience, which will be distractual in the state of the corporation's domicile, it will be enforced in New Hampshire, though not there considered contractual).

The contractual liability of a stockholder domiciled in a foreign jurisdiction, for debts of the corporation beyond the amount of stock subscription, may be enforced by courts of that jurisdiction, where the proofs show an assessment in the state of the creation of the corporation upon domestic stockholders to the full amounts of the stockholders' liability, and the testimony discloses the insolvency of the corporation and indebtedness in excess of the stockholders' liability, and an assessment is sought of exactly the same character as was enforced in the action brought in the domicile of the corporation. Kirtley v. Holmes, 52 L.R.A. 738, 46 C. C. A. 102, 107 Fed. 1 (action by receiver).

The construction of a statute imposing liability upon stockholders for debts of a corporation, made by the highest court of the state in which it was enacted, is binding upon the courts of another state in which it is sought to be enforced. Howarth v. Lombard, 175 Mass. 570, 49 L.R.A. 307, 56 N. E. 888; Converse v. Ayer, 197 Mass. 443, 84 N. E. 98; Pfaff v. Gruen, 92 Mo. App. 560, 69 S. W. 405.

The statutory liability of stockholders cannot be enforced outside the state of incorporation, where it does not appear that the statute of that state, as construed by its courts, has provided any remedy for its enforcement which can be made available outside that state. Miller v. Aldrich, 202 Mass. 109, 132 Am. St. Rep. 480, 88 N. E. 441.

If an original suit has been instituted in a court of the company's domicile, and all stockholders in the jurisdiction brought before that court, an account taken of the debts and resources of the company, the excess of the former ascertained, together with the solvency or insolvency of its different shareholders, and the sum in which each ought to be assessed, and an appropriate decree entered establishing these things, then an ancillary proceeding may 33 L.R.A. Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, John B. Edwards, trustee in bankruptcy of Schillinger Brothers Asphalt Company, a corporation, filed his bill in the superior court of Cook county against the plaintiffs in error, Gustav A. Schillinger and A. C. Gumbinger, stockholders of the corporation, to set be had in a foreign court against stockholders resident in that jurisdiction, who could not be brought before the domestic court in the original proceeding, to make them pay their proportionate dues as ascertained in the parent suit. Pfaff v. Gruen, 92 Mo. App. 560, 69 S. W. 405.

The courts will enforce the double liability of a stockholder of a foreign corporation created by the laws of a foreign state, where the liability is created without providing a remedy. Howarth v. Angle, 162 N. Y. 179, 47 L.R.A. 725, 56 N. E. 489.

If the statute upon which the personal liability of the stockholders is founded also provides a remedy for that liability, such remedy will be held to be exclusive, and will not be enforced in the courts of another state. Ibid. (dictum).

But in Shipman v. Treadwell, 200 N. Y. 472, 93 N. E. 1104, the court, in upholding the right of an Ohio receiver to sue in New York, said: "It is doubtless the rule that where a foreign statute which creates the liability of a stockholder also provides a remedy for the enforcement of that liability, such remedy is exclusive, and our courts will not intervene to enforce it. Lowry v. Inman, 46 N. Y. 119; Christensen v. Eno, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429, 12 N. E. 648; Howarth v. Angle, supra. But it is also obvious that the remedy referred to in these cases is the remedy against the stockholder who is a resident of this state, and a nonresident of the state which is the domicile of the corporation, for if it were not so no proceeding could be instituted against stockholders residing in the domicile of a corporation, without cutting off any right of action against stockholders who reside outside of that domicile. The complaint herein does recite certain proceedings in the Ohio courts to which all the stockholders, including the defendants, were parties, but it is also set forth that the defendants were served by publication, and did not appear in the foreign tribunal, so that as to them the proceedings there were in rem, and not in personam. As to these defendants the only remedy which seems aside a dividend declared by the directors in fraud of creditors, and applied by the stockholders in payment of unpaid balances of their subscriptions to the capital stock, and to compel plaintiffs in error to pay the amount of their subscriptions represented by the fraudulent dividend certificates. The defendants to the bill filed a general demurrer thereto, which was overruled by the court, and they were ruled to answer the bill within ten days. They failed to answer, but elected to stand by their demurrer, and were defaulted, and a decree was entered in accordance with the prayer of the bill, requiring the defendant Gustav A. Schillinger to pay to the complainant $3,000, and the defendant A. C. Gumbinger to pay $2,000, being the portions of their unpaid subscriptions, which they had attempted to cancel by means of the fraud. The appellate court affirmed the decree on appeal, and a writ of error was sued out of this court to review the judgment of the appellate court.

The following are the material facts alleged in the bill and admitted by the demurrer: Schillinger Brothers Asphalt Company is a corporation organized on October 3, 1900, under the laws of the state of Missouri, with a capital stock of $20,000, divided into shares of $100 each. The original subscribers, with the amounts of their subscriptions, were as follows: B. J. Calking, 100 shares; Charles Mueller, Jr., 99 shares; and Henry Jacobson, 1 share. Money or property turned over to

to have been provided by the statutes of Ohio is the right of the court to authorize and direct the receiver to prosecute the stockholders' liability in other jurisdictions, and that is the precise remedy which the plaintiff is pursuing. It is true that neither the provisions of the foreign statute, nor the orders of the foreign courts, have any extraterritorial force, but it is equally true that the remedy thus provided is in fact no remedy, if it cannot be prosecuted in the state where the stockholder resides. For all practical purposes this case is no different from one in which it appears that the foreign statute has provided no remedy, and the foreign court has made no direction, and such a case falls directly within the rule of Howarth v. Angle."

No action will lie in courts out of the state of incorporation to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders for corporate debts, where the statutes imposing such liability provide a single method of enforcing it by one equitable suit in the state of incorporation, in favor of all creditors and against all stockholders, and the corporation of it has assets, since such method is exclusive. Finney v. Guy, 106 Wis. 256, 40 L.R.A. 486, 82 N. W. 595.

This was held even when all the creditors who joined in the action in the state of incorporation, and the receiver there appointed, joined as plaintiffs to recover against the nonresident stockholder not a party to such prior action. Ibid.

A judgment in a statutory proceeding to enforce the liability of stockholders for corporate debts, to which all stockholders within the jurisdiction are required to be parties, and in which all equities between stockholders are required to be settled, has been held to be a bar to any other action to enforce such liability, even against stockholders who were out of the jurisdiction, and therefor not parties to the action. Ibid.

The statutory liability of shareholders under a statute providing that the shareholders of all banking associations shall be individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for contracts, debts and engagements of such association, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares, is secondary, and cannot be enforced until it has been first judicially determined what the assets and liabilities of the corporation are, and how much it will be necessary for stockholders to pay. Until this has been done, suit cannot be brought in another state by a receiver of such a corporation, or by an association of creditors, to enforce the liability of a stockholder there domiciled. McLaughlin v. O'Neill, 7 Wyo. 187, 51 Pac. 243.

Where a suit is brought to enforce the stockholders' statutory liability in a court of the state where the corporation is domiciled, in which all the stockholders, domestic and foreign, are nominally joined, but in which only the domestic stockholders are served and appear, and in which no judgment was rendered against foreign stockholders, a suit in a foreign state to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders domiciled therein cannot be maintained in a court of equity, on the theory that it is an ancillary or auxiliary proceeding brought in aid of and to enforce the equitable decree in the court where the corporation had its domicile. Hale v. Allinson, 188 U. S. 56, 47 L. ed. 380, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244.

Whether a state court should permit an action to enforce the statutory liability of a stockholder of a foreign corporation, to be maintained therein on the principle of comity between the states, is a question exclusively for the court of that state to decide. Finney v. Guy, 189 U. S. 335, 47 L. ed. 839, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 558.

It is not necessary that the procedure to enforce the stockholders' statutory liability, provided by the statutes of the state of incorporation, should be that required by statute in another state, where it is sought to enforce such liability, in the case of its own domestic corporations, as that would frequently be impossible, and would with-the corporation was accepted as half payment, and certificates were issued showing that the stock was only half paid for. The defendant Gustav A. Schillinger became the owner of 60 shares of the capital stock, and received a certificate showing upon its face that it was but half paid, and he assumed and agreed to pay to the corporation the balance of the subscription price when demanded. The defendant A. C. Gumbinger became the owner of 40 shares, and receive a certificate therefor showing on its face that said stock was but half paid, and he assumed and agreed to pay the corporation the balance of the subscription price when demanded. At a meeting of the board of directors held in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, on April 28, 1902, when the corporation was wholly insolvent and unable to pay any dividend whatever upon its stock, the directors, for the purpose of relieving the stockholders from liability for the unpaid portion of the stock held by them, pretended to declare a dividend of $8,920.65, and authorized the secretary to issue dividend certificates to Schillinger upon 60 shares, to Charles Mueller, Jr., upon 50 shares, to A. C. Gumbinger upon 40 shares, to Henry Jacobson upon 1 share, and to A. Maritzan upon 10 shares, and to receive said dividend certificates and the stock certificates held by each of said parties, and to issue to them, in lieu thereof, certificates of fully paid stock in the corporation. Dividend certificates were given to the above-named stockholders, who

In Massachusetts it has been held that foreign statutes will not be enforced, which provide for bringing into court the creditors and stockholders of a foreign corporation in order to liquidate its affairs, or which impose, for the benefit of the creditors of a foreign corporation, a penal liability upon the stockholders. Coffing v. Dodge, 167 Mass. 231, 45 N. E. 928.

Where the indebtedness of a corporation is so great that it cannot be satisfied by anything less than the full par value of the shares held by each stockholder, equity is without jurisdiction, on the ground of the prevention of a multiplicity of suits, of a suit to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholders of a foreign corporation, in which all such stockholders in the jurisdiction of the court are joined, since joinder is not necessary to determine the amount each should pay, and the defense of each would probably be different. Hale v. Allinson, supra.

Full faith and credit are not denied to a judgment of a Minnesota court against resident stockholders of a domestic corporation, in an action to enforce their statutory liability, by the judgment of a court of another state denying the right to maintain a further action to enforce such liability outside the state of incorporation, where, under the Minnesota laws as construed by its courts, the only remedy provided for the enforcement of the liability of stockholders in domestic corporations is a suit in equity in that state, by a creditor in behalf of himself and all other creditors, against the stockholders who can be served with process. Finney v. Guy, 189 U. S. 335, 47 L. ed. 839, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 558, affirming 111 Wis. 296, 87 N. W. 255.

A state statute making each stockholder personally and severally liable for an additional amount equal to his stock, to each judgment creditor of the corporation whose execution against it has been returned unsatisfied, does not offend the public policy of the United States, is not repugnant to justice or good morals, nor is it calculated to injure the United States or its citizens, and hence may be enforced in a Federal court in another state. Dexter v. Edmands, 89 Fed. 467; Western Nat. Bank v. Reckless, 96 Fed. 70.

Such a statute has also been held not opposed to the public policy of various states so as to prevent its enforcement in their were the only holders of stock in the corporation, and said certificates, with the half paid certificates, were exchanged for certificates of fully paid stock. On November 8, 1902, the corporation was adjudged a bankrupt by the district court of the United States in Missouri, and the complainant was elected trustee of the estate and qualified as such. The trustee reduced to cash all of the assets except the liability of the stockholders and a claim that was in litigation, and has $725.95, proceeds of such assets. Claims to the amount of $7,194.10 were proved and allowed, payable out of the assets. The bankrupt corporation ceased doing business, and all the stockholders but the defendants are residents of the state of Missouri and are insolvent, and a judgment against them, or either of them, would be uncollectable. By the laws of Missouri a transferee of stock is liable for any unpaid balance thereon.

The substantial ground upon which it is contended that the judgment of the appellate court was wrong is that the superior court had no jurisdiction to set aside the fraudulent dividend, or to order a call upon stockholders to pay unpaid subscriptions, because the dividend was declared by a corporation which was a resident of the state of Missouri, and the courts of that state, alone, had jurisdiction over it or its affairs. Counsel for plaintiffs in error regard the bankrupt corporation as a necessary party to the suit, and any interference with the action of courts. Love v. Pusey & J. Co. 3 Penn. (Del.) 577, 52 Atl. 542; Bell v. Farwell, 176 Ill. 489, 42 L.R.A. 804, 68 Am. St. Rep. 194, 52 N. E. 346; Pulsifer v. Greene, 96 Me. 438, 52 Atl. 921; Guerney v. Moore, 131 Mo. 650, 32 S. W. 1132; Kulp v. Fleming, 65 Ohio St. 321, 87 Am. St. Rep. 611, 62 N. E. 334.

And even if the courts of such other state should decide that such a statute is repugnant to its public policy, such a decision would not be binding on a Federal court sitting therein. Dexter v. Edmands, supra.

The liability of a stockholder by virtue of a statute of the state creating the corporation, providing that "each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable for such proportion of its debts and liabilities as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation, and for a like proportion only of each debt or claim against the corporation," is enforceable by a creditor in any state where the stockholder may live. Lanigan v. North, 69 Ark. 62, 63 S. W. 62.

And where the statute further provides that "any creditor of the corporation may institute joint or several actions against any of its stockholders, for the proportion of his claim . . . for which each defendant is liable, and a several judgment must be rendered against each," the liability may be enforced by the creditor by an action at law, since, the liability of the stockholder being fixed by the law with absolute precision, there is no necessity to go into a court of equity. Ibid.

The courts of a state will not enforce the liability of resident stockholders in a foreign corporation, when to do so will place them in a worse position than stockholders living in such foreign state. Abbott v. Goodall, 100 Me. 231, 60 Atl. 1030; Coffing v. Dodge, 167 Mass. 231, 45 N. E. 928.

Thus, it has been held that a suit in equity by creditors of an insolvent Colorado corporation, suing on behalf of themselves and all other creditors who may join with them, to enforce against Maine stockholders only the double liability imposed by the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Colorado statute which provides that "shareholders . . . shall be individually responsible for debts . . . in double the amount of the par value of the stock owned by them respectively," cannot be maintained in the court of Maine. Abbott v. Goodall, supra.

The reason assigned in the above case was that the statute contemplates only a pro rata contribution by all stockholders in proportion to the amount of their stock, to the extent necessary to pay the debts of the corporation; that this result could be brought about only by a suit in equity by or for all the creditors, and against all the stockholders and the bank itself, in which the amount of the creditors' claims and the extent of the deficiency of the corporate assets must be judicially ascertained and declared; since otherwise the defendants would be compelled to litigate these questions each time they sought to enforce contribution in another jurisdiction; that such a suit could be brought only in Colorado.

But it has been held that the right of a creditor to bring action against a stockholder living outside of the state of charter is not dependent upon the ability of the stockholders sued to enforce contribution in the jurisdiction in which he is sued, from the other stockholders, although contribution is provided for in the statute creating the double liability. Kisseberth v. Prescott, 91 Fed. 611.

Under a statute of the state of charter, providing that a creditor may enforce the stockholders' statutory liability jointly against all the owners of stock, in an action for the benefit of all the creditors of the corporation, and against all persons liable as stockholders, in which there shall be determined the amount payable by each person liable as stockholders on all the indebtedness of the corporation, a single creditor cannot enforce such statutory liability in a Federal court of a sister state against stockholders there residing, in an action in which neither all the stockholders, the corporation, nor all the creditors are made parties; since, without all these parties before the court, the ascertainment necessary to equitable its directors, by setting aside the fraud, as beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. The arguments touching that subject have taken a very wide range, and cover nearly all questions relating to the powers of courts over foreign corporations, or in any litigation where there affairs are in any manner involved.

The courts have never entertained any doubt of the right of a corporation to bring suits in other jurisdictions than that where it was created. When that question first arose in England, the argument that a foreign corporation was but an emanation of the foreign sovereignty, of which the laws of England would not take notice, and the courts might not sufficiently understand the foreign laws, did not prevail, and it was held that such a corporation might sue in the English courts. Henriques v. Dutch West India Co. 2 Ld. Raym. 1532; Dutch West India Co. v. Van Moses, 1 Strange, 613. The law in this state on that subject was declared in the early case of Bank of Washtenaw v. Montgomery, 3 Ill. 422, where the court said: "It is supposed that nothing is better settled than that corporations may institute suits in the courts of other states and countries than those under whose laws they may have been established." The only rule consistent with that doctrine would be that a corporation permitted to enforce rights in this state should also be subject to have its liabilities enforced here; but, as a matter of fact, there was considerable conflict in the decisions relief cannot be made. State Nat. Bank v. Sayward, 33 C. C. A. 564, 63 U. S. App. 20, 91 Fed. 443.

An action at law by a single creditor of a Maryland corporation cannot be maintained in New York against a single stockholder there resident, to enforce his statutory liability, under a statute of Maryland making stockholders individually responsible for the debts of the corporation equally and ratably, and not one for another, and further providing that the liability of such stockholders shall be an asset of the corporation for the benefit of all depositors and creditors, and enforceable only by a receiver, assignee, or trustee of such corporation. Knickerbocker Trust Co. v. Iselin, 185 N. Y. 54, 113 Am. St. Rep. 863, 77 N. E. 877.

The liability of shareholders of a foreign corporation, under a statute declaring that "shareholders . . . shall be held individually responsible for the debts . . . of said association, in double the amount of the par value of the stock owned by them respectively," cannot be enforced in another state against stockholders there living, by an action by part of the creditors; but only in an equitable action by, or on behalf of, all the creditors, and the corporation itself, and against all the shareholders. Bates v. Day, 198 Pa. 513, 82 Am. St. Rep. 811, 48 Atl. 407.

Where the statutes of a state imposing an additional liability on stockholders, as construed by its courts, contemplate that it shall be enforceable only as a liability of all stockholders to all creditors, and only so far as may be reasonably necessary to satisfy the claims of creditor desiring to take the benefit of it, in an equitable action in the home jurisdiction, where the corporation can be reached, it cannot be otherwise enforced either in another jurisdiction in a suit by a creditor against a stockholder, neither of whom were parties to the suit, or in the home jurisdiction. Eau Claire Nat. Bank v. Benson, 106 Wis. 624, 12 N. W. 604.

and all other creditors, cannot be maintained to enforce the statutory liability of a stockholder upon a claim not reduced to judgment against the corporation, where the corporation or its assignee and all the stockholders are not made parties to the suit; since the corporation would not be bound should the stockholder paying, whose liability is only secondary, seek to recover the amount paid from the corporation, which is primarily liable, out of any of its assets remaining. Clark v. Knowles, 187 Mass. 35, 105 Am. St. Rep. 376, 72 N. E. 352, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 26.

A decision by the highest court of the state under whose laws a corporation is organized, that a suit in equity by creditors to enforce a stockholder's statutory liability may be brought without first reducing the creditors' claims to judgment, or joining the corporation or its assignee and all the stockholders, is not binding on the courts of another state. Ibid.

The courts of a state are bound to follow a decision of the highest court of another state, construing its own statute so as to uphold the right of one of the creditors of one of its corporations to proceed directly against a stockholder, although before such decision they had ruled that such an action could be maintained only by a receiver, and although the legislature of such foreign state subsequently changed the statute to conform to general equitable principles of collection and distribution; but after the rights of the creditors had accrued. Ball v. Anderson, 196 Pa. 86, 79 Am. St. Rep. 693, 46 Atl. 366.

No action can be maintained by a creditor to enforce the statutory liability of a stockholder in a foreign corporation, where there is no allegation that the liability is contractual, nor that it has been so construed by the courts of the state chartering it, nor allegations from which it can be seen that no injustice to others will be done. Coffing v. Dodge, 167 Mass. 231, 45 N. E. 928.

Where a double liability is imposed on stockholders of a corporation organized under the laws of one state, in favor of creditors, and an action is brought to enforce in this country as to whether a foreign corporation could be sued outside of the state of its creation except upon a voluntary appearance, and perhaps more numerous decisions were that it could not. The view of many courts was that a corporation could not migrate beyond the boundaries of the state of its creation, so as to be there served with process. Peckham v. North Parish, 16 Pick. 274; M'Queen v. Middletown Mfg. Co. 16 Johns. 5; Middlebrooks v. Springfield F. Ins. Co. 14 Conn. 301.

The theory that a corporation can only have its existence in the state of its creation has long since been dispelled by the migratory corporations which have transacted the business of the country, and there have always been courts which held that they could be sued wherever they could be served with process in accordance with the local law. Quite convincing reasons that they could be so sued were given in Libbey v. Hodgdon, 9 N. H. 394, where the court said: "If we admit and vindicate their rights, even-handed justice requires that we also enforce their liabilities, and not send our citizens to a foreign jurisdiction in quest of redress for injuries committed here." The Supreme Court of the United States, in Barrows S. S. Co. v. Kane, 170 U. S. 100, 42 L. ed. 964, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526, commented on the manifest injustice resulting from permitting a foreign corporation to do business in a state and to bring suits in its courts, but not permitting such liability in another state, the right to join different causes of action in one suit is governed by the laws of the state where the suit is brought. Anglo-American Land, Mortg. & Agency Co. v. Wood, 143 Fed. 683.

Hence, where the laws of the state of charter allow a creditor to enforce the liability, either when the corporation is bankrupt or when it is dissolved, though not necessarily bankrupt, and the laws of the state where suit is brought allow the joining of different actions of contract, both remedies may be joined in one statement of claim, since the stockholder's double liability, though statutory in origin, is contractual in its nature, and although joinder is not permitted in the state where the corporation is domiciled. Ibid.

In Blair v. Newbegin, 65 Ohio St. 425, 58 L.R.A. 644, 62 N. E. 1040, it was held that, under an Ohio statute providing that "one or more of the persons severally liable on an instrument may be included in the same action thereon," a creditor of a Kansas corporation could join several Ohio stockholders as parties defendant to a suit to enforce their statutory liability, provided for by a Kansas statute making stockholders severally and individually liable to creditors of the corporation who had obtained a judgment against the corporation, execution on which had been returned unsatisfied, although by Kansas practice joinder could not be had.

It was held in Miller v. Spaulding, — Me. —, 78 Atl. 358, that that part of the general practice act of Colorado providing that "when the question is one of a common or general interest of many persons, or when the parties are numerous, and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue the defendant for the benefit of all, and the court may make an order that the action be so prosecuted or defended," was not a part of the statute creating the double liability of stockholders of corporations, that it had no reference to the enforcement of the liability of nonresident stockholders, and was no part of the contract entered into by the shareholders in subscribing for their stock; that it was 10-33 L.R.A. (N.S.) cal, and not transitory, and would not be recognized in Maine; and hence that creditors of a Colorado corporation could not bring an action in Maine based on such practice act, to enforce the stockholders' double liability, where Maine had no such rule of practice. For a somewhat similar ruling, see Miller v. Aldrich, 202 Mass. 109, 132 Am. St. Rep. 480, 88 N. E. 441.

A creditor of a foreign corporation is not debarred from suing a local stockholder on his statutory liability, in an action of contract at law, because a local statute applicable only to domestic corporations provides for a different remedy. Love v. Pusey & J. Co. 3 Penn. (Del.) 577, 62 Atl. 542; Bell v. Farwell, 176 Ill. 489, 42 L.R.A. 804, 68 Am. St. Rep. 194, 52 N. E. 346.

Where the Constitution or statute of a state confers the right upon a receiver to be appointed by the court as a quasi assignee and representative of the creditors, to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders, both foreign and domestic, such receiver may enforce such liability in a foreign state against stockholders there domiciled. Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 516, 51 L. ed. 1163, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755; Howarth v. Ellwanger, 86 Fed. 54; Hale v. Hardon, 37 C. C. A. 240, 95 Fed. 747; Burr v. Smith, 113 Fed. 858; Goss v. Carter, 84 C. C. A. 402; 156 Fed. 746; decision adhered to on later appeal in 99 C. C. A. 664, 175 Fed. 1019, which has petition for writ of certiorari denied in 217 U. S. 605, 54 L. ed. 900, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 695; Howarth v. Lombard, 175 Mass. 570, 49 L.R.A. 301, 56 N. E. 888; Howarth v. Angle, 162 N. Y. 179, 47 L.R.A. 725, 56 N. E. 489 (if no injustice will be done to local stockholders); Shipman v. Treadwell, 200 N. Y. 472, 93 N. E. 1104 (if no injustice will be done to local stockholders).

A receiver appointed to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders of an insolvent corporation, who, under the statute, has legal title to the fund, as trustee for creditors, and who is the only person who can the corporation to be sued there. It was said that such injustice had induced the passage of statutes in many states providing that a foreign corporation doing business within the state shall keep a place of business, and appoint an agent residing therein, upon whom process may be served; but it was held that a foreign corporation doing business in the state might be sued there without any such statute, and that the liability to be sued might be implied from the grant to do business in the state. In Western U. Tele. Co. v. Pleasants, 46 Ala. 641, it was held that a foreign corporation doing business in a state through a managing agent or employee may be sued there by obtaining service on such agent or employee, and a statute providing for that method of service on corporations generally was applied to a foreign corporation.

It is a just and reasonable theory that a business corporation is constructively present outside of the state of its origin, wherever it has property and carries on its operations by means of agents. This court has maintained that doctrine from the beginning, and in Mineral Point R. Co. v. Keep, 22 Ill. 9, 74 Am. Dec. 124, which was an action of debt, with an attachment in aid, against a Wisconsin corporation, it was held that service upon an agent in this state was sufficient to give jurisdiction. The court said that it would be neither just nor wise to bestow upon foreign corporations having property within this state, and exercising powers and privileges here, legally demand and collect the money, may bring actions against stockholders in his own name in courts of other states. Howarth v. Lombard, 175 Mass. 570, 49 L.R.A. 307, 56 N. E. 888.

A receiver of a foreign corporation; who, by the law of the state in which he is appointed, has title to the right of action against stockholders to enforce their statutory liability, may be allowed by comity to enforce such liability in another state where a stockholder resides, when the amount of the latter's liability has been definitely ascertained and is only his proportion of the ascertained deficiency of assets, and it does not appear that there is any other stockholder or any creditor of the corporation in that state, or that injury will be thereby done to any citizen of the state, or any established policy of the state thereby interfered with. Howarth v. Angle, 162 N. Y. 170, 47 L.R.A. 725, 56 N. E. 480.

Where the statutes of a state make stockholders of its corporations liable to the amount of stock held by them, and contemplate a proceeding in the nature of an equity proceeding in that state for the benefit of all the creditors, in which debts and assets will be ascertained, including the amount due on unpaid subscriptions, and that the avails of the stockholders' liability to creditors wherever found shall ultimately be drawn to the parent proceeding and distributed impartially, and where such statutes give the individual creditor no right of action to enforce the stockholders' liability, a receiver appointed by the court for the purpose of enforcing the stockholders' liability may sue in a Federal court of another jurisdiction. Hale v. Hardon, 37 C. C. A. 240, 95 Fed. 747; Hale v. Tyler, 104 Fed. 757.

A receiver of a foreign corporation duly appointed by a court of the foreign state, to bring suits to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders, can maintain an action for that purpose in New York against a single stockholder, under a statute providing that shareholders shall be individually and severally liable to the creditors of the corporation, and, on insolvency of the corporation, may be compelled to pay such deficiency up to the amount of stock at its par value held by them respectively, in proportion to the amount of stock owned by the respective shareholders. Wigton v. Kenney, 51 App. Div. 215, 64 N. Y. Supp. 924.

A receiver appointed in a suit to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders in a corporation, for the benefit of creditors, may, without specific legislative authority, be empowered to maintain suits in his own name against foreign stockholders. Kirtley v. Holmes, 52 L.R.A. 738, 46 C. C. A. 102, 107 Fed. 1; Hale v. Hilliker, 109 Fed. 273, reversed in 54 C. C. A. 252, 117 Fed. 220; Hale v. Coffin, 114 Fed. 567, affirmed in 57 C. C. A. 528, 120 Fed. 470. Contra: Wigton v. Bosler, 102 Fed. 70; Hilliker v. Hale, 54 C. C. A. 252, 117 Fed. 220, petition for writ of certiorari denied in 188 U. S. 739, 47 L. ed. 677, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 848; Covell v. Fowler, 144 Fed. 535.

It was held in Hale v. Coffin, 114 Fed. 567, affirmed in 57 C. C. A. 528, 120 Fed. 470, that an equitable action could be maintained in a Federal court in another state by a receiver appointed by a court in the domicile of the corporation, to enforce the statutory liability of a stockholder, although his authority to sue came from the court, and not from the statute creating the liability, and although such action might not lie in a state court, since in equity Federal courts do not concern themselves with state practice.

But in Wigton v. Bosler, 102 Fed. 70, under a statute providing that shareholders shall be individually and severally liable to the creditors of the corporation over and above the stock by them held, to an amount equal to their respective shares so held, and shall be compelled to pay such deficiency in proportion to the amount of stock owned by each, in case the corporation should become insolvent and its assets be found insufficient to pay its debts, it was held that a receiver of a corporation appointed in the state of its domicile in the exercise of the general powers of the court, and not in the pursuance of a statute vesting in him the legal title to immunity of exemption from observance of their contracts, or to deny to the people the usual facilities for collecting their debts against them. It was held that service of process could be had upon agents of foreign corporations within the state, in the same manner as on agents of local corporations. The same principle was stated in Midland P. R. Co. v. McDermid, 91 Ill. 170, where it was said that a foreign corporation doing business and having agents in this state may be sued and service had through its agents or officers doing business here the same as domestic corporations. Again, in Italian-Swiss Agri. Colony v. Pease, 194 Ill. 98, 82 N. E. 317, it was held that where a foreign corporation voluntarily extends its business into the state, which it can only transact through an agent, it is presumed to do so with full knowledge that the statutes of the state authorize the courts to obtain jurisdiction of it by service of a copy of process on one of its agents. While a corporation is a resident of the state of its creation, there is no ground of distinction between it and an individual, so far as a suit or jurisdiction of courts is concerned. Even under that rule entire equality cannot be secured, since a foreign mercantile corporation may bring suits in our courts to collect debts arising from the sale and delivery of goods, though it has no general office in the state nor any agent upon whom process might be served, so that it the corporate assets, cannot maintain an action against a stockholder in another state to recover the amount of an assessment on stock made by the court appointing him, in a proceeding in which such stockholder was not a party and did not appear.

A receiver of a foreign corporation cannot maintain an action at law in his own name, to enforce the statutory liability of a resident stockholder, though authorized by the court appointing him to sue in pursuance of a statute of the state of incorporation relating to insolvent corporations, where there is no allegation that the receiver has legal title in himself. Murtey v. Allen, 71 Vt. 377, 76 Am. St. Rep. 779, 45 Atl. 752; Sparks v. Estabrooks, 72 Vt. 101, 47 Atl. 394; King v. Cochran, 72 Vt. 107, 47 Atl. 394.

A judgment in favor of all the creditors of a corporation against all the stockholders, rendered in a receivership proceeding in the state of incorporation brought to enforce the stockholders' statutory liability, in which all the stockholders were personally served, may be enforced in another state against one of the stockholders served, who thereafter removed thither, in an action in which all the judgment creditors, and the receiver appointed in such judgment to collect the amount therein adjudged due by stockholders, are parties plaintiff. Childs v. Blethen, 40 Wash. 340, 82 Pac. 405.

A receiver for a corporation appointed in the state of its domicile will, as a matter of comity, be permitted to sue in another state in his own name, to enforce a stockholder's statutory liability, when no injustice will be done to stockholders living in the state where suit is brought. Tompkins v. Blakey, 70 N. H. 584, 49 Atl. 111.

Where a state statute allows suit to enforce a stockholder's statutory liability to be brought in the state only by a creditor of the corporation, it cannot be enforced outside of the state against a nonresident stockholder by a receiver appointed by the court for that purpose. Evans v. Nellis, 187 U. S. 271, 47 L. ed. 173, 23 Sup. Ct. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Rep. 74; Hale v. Allinson, 188 U. S. 56, 47 L. ed. 380, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240.

In Hale v. Allinson, supra, the court said: "The question of comity cannot avail in a case where the courts of the state in which the receiver was appointed hold that an action similar to the one brought in the foreign jurisdiction cannot be maintained by him in the courts of the state of his appointment."

—conditions precedent to right to sue.

A Federal court cannot enforce the statutory individual liability of a nonresident stockholder of a foreign corporation at the suit of a receiver of its assets, where the latter has not first taken the steps which the statutes of the state, as construed by its courts, make a prerequisite to any action against an individual stockholder; namely, that the receiver should have first brought suit against all the resident stockholders to collect the unpaid subscriptions, and to enforce the additional individual liability, and to ascertain the indebtedness of the corporation, and the amount each stockholder should pay. Evans v. Nellis, 187 U. S. 271, 47 L. ed. 173, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 74.

But when such steps have been taken, such statutory liability may be enforced by a receiver in the Federal courts sitting in another state. Hale v. Hardon, 37 C. C. A. 240, 95 Fed. 747.

A constitutional provision that "dues from corporations shall be secured by such individual liability of the stockholders, . . . as may be prescribed by law; but in all such cases, each stockholder shall be liable, over and above the stock by him or her owned, and any amount unpaid thereon, to a further sum at least equal in amount to such stock," is not self-executing, so as to be enforceable against a stockholder outside the state, where the legislature provided a procedure and stated a remedy which must be pursued, at least in the first instance, in the courts of such state of charter. Middletown Nat. Bank v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. 197 U. S. 394, 49 L. ed. 803, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 462.

cannot be sued here. John Spry Lumber Co. v. Chappell, 184 Ill. 539, 56 N. E. 794.

It may be that a suit cannot be maintained against a foreign corporation, because a court cannot obtain jurisdiction of the corporation. If a foreign corporation does no business in a state through agents or employees, and has no office there, jurisdiction cannot be obtained by serving the president accidentally within the state or passing through it. Moulin v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. 24 N. J. L. 222. If a foreign corporation confines its operations to the state within which it was created, and does not transact any business in another state, and has no office or agent located there, jurisdiction cannot be obtained by serving process upon an officer or agent temporarily in the latter state. Midland P. R. Co. v. McDermid, and Italian-Swiss Agri. Colony v. Pease, supra. There are also cases where the court would have no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, an illustration of which is the power to decree a forfeiture of the franchise of a foreign corporation. Society for Propagation of Gospel v. New Haven, 8 Wheat. 464, 5 L. ed. 662. The courts of one state have no power to dissolve a foreign corporation and wind up its affairs; but it will retain its legal existence until dissolved by a proceeding in the state which created it; but even in that case assets, which are a trust fund for shareholders and creditors, will be administered by the domestic courts where they are found. Life Asso. of Amer-

Where a statute of a state gives to any creditor who has obtained a judgment against a corporation, and had execution returned unsatisfied, the right to sue any stockholder to recover the amount of his debt, not exceeding the par value of the stock held by such stockholder, in suing a stockholder in another state it is sufficient to allege the recovery of such judgment against the corporation, and the return of the execution unsatisfied, without averring the original debt, although such averment is required to be made and proved in the state where suit is brought; since it is not necessary to prove it in the state of charter, with reference to the laws of which such stockholder contracted. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Woodworth, 79 Fed. 951.

A creditor of an insolvent foreign corporation cannot enforce the stockholders' statutory liability in the state of the forum, where such creditor has not first obtained judgment against the corporation, and had execution thereon returned unsatisfied, as required by the law of the state of incorporation as a condition precedent to enforcing such liability. Brookman v. Merchants' Sav. Bank, 31 Misc. 191, 65 N. Y. Supp. 54.

An action at law will not lie by a receiver of an insolvent foreign corporation against a resident stockholder, to enforce the latter's statutory liability, where the statutes and decisions of the foreign state were not complied with, which contemplated a suit in equity in such foreign state in which all creditors and all debtor stockholders should be made parties in order that the entire indebtedness of the corporation and the amount stockholders should pay may be determined in one action. Hazlett v. Woodhead, 27 R. I. 506, 63 Atl. 952.

Collection may be made from stockholders wherever they may be found, after the preliminary proceedings required by the statute, and the adjustment of the rights and liabilities of the corporation, creditors, and stockholders under a statute imposing liability for corporate debts upon stockholders after proceedings showing the insolvency of the corporation and the need of payment by stockholders to satisfy the needs of creditors. Howarth v. Lombard, 175 Mass. 570, 49 L.R.A. 301, 56 N. E. 888.

Right to enforce tax against nonresident stockholder.

A receiver of a corporation who has paid the tax assessed against the shares of its stock by the city in which the corporation has its domicile cannot maintain an action in another state against a stockholder there residing, to recover the amount assessed against his shares; nor is such stockholder rendered liable because the statute imposing the tax declares that the situs of the stock shall be at the chief office of the corporation. Mercantile Trust & Deposit Co. v. Mellon, 20 Pa. Co. Ct. 25.

Right of state to impose personal liability on stockholder of foreign corporation.

The liability of a subscriber to stock in a foreign corporation is governed by the law of the domicile of the corporation. When, therefore, by the law creating a corporation its stockholders are not liable beyond the amount unpaid on their stock, stockholders living in the state creating it cannot be held to any greater liability by a statute of another state providing that every officer, agent, and stockholder of a foreign corporation which has not complied with certain requirements shall be jointly and severally personally liable on all contracts made by the company within the state while so in default. Leyner Engineering Works v. Kempner, 163 Fed. 605.

A stockholder living in one state, of a corporation organized under the laws of a second state and doing business in a third state, the Constitution and laws of which provide that each stockholder of a corporation shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock owned by him bears to ica v. Fassett, 102 Ill. 315. It is the duty of a state to keep the local assets for the satisfaction, in the first instance, of local claims. Coombs v. Crane, 236 Ill. 333, 86 N. E. 245; 18 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1229. Another class of cases is where the court cannot make any effective decree, as in a case of enjoining or compelling an act in a foreign state where the decree could only be enforced by proceedings for contempt, and the parties are beyond the jurisdiction. Courts of one state cannot exercise visitatorial powers over corporations of other states, such as requiring them to pay such dividends as, on an accounting of the affairs of the corporation, may appear to be proper, nor to determine whether a stockholder has been wrongfully excluded from his privileges and matters of that kind.

If, however, a court has jurisdiction of the necessary parties and of the subject-matter, and has power to grant an effective remedy, there has never been any question about the existence of the jurisdiction; but the question has been as to the propriety of assuming jurisdiction in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion. In the exercise of such discretion the courts will not permit their tribunals to be used for the purpose of affording remedies denied to the parties in the foreign state, and which would operate with hardship on the citizens of the domestic state. Rice v. Merrimack Hosiery Co. 56 N. H. 114. How far foreign laws should be enforced the whole of the stock, and that no foreign corporation shall be allowed to transact business within the state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed for domestic corporations, cannot be held personally liable to a creditor for debts incurred in such third state, since no contractual relation exists between the parties. Thomas v. Matthiessen, 170 Fed. 362.

In Risdon Iron & Locomotive Works v. Furness [1906] 1 K. B. 49, 93 L. T. N. S. 687, 75 L. J. K. B. N. S. 83, 54 Week. Rep. 324, 22 Times L. R. 45, 11 Com. Cas. 35, a limited liability company was formed for the purpose, as stated in the memorandum of association, inter alia, of acquiring and working mines in the United States and elsewhere. The articles of association empowered the directors to do all things necessary to comply with any statutory enactment, rule, or regulation in any country where the company might do business. The company did business in California, the laws of which made every stockholder individually and personally liable for debts of the corporation in an amount proportionate to the amount of stock held by him, and provided that foreign corporations should not do business on more favorable terms than domestic corporations. The company having become insolvent, and suit having been brought by a creditor against a stockholder living in England, it was held that the memorandum and articles of association did not constitute an authority by the shareholder to the company to pledge his personal credit for the company's debts, so as to increase his liability beyond the amount to which it was limited by the companies acts.

It was held in Pinney v. Nelson, 183 U. S. 144, 46 L. ed. 125, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 52, that California stockholders in a Colorado corporation whose charter specified that one purpose of the incorporation was the transaction of business by the corporation in California must be deemed to have contracted with reference to the provisions of the California Code imposing a personal 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

liability upon stockholders of domestic corporations, and also imposing the same personal liability upon stockholders of foreign corporations doing business within the state as upon stockholders in domestic corporations, and are bound thereby, so far, at least, as such liability arises from the corporate business carried on in California, although the Colorado corporation law imposed no personal liability upon stockholders. The court said: "As then a corporation can have no legal existence outside of the state in which it is incorporated, the contract of the stockholders with one another, by which the corporation is created, is presumed to have been made with reference to the laws of that state, nothing being said in the charter to the contrary. But as comity permits a corporation to enter another state and do business therein, it is competent for the stockholders, in making their charter, to contract with reference to the laws of a state in which they propose the corporation shall do business. And in this case the stockholders in their charter specified that the purpose of the incorporation was partly business beyond the limits of Colorado, and that the principal part of such outside business should be carried on in California. Not content to rely upon the general authority which, by the rules of comity, the Colorado corporation would have to enter California and transact business therein, they in terms set forth that a part of the purpose of the incorporation was the transaction of business by the corporation in California. Now, when they in terms specified that they were framing a corporation for the purpose of having that corporation do business in California, is it not clear that they were contracting with reference to the laws of that state? Contracting with reference to the laws of that state, they must be assumed to know the provisions of those laws; that by them a personal liability was cast upon the stockholders in corporations formed under the laws of the state, and that that same liability was also imposed upon the stockholders of corporations formed under the laws of other states and doing business under the doctrine of comity depends upon whether any wrong or injury will be done to citizens of the domestic state, whether the policies of its laws will be contravened or impaired, or whether the courts can do complete justice to those affected by the decree. New Haven Horse Nail Co. v. Linden Spring Co. 142 Mass. 349, 7 N. E. 773. In the case of May v. Black, 77 Wis. 101, 45 N. W. 949, it was considered that the foreign law was enforceable only in the foreign state and in a particular form of action, and for those reasons it was held that the Wisconsin court ought to decline to assume jurisdiction. It was there sought by a bill in equity to enforce the Constitution and statute of the state of Michigan, making stockholders liable for labor performed for a corporation, by an action in assumpsit, and it appeared to the Wisconsin court that the corporation must be a party to the suit. The necessity of the corporation being a party, and an account being taken, and its affairs being wound up in order to do complete justice, was the basis of the decision in Young v. Farwell, 139 Ill. 326, 28 N. E. 845. In that case a bill was filed against two stockholders of a Michigan corporation residing in this state, to enforce payment of the amount of a judgment. The bill was dismissed as to one, and relief granted as to the other, and it appeared that it was necessary to take an account of the indebtedness, and wind up the affairs of the corporation, and apportion the indebtedness within California. How can it be said that those laws do not enter into the contract, and control as to all business done in pursuance of that contract within the limits of California?"

The court in the above case did not "express any opinion upon the question whether the defendants could have been held liable under the California statutes independently of the provisions of the Colorado charter," saying: "All that we here hold is that when a corporation is formed in one state, and by the express terms of its charter it is created for doing business in another state, and business is done in that state, it must be assumed that the charter contract was made with reference to its laws; and the liabilities which those laws impose will attend the transaction of such business."

A similar ruling was made in Peck v. Noe, 154 Cal. 351, 97 Pac. 865, under facts almost identical.

The principal difference between Risdon Iron & Locomotive Works v. Furness and Pinney v. Nelson is that in the latter the charter expressed the purpose of the incorporation to be doing business in California, and, as the laws of that state imposed a personal liability on stockholders, they were presumed to have had that in mind when incorporating; whereas in the former case the stockholders would not know in what quarter of the globe and under what laws the corporation would do business, and could not reasonably have expected such a great extension of their liability.

Right of one stockholder to sue another for contribution outside state of incorporation.

A stockholder of a corporation, who, in accordance with the laws of the state of charter making stockholders liable to creditors to the amount of their unpaid subscriptions, has been compelled to pay a judgment against the corporation, can sue other stockholders similarly liable, for contribution in any state where they may be 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

found. Putnam v. Misochi, 189 Mass. 421, 109 Am. St. Rep. 648, 75 N. E. 956, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 733.

And this is true even where the stockholder seeking contribution after satisfying the judgment made no demand upon the corporation, and took no action against it. Ibid.

Impairment of obligation of stockholder's contract by change of remedy for enforcement of his liability in foreign jurisdiction.

The rights of one owing an obligation on a contract are not impaired by a statutory change in the remedy rendering it more efficacious. Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 516, 51 L. ed. 1163, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755.

Hence, where the Constitution of a state provides that every stockholder shall be liable to the amount of stock held or owned by him, and the legislature, to enforce such provision, passed a statute defective because only those who could be personally served in the state could be reached and rendered liable, whereby stockholders in other states were thus rendered immune, and the entire burden cast upon local stockholders, the contract of a foreign stockholder was not impaired because the legislature subsequently changed the law so as to provide for the appointment of a receiver having power to collect assessments from both domestic and foreign stockholders, and to sue the latter in the state of their domicile. Ibid.; Converse v. Ayer, 197 Mass. 443, 84 N. E. 98.

Nor was it impaired because the later statute imposed upon the stockholders the expense of suits to enforce the liability of stockholders outside the state of charter, so long as these expenses were kept within the amount of the original liability; since such expenses are incident to the ascertainment of the trust fund, which it is necessary to realize from the liability of stockholders. *Bernheimer v. among the solvent delinquent stockholders, and for that purpose to determine liabilities under the laws of Michigan, so that no decree entered in this state could do complete justice to those liable to be affected by it, and might do injustice to some. What was said in that case about a want of sufficient comprehension of the laws of Michigan, and the possibility of the supreme court of that state reaching a different conclusion from this court, is not applicable to this case, where the bill avers both the laws of Missouri and an express promise to pay the balance to the corporation. In Tuttle v. National Bank, 161 Ill. 497, 34 L.R.A. 750, 44 N. E. 984, it was held that the liability of stockholders under the Constitution of Kansas, and the special remedy given by the statute of that state, must be applied within that jurisdiction; but afterward, in Bell v. Farwell, 176 Ill. 489, 42 L.R.A. 804, 68 Am. St. Rep. 194, 52 N. E. 346, the holding that a special remedy provided by the statutes of another state, not opposed to the legislation or public policy of this state, nor calling for forms of action unknown to our law, could not be enforced here, was distinctly disapproved. It was also there held that, where the laws of Kansas were pleaded, the stockholder's liability would be enforced in this state, and under that decision the possibility suggested in Young v. Farwell, that the supreme court of Michigan might reach a different conclusion from this court, ceases to have

Where a creditor of a corporation is given by the laws of the state where it is organized a personal right of action against any of its stockholders to the amount of the stock held by him, in case of the insolvency of such corporation, a statute of another state which takes away such personal right of action, and substitutes another action in the nature of an equitable accounting for the proportionate benefit of all parties interested, to which such corporation and its legal representatives and all its creditors and stockholders shall be necessary parties, is contrary to a constitutional provision of the latter state that "the legislature shall not pass . . . any law impairing the obligation of contracts, or depriving a party of any remedy for enforcing a contract which existed when the contract was made." *Western Nat. In the absence of fraud, stockholders are bound by a decree against their corporation in respect to corporate matters, even though not served, and though residents of another state; since the stockholders are to be deemed privy to the proceedings touching the body of which they are members. *Hancock Nat. Hence, an assessment by the court on stockholders on their unpaid subscriptions is binding, even as to stockholders residing outside the state and not served, as to the necessity of making such assessment and its amount. *Great Western Teleg. So, also, an adjudication by a court of the state where the corporation has its domicile, that an assessment be levied on all stockholders on account of their statutory liability, is binding on nonresident stockholders, though not personally made parties, both as to the necessity and the amount of the assessment. *Hale v. Thus, a stockholder sued by a receiver in a state other than the state of incorporation, on his statutory liability, cannot show, contrary to an adjudication in the state of charter in which the corporation was a party, that the corporation had assets which could be used to pay corporate debts without resorting to the stockholders.

any weight. In Young v. Farwell the court cited and relied upon the decision of the Massachusetts court in New Haven Horse Nail Co. v. Linden Spring Co., supra; but that court afterwards, in Hancock Nat. Bank v. Ellis, 166 Mass. 414, 55 Am. St. Rep. 414, 44 N. E. 349, held that a declaration alleging that, according to the law of Kansas, a stockholder in a corporation is liable to a judgment creditor as upon a contract, is a good declaration, and that requirement is satisfied by the bill in this case. In Whitman v. National Bank, 176 U. S. 559, 44 L. ed. 587, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 477, which was a suit to enforce the liability of a stockholder, it was held that the action, not being to enforce a penal statute of Kansas, but only to secure a private remedy, could be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction.

There is no reason in this case for declining to take jurisdiction on the ground that the laws of the state of Missouri are unknown. The laws of other states are pleaded in the courts of this state as facts, and our courts constantly take jurisdiction of cases where laws must be, and are, proved as facts. Our courts are perfectly competent to determine what the laws of other states are as matters of fact, and there is no reason for sending an applicant for the redress of wrong to another state to have a fact determined which is pleaded and may be proved in our courts. Counsel are in error in contending that the allegation concerning the laws of Mis-

So, a judgment against the corporation in favor of a creditor, rendered in the state of its domicile, is conclusive evidence of the indebtedness of the corporation to such judgment creditor in a subsequent action by him in another jurisdiction, to enforce in his favor the individual statutory liability of a stockholder. Hancock Nat. Bank v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 44 L. ed. 619, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506; Dexter v. Edmonds, 89 Fed. 467; Ferguson v. Sherman, 116 Cal. 169, 37 L.R.A. 622, 47 Pac. 1023.

An assessment against shareholders to pay the debts of an insolvent foreign corporation, levied in accordance with a judgment of the foreign state, is conclusive against stockholders in the state of the forum, where it is held in the courts of the foreign state to be conclusive against stockholders, although such an assessment would not be held conclusive in the courts of the state of the forum; since otherwise full faith and credit would not be given to the judgments of other states. Tompkins v. Blakey, 70 N. H. 584, 49 Atl. 111.

A judgment against a corporation which, by the laws of the state in which it is rendered, is binding on stockholders, must be given by a court of another state the same conclusive effect against a stockholder who is sued therein on his statutory liability; and the only defenses which he can make against it are those which he could make in the courts of the state in which it was rendered. Hancock Nat. Bank v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 44 L. ed. 619, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506, reversing 20 R. I. 466, 40 Atl. 341.

It has been held that the findings in the parent action in the state where the corporation is domiciled, that the corporation is insolvent, that its assets are insufficient to meet its liabilities, that the deficiency amounts to so much, and that a certain sum must be raised from the shareholders, are only prima facie evidence against foreign shareholders who were not parties thereto, in ancillary actions in the state of their domicile. Pfaff v. Gruen, 92 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Mo. App. 560, 69 S. W. 405 (action to enforce statutory liability).

And in Converse v. Aetna Nat. Bank, 29 Conn. 163, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 64 Atl. 341, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 75, it was held that an adjudication by a court of the state where the corporation was domiciled, that an assessment be levied on stockholders on account of their statutory liability, was not so conclusive on a nonresident stockholder not served, as to preclude him from showing that, in fixing the amount of the assessment, an unconstitutional item had been included.

A judgment against a corporation in an independent action on contract is not so conclusive on a stockholder, in an action by the judgment creditor to enforce such stockholder's individual liability for the corporate debts, under the constitution and laws of the state of charter, as to prevent him from showing that such contract was ultra vires and void under such Constitution and laws. Ward v. Joslin, 186 U. S. 142, 46 L. ed. 1093, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 807.

A statute of a state to the effect that a court of that state may, in a summary proceeding, fix the amount for which stockholders must respond upon their statutory liability, and the time when and the person to whom the same must be paid, and that the determination shall be regarded as a bar to every defense to such liability in any court anywhere, even by stockholders not served, will not be so enforced in another state as to prevent a resident stockholder not served in the original proceeding from setting up any defenses he may have. Hunt v. Whewell, 122 Wis. 33, 99 N. W. 599; Converse v. Hamilton, 136 Wis. 591, 118 N. W. 190; Converse v. McCauley, 136 Wis. 594, 118 N. W. 192.

Where, by the laws of such foreign state, a corporation is not a necessary party to a suit to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders, service upon it cannot be considered service upon stockholders, or in anyway binding upon those not notified or made parties to such suit. Hazlett v. Woodhead, 27 R. I. 506, 63 Atl. 952.

Where, under the law of the state in missouri is a mere conclusion of law, not admitted by the demurrer. The averment is an averment of fact, which may be pleaded, admitted, or denied like any other fact. It is suggested that the allegation as to the laws of Missouri is not sufficient in form, but we see no objection to it. Furthermore, the liability for the unpaid balance need not rest upon any allegation as to the laws of Missouri, since the bill alleges a specific promise to pay to the corporation the unpaid balance on the stock. The objection that this promise might have been made to the persons from whom the stock was purchased has no force, for the reason that it makes no difference whether the promise was made directly to the corporation or to the assignor of the stock for its benefit.

It was not necessary that there should be any call made by the corporation or the bankruptcy court. The creditor of a corporation can proceed in equity without a call, and without taking any account of other indebtedness or making all stockholders defendant. The liability of a stockholder for unpaid subscriptions is several, and not joint, and the creditor is not bound to settle up the affairs of the corporation in order to obtain his dues. Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, 25 L. ed. 885. A creditor of a corporation seeking satisfaction of his debt need look no further than to find a solvent stockholder who is liable for it, and he sustains no relation to the corporation which requires him to adjust equities between stockholders or between the corporation and others. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co. 22 How. 380, 16 L. ed. 349.

It was suggested in Hatch v. Dana, supra, that a stockholder, when sued, could, if he desired, file a cross bill, and bring in other stockholders and enforce contribution, and upon that suggestion counsel found an argument that this suit ought to have been brought in Missouri, so that the defendants could bring in other stockholders. Inasmuch as the Missouri court would have no jurisdiction of the defendants, and they could not be brought into that court, there would be no occasion for their filing any cross bill to bring in someone else, and, of course, it would be desirable for them to have the suit in a court that could render no decree against them. But whenever the suit might be brought, it would be of no avail to the defendants to bring in the other three stockholders who are insolvent, and from whom nothing could be recovered in the way of contribution.

Much is said about this suit relating to the internal affairs of a Missouri corporation, and that, because it relates to internal affairs, the courts of this state have no which a corporation is chartered, a judgment by a creditor against the corporation is not conclusive against a stockholder residing in such state, when sued by the creditor to enforce the double statutory liability of such stockholder, if the judgment was obtained by fraud, neither is it conclusive on a nonresident stockholder under like circumstances; but such nonresident stockholder, when sued by the creditor in another jurisdiction, may set up as a defense that the judgment was obtained by fraud. Ball v. Warrington, 47 C. C. A. 447, 108 Fed. 472.

But although the general rule is that a stockholder, though out of jurisdiction, and not a party to an action in the state of incorporation to wind up the corporation's affairs and enforce the liability of stockholders, cannot question the findings of insolvency and the other foundations of an assessment upon the stockholders, yet this does not preclude the stockholder, when sued in another jurisdiction, from setting up defenses personal to himself. Rood v. Whorton, 67 Fed. 434, affirmed in 20 C. C. A. 332, 46 U. S. App. 6, 74 Fed. 118; Childs v. Cleaves, 95 Me. 498, 50 Atl. 714; Tompkins v. Blakey, 70 N. H. 584, 49 Atl. 111.

Hence, an adjudication of a court levying an assessment on unpaid subscriptions for the payment of creditors is not binding on 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) a stockholder in another state, and not a party to the proceeding, to such an extent as to prevent him setting up as a defense to an action by a receiver to recover the amount unpaid on his stock, that he bought the stock in good faith as full paid. Rood v. Whorton, 67 Fed. 434, affirmed in 20 C. C. A. 332, 46 U. S. App. 6, 74 Fed. 118.

The whole effect of a call or order of assessment made by a court upon the stockholders of an insolvent corporation, to collect the amount due on unpaid assessments, is to fix the amount which any stockholder liable under his contract of subscription should pay, and to authorize the receiver to bring suits against stockholders for the same, but not to determine whether any particular stockholder is liable for anything, or to cut off defenses which any particular stockholder may have. Great Western Teleg. Co. v. Purdy, 162 U. S. 329, 40 L. ed. 986, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 810.

Hence, such an order of assessment made by a court of the state where the corporation is domiciled is not a judgment against a stockholder resident in another state, which is entitled to full faith and credit in the courts of the latter state, so as to preclude such stockholder, when sued by the receiver on his unpaid assessment, from setting up the defense of the statute of limitations. Great Western Teleg. Co. v. Burnham, 162 U. S. 339, 40 L. ed. 991, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 850. R. A. E.

jurisdiction to set aside the fraudulent scheme by which the balance of the unpaid subscriptions was nominally satisfied. The term "internal affairs" has no very definite or fixed meaning; but we do not think that it extends to cheating creditors, and it must be confined to relations affecting only the stockholders and the corporation among themselves. A contract of a corporation limiting the liability of its stockholders to a portion of the par value of their stock is void both as to creditors and the assignee in bankruptcy (Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45, 23 L. ed. 203), and the scheme in this case is admitted by the demurrer to have been a fraud. The relation of a stockholder who has not paid for his stock, to the corporation, is the ordinary one of debtor. Parmelee v. Price, 208 Ill. 544, 70 N. E. 725. If it was necessary that the corporation should be represented in the litigation, it was present in this case by the trustee in bankruptcy, who by the law represents and stands in the place of the corporation. The bankrupt corporation was in legal contemplation a party, and all the stockholders except those who are insolvent were defendants. The stockholders, except the defendants, were not necessary parties by reason of their insolvency, and, as the trustee represents both the creditors and the corporation (Brandenburg Bankr. 737; Collier, Bankr. 389), all the parties whose presence could in any manner affect the litigation were subject to the jurisdiction of the court. There was no lack of jurisdiction in the court to hear and determine the case, nor any reason for declining to assume jurisdiction. The courts of Missouri could not obtain jurisdiction of the defendants, and the courts of this state alone could grant relief. The controversy was between creditors through their representative, the trustee in bankruptcy, and the defendants, and the court could apply an effective remedy, which it did.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM DE GLOPPER, by Next Friend,
v.
NASHVILLE RAILWAY & LIGHT COMPANY.

Negligence — accident — res ipsa loquitur.

1. The maxim Res ipsa loquitur will not apply to establish on the part of a street car company liability for injury to a passer-by by a missile thrown from under a car, where both the act which caused the injury and the negligence of the street car company in relation thereto would have to be inferred from the accident.

Street railway — operation of car — accident to passer-by — liability.

2. The mere fact that the attempt to move a heavily loaded street car stalled on a steep grade caused the wheels to revolve rapidly without imparting motion to the car, but throwing a missile against a passer-by, to his injury, does not establish negligence on the part of the street car company which will render it liable for the injury.

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to review a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Disallowed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. H. Washington and Thomas H. Andrews for plaintiff in error.

Mr. R. F. Jackson for defendant in error.

Lansden, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced in the circuit court of Davidson county to recover damages for personal injuries received by William De Glopper, a boy fourteen years of age, and there was a trial before the circuit judge and jury, and a verdict and judgment for plaintiff below in the sum of $4,000. An appeal was taken to the court of civil appeals, and this judgment reversed, and the suit dismissed, to review which action of the court of civil appeals a petition for certiorari is filed in this court and errors assigned.

The plaintiff below states his cause of action in substance as follows: In the first count it is thus stated:

"At the time of said injuries, to wit, on the 27th day of October, 1906, the defendant was running a car towards the east on Church street, at and near its intersection with Ninth avenue north, on its West Nashville line. Said car was in charge of a motorman of defendant, and had underneath it the electrical machinery which moved and controlled it. At the time of said injuries, said electrical machinery was defective and out of repair, and the wheels of said car were defective, so that, when revolving rapidly upgrade, they would throw off slivers or pieces of iron or steel with great force."

"At said place there exists a heavy upgrade east on Church street, and on the day and year aforesaid, whilst said car with said defective electrical machinery and defective wheels was ascending said steep grade, the plaintiff, seated in a buggy, was driving upon the street, and was in the exercise of ordinary care, and when near the side of said car the motorman negligently managed, manipulated, and handled the electrical and propelling power of said car, which, together with the defective electrical machinery, caused the wheels of said car to revolve at a furious, excessive, and dangerous velocity at the same place upon the rails, without giving the car any perceptible movement forward. Said unusual, extraordinary, and dangerous velocity of the wheels, together with the defects in the material of which they were composed, caused pieces of sliver or material to be broken therefrom and from the rails of the track of defendant, which were defective, and to be thrown off at a tangent, with tremendous force, one of which struck the plaintiff in the eye, and cut, tore, and lacerated it so badly that it was necessary to take it out, which was accordingly thereafter done. The said injury and cut in plaintiff's eye was the direct and proximate result of the said negligence of defendant, and was directly due to the negligence of the motorman in failing to properly apply the electrical current, and to the negligence of defendant in having electrical machinery so defective as to cause the wheels to run away, get beyond control, and revolve at such excessive and tremendous velocity as to break and wear away the wheels of said car, as well as the rails of the track at that point, which, by the negligence of defendant, were defective and wholly unfit to bear the excessively rapid revolutions of the wheels at the same place, and said injuries were thus directly and proximately due to the grinding and wearing of the metal upon metal, and to the friction upon the tracks, all directly brought about by the said negligence of defendant and its agent and servant, the motorman in charge of said car. The defective condition of said electrical machinery, wheels, and rails was known to defendant, or could have been known by ordinary care, and was unknown to plaintiff."

In the second count it is thus stated:

"At the time of said injuries, to wit, on the 27th day of October, 1906, whilst plaintiff was driving along Church street at and near Ninth avenue north, in Nashville, the defendant had negligently allowed and permitted its track at said point to become defective and dangerous, on account of the accumulation thereon of rock, gravel, débris, and other hard, sharp material, and on the day and year aforesaid, whilst plaintiff was driving along said street, seated in a buggy, a car of defendant was in such defective condition, and so negligently managed by the motorman of defendant in charge of it, that the wheels were thereby caused and permitted to run away and revolve in practically the same place at such excessive and dangerous velocity, in endeavoring to ascend a heavy grade at said point, as to grind up, take up, and throw off at a tangent said rock, gravel, débris, and other hard, sharp material and substance, and hurl it against and into the eye of plaintiff, whereby it was put out, and had to be cut out, thereby disfiguring and disabling him for life."

"From said injuries plaintiff suffered and still continues to suffer great pain and agony of body and mind, and was permanently injured, and lost much time, and expended considerable sums in nursing and doctor's bills."

"Before the happening of said injuries, defendant knew of the defects in the machinery of said car, which caused the wheels to revolve so rapidly at the same place upon the rails, as well as the defective condition of the surface of its track at said place, or might have known it by ordinary care, and it was unknown to plaintiff; and the said injuries were directly and proximately due to the said negligence of defendant, and the negligence of its motorman, in carelessly and negligently handling said car."

In the third count it is thus stated:

"At the time of the injuries set out in the counts of the original and amended declaration, to which reference is made herein and which are made a part hereof, the said car was negligently overloaded for the place and grade, and this fact, to wit, because there was more load upon the car than it could safely carry at that place, was the direct and proximate cause of the stalling of the car, and the extremely rapid revolutions of the wheels, which caused said sliver of metal or hard substances to be thrown off with great force, and which struck plaintiff in the eye, inflicting the injuries described and set out in said amended declaration."

The facts of the case are as follows:

On the 27th of October, 1906, William De Glopper, with two boy companions, was driving west on Church street, near Ninth avenue, and they met a car of the defendant in error coming east on the same street. There is a sharp ascent in the grade of the street at this point, and the car of the defendant in error stalled. It was heavily loaded, and the motorman applied the power in such a way that the wheels of the car revolved very rapidly without moving the car, except that the car would lurch forward a few inches or a few feet, and would again stop, and the wheels would continue to revolve rapidly in the same place. The plaintiff in error was in a small buggy drawn by a pony, and was on the left-hand side of the buggy, next to the car, and when his position was somewhat in front of the rear truck, and west of the center of the car, he suddenly threw his hand to his eye and cried, "Stop! Something flew from under that car and hit my eye."

The plaintiff in error was struck in the lower left-hand corner of the eye with a triangular substance with a rough edge, which penetrated the eye and destroyed it. On the following day his eye was removed. There was no one on the street west, east, or south of plaintiff in error who could have thrown the substance inflicting the injury in the manner in which it was done, and the windows of the car, as well as the vestibules, were all closed in such a way that no one upon the car could have done so. The car was 28 feet long and 12 feet high, and thus it made it impossible for the injury to have been inflicted by a person to the south of plaintiff in error. The wind was not blowing.

A witness was introduced as an expert, who says that the probable effect of revolving the steel wheels of the car rapidly in the same place upon the steel rails of the track when the car is heavily loaded is to throw out slivers of steel, either from the rail or wheel, or both, with considerable force. This witness stated that he has seen this occur on different occasions, and that it results from the nature of the wheel and the track, when subjected to the great friction that would be created by the rapid revolution of the wheels while the car is heavily loaded and stationary.

The track of defendant was examined at the place of the accident soon after it occurred, and particles of sand were found upon it; but the witness could not say that the servants of defendant in error were using sand just before or at the time of the accident. It is a custom of defendant in error to place sand on its track wherever needed to prevent the slipping of the wheels.

When the eye of plaintiff in error was examined soon after the accident, as well as when it was removed, no foreign substance was found in it. It was seen, however, that the cornea had been penetrated by a hard, rough, triangular shaped substance of sufficient weight to fall out of the eye. There is no other proof tending to show that either the machinery or the wheels of the car, or rails of the track, were defective. There is no proof tending to show that defendant in error had notice, or should have had notice by the exercise of due care, of any of the alleged facts. There is no proof of the negligent operation of the car, other than the facts stated,—that it was heavily loaded, and stalled at the ascent in the street, and the motorman, in applying the power to propel the car, caused the wheels to revolve very rapidly at the same place. The plaintiff in error was rightfully upon the street and in the exercise of due care.

The foregoing facts appear entirely from the testimony of the plaintiff in error. The defendant in error, at the conclusion of the testimony of plaintiff, moved the court to direct a verdict in its behalf, which was overruled, and the case was given to the jury without any further proof being offered.

In every action for damages resulting from injuries to the plaintiff, alleged to have been inflicted by the negligence of the defendant, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of the testimony, three propositions:

(1) A duty which the defendant owes to him.

(2) A negligent breach of that duty.

(3) Injuries received thereby, resulting proximately from the breach of that duty.

If he aver that the duty which the defendant owes him arises out of a particular relationship, or that the negligence constituting its breach consists of a particular act, omission, or thing, he must prove his case substantially as averred. This may be done either by direct testimony of witnesses who know the facts, or by direct proof of indirect but correlated facts from which the duty owing him, the injury done him, the negligence of defendant, and its proximate causal connection with the injury, may be reasonably inferred. When such method of establishing liability is resorted to, negligence is never inferred from the mere fact of the injury; but the act which produced it, and defendant's negligence, and the injury, must all be shown, and the nexus between them must appear in the relationship of cause and effect. This indirect method of arriving at the negligence of defendant is generally expressed by the maxim Res ipsa loquitur. Literally translated, it means "the thing speaks for itself," and is merely a short way of saying that the circumstances attendant upon the accident are themselves of such a character as to justify a jury in inferring negligence as the cause of the injury. It in no wise modifies the general doctrine that negligence will not be presumed.

The mere fact of any injury never raises a presumption of negligence. Benedick v. Potts, 88 Md. 52, 41 L.R.A. 478, 40 Atl. 1061; Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Giese, 229 Ill. 263, 82 N. E. 232; Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co. 43 W. Va. 661, 39 L.R.A. 499, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922, 28 S. E. 733.

The general meaning of the maxim is well expressed by the supreme court of Illinois in Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Giese, 229 Ill. 263, 82 N. E. 232, as follows: "When a thing which has caused an injury is shown to be under the management of the party charged with negligence, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, the accident itself affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of an explanation by the party charged, that it arose from the want of proper care."

This rule finds its most common application in cases where one, in passing along the street, is hurt by a barrel falling from a door above, or by a brick falling from a wall, or scaffold, or by a falling shutter or wall, or the like. The mere occurrences in themselves import negligence.

In Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co. 43 W. Va. 668, 39 L.R.A. 502, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922, 28 S. E. 735, supra, it is said that "where things of great danger are used in public highways, where multitudes constantly and lawfully pass, their very nature requiring the highest degree and constancy of care, and one is killed from its being out of place or defective, why may we not logically and fairly assume negligence, unless other plausible explanation appears?"

well defined and well understood, and are fully illustrated and fully expressed by this court in East Tennessee & W. N. C. R. Co. v. Lindamood, 111 Tenn. 457, 78 S. W. 99, where the court quoted the following from the supreme court of California with approval:

"Unless facts are shown from which negligence may be reasonably inferred, a jury should never be permitted to infer arbitrarily and without evidence that there was negligence. When a fact is established, some other fact may be justly inferred therefrom; but when a plaintiff, instead of presenting a fact or facts from which the negligence of the defendant may be reasonably inferred, gives to the jury only a presumption drawn from other facts, the jury are not to be allowed to infer negligence from such presumption. The inference cannot be drawn from a presumption, but must be founded upon some fact legally established."

Applying these principles to the present case, we find that plaintiff in error was passing the car mentioned when his face was about 6 feet from the car, with his left side to the car, when he was struck in the left eye with force by a hard substance coming from under the car, while the wheels of the car were revolving rapidly in the same place under a heavy load. The fact that the substance which struck plaintiff in error in the eye came from under the car is a fact which may reasonably be drawn from the whole circumstances of the accident by a fair inference from the situation of the parties at the time. It is not directly proven, and is arrived at by inference only. There is no direct, open, and visible connection between this inferred fact and the rapid turning of the wheels of the car at the same place. Whatever of connection there may be between the turning of the wheels and the striking of plaintiff in error arises only upon inference, and in order to make this connection between the operation of the car and the injury of plaintiff in error it must be inferred that the substance which struck plaintiff in error came from under the car, and from that fact it must be further inferred that it was thrown from under the car by the rapidly turning wheels, and there still must be superadded to these two inferences the further inference that the motorman was negligent in the operation of the car at the time, or that the wheels of the car were defective, or that the track was defective at the place of the accident, and that defendant in error had notice of the defects, or, by the exercise of due care, should have known of them.

If the act which caused the injury was shown by direct evidence, and all of the circumstances of the accident were shown in the proof, and if the only reasonable explanation of the accident should give rise to an inference of negligence, then the rule of Res ipsa loquitur would apply; but there can be no foundation for the application of this maxim where both the act which caused the injury and the negligence of defendant in relation to the act must be inferred from the accident itself. You cannot well say that an act is negligent, unless you know what it is. It is said in one case that the maxim under consideration can have no application where the injured person and the alleged negligent person were both in the exercise of an equal right and were each chargeable with the same degree of care. Sauer v. Eagle Brewing Co. 3 Cal. App. 127, 84 Pac. 425.

The only fact that is directly proven, from which it is possible that negligence might be inferred, is the fact that the car was heavily loaded upon a steep ascent in defendant's track; so much so that it stalled and the application of the power to its machinery caused the wheels to slip and revolve rapidly. Nothing else appears than the facts stated. It is not proven that the car was overloaded, or carelessly loaded, or that the power was negligently or improperly applied. It is a matter of common knowledge that the wheels of a street car may turn rapidly at the same place upon the rails of the track, when both the wheels and the rails are in perfect condition and the motorman is in the exercise of due care.

Street cars are run for the accommodation of the public, as well as profit to the company, and the courts cannot say that the fact that the company permits a large number of passengers to occupy the car sufficient to load it heavily is an act of negligence. To so hold would work very great inconvenience to the traveling public and impair the efficiency of the car service.

One of the requirements of modern city life is rapid transit; and the public has demanded that the street cars at certain hours of the day be loaded to their utmost capacity. It is doubtful if the company could refuse to receive a passenger upon its car as long as there was room in the car for him. A tender to the company of the requisite fare and the ability of a passenger to find a place of safety upon the car would impose an obligation upon the company to receive and transport the passenger. Thus it appears that the jury could not infer negligence from the single statement that the car was heavily loaded and that there was a sharp ascent in the street. Cases illustrating the general doctrine stated in this opinion are the following: Wood v. Wilmington City R. Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

373, 64 Atl. 246; Foulke v. Wilmington City R. Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 368, 60 Atl. 793; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Anderson, 20 Am. St. Rep. 493, note; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Locke, 112 Ind. 404, 2 Am. St. Rep. 193, 14 N. E. 391; Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228, 28 L. ed. 410, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369; authorities cited in Lindamood's Case, supra.

The negligence averred in the declaration as the proximate cause of the injury is: First. That the electrical machinery and wheels of the car were defective. Second. That the rails were worn and out of repair. Third. That the motorman was negligent and careless in the management and operation of the car. Fourth. The rocks and debris and other hard substances had been allowed to accumulate on the track. Fifth. That the car was overloaded.

There is no testimony in the record tending to establish either of the alleged acts of negligence, and from the facts proven, if it were permissible to infer the act which caused the injury, no inference points directly to one of the acts of negligence rather than any of the others. What caused the injury, and the defendant's negligent connection with it, are left entirely at large by the proof, and are matters of pure conjecture. Under all the cases cited, this is not sufficient.

It results that there is no error in the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, and the petition is disallowed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN
v.

FRANK M. DICKERSON, Plff. in Err.

Witness — expert — appointment by court — validity.

A legislative attempt to confer upon the court the power in a criminal case to appoint experts in case they are needed, and acquaint the jury with the fact, who shall prepare themselves and give testimony in the case, is invalid, as tending to deprive the accused of due process of law.

Note. — Constitutionality of statute permitting court to appoint expert witnesses.

It will be noticed that in PEOPLE v. DICKERSON, the section of the statute empowering the court in cases of homicide to appoint expert witnesses, not to exceed three in number, to investigate the issues raised, and testify at the trial, and also providing ERROR to the Recorders' Court for the City of Detroit to review a judgment convicting defendant of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederick E. McCain, for plaintiff in error:

Section 3 of act 175 of Public Acts of 1905 is invalid, as tending to deprive accused of "due process of law."

Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 25 L. ed. 676; Re Cox, 129 Mich. 635, 89 N. W. 440; Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 213; Den ex dem. Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 18 How. 272, 16 L. ed. 372; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 519, 4 L. ed. 630.

Mr. Ormond F. Hunt, amicus curiæ.

Messrs. Franz C. Kuhn, Attorney General, Philip T. Van Zile, and Arthur W. Kilpatrick, for the People.

Brooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondent was convicted of murder in the recorder's court for the city of Detroit, and brings his case to this court for review. During the trial, it became apparent that the respondent claimed immunity from punishment because of alleged lack of mental capacity. The court thereupon, acting under the mandate contained in § 3 of act No. 175 of the Public Acts of 1905, proceeded to appoint two medical experts. The appointment was made known to the jury, and the experts gave testimony. The experts were appointed and their testimony received over the objection of respondent, and exceptions were duly taken. The only question raised upon this record is the constitutionality of the act in question, which is as follows:

An Act to Regulate the Employment of Expert Witnesses.

The People of the State of Michigan enact:

Section 1. No expert witness shall be paid or receive as compensation in any given case, for his services as such, a sum in excess of the ordinary witness fees provided by law, unless the court before whom such witness is to appear or has appeared awards a larger sum; and any such witness who shall directly or indirectly receive a larger amount than such award, and any person who shall pay such witness a larger sum than such award, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment in the county jail not to exceed one year, or both, in the discretion of the court, and may further be punished for contempt.

Sec. 2. No more than three experts shall be allowed to testify on either side as to the same issue in any given case except in criminal prosecutions for homicide: Provided, the court trying such case may in its discretion permit an additional number of witnesses to testify as experts.

Sec. 3. In criminal cases for homicide where the issues involve expert knowledge or opinion, the court shall appoint one or more suitable disinterested persons, not exceeding three, to investigate such issues and testify at the trial; and the compensation of such person or persons shall be fixed by the court and paid by the county that the fact of appointment should be made known to the jury, and that the provision should not exclude the prosecution or defense from using other expert witnesses, was held unconstitutional in that it violated the due process of law provisions of the Constitution, and also because it attempted to confer a power upon the judicial branch of the government which, by the Constitution, belonged to the administrative department.

This seems to be a pioneer case upon the question of the constitutionality of such an act. The decision, under the existing conditions, seems to be sound. In case other statutes should be drawn in the future along the lines of this one, it would seem that they should contain a provision for giving the prosecution and the accused the names of the experts chosen before the opening of the trial, in order that some opportunity might be afforded to examine into the qualifications and standing of such witnesses.

to warrant its insertion. In that case it was held that a statute was invalid which authorized the court to appoint surveyors or other persons to make examinations or surveys to relevy taxes in place of invalid ones, since such acts pertained to the administrative branch of the government rather than the judicial. The court said: "The design of the Constitution is that each of the three branches of the government shall be kept, so far as practicable, separate, and that one of the departments shall not exercise powers confided by that instrument to either of the others. Any legislation, therefore, authorizing an invasion of this design, and conferring upon the judiciary the exercise of powers belonging to either of the others, cannot be regarded as valid."

See, in this connection, State v. Keener, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 615, and note as to powers or duties of a nonjudicial character with which judges of municipal or police courts may be vested or burdened; and Moore v. Nation, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1115, and note as to power to impose upon judges the duty to assist in drawing jurors. J. T. W.

where indictment was found, and the fact that such witness or witnesses have been so appointed shall be made known to the jury. This provision shall not preclude either prosecution or defense from using other expert witnesses at the trial.

Sec. 4. This act shall not be applicable to witnesses testifying to the established facts or deductions of science, nor to any other specific facts, but only to witnesses testifying to matters of opinion.

Approved June 7th, 1905.

Sections 1, 2, and 4 of the act are not attacked, and we wish it to be understood that no opinion is hereinafter expressed as to the validity of those sections. Our attention is directed solely to the provisions of § 3, and that section alone will be discussed. The objections urged are set out in the people's brief as follows: 1. Is act No. 175, Pub. Acts 1905, unconstitutional (a) in that it embraces more than one object? or (b) is the title to the act sufficiently broad to embrace its object? (2) Does the act infringe upon the respondent's right to due process of law, as guaranteed him by the state and Federal Constitutions? (3) Does the act violate the provisions of § 16, art. 2, of the state Constitution? We will consider these objections in their order.

1. The title of the act is: "An Act to Regulate the Employment of Expert Witnesses." It will be noted that this title is extremely simple, general, and comprehensive. The word "regulate" has frequently received judicial interpretation, and under that term very broad powers have been exercised. Westgate v. Adrian Twp. 161 Mich. 333, 126 N. W. 422, and cases cited. But it is urged that the term, broad as it is, must have reference only to something which has theretofore existed,—that it imparts no power of creation. It is further argued that § 3 delegates to the judicial department of government a new and incongruous power, and in effect creates a new class of witnesses,—that this is in no sense regulation. In view of what we shall have to say later concerning the provisions of this section, we find it unnecessary to determine whether or not this contention of the respondent is correct.

2. Section 16 of article 2 of the Constitution of 1908, among other things, provides: "No person shall . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." "Due process of law" has been variously defined. Mr. Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed., p. 502, adopts the definition given by Daniel Webster in the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 519, 4 L. ed. 630, as follows: "By the law of the land is most clearly intended the general law,—a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not, therefore, to be considered the law of the land." This provision of the Constitution has been frequently discussed in the decisions of this court. Among those may be cited the following: Parsons v. Russell, 11 Mich. 113, 83 Am. Dec. 728; Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 618; Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201; Swart v. Kimball, 43 Mich. 443, 5 N. W. 635; Risser v. Hoyt, 53 Mich. 185, 18 N. W. 611; People v. Harding, 53 Mich. 481, 19 N. W. 155; Re Cox, 129 Mich. 635, 89 N. W. 440. See also Den ex dem. Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 18 How. 272, 15 L. ed. 372; 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1080 et seq., and cases there cited. From an examination of the authorities, it is apparent that this constitutional guaranty simply preserves to the people rights which had existed for centuries, and which had been enjoyed according to the course of the common law. It means such an exercise of governmental power as is sanctioned by settled maxims of law, under safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribed. It becomes pertinent, therefore, to ascertain what settled maxims and safeguards—what "general rules which govern society"—are applicable to a criminal prosecution such as is here under consideration. Wherever the common law is in force, the parties to a criminal action have been, upon the one side, the Crown or the people, and upon the other, the accused. In England and her colonies, the Crown is represented by an official duly appointed by it, whose duty it is to prosecute. In this country, the duties of this official have been assumed and discharged by the prosecuting attorney, who is himself a constitutional officer. Mich. Const. art. 8, § 3. From the foundation of our government it has been the duty of the prosecuting attorney to prepare the case for the people. He, and he alone, must determine what witnesses shall be sworn to establish the case he presents. In case of disability or the necessity for assistance, the statute provides for substitution or assistance as the case may be, upon proper application, but the principle of responsibility remains the same, though the service may, by reason of necessity, be temporarily performed by one clothed with statutory authority. See Wigmore, Ev. §§ 1286 & 2483. We think it clear that the preparation for and conduct of the trial on behalf of the people are acts executive and administrative in character. Under our Constitution, which jealously separates the powers of government to legislative, executive, and judicial departments, the powers and duties properly belonging to one department cannot by statutory enactment be granted to or imposed upon another department. Houseman v. Montgomery, 58 Mich. 364, 25 N. W. 369; Locke v. Speed, 62 Mich. 408, 28 N. W. 917; Manistee v. Harley, 79 Mich. 238, 44 N. W. 603; Allen v. State Auditors, 122 Mich. 324, 47 L.R.A. 117, 80 Am. St. Rep. 573, 81 N. W. 113. The power of selecting and appointing witnesses who shall, after appointment, acquaint themselves with the matter in controversy, and testify concerning the same, is in no sense a judicial act, and, if exercised by the court in accordance with the mandate of § 3, would entirely change the character of criminal procedure, and would seriously endanger, if not absolutely destroy, those safeguards which our Constitution has so carefully enacted for the protection of the accused. The most cursory examination of § 3 will disclose its vice. The court is directed to appoint one or more suitable, disinterested persons to investigate and testify. This appointment is to be made without notice to either the prosecuting attorney or the accused. The reasons which impel the court to make the selection are not of record and can never be known. The names of the selected experts cannot be indorsed upon the indictment by the prosecuting attorney, as required by law, for he himself is as ignorant of their identity as is the accused. The right of one accused of crime to know in advance the names of the witnesses who will testify against him, and to examine into their character, means of knowledge, etc., in order that he may properly prepare his defense, is a right as ancient as our criminal jurisprudence. The court is commanded to make known to the jury the fact of the appointment, and that his appointees have been found by him to be suitable and disinterested. The section then provides that other experts may be sworn by either prosecution or defense. This is an idle provision, for, in the face of the certificate of character, fitness, and ability given to the court experts by the court, experts summoned by either side would receive but scant consideration at the hands of the jury,—their testimony would be swept aside in a breath. Juries are most anxious to ascertain the opinion of the court as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, and, ordinarily, more than willing to adopt that opinion as their own. Trial courts therefore, in doubtful cases, have jealously guarded their own opinions in order that juries might determine controlling facts uninfluenced by the mental attitude of the judge.

The expert witnesses provided for by this section testify under a sanction which gives to their testimony practically the same weight as if it were delivered by the court itself, and if that testimony being against the accused, were either wilfully false or ignorantly mistaken, its baneful results would be appalling. To give to the testimony of a witness or witnesses this extraordinary certificate of candor, ability, and truthfulness, while the other testimony in the case must be judged by the jury by ordinary standards, is to subvert the very foundations of justice. In People v. Vanderhoof, 71 Mich. 158, 39 N. W. 28, this court said: "The charge of the court virtually put the evidence of these doctors and professors upon a higher plane than the other testimony, which was manifestly wrong." In People v. Seaman, 107 Mich. 348, 61 Am. St. Rep. 326, 65 N. W. 203, the following language is used: "An expert witness is to be judged from the same standpoint as any other witness." In People v. Holmes, 111 Mich. 364, 69 N. W. 501, we said: "When the question of insanity is to be submitted to the jury, the testimony which is offered to support the claim should be treated with the same respect as that offered to establish any other fact."

We do not overlook the fact that the statute here considered was designed to correct an evil long recognized as tending to bring the administration of the criminal law into disrepute, in cases where insanity is urged as a defense, but we are of opinion that the true remedy for this evil rests in the development of a livelier sense of responsibility to the public for the proper and decent administration of justice on the part of both the legal and medical professions, rather than in revolutionary legislation. That both professions recognize and deplore the existence of the evil, there can be no doubt, and recent activities in both lend reason for hoping that the scandal which has often attended the introduction of expert testimony will, in the future, cease to be a reproach in the administration of criminal law.

In view of our conclusions upon the second point discussed above, it is unnecessary to give attention to the third ground urged. We must hold § 3 unconstitutional. The judgment is reversed, and the respondent remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the county of Wayne, to be tried again.

PARSONS BUSINESS COLLEGE
v.
CITY OF KALAMAZOO et al., Appts.

Tax — exemption — business college.

1. A business college, owned by a private corporation, giving short courses in book-keeping, penmanship, business law, shorthand, type-writing, correspondence, and grammar, and incorporated chiefly to avoid taxation, is not within the operation of a statute exempting from taxation real estate owned by educational institutions incorporated under the laws of the state.

Same — property devoted to other uses.

2. Property of an educational corporation, portions of which are occupied by a family, rented for election purposes and held as vacant property for a rise in value, is not within the operation of a statute exempting from taxation property of such corporations occupied solely for the purposes for which they were incorporated.

(June 2, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree in Chancery, of the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County, in complainant's favor declaring its property exempt from taxation and restraining the defendant city and its assessor from assessing or levying taxes against it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Marvin J. Schaberg, for appellants:

The property of complainant which, according to the testimony of its president and secretary, is not used for the purposes expressed in its articles of association, is subject to taxation.

Detroit Young Men's Soc. v. Detroit, 3 Mich. 172.

In order to entitle the complainant to exemption it must be organized solely and chiefly for educational purposes.

Atty. Gen. v. Detroit, 113 Mich. 388, 71 N. W. 632.

Mr. Dorr O. French for appellee.

Note.—The questions decided in PARSONS BUSINESS COLLEGE v. KALAMAZOO have already been annotated in this series: A note on the exemption of property used for a private school is appended to Jackson v. Preston, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 164; and the question whether a school which is also used for residential purposes by the proprietor and his family, or other persons connected with the school, is "exclusively" used for school purposes within the exemption statute, is considered in the note to State ex rel. Spillers v. Johnston, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 171.

McAlvay, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainant filed its bill of complaint against defendant city and its assessor to have its property declared exempt from taxation, and to restrain defendant city and its assessor perpetually from assessing, levying, or collecting any taxes against its property, for the reason that all said property is exempt from taxation under the provisions of chapter 218 of the Compiled Laws of 1897, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Incorporation of Institutions of Learning." An issue was joined between the parties and a hearing had before the court. A decree was granted in accordance with the prayer of the bill. Defendants upon appeal ask this court for a reversal.

It appears that Mr. Wm. F. Parsons entered upon this business at Kalamazoo in 1869 as a private business under the name of Parsons Business College, and continued it with a reasonable amount of success until 1893, when he purchased and moved upon the premises, the taxation of which is in question in this suit, under a land contract, and proceeded to and did erect the building, in part of which complainant now conducts business, and so continued until the year 1905, up to which year taxes were annually assessed against said property, and regularly paid. The undisputed proof is that this property is now of the value of about $20,000. The property so purchased by Mr. Parsons was deeded directly to his wife, Mary P. Parsons. Up to 1905 the business had been conducted by Mr. Parsons, a son and a daughter, who "shared equally in the gains and losses, and each owned one third of the business college." In 1905 the business was incorporated under chapter 218 above cited.

Mr. Parsons testified:

I had the institution incorporated because I felt I ought to be exempt from taxes. That is one reason I had it incorporated, and another reason was that I was at the head of the institution, and, if anything happened to me, the institution could go along without any change in it at all, and I felt it was no more than right that I should be incorporated and be relieved from taxation.

Q. That was your principal reason, to avoid taxation, that you incorporated, was it not?

A. That was the principal reason.

The son, who is secretary and bookkeeper of the complainant, testified to the same effect. This was purely a stock corporation. The incorporators were the members of the Parsons family, who certified "that they in good faith subscribed and paid in the sums set opposite their names for the purpose of founding and establishing a commercial and business school, viz., Mary P. Parsons, 80 shares, $4,000; Wm. F. Parsons, 5 shares, $250; Caroline Parsons, 5 shares, $250." The cash paid in was in fact the property in question, and all the assets of the old business arbitrarily fixed at a valuation of $5,000. They were named in the articles of incorporation as trustees, to hold office for the term of fifteen years. At the first meeting, Wm. F. Parsons was elected president, Caroline Parsons treasurer, and Wm. W. Parsons secretary, to hold these respective offices, and have so continued ever since. The articles of incorporation bear date January 19, 1906, and were filed with the secretary of state February 2, 1906. The deed of this property from Mary P. Parsons to the corporation bears date November 6, 1905, and was recorded March 3, 1908. At the first meeting of the stockholders, the president was voted a salary of $2,500, the secretary $2,000, and the treasurer $2,000 per annum, respectively. These salaries have been drawn each year pro rata to the amount of cash available, and for the balance each has taken the note of complainant each year. The entire third floor of the building is occupied by the family as a residence, without payment of rent. The president testified: "We teach bookkeeping, penmanship, business law as used in the ordinary work of the school, shorthand, typewriting, correspondence, and grammar." The regulation course is twelve months, at $75. Tuition is charged as follows: Three months', $28. Six months' course, $45. Nine months', $60. The average attendance is 200. A total of $150 has been received from the city for rent of room on election days. There has been no other income than as stated. This property is 5 rods by 12 rods, on one of the most valuable corners in Kalamazoo. The larger portion of it is not occupied by the building, and is held for a rise in its value. Taxes were not assessed against this property after 1905 until the present assessment in 1910.

An extended statement of what an uncontradicted record in this case shows has been considered necessary because of the importance of the question involved. Complainant's contention that it is exempt from taxation is founded upon the provisions of ¶ 4 of § 7, act 309, Pub. Acts 1909, as follows: "Fourth. Such real estate as shall be owned by library, benevolent, charitable, educational, and scientific institutions incorporated under the laws of this state, with the buildings and other property thereon, while occupied by them solely for the purposes for which they were incorporated." Complainant relies upon the case of Detroit Home & Day School v. Detroit, 76 Mich. 521, 6 L.R.A. 97, 43 N. W. 593, as decisive of the case at bar. The statute of which the one invoked is an amendment (Session Laws of 1887, p. 415) was under construction in that case. The words "educational" and "solely" have been added since that time. The court in that case, where the corporate purpose named in the charter was to establish, maintain, and conduct a seminary of learning, said: "Unless the term 'scientific institutions' includes educational corporations, there is no statute exempting from taxation any schools unless those in the hands of the public authorities, and those are only exempt by implication. And, if it does not include the seminaries of learning, there is practically nothing exempted, for there are no other scientific institutions, properly so called. But it is a matter of common knowledge that all general educational establishments have universally been known as 'scientific institutions,' and fall naturally and directly within it." Such construction brought within the terms of the exempting act educational corporations. The legislature later amended the law to include by express terms "educational" corporations. If this word had been included in the earlier law, the only question for the court in that case to determine would have been whether the institution claiming the exemption was within the class exempted. The majority opinion of the court in the case relied on by complainant was considering and passing upon "general educational establishments" in express terms, holding that it was a matter of common knowledge that such institutions have universally been known as "scientific institutions." The minority opinion shows that this was a school with kindergarten, primary, preparatory, and collegiate departments, with courses of instruction in all the elementary and advanced sciences, and ancient and modern languages. In the advanced departments there were the courses of instruction usual in the colleges of this state. The court determined that it was a general educational establishment. The disagreement in the opinions is not upon that question, but whether a stock corporation, organized and run for profit as a business venture, was within the legislative intent as expressed in the exemption law. The court, without doubt, was correct in classifying that school as a general educational institution. This is the "educational institution" intended by the legislature in the statute under consideration in the instant case. We have, then, this standard, as interpreted by the court, by which to measure the institution of complainant which seeks the protection of exemption from taxes accorded to general educational institutions.

In our opinion it does not in any way measure up to the standard it has set up and claims for itself. It cannot be called a general educational institution. It is organized and conducted for special purposes only. It completes its courses in three, six, nine, and twelve months. The statute under which it is incorporated prohibits the granting of diplomas by it "unless candidates shall have pursued such course of study for at least two years." It is a matter of common knowledge that during the periods which complainant has fixed for the completion of the subjects indicated in the statement of facts, except type-writing and stenography, students could obtain but a mere smattering of knowledge. Not that this institution and similar ones are not useful and very beneficial to a large class, but to put them, as complainant suggests, in the same class with Hillsdale, Olivet, Albion, and Kalamazoo College, well-known institutions in this state, would be giving this statute a construction which the facts will not warrant, and which evidently was not within the legislative intent, and contrary to the former construction. It appears from the record that the incentive to incorporation was to avoid taxation, and not obtain recognition as a general educational institution.

Complainant is not entitled to the relief asked, for another reason, that the property for which exemption from taxation is claimed is not occupied "solely" for the claimed purposes for which it was incorporated. One entire story is used as a residence, and the larger portion of the lot is vacant and held for an advance in value. By this change in the law the legislature has restricted and narrowed the scope of the exemption. Complainant makes no showing as to any irregularity in the matter of the assessment and levy of the taxes in question by the defendant city and its assessor, but invokes the statute as exempting it from taxation.

Our conclusion is that it was not entitled to the relief granted. The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and set aside, and the injunction dissolved, and a decree will be entered dismissing the bill of complaint, with costs of both courts to defendants.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

JOHN E. EDWARDS

v.

WILLIAM H. FLEMING et al., Appts.

Adverse possession — overlapping boundary.

1. The real test as to whether or not possession of real estate beyond the true boundary line will be held adverse is the intention with which the party takes and holds the possession. It is not merely the existence of a mistake, but the presence or absence of the requisite intention to claim title that fixes the character of the entry and determines whether the possession is adverse.

Same — presumptions.

2. Among the presumptions which usually obtain with respect to the possession of real estate are these: (1) It is presumed that the possession is in subordination to

This note is supplemental to the note to Preble v. Maine C. R. Co. 21 L.R.A. 829.

For cases on the right of one in permissive possession of real property to acquire title by adverse possession, see the note to McCutchen v. McCutchen, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1140.

For cases upon possession of part of a neighbor's land where the boundary is unknown or disputed, as raising the question of champerty in such neighbor's deed, see the note on the conveyance of land in adverse possession. Huston v. Scott, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —.

This note does not include cases where the tract inclosed by mistake is not merely an adjoining strip to one's own land, but an the true title: (2) where one enters into possession under a deed, it is presumed that he claims only the title given him by his deed, and that his possession is restricted to the premises granted.

Same — intent to claim to fence.

3. Where a fence is believed to be the true boundary, and the claim of ownership is up to the fence as located, if the intent to claim title exists only on the condition that the fence is on the true line, the intention is not absolute, but conditional, and the possession is not adverse. If, however, in such a case there is a clear intention to claim the land up to the fence, whether it be the correct boundary or not, the possession will be held adverse.

Same — sufficiency of evidence.

4. In an action to quiet title, the plaintiff claimed under deeds to himself and his immediate grantor, executed by the defendants, which described the land conveyed as bounded on the south by a hedge fence. The plaintiff and his grantor had been in the actual possession of the land, claiming title up to the fence, for more than fifteen years, during which time the defendants continued to own the land adjoining on the south, but made no claim to land north of the hedge fence. Held, that the evidence warranted a finding of adverse possession by the plaintiff, intention on the part of the defendants to fix the fence as the boundary, and acquiescence on their part sufficient to bar them from claiming that the fence was not the true boundary.

Same — survey — effect.

5. Where it appears that the plaintiff has acquired title by deed, adverse possesentirely different parcel; for example, where there is a mistake in the deed as naming one lot instead of another (see Albert Hanson Lumber Co. v. Angelloz, 118 La. 861, 43 So. 529). It also excludes cases where the grantor marks out and places the grantee in possession of a tract of the grantor's land, and the deed by mistake describes only a part of such tract, as in Lee v. Wheat, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 724, 111 S. W. 307; or confuses the land intended with other land of the grantor, as in Moore v. Wiley, 44 Kan. 736, 25 Pac. 200. See also in this connection, Louisville Trust Co. v. Alford, — Tenn. —, 53 S. W. 974.

Cases upon the accidental possession of part of premises as constructive possession of more than is in actual possession are excluded, as are cases dependent in whole or in part on statutes requiring those claiming under the statutes of limitations to have paid taxes.

The reader is reminded that admissions against interest in regard to the nature of possession are of no effect when made after the person making the admission has gained a title by adverse possession.

I. General principles.

a. Introductory.

The old idea that there could be no disseisin by mistake (see Davis v. Furlow, 27 Md. 536) is now abandoned. And the courts are now agreed that an entry by mistake will not prevent an adverse possession. It is generally said that there are two rules governing the question, which are thus stated in a recent case: "When a landowner, acting under a mistake as to the true boundary between his land and that of another, takes possession of land of another, believing it to be his own, incloses it, claims title to it, and holds possession for the statutory period, he becomes the owner; for such possession and claim of title, though founded on a mistake, would be adverse; but this would not be so if his intention was to claim only to the true line, wherever that may be, for then the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) possession would not be adverse beyond such line." Shirey v. Whitlow, 80 Ark. 445, 97 S. W. 444. See also Liddon v. Hodnett, 22 Fla. 442.

Similar statements are to be found in a great number of the cases.

Technically and logically these rules are well enough, and if each case afforded positive definite proof of intention, they might be accepted with the complacency shown in Preble v. Maine C. R. Co. 85 Me. 260, 21 L.R.A. 829, 35 Am. St. Rep. 366, 27 Atl. 149, where it was said of these two rules that the distinction between them "is neither subtle, recondite, nor refined, but simple, practical, and substantial. It involves sources of evidence and means of proof no more difficult or complex than many other inquiries of a similar character constantly arising in our court." But the fact is that actually in practice these rules afford no assistance in the majority of the cases which arise where the evidence of intention is not positive, but must be gathered from mere general circumstances of occupation to a visible boundary. Indeed, the occupation, perhaps, in the majority of cases, is without any positive intention one way or the other except that the possessor supposes that his boundary is correct. The result has been that, in the application of the rules, the courts have in effect, though not often so stating it, decided the case by opposite applications of the doctrine of presumption, some courts taking the view that the presumption is that the holding is in subordination to the paper title, others, and these are the fast-increasing majority, that after there has been occupation to a visible boundary for the period of the statute of limitations, the presumption is that the holding has been adverse. This is so far true that, as will be seen, the cases do not in general divide on the circumstantial evidence of intention. But it is to be remembered that in the true view these presumptions are not positive rules of law to override an actual showing that the possession was or was not adverse, nor to dispose of the circumstances in proof of the actual situation.

sion, and acquiescence in the boundary by the defendants, a survey afterwards made at the request of the defendants, under the provisions of § 2275, Gen. Stat. 1909, fixing a different boundary to the tract claimed by the plaintiff, furnishes no defense to an action to quiet plaintiff's title.

Real property — survey — effect on title.

6. A statutory survey may establish the permanent boundaries between two tracts of land, but cannot change the title to the land.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Lyon County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The point of view of the majority of the recent decisions is indicated by the statement in Searles v. De Ladson, 81 Conn. 133, 70 Atl. 589, where the court said that it was held in French v. Pearce, 8 Conn. 439, 21 Am. Dec. 680, that "to render possession adverse it was not necessary that it should be with a wrongful intent to dispossess the true owner, or accompanied with a denial of his title, or with a claim of title in the person entering; and that where a person enters and takes possession of land as his own, taking the rents and profits to himself, and managing with it as an owner manages with his own property, the possession is adverse and a disseisin. The very act is held to be an assertion of his own title, and thus equivalent to a denial of the title of all others, and it does not matter that he was mistaken, and that, had he been better informed, he would not have entered on the land. This has since been adhered to as the law in this state, and still has our approval." Searles v. De Ladson, supra.

Some of the earlier cases contemplate a possibility of change in intention. Thus, in Mather v. Walsh, 107 Mo. 121, 17 S. W. 755, it was said: "The fact that a proprietor of land has taken possession (under a deed) of more land than its description calls for will not prevent his asserting, later, an adverse possession of, or title to, the excess beyond his paper title. Though his original taking may have been the outgrowth of mistake, or in ignorance of the true line, he may, notwithstanding, afterwards begin an adverse holding which the law will recognize when sufficiently long continued."

Where the defendant entered, the land being forest, and cleared a strip near the true line and built a fence, it was held that the jury were properly instructed that, to hold adversely, he must have so intended during the full period of the statute; that if he did not so enter, but changed his mind, his change of mind must continue for the statutory period. Ayers v. Reidel, 84 Wis. 276, 54 N. W. 588.

It has also been said that "adverse possession depends upon the intention with which the possession is taken and held; and while the intention to claim title must be manifest, it need not be expressed. But whether or not a party takes possession by mistake, or without the intention of claiming title, is a question for the jury." Haney v. Breeden, 100 Va. 781, 42 S. E. 916.

b. Claiming only to true line.

Where the intention is not to hold to the visible boundary unless it is the true line, the possession is not adverse. Humes v. Bernstein, 72 Ala. 546; Silver Creek Cement Corp. v. Union Lime & Cement Co. 138 Ind. 297, 35 N. E. 125, 37 N. E. 721; Heinz v. Cramer, 84 Iowa, 497, 51 N. W. 173; Mills v. Penny, 74 Iowa, 172, 7 Am. St. Rep. 474, 37 N. W. 1032; Roecker v. Haperla, 138 Mo. 33, 39 S. W. 454; King v. Brigham, 23 Or. 262, 18 L.R.A. 361, 31 Pac. 601; Bradford v. Guthrie, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 351; Suksdorf v. Humphrey, 36 Wash. 1, 77 Pac. 1071; Wilcox v. Smith, 38 Wash. 585, 80 Pac. 803; Fieldhouse v. Leisburg, 15 Wyo. 207, 88 Pac. 214.

Where one intended to claim only a certain depth in feet, and inadvertently inclosed too much, it was held that his possession was not adverse. Murdock v. Stillman, 72 Ark. 498, 82 S. W. 834.

In some cases the limited nature of the claim is clearly indicated. Thus, evidence of repeated offers by a party to purchase land inside his own fence from his neighbor will rebut a claim of adverse possession. Kitchen v. Chantland, 130 Iowa, 618, 105 N. W. 367, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 81.

Messrs. Buck & Spencer for appellee.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Edwards sued the Flemings to quiet his title to a tract of land of about 10 acres. The defendants formerly owned the land, and, in 1891, conveyed the same to Floyd E. Fleming by warranty deed which described the tract as follows: "Commencing twenty (20) rods west of the northeast corner of northeast quarter ($\frac{1}{4}$) of section thirty-three (33), township twenty (20), range thirteen (13), thence west sixty (60) rods, thence south twenty-six rods to hedge fence, thence east sixty (60) rods, thence north to place of beginning, containing ten (10) acres more or less."

The petition alleged that Floyd E. Fleming was in possession of the land under this conveyance until 1908, when he conveyed by the same description to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff has been in possession of the land ever since the conveyance to him. There was the further allegation that both deeds made the "hedge fence" an artificial boundary and a part of the description of the land conveyed. The plaintiff also alleged that he and his immediate grantor have been in the open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession of the tract of land and the whole thereof up to the hedge fence on the south for more than fifteen years preceding the beginning of the action; and further, that a short time before the action was brought, the defendants had entered upon the tract of land claimed by the plaintiff, and moved a wire fence, and are now claiming that the hedge fence is not the true boundary on the south, and claim to own the land that lies immediately north thereof. The defendants in their answer set up a survey made by the county surveyor on the 18th day of January, 1908, at their request, and upon due notice to the plaintiff, as required by the statute, and alleged that on the day appointed the plaintiff personally appeared at the time and place of survey; that the county surveyor duly surveyed and established the corners and boundaries between the lands of the defendants and the lands of the plaintiff; and that the report and plat of the survey so made were thereafter duly filed in the office of the county surveyor, and that the survey was acquiesced in both by the plaintiff and the defendants, possession of the excess will not be adverse during the lease, unless on actual notice to the other party. Wilson v. Lerche, 90 Mo. 473, 2 S. W. 799.

Where, on a survey, one abandons his improvements extending over on his neighbor's land, and locates new improvements within the true lines of his lot, this abandonment taking place before the statute of limitations has given him title, he will not be deemed to have claimed to hold adversely the land of his neighbor so abandoned. Noyes v. Douglas, 39 Wash. 314, 81 Pac. 724.

In rough or wild lands the element of notice may be important. Thus, where a fence erected by owners on one side of a line had become overgrown with brush, and the land on the other side was unoccupied, and owned by a nonresident, it was held that there would not be presumed to be an acquiescence in the fence as a boundary. Palmer v. Osborne, 115 Iowa, 714, 87 N. W. 712.

In King v. Wells, 94 N. C. 344, the court said: "When there is a long line, running over a wild, broken, mountainous ridge, such as that was up to which the defendant obtained a possession, a small portion might be taken and held for years without anyone knowing whether there was a trespass or not. Therefore it has been held that when the extent of a wrongdoer's possession is so limited as to afford a fair presumption that the party mistook his boundaries, or did not intend to set up a claim within the lines of the deed of the other party, it would be a proper ground for saying that 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) he had not the possession, or that it was not adverse."

c. Claiming to visible boundary at all events.

When the claim is to a visible boundary at all events, whether it is the true line or not, the possession is adverse. Bayles v. Daugherty, 77 Ark. 201, 91 S. W. 304; Doolittle v. Bailey, 85 Iowa, 398, 52 N. W. 337; Byrd v. Rose, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1898, 44 S. W. 958; Schieble v. Hart, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 607, 12 S. W. 628; Aikman v. South, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1201, 97 S. W. 4; Richardson v. Watts, 94 Me. 487, 48 Atl. 180; Shotwell v. Gordon, 121 Mo. 482, 26 S. W. 341; Hedges v. Pollard, 149 Mo. 216, 50 S. W. 889; Pittman v. Weeks, 132 N. C. 81, 43 S. E. 582; Bell v. Whitehead, — Tenn. —, 62 S. W. 213 (semble); Hand v. Swann, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 241, 21 S. W. 282; Bisco v. Casper, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 19, 36 S. W. 345; Logan v. Meade, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 477, 98 S. W. 210; Daughtrey v. New York & T. Land Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 61 S. W. 947.

"Where one of two adjoining land proprietors takes and holds possession up to a fence which he supposes is on the true line, claiming to the fence, his possession is adverse as to all the land within his inclosure. In such case it makes no difference that he was mistaken as to the location of the true line; nor does it make any difference that he did not intend to invade his neighbor's rights. The fact that he claimed to the fence, not simply to the true line when and that no appeal therefrom was ever taken. To the answer there was attached a copy of the surveyor's report, and affirmative relief was asked, declaring the boundaries to be those established by the survey. In his reply the plaintiff alleged that there were no disputed corners or boundaries between the lands of the parties and there was no occasion for any survey. The reply also alleged that the notice served upon him by the county surveyor was insufficient because, in describing the land to be surveyed, it did not follow the description in the deeds under which he held, and that there were a number of other irregularities in the survey. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court made a number of special findings, and found generally for the plaintiff and against the defendants. A decree was entered quieting title in the plaintiff to the disputed tract of land. The defendants appeal.

Among the special findings are: That the plaintiff and his immediate grantor had been in the open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession of the tract of land claimed by him, and the whole thereof, for more than fifteen years, and that when the defendants conveyed the land in question to

Floyd E. Fleming they intended to and did convey to him a certain tract of land inclosed by four certain fences; to wit, a hedge fence on the north, a hedge fence on the west, a hedge fence on the south, and a post and wire fence extending from the hedge fence on the south and along the entire east side to the hedge fence on the north, and that the fences had remained substantially located in the same places from the time of their being built until some time during the month of March, 1909, and after the conveyance to the plaintiff.

The defendants offered testimony to show that the possession had not been adverse. But there was little conflict in the testimony. Defendant William H. Fleming testified that the hedge fence on the south was planted more than thirty years ago, not for the purpose of fixing any boundary line, but in order to fence off a pasture used by his father, who at that time owned the whole 80 acres. The plaintiff lived within a few rods of the land for forty-two years. He testified that he furnished the plants for the west and south hedge fences and helped the old gentleman, Fleming, then the owner, to set them out; that twenty-five ascertained, is sufficient and will constitute a disseisin." Goltermann v. Schiermeyer, 111 Mo. 404, 19 S. W. 484, 20 S. W. 161.

In Brown v. Clark, 73 Vt. 233, 50 Atl. 1066, the court said: "Here, then, we have a line lived up to as the common boundary for more than fifteen years, each owner claiming all the while to own to the fence and beyond; that is, all the land he was occupying, and more. If the report could be read as meaning that each claimed to the true line, on whichever side of the fence it might fall, the occupation might not be adverse; but the finding is explicit that each claimed to own what he occupied."

Where part of defendant's barn was upon the disputed strip, and the rest of it was used as a garden, the court said: "The fact that the defendant or those under whom he claims may have entered upon the land and located the fence and barn by mistake and in ignorance of the location of the true boundary line, the fact that they had no intention of taking what did not belong to them, the fact that within their fences they may have inclosed a larger area than what they might have found out their deed called for if they had consulted the plat and had surveyed the lots, would not destroy the adverse character of their possession, if that possession was with the intention to hold and claim all that the fence inclosed." Milligan v. Fritts, 226 Mo. 189, 125 S. W. 1101.

Where the proprietors of a township made a grant to one who entered, built a house and cultivated the land, and his successors continued the occupation, and it was 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

found that the land was, by the mistake of the proprietors, beyond the township boundary, it was held that while the possession of the proprietors would not be deemed adverse to their neighbors, the possession of their grantee was of such a character as to show that it was adverse. Otis v. Moulton, 20 Me. 205.

There is a class of cases illustrated by Powers v. Bank of Oroville, 136 Cal. 486, 69 Pac. 151, where the owner of a tract of land holds one part of it separated from the rest of his land by a fence, and sells it, and the purchaser enters; under these circumstances it is an almost irresistible conclusion that the property sold was that within the visible inclosure.

So, even stronger is the case where all the land covered by a building is not described. Thus, where it was found that 14 inches in width of a house, besides an adjoining area way, were outside the land description of a deed, and within the description of the adjoining property afterwards conveyed by the same grantor, the court said: "Here there is no mistake as to the line to which Mrs. O'Dell attempted to convey, but the mistake was in describing the land which both parties supposed to be included in the deed. That all parties concerned supposed and believed the deed conveyed all the land covered by the house is clear beyond reasonable doubt. For more than ten years they have acted in strict harmony with that understanding, and it would be grossly inequitable to permit the grantor or a subsequent purchaser of the adjoining tract to now reap any advantage from the mistake."

years ago a post and wire fence was built along the whole east side, inclosing the entire field; that the fences were on the same line when he bought the land in 1908.

Floyd E. Fleming testified that he had owned this tract of land, that he bought it from his brother, defendant William H. Fleming, and sold all he owned to the plaintiff; that he knew the boundaries of the tract; that it was fenced on the east with a wire fence, and on the north, west, and south by hedge fences; that during the seventeen years in which he occupied the land the defendants never, to his knowledge, claimed to own any of the land inside these fences. There was testimony of a witness who had rented the land as the "Floyd E. Fleming tract," and who occupied it up to the south hedge, that the defendants never claimed to own any of the land within the fences until after the conveyance to the plaintiff. The findings of the court are fully sustained by a preponderance of the evidence. The following is a plat of the survey upon which the defendants rely:

Lougee v. Shuhart, 127 Iowa, 173, 102 N. W. 1125. See also infra, III. d.

II. Cases holding the paper title the important element.

Some of these cases emphasize the principle that the presumption, in the absence of evidence expressly or impliedly evincing that the possession is of a hostile character, is that it is in subordination to the legal title. Lecroix v. Malone, 157 Ala. 434, 47 So. 725.

"The possession by a coterminous owner up to a line erroneously believed to be the true line is not presumably adverse." Barrett v. Kelly, 131 Ala. 378, 30 So. 824. See also to similar effect in an equitable action, Phelps v. Henry, 15 Ark. 297.

And that the claim must be as broad as the possession, see Doolittle v. Bailey, 85 Iowa, 398, 52 N. W. 337; where, however, it was held that there was sufficient possession and acquiescence.

The particular point of this class of cases is that claiming to a boundary believing it to be the true line is not enough. Fisher v. Muecke, 82 Iowa, 547, 48 N. W. 936; Jordan v. Ferree, 101 Iowa, 440, 70 N. W. 611; Conrad v. Sackett, 8 Kan. App. 635, 56

The plaintiff claims the land bounded on the north by the public road and on the west, south, and east by the dotted lines. The defendants own the land south and east of plaintiff's land, and the boundaries fixed by the surveyor gave to the plaintiff only the land included within the straight lines, amounting to 9.75 acres, which is 3.75 acres less than the plaintiff claims. The controversy, so far as the defendants are concerned, is over the location of the south and east boundaries of the tract. The defendants rest mainly upon the conclusiveness of the survey under § 2275 of the General Statutes of 1909 (Laws 1891, chap. 89, § 10), which provides that "the corners and boundaries established in any survey, . . . where no appeal is taken from the surveyor's report, . . . shall be held and considered as permanently established, and shall not thereafter be changed."

Aside from the plaintiffs claim that the survey was irregular and void, his main contention is that he pleaded and proved his title by a deed and adverse possession for over fifteen years, and that the only defense offered to the trespass of the defendants was the record of the survey. In answer to this contention, the defendants insist that the possession of the plaintiff and his immediate grantor was through a misapprehension of the true boundary lines, and that the possession was therefore not adverse. The defendants rely upon the following decisions: Winn v. Abeles, 35 Kan. 85, 57 Am. Rep. 138, 10 Pac. 443;

Pac. 507; Taylor v. Fomby, 116 Ala. 621, 67 Am. St. Rep. 149, 22 So. 910 (dictum).

Where each neighbor cleared and cultivated up to a dividing hedge fence, it was held that the encroacher's honest belief in his boundary for much longer than the statutory period would not avail him. Davis v. Caldwell, 107 Ala. 526, 18 So. 103.

In Walker v. Wyman, 157 Ala. 478, 47 So. 1011, where there was cultivation up to a path, the court, in holding that there was no adverse possession, reviewed the Alabama cases, and stated that the doctrine of Brown v. Cockerell, 33 Ala. 38, is still in force in that state.

It was held in Allen v. Reed, 51 Cal. 362, that erecting a fence on what one supposes to be the true line, and inclosing part of the neighbor's lot within the fence, and occupying the land, will not make the possession adverse. Compare later California cases, infra, III.

So, where the encroacher set his fence on what he and the neighbors supposed to be the true line, it was held that there was no adverse possession. McWilliams v. Samuel, 123 Mo. 659, 27 S. W. 550. As to Missouri cases generally, see infra, III. a.

It as even been held that encroaching 18 inches with buildings and fences, with the belief that they are on one's own lot, will not support adverse possession. Wacha v. Brown, 78 Iowa, 432, 43 N. W. 269.

Where the claim was made "that, as the defendant accepted a conveyance which in apt terms excluded the land in controversy from the conveyance under which he claims, he is estopped from setting up color or claim of title," the court said: "We do not deem it necessary to determine the question just stated, but such question is entitled to weight and consideration in determining whether the defendant and his grantors took possession adversely to the true owners. The intent with which the possession was taken is material, and the facts relied on to prove it must be strictly proved. They cannot be presumed." But it does not appear what was the nature of the "apt term" excluding the land in controversy. Weinig v. Holcomb, 73 Iowa, 143, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Williams v. Bernstein, 51 La. Ann. 115, 25 So. 411, the court said: "The mere fact that parties owning adjoining property have cultivated lands up to a certain line or up to a certain fence, built either by one or by both, or built by one and repaired by the other, does not per se evidence an adverse possession up to the line or fence, or an acquiescence in or recognition of an adverse ownership. Neighbors constantly run up fences within or beyond the boundary lines and join their fences, doing so with the knowledge and understanding that such acts are merely temporary and done subsidiarily to and with reference to the right of both to ultimately ascertain and fix rights by an action of boundary or through a formal legal survey. Until this happens, the lands held by each are in the occupancy, and not in the adverse possession, of either; certainly so in the absence of a clear and direct claim advanced of adverse ownership and possession."

It will be seen by the opinion in Edwards v. Fleming that, notwithstanding the result of the case, the Kansas court continues to favor the paper title at the expense of the possessor. This is in accord with its earlier decisions.

In Rasdel v. Shumway, 6 Kan. App. 45, 49 Pac. 631, affirmed in 58 Kan. 818, 51 Pac. 285, the court said: "If the plaintiff can recover, it is purely and simply because there was a mistake as to the boundary line, under which mistake she and her grantors took possession, and have ever since held possession, of the strip of land in question. The plaintiff in error in the court below testified that she had always claimed to own to the fence, and beyond the boundary line of lot 11. But the court found that she had made no such claim, and, if she had any purpose to do so, she had never communicated it until a very short time previous to the beginning of this action," and it was held that the possession was not adverse; the court saying further that an intention to claim adversely, not communicated to the holder of the Swarz v. Ramala, 63 Kan. 633, 66 Pac. 649; Shanline v. Wiltsie, 70 Kan. 177, 78 Pac. 436, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 140; Scott v. Williams, 74 Kan. 448, 87 Pac. 550; Crawford v. Hebrew, 78 Kan. 401, 96 Pac. 348. These cases, however, recognize the doctrine that the character of the possession depends upon the intent with which it is taken and held. The reason why possession held under a mistake as to the true location of the boundary line is not adverse is stated to be, in Shanline v. Wiltsie, 70 Kan. 177, 78 Pac. 436, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 140, cited with approval in Scott v. Williams, 74 Kan. 448, 87 Pac. 550, "that there is no intention on the part of the occupant to exercise, or on the part of the owner to suffer, any dominion beyond the true line, legal title, was unavailing; and treated the entry of one who enters on a lot where the fence included more than the paper title as permissive as to the excess.

In an action in respect to the location of a highway, the court said: "As between the respective owners of adjoining lands, a physical possession held by one of them of a part of his neighbor's grounds, taken and held through a misapprehension of the location of the boundary line, is not adverse, and, however long continued, will not ripen into a title or set the statute of limitations in operation, for the reason that there is no intention on the part of the occupant to exercise, or on the part of the owner to suffer, any dominion beyond the true line, wherever it may be." Shanline v. Wiltsie, 70 Kan. 177, 78 Pac. 436, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 140, quoted and followed in Scott v. Williams, 74 Kan. 448, 87 Pac. 550, where the plaintiff's occupation and farming of the disputed strip for the statutory period, supposing it to be his own, and only claiming it on that account, was held of no avail to him. (There was no fence in this case.)

And in Crawford v. Hebrew, 78 Kan. 401, 96 Pac. 348, where there was a dividing fence which the two neighbors supposed for the statutory period to be on the true line, and the defendant replied in the affirmative to the question: "All the years, Mr. Crawford, that you have occupied the land that you have testified to, you occupied it under the claim that that was the line? The line that divided you from these other pieces of land?" The court said: "Under this evidence the defendant occupied the strip under the mistake that the fence was on the true boundary line, and without any intention to hold the land beyond his true line, or to claim land which did not belong to him. Under these facts he cannot acquire title to such strip by adverse possession."

In Tennessee it has been held that "the accidental and unintentional inclosure of land lying near and along a line which is not clearly known constitutes no adverse possession." East Tennessee Iron & Coal Co. v. Ferguson, — Tenn. —, 35 S. W. 900. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

wherever it may be. In Scott v. Williams, supra, there was testimony to the effect that the plaintiff claimed no more land than was in the northeast quarter of the section, and, of course, the possession was held not to be hostile or adverse.

It would be impossible to reconcile the conflict in the authorities generally, respecting the effect of possession of real property taken and held under a mistake as to the true location of the boundary line. There are many cases which state the rule in general terms and apparently hold that under no circumstances can the possession be adverse where there was a mistake as to the true boundary. The better considered cases, however, recognize the existence of two rules; or, at least, they

See also to similar effect general dictum as to intention, in Fuller v. Jackson, — Tenn. —, 62 S. W. 274.

In Erck v. Church, 87 Tenn. 575, 4 L.R.A. 641, 11 S. W. 794 (quoted in the original note), the court emphatically declared on the side of the possession, holding that intent was not an essential element of disseisin.

But in Kirkman v. Brown, 93 Tenn. 476, 27 S. W. 709, where the owner of 40 acres entirely surrounded by his neighbor inadvertently built his house two thirds on his neighbor's land, and also cultivated one fourth of an acre of his neighbor's land, it was held that he acquired no title although he held for the statutory period.

In Treece v. American Asso. 58 C. C. A. 266, 122 Fed. 598, the court stated that the doctrine that accidental and unintentional possession of a strip does not operate to start the statute or give the encroacher any possessory right, however long such accidental possession might last, "seems to be settled by the most recent of the Tennessee decisions upon this subject. Kirkman v. Brown, supra. The prior case of Erck v. Church, supra, announced quite a contrary rule, and it is not referred to in Kirkman v. Brown. Being, however, a question of strictly local law, we deem it our duty to follow Kirkman v. Brown, as the most recent announcement." It does not seem clear, however, that the question was involved in the decision in the Treece Case.

III. Cases holding possession the important element.

a. In general.

The trend of opinion is against disturbing him whose visible boundaries have existed for the period of the statute of limitations, which is illustrated in many cases where the possession has been held sufficient. Johnson v. Elder, 92 Ark. 30, 121 S. W. 1066 (fencing a triangle on the supposition that it was a part of one's tract); Searles v.

make an exception and hold that the general rule has no application where the party holds possession with intent to claim to the boundary line in any event. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 791 & 792. In 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1037, it is said that "the real test as to whether or not a title will be acquired by a holding for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations is the intention of the party holding beyond the true line. It is not merely the existence of a mistake, but the presence or absence of the requisite intention to claim title, that fixes the character of the entry and determines the question of disseisin." In Preble v. Maine C. R. Co. 85 Me. 260, 21 L.R.A. 829, 35 Am. St. Rep. 366, 27 Atl. 149, the court recognizes the existence of the two rules, and in the opinion it was said: "The distinction between them is neither subtle, recondite, or refined, but simple, practical, and substantial. It involves sources of evidence and means of proof no more difficult or complex than many other inquiries of a similar character constantly arising in our courts."

Numerous cases illustrating both rules are referred to and collated in a note to that case in 21 L.R.A. 829. In the note the editor cites a large number of cases holding that one may acquire title by adverse possession by claiming and occupying up to a fence, notwithstanding by mistake he supposes the fence to be on the true line. Thus, in Hitchings v. Morrison, 72 Me. 331, it is held that if the title is claimed

E. 362, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1061; Riggs v. Riley, 113 Ind. 208, 15 N. E. 253 (building a fence and clearing and cultivating up to it); Dyer v. Eldridge, 136 Ind. 654, 36 N. E. 522 (occupation to a fence, of land as a part of the occupant's farm); Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Stickley, 155 Ind. 312, 58 N. E. 192 (placing a house conveniently with reference to a fence as the correct boundary); Webb v. Rhodes, 28 Ind. App. 393, 61 N. E. 735; Brown v. Morgan, 44 Minn. 432, 46 N. W. 913 (building fence and cultivating up to it); Diers v. Ward, 87 Minn. 475, 92 N. W. 402 (inclosing and cultivating); Obernalt v. Edgar, 28 Neb. 70, 44 N. W. 82 (cultivating to a road and setting out forest and fruit trees); Bowenfield v. Bleekman, 4 Neb. (Unof.) 443, 94 N. W. 714 (where there were no fixed monuments); Andrews v. Hastings, 85 Neb. 548, 123 N. W. 1035; Sommer v. Compton, 52 Or. 173, 96 Pac. 124, 1065; Bruce v. Washington, 80 Tex. 368, 15 S. W. 1104 (improvements and cultivation as "visible appropriation"); Hesser v. Siepmann, 35 Wash. 14, 76 Pac. 295 (a claim up to a street, believing that the correct boundary); Cole v. Brunt, 35 U. C. Q. B. 103 (occupation to a fence for thirty years).

In Steers v. Shaw, 1 Ont. Rep. 26, an occupation for many years along a runout line was held sufficient, the court finding some difficulty as to the parts not actually fenced, though occupied, but holding all sufficient, and there the line was considered as a division line by both parties. This case was followed in McGregor v. Keiller, 9 Ont. Rep. 681, where there were no fences, but the occupation was shown largely by the cutting of timber.

Where a farmer settled upon his homestead, placed a substantial dwelling house thereon, and barn and outbuildings, dug a well, planted an orchard, and built a fence, including by mistake some land of an adjoining proprietor, it was held that his possession was notice that it was adverse. Bowers v. Ledgerwood, 25 Wash. 14, 64 Pac. 936.

When one takes possession of land under the belief that he owns it, incloses it, lays it off into town lots, and holds it continuously for the statutory period under claim of ownership, without any recognition of the possible right of another thereto on account of a mistake in the boundary line, his possession and holding are adverse. Goodwin v. Garabaldi, 83 Ark. 74, 102 S. W. 706.

In Lucas v. Provenin, 130 Cal. 270, 62 Pac. 509, where the purchaser of a lot on a city street took possession of an adjoining unseparated strip 2½ feet wide, inclosing it so as to be a part of the lot purchased, and ever since claimed and occupied it as her own property, it was held that the possession was adverse.

The Missouri cases, though perhaps at first in favor of the paper title, seem to show a drift towards the possession. While as recently as McCabe v. Bruere, 153 Mo. 1, 54 S. W. 450, we have the citation of earlier authorities that there can be no disseisin by mistake, which is explained to mean without intention to claim against the true owner, it will be seen infra that the expression of no intention to take more than one's paper title will not conclude the possessor in Missouri, and it has been recently held that one in possession for the statutory period is entitled to a verdict if there is no evidence that his claim of title is conditional on the subsequent ascertainment of the true line. Milligan v. Fritts, 226 Mo. 189, 125 S. W. 1101.

And in Lemmons v. McKinney, 162 Mo. 525, 63 S. W. 92, the court said: "When the possession up to the fence, under an apparent claim of ownership, has been held for the period covered by the statute of limitations, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the holding was subject to future ascertainment of the true line."

Under the modern theory, the statement by the holder that he did not mean to claim anything more than was covered by his paper title will not conclude him. Golter- clear to the fence, which was not on the true line, the title may be acquired by adverse possession, although by mistake it was supposed to be on the true line. In Tamm v. Kellogg, 49 Mo. 118, it was decided that if possession was held to a fence under the claim that it was the true line, and the other party acquiesced or failed to take steps to disturb possession, it was adverse. And, again, in Handlan v. McManus, 100 Mo. 124, 18 Am. St. Rep. 533, 13 S. W. 207, it was decided that if a fence is held as the true division line by one of the parties who claims to hold all land to the fence, his possession is adverse. To the same effect are Wilson v. Hunter, 59 Ark. 626, 43 Am. St. Rep. 63, 28 S. W. 419; Ayers v. Reidel, 84 Wis. 276, 54 N. W. 588;

Wheeler*, 69 Ala. 332; Fuller v. Worth, 91 Wis. 406, 64 N. W. 995; Graeven v. Dieves, 68 Wis. 317, 31 N. W. 914; Taylor v. Fomby, 116 Ala. 621, 67 Am. St. Rep. 149, 22 So. 910; Tex v. Pfug, 24 Neb. 666, 8 Am. St. Rep. 231, 39 N. W. 839. See also note to Finch v. Ullman, 24 Am. St. Rep. 383.

In Alexander v. Wheeler, 69 Ala. 332, it is said: "The quo animo, or intention with which possession is taken and held by a defendant, must always constitute an essential consideration. . . . But the rule is different where the fence is believed to mann v. Schiermeyer, 111 Mo. 404, 19 S. W. 484, 20 S. W. 161; Wiess v. Goodhue, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 142, 102 S. W. 793; Schlossmacher v. Beacon Place Co. 52 Wash. 588, 100 Pac. 1013. See also to similar effect, Anderson v. Buchanan, 139 Iowa, 676, 116 N. W. 694.

In Layton v. Bailey, 77 Conn. 22, 58 Atl. 355, the court said: "The fact that one of the defendants, while testifying on the trial, was asked upon cross-examination if, in occupying the land, he had the intention of holding adversely to and so acquiring title against the person to whom the land rightfully belonged, and answered that he did not, but that he occupied claiming that his father's deed gave title to the property, did not determine the question of adverse user, nor conclude the defendants from setting up title to the land through adverse possession."

Where a party, an ignorant woman, stated that she did not wish any more land than she was entitled to under a certain will, which was shown by repeated surveys to be 8 acres, but she had for upwards of twenty years cultivated 11 acres, and claimed that she was entitled to that under the will, it was held that she had title by adverse possession to as much land as she had cultivated. Johnson v. Thomas, 23 App. D. C. 141.

A party who enters upon land on purchasing it under the belief that a fence is the true boundary between himself and his neighbor, and who is so informed by a former owner of the land, will not be ousted of half his lot because he replies to a question by the court, "I suppose you had no intention of taking anybody else's land excepting your own, had you?" the answer, "No, sir," when he had occupied the land up to the fence for a period sufficient to give title under the statute of limitations. Flynn v. Wacker, 151 Mo. 545, 52 S. W. 342.

In Davis v. Braswell, 185 Mo. 576, 84 S. W. 870, where there was evidence that the defendant for twenty-seven years claimed up to the fence, as the correct line, cleared the line and built a house on the disputed 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

strip openly and notoriously, with full knowledge of his neighbor, the court said: "The mere fact that he said he did not want his neighbor's land, when at all times he was claiming this was not his neighbor's, did not affect his adverse possession. He could make this defense under his general denial."

In Webster v. Shrine Temple Co. 141 Iowa, 325, 117 N. W. 665, where the plaintiff especially admitted on the stand that she never, at any time, intended to make any claim to the property other than such as belonged to her, and that she claimed up to the alleged boundary because she supposed it to be the correct line, it was held that her possession was not adverse. But it appeared in the case that there was no real acquiescence in any boundary line as being the actual boundary.

b. Mistake immaterial.

It is immaterial that the holder supposed the visible boundary to be correct. Woodward v. Faris, 109 Cal. 12, 41 Pac. 781; Daily v. Boudreau, 231 Ill. 228, 83 N. E. 218; Richwine v. Presbyterian Church, 135 Ind. 80, 34 N. E. 737; Logsdon v. Dingg, 32 Ind. App. 158, 69 N. E. 409; Rowland v. Williams, 23 Or. 515, 32 Pac. 402; Moore v. Fowler, — Or. —, 114 Pac. 472; Jayne v. Hanna, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 51 S. W. 296. See also to similar effect, Williams v. Shepherdson, 4 Neb. (Unof.) 608, 95 N. W. 827.

The occupation must be adverse to the true owner and all the world if it is not under a license. Bayhouse v. Urquides, 17 Idaho, 286, 105 Pac. 1066.

"In this state, when an owner of land, by mistake as to the boundary line of his land, takes actual, visible, and exclusive possession of another's land, and holds it as his own continuously for the statutory period of twenty years, he thereby acquires the title, as against the real owner. The possession is regarded as adverse, without reference to the fact that it is based on mistake; it being prima facie sufficient that actual, visible, and exclusive possesbe the true line, and the claim of ownership is up to the fence as located, even though the established division line is erroneous, and the claim of title was the result of the mistake. In such case there is a clear intention to claim to the fence as the true line, and the possession does not originate in an admitted possibility of mistake." To the same effect is Hoffman v. White, 90 Ala. 354, 7 So. 816.

There must be an intention to claim the land within a certain boundary, whether it eventually be the correct one or not. Where, however, the intent to claim title exists only upon the condition that the fence is on the true line, the intention is not only absolute, but conditional, and the possession is not adverse. Shanline v. Wiltsie, 70 Kan. 177, 78 Pac. 436, 3 A. &

E. Ann. Cas. 140; Scott v. Williams, 74 Kan. 448, 87 Pac. 550; Dow v. McKenney, 64 Me. 138.

There is no evidence in this case, as there was in Scott v. Williams, supra, that the claim was a provisional one. Two presumptions always obtain with respect to the possession of real estate: (1) It is presumed that the possession is in subordination to the true title; (2) where there is a deed, it is presumed that the grantee entered into possession under his deed, claiming only the title given him by his deed, and that his possession was restricted to the premises granted. Fuller v. Worth, 91 Wis. 406, 410, 64 N. W. 995. Neither of these presumptions hinders and both help the claim of the plaintiff. If we look to the deeds sion is taken under a claim of right." Renner v. Shirk, 163 Ind. 542, 72 N. E. 546.

In Jordon v. Riley, 178 Mass. 524, 60 N. E. 7, the court said, in affirming judgment for the tenant: "The demandant was disseised continuously for more than twenty years. Pub. Stats. chap. 196, § 1. It is not material, if it be a fact, that the successive occupants of the tenant's lot claimed the disputed strip only because they were under a mistake as to where the boundary line would fall when the deeds were applied to the land. Harrison v. Dolan, 172 Mass. 395, 52 N. E. 513; Bond v. O'Gara, 177 Mass. 139, 83 Am. St. Rep. 265, 58 N. E. 275."

In Baty v. Elrod, 66 Neb. 735, 92 N. W. 1032, 97 N. W. 343, the court said in disapproving the holding of Grube v. Wells, 34 Iowa, 148: "If one, by mistake, inclose the land of another, and claim it as his own, to certain fixed monuments or boundaries, his actual and uninterrupted possession as owner for the statutory period will work a disseisin and his title will be perfect."

In Ramsey v. Ogden, 23 Or. 347, 31 Pac. 778, the court said: "It was held in Caulfield v. Clark, 17 Or. 474, 11 Am. St. Rep. 845, 21 Pac. 443, that where a person, under a mistake as to the boundaries, enters and occupies land not embraced in his title, claiming it as his own for the requisite statutory period, he becomes invested with title thereto by possession, although his entry and possession were by a mistake."

Where it was argued that a possession by mistake as to boundary could not be adverse, the court said: "Every act of the defendant in entering and occupying this land was an assertion of title in himself. His actual, substantial inclosure of it was, both by the statute of Nevada and the general principles of law, decisive proof of his adverse possession. . . . The fence, together with the planting of the hedge and the shade trees, are acts evincing 'an intention of asserting ownership and possession,' and it is 'the intention which guides the entry and fixes its character.' . . . He marked out the boundary, not as a doubtful one, but as the true one, and all his actions agree with this view." Brown v. Leete, 6 Sawy. 332, 2 Fed. 442.

c. Recognition of visible line.

Some of the cases emphasize the point that the adjoining proprietors have recognized the visible line as a division line. Cornish v. Follis, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 300, 45 S. W. 1050; Grider v. Davenport, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1455, 60 S. W. 866; Puntt v. Zimmer, 8 Ohio C. C. N. S. 455, 29 Ohio C. C. 721; Sullivan v. Michael, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 564, 87 S. W. 1061.

In Kron v. Daugherty, 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 163, it was held to be error to refuse an instruction that "when adjoining owners have for twenty-one years recognized and adopted a marked line as their mutual boundaries, they are each protected by the statute of limitations, even though it is not the line mentioned in the deed."

In Holmes v. Judge, 31 Utah, 269, 87 Pac. 1009, the court said: "We do not wish to be understood as holding that parties may not claim to the true boundary, where an assumed or agreed boundary is located through mistake or inadvertence, or where it is clear that the line as located was not intended as a boundary, and where a boundary so located has not been acquiesced in for a long term of years by the parties in interest. But in all cases where the boundary is open, and visibly marked by monuments, fences, or buildings, and is knowingly acquiesced in for a long term of years, the law will imply an agreement fixing the boundary as located, and will not permit the parties or their grantees to depart from such line."

This case was followed in Young v. Hyland, — Utah, —, 108 Pac. 1124, where it was said: "Where the owners of adjoining lands occupy their respective premises up to a certain line which they recognized and acquiesced in as their boundary line for a long period of time, they and their grantees will not be permitted to deny that the boundary line thus recognized is the true line of division between their properties."

under which the plaintiff and his immediate grantor took and held possession, we find that they describe the land as bounded on the south by a hedge fence, so that his entry, his possession, and his claim of title are identical. As was said in Tex v. Pflug, 24 Neb. 686, 8 Am. St. Rep. 231, 39 N. W. 839, "He took possession to the line fixed by the surveyor, and designated as his boundary by his grantor, and held with reference to it, and to nothing else."

It may be observed that the findings, as well as the evidence, seem to preclude the possibility of the possession having been taken and held through a mistake as to the true location of the boundary line. There is no finding that the claim of the plaintiff and his immediate grantor was provisional; that is, that they claimed to own up to the fence only upon the supposition that this was the true boundary. Nor is there any finding that the fence is not the true boundary. If we turn to the evidence, we find nothing to suggest that possession was taken and held up to the fence through a mistake, or that the fence was not the true boundary, except the evidence of the recent survey made a short time before the commencement of the suit. This survey was made at the request of the defendants, who owned the land on the south and east. The evidence is that they told the county surveyor to get the description of the land of the plaintiff from his recorded deed, and to serve him with proper notice. It appears, however, that in his

Where there was evidence tending to show that for more than half a century two farms had been continuously occupied by their respective owners, and that a fence had been maintained as a division or line fence between them, up to which each had claimed and occupied without the slightest objection on the part of the other, and improvements had been made along it on both sides, the court said: "The maintenance of a line fence between owners of adjoining lands by their acts, up to which each claims and occupies, is a concession by each of the open adverse possession by the other of that which is on his side of such division fence, which, after twenty-one years, will give title, though subsequent surveys may show that the fence was not exactly upon the surveyed line." Reiter v. McJunkin, 173 Pa. 82, 33 Atl. 1012.

As has been seen, the courts that favor the paper title do not consider the placing of buildings decisive evidence of adverse possession. See cases cited supra under subd. III, viz., Wacha v. Brown, 78 Iowa, 432, 43 N. W. 269; Kirkman v. Brown, 93 Tenn. 476, 27 S. W. 709.

But there would seem to be no doubt that such evidence is conclusive. Possession is adverse if a party incloses and builds upon and holds land under the belief and claim that it is his own, even though the claim of title is the result of a mistake as to the boundaries of his own land. Wilson v. Hunter, 59 Ark. 626, 43 Am. St. Rep. 63, 28 S. W. 419, where about 20 inches of land had been built upon, and the jury held that the possession was adverse.

Where one claims the line on which he builds to be the true boundary of his lot, his possession of all that lies within this assumed line is necessarily hostile to the owner of the adjoining lot. The latter is at once put to his action, and the statute of limitations begins to run. Neale v. Lee, 8 Mackey, 5. See also to similar effect, Ramsey v. Glenny, 45 Minn. 401, 22 Am. St. Rep. 736, 48 N. W. 322.

Where a party built one wall of his house so that it extended 4 inches on his neighbor's land, and so stood for over twenty years without objection by the neighbor, it was held that he had by adverse possession a title to the 4 inches. Pearsall v. Westcott, 30 App. Div. 99, 51 N. Y. Supp. 663. See also further appeal in the same case, 45 App. Div. 34, 60 N. Y. Supp. 816.

So, where there was proof to the effect that the defendant's predecessor in title had built a house upon the land in controversy more than twenty years before the commencement of the action, and that it had been openly occupied and used by him and his successors in title ever since without question on the part of anyone, until the suit was begun. Stillwell v. Boyer, 36 App. Div. 424, 55 N. Y. Supp. 358, affirmed in 165 N. Y. 621, 59 N. E. 1131. See also Lougee v. Shuhart, 127 Iowa, 173, 102 N. W. 1125, supra, I. c. See also to similar effect, Davis v. Braswell, 185 Mo. 576, 84 S. W. 870.

Where part of the width of the disputed strip was covered by a building the eaves of which covered the rest of the width, it was held that the entire width was adversely possessed. Weeks v. Upton, 99 Minn. 410, 109 N. W. 828.

So, where a party has built a house with the understanding and claim that she owns beyond its eaves the space necessary for the swing of the window blinds and an underground drain, and has occupied the same for twenty years, her possession will be deemed adverse to at least the space occupied by the eaves, drain, and blinds. Atkins v. Pfaffe, 136 Iowa, 728, 114 N. W. 187.

So, where one bought a city lot separated by a fence from the adjoining lot, and built a house thereon, and occupied the lot for more than the statutory period, the eaves of the house draining on a strip inside the fence, afterwards claimed by the neighbor, the court said: "Unless it is to be held that boundary lines cannot be determined by possession and claim of right upon the one side, and acquiescence upon the other, we know of no reason why the respondents may not claim title by adverse notice to the plaintiff he did not describe all the land which the plaintiff claims. Neither in the notice nor the survey was any attention paid to the artificial boundaries mentioned in the deeds under which the plaintiff holds. The notice and the survey proceed upon the theory that the land he was to survey and establish the boundaries of was a tract of 10 acres more or less, commencing at a stone 20 rods west of the northeast corner of the quarter, "then west 60 rods, then south 26 rods, then east 60 rods, then north to place of beginning." The west line of the tract which the plaintiff claims to own is described in his deeds as running "south 26 rods to hedge fence, then east sixty (60) rods," etc.

The only evidence, therefore, of any mis-possession, in this instance. The general rule, as we understand it, is that boundary lines may be determined by adverse possession." Erickson v. Murlin, 39 Wash. 43, 80 Pac. 853.

Where the line claimed is a straight line, the fact that a building placed up to the line does not cover the entire length of the boundary will not confine the recovery to the land actually covered by the building. O'Callaghan v. Whisenand, 119 Iowa, 566, 93 N. W. 579; Yunker v. White, 136 Iowa, 23, 111 N. W. 824.

Where forty years before the trial of the action, a building was erected mostly on the defendant's premises, but encroaching a foot and a half on the plaintiff's lot, this building being a frame building with a brick foundation, and a fence on the rear of the lot, in continuation of the line of the building, having been built more than twenty years before the action, upon the mistaken assumption that it was on defendant's premises, as was the building first mentioned, it was held that the defendant had title by adverse possession. Roulston v. Stewart, 40 App. Div. 200, 57 N. Y. Supp. 1061, following Crary v. Goodman, 22 N. Y. 170.

e. Iowa cases.

The Iowa court is now committed to the doctrine that "in the absence of other controlling circumstances, the inference is conclusive that the division line between adjoining tracts, definitely marked by the erection and maintenance of a fence or other monuments, recognized by the owners as such, and up to which they have occupied and cultivated the land on either side more than ten years (the statutory period of limitations), is the true boundary between them." Miller v. Mills County, 111 Iowa, 654, 82 N. W. 1038.

This case was followed in Axmear v. Richards, 112 Iowa, 657, 84 N. W. 686, where a party placed his fence on what he supposed was the true line of the highway, and this was acquiesced in by the public for thirty years, and it was held that his take as to the south boundary, is that a survey not of the entire tract as described in the plaintiff's deeds, or as claimed to be owned by him, but of a different tract of land, shows a south boundary different from the hedge fence. It is altogether probable that the objections raised by the plaintiff to the validity of the survey, based upon the variance in the description of his land in the notice and the description in his deeds, would, in a proper case, be held to be a mere irregularity of which advantage could only be taken by an appeal from the survey. Shanline v. Wiltzie, 70 Kan. 177, 78 Pac. 436, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 140. But this is not an action to set aside a survey, but to quiet title to a tract of land to which the plaintiff claims to have title would be sustained (it appearing to be the law in Iowa that an individual may obtain title to part of a highway by adverse possession). It was also followed in Lawrence v. Washburn, 119 Iowa, 109, 90 N. W. 73, and O'Callaghan v. Whisenand, 119 Iowa, 566, 93 N. W. 579, also in Klinker v. Schmidt, 114 Iowa, 695, 87 N. W. 661, where the court said: "We apprehend the distinction between the doctrine of the cases which deny efficacy to an occupancy founded on mistake, and those which recognize occupancy to a line established by acquiescence, to be this: that in the one case the assertion of title is presumed to be limited to the premises covered by the grant under which possession is claimed, while in the other case there is a wholly independent basis for the assertion of title; to wit, acquiescence of the adjoining owner."

And in Bradley v. Burkhart, 139 Iowa, 323, 115 N. W. 597, 130 Am. St. Rep. 328, the court said: "The doctrine of adverse possession, strictly speaking, does not apply to the case, for the reason that plaintiff has failed to show any intent to claim more than his deed calls for. But a line may be established by recognition and acquiescence, although neither of the parties intends to claim more than his deed gives him. This is the doctrine established by Miller v. Mills County, supra, and recognized in almost innumerable cases since that time."

And in Kennedy v. Niles, — Iowa, —, 96 N. W. 772, it was said: "This court is fully committed to the doctrine that occupancy up to a marked division line, without questioning its correctness, for the statutory period of limitation, is such acquiescence therein as to defeat subsequent controversy as to its true location."

Thus, it is now held that occupation and cultivation by both parties up to a fence for twenty years make a boundary in absence of other proof. Andrews v. Meredith, 131 Iowa, 716, 109 N. W. 287.

In Keller v. Harrison, 139 Iowa, 383, 116 N. W. 327, the court said: "The jury were not told in any of the instructions, as they should have been, that, if defendant, by held adverse possession for more than fifteen years; so that, in our view, the validity of the survey is not involved, and we only refer to the alleged defects therein to show that there is no evidence that the hedge fence on the south is not the true boundary of the land actually claimed by the plaintiff to be his.

The theory of the defendants, of course, is that a valid survey from which no appeal was taken has permanently fixed the boundaries between the two tracts, and determined that the hedge fence never was the true boundary, and that it necessarily follows that the possession of the plaintiff was acquired under a misapprehension as to its true location. If, however, we concede that such is the effect of the survey, himself, employees, or tenants, marked by the planting of trees, grove, or other improvements, held to a visible division line, in good faith believing it to be the true boundary, and for more than ten years subsequent thereto occupied and made use of the land up to such line, and during such period the owners of plaintiff's land occupied and cultivated their land up to such line, then they will be conclusively presumed to have agreed thereto as a boundary line, and neither party can be heard to say that the division line so marked is not the true boundary line between them."

Boltz v. Colsch, 134 Iowa, 480, 109 N. W. 1106, is not inconsistent with the foregoing cases, as there it appeared, as to the claim of an old line, that overflow from a river frequently washed away a fence, which was not always replaced on the same line; and further, that afterwards there was a recognition of a new line by the party who complained of encroachment.

f. Wisconsin cases.

In Wisconsin the earlier cases seem to favor the paper title.

Thus, it was held in Fuller v. Worth, 91 Wis. 406, 64 N. W. 995, that where one enters under a deed, finding a fence apparently as a partition between him and a neighbor, and all that appears is that the one so entering occupied to the fence for over twenty years, if the fence is not on the true line, he will not hold by adverse possession any land on his side of the fence.

And in Reilly v. Howe, 101 Wis. 108, 76 N. W. 1114, it seems to be held that where there is occupancy to a fence, it must be shown that it was under claim of title; but the case was controlled by an estoppel.

But in Wollman v. Ruehle, 104 Wis. 603, 80 N. W. 919, it was said that the presumption is that possession is in subordination to the true title, and this is so by statute in Wisconsin, but it was held that where twenty years have run, the presumption is the other way. Citing Grady v. Goodman, 22 N. Y. 171; Eldridge v. Kenning, 35 N. Y. S. R. 190, 12 N. Y. Supp. 693.

And the later cases are now fully committal to the doctrine that possession is still, under the authorities we have cited, the plaintiff's possession would be adverse, notwithstanding the mistake, if the intention was to take and hold to the fence in any event. Upon this theory we have deemed it necessary to review the cases holding that the test is not whether there was a mistake, but what was the intention of the person holding possession up to the mistaken boundary.

Viewed from still another aspect of the case, the judgment must be affirmed. The petition alleges and the evidence abundantly shows that the defendants, having by their deed fixed the hedge fence as an artificial boundary of the land conveyed, acquiesced in that being the true boundary for a period long enough to estop them from mitted to the doctrine that possession is the important element. Thus it was said in Bishop v. Bleyer, 105 Wis. 330, 81 N. W. 413: "He entered into the possession of this land. He supposed that it was the land he purchased. He claimed the land between the lines of his fence, and held it in visible and notorious occupancy for more than forty years. The rule has frequently been asserted that unexplained occupancy, continued for twenty years, raises the presumption that such occupancy was under claim of right and adverse. Carmody v. Mulrooney, 87 Wis. 552, 58 N. W. 1109; Wilkins v. Nicolai, 99 Wis. 178, 74 N. W. 103; Wollman v. Ruehle, 100 Wis. 31, 75 N. W. 425; Meyer v. Hope, 101 Wis. 123, 77 N. W. 720; Wollman v. Ruehle, 104 Wis. 603, 80 N. W. 919. Such possession, when established, is conclusive as to the nature of the possession, unless rebutted or explained away by some satisfactory evidence."

So, in Dreger v. Budde, 133 Wis. 516, 113 N. W. 950, the court said: "It is contended that the evidence is undisputed that . . . (defendant's predecessor in title and possession) never claimed or occupied the strip in question as his land. The proof is clear that he and other owners of the land had occupied the strip for more than twenty years, had cleared parts of it and cultivated portions, and treated the line fence as the division line between the farms. These facts and circumstances are but slightly contradicted in the case. From this the inference is well-nigh irresistible that such open and notorious occupancy of the strip was adverse as to all the world, and at the expiration of twenty years ripened into an absolute title."

In Ovig v. Morrison, 142 Wis. 243, 125 N. W. 449, the court explains its present doctrine as follows: "The necessity for the system which is written into our Code in order to avoid confusion and uncertainty on the subject of adverse possession is significantly illustrated by the claim here made and another, which, until recent years, was often dignified as legitimate and is yet disturbing in the administration of claiming the contrary. It is well settled that adjoining landowners may, either by writing or parol, agree upon the boundary between their lands, and that their possession on either side up to the boundary so agreed upon will be mutually adverse. Steinhilber v. Holmes, 68 Kan. 607, 75 1019; Sheldon v. Atkinson, 38 Kan. 14, 16 Pac. 68; Alexander v. Wheeler, 69 Ala. 332; Yates v. Shaw, 24 Ill. 367; Cleveland v. Obenchain, 107 Ind. 591, 8 N. E. 624; McNamara v. Seaton, 82 Ill. 498; Watrous v. Morrison, 33 Fla. 261, 39 Am. St. Rep. 139, 14 So. 805; Clark v. Hulsey, 54 Ga. 608. See also note to case in 21 L.R.A. 833, and note to case in 39 Am. St. Rep. 154; 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1036.

in planting the hedge throws on light upon the matter. He owned the land on the other side and did not intend the fence as a boundary line; but the defendants afterward in their deed expressly fixed upon this hedge as the south boundary line of the tract which they conveyed. Their situation is the same as though they had agreed with the adjoining landowner that this should be the boundary line. Their acquiescence in it as the true boundary line for a period even less than the statutory period for acquiring title by prescription would estop them. Sheldon v. Atkinson, 38 Kan. 14, 16 Pac. 68. Their acquiescence continued beyond the statutory period, and, under the circumstances of this case, should, upon every principle of justice and justice. On the one hand it was claimed that adverse possession could not be grounded on possession as owner under mistake of boundaries, while, on the other, it was claimed that such possession must, to be effective, be characterized by good faith. The result was the theory that if a person, as owner, maintained exclusive, continuous occupancy by the location of his building or otherwise, partly within and partly without his true line, according to his paper title, for twenty years or any greater length of time, he was still in danger of being dispossessed of the latter portion because, if his occupancy was by mistake of boundaries, that was fatal to his claim of title, and if he intended to claim as owner regardless of the true boundary, or knowing that he was a trespasser, that was in bad faith and likewise fatal to his title. It is obvious that the only sensible, safe, and really equitable rule is to make the physical characteristics of possession—excluding all other persons—the sole test of adverse possession, and so it was written in the Code. It has been lost sight of at times. Experience has demonstrated, clearer and clearer as time has progressed and the importance of stability of titles has grown with increase in value of property, the wisdom of the Code makers in incorporating into their work the simple test of adverse possession indicated."

IV. Agreements and joint building of fences.

a. General rule.

It is a general rule that an agreement upon a disputed or uncertain boundary line, followed by possession for the limitation period, will prevent either party from disputing the location of the line. Ivey v. Cowart, 124 Ga. 159, 110 Am. St. Rep. 160, 52 S. E. 436; Kincaid v. Vickers, 217 Ill. 423, 75 N. E. 527; Tritt v. Hoover, 116 Mich. 4, 74 N. W. 177; Ries v. Wolf, 9 Ohio C. D. 255; Gist v. Doke, 42 Or. 225, 70 Pac. 704. See also Dunnigan v. Wood, — Or. —, 112 Pac. 531, where, however, it 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) seemed probable that the line occupied was the correct original line.

In Kitchen v. Chantland, 130 Iowa, 618, 105 N. W. 367, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 81, the court said: "The rule of law is well settled that if there be doubt or uncertainty, or a dispute as to the true location of a boundary line, the parties may by parol fix a line which will, at least, when followed by possession with reference to the boundary so fixed, be conclusive upon them, although the possession may not have been for the full statutory period."

Where an owner built a stone wall partly on his own land and partly on his neighbor's land, and there was evidence that there was a parol understanding that they would give and take land, the court stated that no title would pass by the mere force of such an agreement; "but an occupation according to the line thus adopted, if adverse and under a claim of right, and if sufficiently long continued, would effect a change of title." The kind of occupation to which the court referred was that sufficient to make a title under the statute of limitations. Gray v. Kelley, 190 Mass. 184, 76 N. E. 724.

"When owners of contiguous parcels of land, the boundary line between which is uncertain and unfixed, by parol agreement mutually establish a dividing line, and thereafter use and occupy their respective tracts according to such line for a considerable period of time, particularly when they so act for a period longer than the statutory period of limitations, and for such period maintain a fence on the line, such line cannot afterwards be controverted by the parties or their successors in interest. . . . By the fixing of a boundary line neither party attempts to convey land to the other; but, the boundary line being uncertain, they simply agree that, under their deeds, their respective lands extend to a certain common dividing line; 'after their boundary line is fixed by consent, they hold up to it by virtue of their title deeds, and not by virtue of a parol transfer.'" Diersen v. Nelson, 138 Cal. 394, 71 Pac. 466.

See also to similar effect, Hess v. Rudder, equity, estop them from now claiming that the fence is not the true boundary.

It is unnecessary to consider whether the court erred in holding the survey void, for the reason that the judgment rests as well upon the findings of adverse possession by the plaintiff and acquiescence in the boundary line by the defendants. The latter is included in the general finding and is fully sustained by the evidence. This being an action to quiet title, the survey, however valid, cannot defeat the action. As held in Swarz v. Ramala, 63 Kan. 633, 66 Pac. 649, the title to real estate is not put in issue in a determination by the county surveyor of the true boundary line between two tracts of land. It was said in the opinion in that case: "Adverse possession may change the title to real property, but it cannot change the location of a quarter section line." Conversely, it may be said that a valid statutory survey may change the location of the boundary line between two tracts of land, but it cannot change the title to the land itself. Suppose that, at the time the survey was made, the plaintiff held an unrecorded deed conveying to him a perfect title to the strip of land in controversy. It would hardly be contended that his failure to appeal from the survey vested the title to this intervening strip of land in the defendants, or prevented the plaintiff from asserting title by his deed. Conceding its validity, the only effect of the survey is to determine the quantity of land which the defendants deprived themselves of by agreeing in their deed upon a different boundary, and their long acquiescence in that and the other boundaries, and by the adverse possession of the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

117 Ala. 525, 67 Am. St. Rep. 182, 23 So. 136; Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 634, 108 Pac. 707; Palmer v. Dosch, 148 Ind. 10, 47 N. E. 176 (both parties purchasing with the understanding that the fence in question marked the true boundary); Ernsting v. Gleason, 137 Mo. 594, 39 S. W. 70; Schwartz v. Gebhardt, 157 Mo. 99, 57 S. W. 782; Barnes v. Allison, 166 Mo. 96, 65 S. W. 781.

Where the parties as adjoining owners maintain the boundary division fence for thirty years, and the claim of one of them is that the land on his side of the fence belongs to him, his possession is adverse. Davis v. Waggoner, 42 Ind. App. 115, '83 N. W. 381, 84 N. E. 1105.

In Dyer v. Eldridge, 136 Ind. 654, 36 N. E. 522, the court said: "The law is that the location of a division boundary fence, acquiesced in and acted upon, and the premises improved up to the line by each, for twenty years, becomes binding as the true line."

Where parties purchase lots on a city street, enter, build a division fence on the supposed boundary, and each improves on his side of the fence for the period of the statute of limitations, he will not be ousted on a discovery that the line is a mistake. Thornely v. Andrews, 45 Wash. 413, 88 Pac. 757.

So, in Lindley v. Johnston, 42 Wash. 257, 84 Pac. 822, the court said: "We think it is well established that where two adjoining landowners locate a division line between their farms and jointly build a fence thereupon, believing it to be the correct line, when, as a matter of fact, it is not, and continue said fence as their boundary line continuously for twenty-four years, each continuously occupying, cultivating, and exercising exclusive control and dominion over the land up to said fence, that it must, in the absence of positive evidence to the contrary, be inferred that said line was located 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) and accepted by them pursuant to an agreement that it should be considered and treated as the division line."

In Peters v. Reichenbach, 114 Wis. 209, 90 N. W. 184, where it was held that the occupation must exist for the statutory period, the court said: "It is established that the building of a fence as a division line, if followed by undisturbed possession by both parties for more than twenty years, does not refute, but rather tends to establish, the adverse character of the holding, so that, if not overcome by other evidence, the statutory bar will establish ownership on each side of it, and it thereby becomes the true dividing line of ownership."

The principle that the statute of limitation will not begin to run in case of mistake until it is discovered by the party against whom the statute is invoked is inapplicable to a case where the statute is invoked against a party who purchased the land in 1884, and at whose instance the county surveyor ran out the lines of the survey, and made a mistake as to its boundaries which was not discovered until 1908. Paterson v. Rector, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 127 S. W. 561.

Even in Iowa prior to Miller v. Mills County, 111 Iowa, 654, 82 N. W. 1038, it was held that when each adjoining owner occupies up to a fence for over ten years with the understanding on both sides that the fence is the true boundary, their possession will be mutually adverse. Fullmer v. Beck, 105 Iowa, 517, 75 N. W. 366.

Foard v. McAnnelly, 215 Mo. 371, 114 S. W. 990, is an illustration of the class of cases where a question arises whether the agreement was as to the boundary, or whether it was an agreement to have a surveyor run a line for a fence; and it was held that there was no evidence for the jury that the parties agreed upon a boundary.

Some of the foregoing Missouri cases do not confine the reason of the decision to the fact that the agreement had continued for the statutory period, which does not seem to be necessary in Missouri. See Brummell v. Harris, 148 Mo. 430, 50 S. W. 93; Betts v. Brown, 3 Mo. App. 20. Agreements which have not existed for the statutory period are without the scope of this note.

b. Theory that mistake may be corrected.

In a few cases it has been held that where a boundary is agreed upon through mistake, the mistake may be rectified on discovery.

Thus it has been held that the placing of fences by mutual consent, in mistake as to the real boundary, neither gives nor destroys title. Frederick v. Brulard, 6 La. Ann. 382.

And that an erroneous location of a boundary by both parties, manifestly not in accordance with the title, and fixed in error, will not support prescription. Gaude v. Williams, 47 La. Ann. 1326, 17 So. 844.

In Randleman v. Taylor, 94 Ark. 511, 127 S. W. 723, it was held that where an erroneous line is agreed upon by mistake, the party, on discovery of the mistake, may have the same set aside unless there is some evidence of estoppel; and that it is only where the true line is not capable of or is difficult of ascertainment, and the boundary agreement is a settlement of a vexatious dispute, that the agreement is binding. It does not appear whether the agreement had existed for the period of the statute of limitations.

In Oldham v. Medearis, 90 Tex. 506, 39 S. W. 919, where it appeared that the parties had made a verbal partition many years before, and then had the line run out by the surveyor and there was a material mistake made by the surveyor in running such line, it was held that if the aggrieved party exercised due diligence in discovering the mistake in the partition of the land and the shortage in the land set apart to him, the statutes of limitation would not apply and run against an equitable suit to correct said mistake and repartition the land.

In Schraeder Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Packer, 129 U. S. 688, 32 L. ed. 760, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 385, the court distinguishes between a mutual undertaking to adjust a doubtful and disputed dividing line and the mistaken marking of a boundary where there is no known conflict, and says: "The decisions . . . generally support the rule that owners of adjacent tracts of land are not bound by consent to a boundary which has been defined under a mistaken apprehension that it is the true line, each claiming only the true line, wherever it may be found, and that in such case neither party is precluded or estopped from claiming his own rights under the true one, when it is discovered."

c. Agreement to move fence.

Where the parties build or leave a fence, agreeing to put it on the true line when ascertained, they do not hold against the true line. Quinn v. Windmiller, 67 Cal. 461, 8 Pac. 14; Peters v. Gracia, 110 Cal. 89, 42 Pac. 455; Smith v. Roberts, — Cal. —, 9 Pac. 104; Pugh v. Schindler, 127 Mich. 191, 86 N. W. 515; Clark v. Thornburg, 66 Neb. 717, 92 N. W. 1056; Lowe v. Cunningham, — Tenn. —, 39 S. W. 1052; Thompson v. Slater, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 34 S. W. 357; Schaubach v. Dilleuth, 108 Va. 86, 60 S. E. 745, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 825; Clinchfield Coal Co. v. Viers, 111 Va. 261, 68 S. E. 976; Phinney v. Campbell, 16 Wash. 203, 47 Pac. 502.

If the agreement is to hold the land until the true boundary is ascertained, adverse possession does not begin until the agreement is repudiated or the true line ascertained. Crosby v. First Presby. Church, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 111, 99 S. W. 584.

But where a fence was on the same line for twenty-five years before the action, and twenty years before the action it was rebuilt by the defendant on the same line, and there was evidence that before the rebuilding it was agreed that when rebuilt it should be placed on the true line, it was held that the rebuilding was an entry by the defendant, and that his possession was adverse. Mielke v. Dodge, 135 Wis. 388, 115 N. W. 1099.

When the plaintiff's predecessor took from the defendants the following receipt: " . . . Received of W. G. Bender nineteen 50-100 dollars ($19.50), the same being for the one-half interest in 720 varas of wire fence situated between my land and the land belonging to the said Bender, . . . and for the consideration of the said payment the said Bender is to have the use of said fence as long as it shall last,"—and joined his fence to that mentioned in the receipt, and no question was made as to the boundary for sixteen years (the statute bar being ten years), it was held that a verdict must stand which disregarded evidence that Bender told the defendants, about the time of the receipt, that they could move the fence whenever they knew the true line. Mann v. Schueling, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 68 S. W. 292.

d. Location for convenience.

Holding part of a neighbor's land inside one's fence where the fence is left in its position for the convenience of the parties is not an adverse possession. West v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 59 Mo. 510; Reed v. Gilliam, 140 Ky. 824, 131 S. W. 1034.

It has been said that the mere fact that a man "has set back his fence for his own convenience cannot affect his right and vest the title to the land in another." Kron v. Daugherty, 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 163.

Where for convenience the dividing fence is built so as to avoid bushes and difficult places in a swamp, neither party will get adverse possession of the land. Small v. Hamlet, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 238, 68 S. W. 395.

V. Miscellaneous.

Where, twenty years after condemnation proceedings under which a railroad acquired a right of way, it complained that the report of the engineer in the condemnation proceedings did not give it as much land as was supposed, and it appeared that the contiguous owners had fixed their fences according to the engineer's report, and had occupied the land within those fences ever since, it was held that, the period of the statute of limitations having expired, the proprietors of the bounding lands owned their land within those fences free of any claim of the railroad. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Quinn, 94 Ky. 310, 22 S. W. 221.

When the jury were instructed that "the fact that the land on either side of the division line has changed hands since the fence was built would not render a possession adverse as to the subsequent owners which was not adverse as between the parties who built the fence. The situation would remain the same as between subsequent owners, no matter how many times it might be conveyed, unless some acts were done or notice given by the subsequent possessors to change the character of the possession from a permissive to an adverse one," the appellate court, in criticizing the instruction, said: "If a grantee of Mr. Hopkins was informed at the time he made his purchase that the land he bought included all the land inclosed by the fence, and he entered into its occupancy without any knowledge that Mr. Hopkins's occupancy was permissive, and with the belief that he was the owner of the land, and with the intent to occupy as an owner, his intention to claim the land might thus be shown; and, if the occupancy in all other respects met the requirements of an adverse occupancy for the requisite time to acquire title, we think it would be sufficient." Pugh v. Schindler, 127 Mich. 191, 86 N. W. 515.

Where a purchaser of lots 1 and 2 attempted by measurement with a pole to locate the boundaries, and, supposing that he had done so, he built a fence on the lines so located, which fence, however, in fact only included parts of lots 1 and 2, but did include all of lot 3 and part of lot 4, the court said: "While it is true that Taylor originally made a mistake in fixing the lines, and by reason thereof unintentionally entered into the possession of lot 3 and part of lot 4, it is nevertheless apparent from the evidence that his possession thus obtained was immediately followed by a claim of right to the land: that he and his grantees erected a dwelling house and other buildings; that they planted fruit trees and otherwise improved the place; that each of the subsequent purchasers, before buying, went upon the property, saw the inclosure and improvements, intended to acquire the identical land so inclosed and improved, and that their mistake was not as to the particular land claimed or purchased, but as to its true description. These acts, which continued without interruption for a period of more than ten years, and until the commencement of this action, certainly evinced an assertion of permanent proprietorship on the part of respondents and all of their grantors, . . . and constituted notice to the real owners." McCormick v. Sorenson, 58 Wash. 107, 107 Pac. 1055.

It has been held in Iowa that the fact that the public, in the use of a highway, by mistake actually traveled several feet away from the record lines of the highway as legally established, will not secure to the public a right as against the landowner, as the use does not correspond with the claim of right. State v. Welpton, 34 Iowa, 144; State v. Schilb, 47 Iowa, 611.

Conversely, the owner will not, by mistake, obtain by possession the right to hold lands in the highway, as he will not hold adversely. Bolton v. McShane, 79 Iowa, 26, 44 N. W. 211.

Where there has been no actual possession up to any definite line, and no proof of acquiescence in a boundary, there has been no adverse possession to give title beyond the true line. Liddle v. Blake, 131 Iowa, 165, 105 N. W. 649.

In Gordon v. Booker, 97 Cal. 586, 32 Pac. 593, where the defendant testified that the strip of land in controversy had been lying open, unfenced and uncultivated, and that he never claimed anything except what was actually embraced on his side of the line, the location of which was in controversy, it was held that there could be no constructive possession beyond the true line under the circumstances.

In a case where the defendant's grantor had built a fence which excluded some of his timber land, and maintained it for fifty years, the court said: "It was uncleared land, and if the plaintiff sometimes trespassed upon it to take timber, the verdict proves that he had no such possession of it as would be title under the statute of limitations. . . . So long as there is no actual entry and ouster, a man is constructively in possession of all the lands his titles cover, wherever his fences may be built." Potts v. Everhart, 26 Pa. 493.

"What constitutes adverse possession is for the court to determine; but the facts which establish it are for the jury, and the question of the character of the possession is generally submitted to them. Gross v. Welwood, 90 N. Y. 638." Ayers v. Reidel, 84 Wis. 276, 54 N. W. 588.

NEVADA SUPREME COURT.

RE WILLIAM H. SCHNITZER.

(— Nev. —, 112 Pac. 848.)

Attorney — disbarment — advertising for divorce case.

1. Publishing advertisements in other states, and sending pamphlets there, for the purpose of attracting their citizens to the state for the purpose of instituting divorce proceedings in its courts, and giving employment to the one doing the advertising, is misconduct on the part of an attorney within the meaning of a statute permitting his disbarment or suspension therefor.

Same — ceasing to offend — effect.

2. Ceasing advertising for divorce business among nonresidents upon complaint of the bar association may, in case of a first delinquency, be ground for leniency on the part of the court in fixing punishment therefor.

PETITION for the disbarment of an attorney at law. Judgment of suspension.

Statement Per Curiam:

The respondent, William H. Schnitzer, was admitted to practise in all the courts of this state upon the 18th day of January, 1907, upon motion based upon a license to practise in the courts of the state of New York, and upon a showing of good moral character. Respondent filed a demurrer to the petition filed by the Reno Bar Association, praying for his disbarment, which was overruled, whereupon he interposed an answer. The main facts upon which the petition is based are not denied, but certain allegations in the petition based upon such facts are denied.

The following are the principal facts upon which the proceeding is based:

Prior to the institution of these proceedings, the respondent caused to be published in the programs of the Orpheum Theater of San Francisco advertisements reading as follows:

Upon certain days during the month of April, 1909, the respondent caused to be inserted in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle of Brooklyn, New York, and in the Washington Post of Washington, District of Columbia, newspapers of large circulation, the following advertisement: "Divorce Laws of Nevada. Complete Information Mailed Free by Attorney William K. Shafer, Reno, Nevada." The "W. Shafer" and the "William K. Shafer" mentioned in the foregoing advertisements were intended for a certain William B. Shafer, who for a time was in the office of the respondent, but who was not an attorney of this court.

In January, 1909, the respondent pub-

Note.—Advertising as ground of disbarment.

The early cases upon the question of advertising as a ground of disbarment are gathered in the note to Ingersoll v. Coal Creek Coal Co. 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 282, and the present note includes only the cases which have passed upon the question since the writing of that note.

In People ex rel. Deneen v. Smith, 200 Ill. 442, 93 Am. St. Rep. 206, 66 N. E. 27, it was held that the insertion by an attorney in a newspaper of an advertisement reading, "Loyal, wealthy attorney guarantees family freedom in a month; no advance costs; witnesses quietly volunteered," violated an act 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

punishing the offense of advertising for divorces, and showed such a lack of good moral character and such unfitness for the practice of law as to justify his disbarment.

In Re Wilson, 79 Kan. 450, 100 Pac. 75, it was held a cause for disbarment, for attorneys to carry on a scheme to defraud under the disguise of doing a real estate business, the scheme being carried out by advertising extensively that they had numerous correspondents in many places, and that they could sell real estate wherever located, and in charging a fee for each tract listed, and in thereafter making little or no effect to sell the property listed.

lished a twenty-four-page pamphlet for general distribution, the title page of which reads:

DIVORCE PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE.

Under the Laws of the State of Nevada, with Notes and Decisions.

Compiled and Digested by WILLIAM H. SCHNITZER of the Nevada Bar.

Published at Reno, Nevada,
January, 1909.

The preface to the pamphlet reads:

"Preface.

"The purpose of this treatise is to briefly, tersely, concisely, and clearly present to the reader the divorce practice and procedure under the laws of the state of Nevada.

"While the laws of the eastern and middle west states generally contain some provision for the dissolution of the marriage tie, it is obvious to the reader that in cases where extreme cruelty, desertion, and neglect to provide form the basis of the grievance, the law in such states offers no substantial relief to the aggrieved party, because the requirements of proof, duration of offense, corroboration of plaintiff, and procedure under court rules, are so exacting and irksome that the desired relief sought by applicant is rendered impossible of attainment.

"Summing up the situation as it exists in the eastern states, respecting the domestic relation law, the client, when consulting local counsel, is almost invariably advised that upon the facts submitted he or she is without remedy.

"Here, in Nevada, the applicant, without deception or fraud, upon almost any charge from which lack of harmonious relations may be reasonably inferred, may apply to our courts and secure prompt results by decree of absolute divorce, valid and binding in law. The next few pages will contain the statutes of Nevada applicable, together with a brief interpretation supported by supreme court decisions, clearly indicating the superior advantages afforded applicant under the law and procedure of Nevada.

"William H. Schnitzer."

The pamphlet is divided into subjects under the following headlines: "Divorce Statutes." "Causes." "Cruelty as Interpreted by Judicial Decisions." "Residence." "Summons and Service; How Made Upon Defendant." "Service of Non-Resident by Publication." "Appearance of Defendant." "Testimony and Hearings Before the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Court." "Alimony and Custody and Support of Children." "Decree of Divorce Shall Provide." "The City of Reno, Nevada." "Summary." "Your Selection of Lawyer." "My References."

Without setting forth a copy of the pamphlet in full, the following extracts will serve to show its general import:

"Residence.

"Under the provisions of § 22 of the marriage and divorce act, the plaintiff must reside in the state for a period of at least six months. This is not construed to mean that, in order to fully comply with the statute, party must remain here continuously for said period. So, if a party comes to Nevada, and in good faith takes up a residence, party may leave the state at any time after establishing residence, may go and travel when and wherever party chooses, and may return to the state whenever inclination prompts, and yet, such temporary absence would not in anywise affect the legality of the residence established, but party would be entitled, under the law, to bring suit any time after the lapse of six months from the date residence was originally established, notwithstanding party's absence from the state during said period.

"Upon a careful reading of § 22 (page 5) the reader will note several exceptions to the rule requiring a residence in the state of six months, viz.: In any case where the defendant may be found or may reside within the state. The residence of the plaintiff is immaterial, and it is not necessary to prove any period of residence on the part of plaintiff; so, in cases where defendant is willing to facilitate the plaintiff, and will come to Nevada and remain here long enough to enable plaintiff to procure the service of the summons on defendant personally within the state, then, in that case, suit may be filed at once, regardless of the duration of plaintiff's residence here, and under such circumstances the court will acquire complete jurisdiction."

"Appearance of Defendant.

"A defendant shall be deemed to appear in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives the plaintiff or her attorneys written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him.

"Compiled Laws of Nevada, § 3594.

"A voluntary appearance of defendant shall be equivalent to personal service of summons upon him.

"Compiled Laws of Nevada, § 3130.

"In many cases the voluntary appearance of defendant may be procured, thereby saving the time and avoiding the tedious delays incident to service of process and proofs of service. To that end I am in position to recommend to my clients the names of reputable attorneys in the state, who, upon written instructions from defendant, will enter an appearance in his or her behalf, which practice is frequently resorted to for the purpose of bringing the main issue speedily before the court."

"Testimony and Hearings Before the Court.

"After the completion of the service of the summons upon the defendant as herein set forth, and his time to appear for answer has expired, the plaintiff may at once proceed with hearing before the court. Our courts are always in session to hear testimony in uncontested divorce proceedings, and the hearing can be set for any day, on motion of counsel. In all such cases where there is no real contest, the oral testimony of plaintiff, without corroborative testimony (usually required in other states), before the judge in private chambers, in support of the allegations of the complaint, is deemed sufficient.

"This rule of practice is in line with the provisions of § 26 of the domestic relation act, Laws of Nevada."

"The City of Reno, Nevada.

"Important questions that will appeal to many before deciding to leave their present domicil, and coming to this western country, are: What sort of a place is Nevada with respect to climate, comfort, and convenience of life, and opportunity of engaging in business, or securing lucrative employment?

"To fully cover this ground, and to do justice to the grandeur and industrial enterprises of this great—greatest—mineral state, would alone require a volume. I will only reply briefly and tersely to these interrogatories, and for further and more complete information on the subject will be pleased to reply by letter to special inquiry.

"Reno, the commercial metropolis of Nevada, is beautifully situated on the Truckee river, at an elevation of 4,495 feet above sea level, and is on the main line of the Southern Pacific Railroad, overlooking the majestic Sierra Nevada mountains, and is just 26 miles easterly from the borders of California; just two hours' ride from Lake Tahoe, the most beautiful and picturesque lake in America, and the mecca of society and fashion; the climate is dry, healthy, and invigorating; is especially favorable to the treatment of bronchial and pulmonary troubles; there are no sudden extremes of heat and cold.

has public library, seven churches of all religious denominations, five banks with combined deposits of over $6,000,000, three theaters, four modern up-to-date fire-proof hotels, 6½ miles of street railway operated through the leading streets, beautiful public and office buildings, and magnificent homes.

"The cost of living in Nevada, all things being considered, is as low as any part of the country, and employment in all branches of labor is readily obtained at good wages. Steady and industrious mechanics should experience no difficulty in securing employment at a high rate of wages."

"Summary.

"Summarizing all that has been herein submitted to the reader, and as sound reasons why the greatest advantages and facilities are afforded under the law and practice of Nevada, to those seeking speedy release from the marital relations, we submit as follows:

"1. The shortest period of residence, viz., six months.

"2. In special instances, when defendant may be found in the state, suit may be filed at once without a delay of six months.

"3. The great number of grounds, viz., seven distinct and separate grounds.

"4. The simplest and least difficult grounds to prove: (Reading carefully citations under subdivision of 'Cruelty').

"5. No delays after time for defendant to answer has expired, our courts being always in session to hear testimony in uncontested cases.

"6. Under the charge of extreme cruelty, plaintiff may allege and prove any facts or acts producing mental anguish and threatening health.

"7. Under the practice of our courts, where no real contest exists, parties are not subject to embarrassing cross-examinations.

"8. In all uncontested cases parties may, on application of counsel, have hearings conducted in private chambers of the judge, and thereby avoid embarrassing publicity and exposure to the public.

"9. Unlike the practice and rule in most states, the sole testimony of plaintiff, without corroborative proofs, is sufficient to establish the allegations of the complaint in all undefended actions.

"10. A decree absolute is granted immediately, after proofs are submitted, so that party receiving same may marry again at once, and is not obliged to wait for any period thereafter, as is the law in many states.

"11. Here in Nevada, we have up-to-date cities where one may enjoy all the comforts, conveniences, and luxuries of an eastern metropolis, and may indulge in little journeys into the adjoining state, California, which is justly styled the land of 'sunshine and flowers.'"

"Your Selection of a Lawyer.

"Lastly, but most importantly, is the question for you to determine: Who shall I select as my attorney to conduct my proceedings? Naturally you want the best, the most skilful and reliable talent obtainable, one in whose judgment and advice you will place implicit confidence, before you incur the expense and time in traveling to this state to establish your new residence.

"It may sound somewhat boastful to shout my own praise, but under the circumstances it is necessary that I tell you frankly who I am, and how I stand in this community.

"The writer has had twenty years' experience in the actual practice of the law at the New York and Nevada bar. I pride myself in being able to state, with perfect frankness and candor, that during the three years of active practice at the Nevada bar I have earned and won the friendship, respect, and esteem of my colleagues at the bar and the judges on the bench.

"I have made it a rule of my conduct to always make my word good and deal on the square with everybody. I am a member of the executive committee of the state Democratic organization.

"A sense of modesty impels the writer to refrain from further self-aggrandizement; but with the consciousness of my own record in this commonwealth, and with a full realization that those who know me will be willing to say a kind word for me, and will testify to my good reputation and high standing, I unhesitatingly submit to the inquirer a few of my references."

Under the heading of "My References," the respondent appends the names of judges, a United States Senator, the acting governor of the state, attorneys, editors, and prominent business men of the state, at least one of whom is shown to have repudiated the use of his name in such manner.

The concluding page of the pamphlet reads as follows:

Twenty years' active experience in commercial litigation and practice.

Per Curiam:

That the purpose of the pamphlet published by respondent was to attract persons residing outside the state of Nevada, and citizens of other states and countries, to come to this state for the ultimate purpose of applying to its courts for divorce, through the agency of the respondent as an attorney, in order that he might profit financially thereby, is too manifest to require other than the bare statement. That the object of the advertisements quoted was to extend the circulation of the pamphlet is equally obvious. This method of advertising is highly reprehensible and contrary to the ethics of the legal profession, as universally recognized. Even if statements contained in the pamphlet were not open to question, either as to fact or law, nevertheless the purpose for which the pamphlet was issued and the advertisements published merits a severe rebuke. The pamphlet, however, contains statements that, to say the least, are misleading. It is not true that the laws of this state permit a divorce "upon almost any charge from which lack of harmonious relations may be reasonably inferred." It is not true that the testimony of the plaintiff in a divorce case, whether or not there be a "real contest," can be heard "before the judge in private chambers." The testimony in divorce proceedings must be before the court. An action for the dissolution of the bonds of matrimony, whether contested or not, is not a proceeding that a judge can hear in chambers. Even if we were to accept the explanation of respondent, that he only intended to convey the information that in uncontested cases the court could hold sessions in the private chambers of the judge, nevertheless that would not be the meaning which the layman would naturally place upon the language used.

Petitioners have attacked the correctness of a number of statements contained in respondent's pamphlet as to the law of this state upon the subject of divorce; but we do not deem it essential in this proceeding to determine these questions. It would be sufficient to rest our condemnation of the conduct of the respondent upon the pamphlet and advertisements, upon a bare recital of the same without comment. They speak for themselves; and are unworthy the high calling that respondent has followed, as he says, for twenty years. The courts of Nevada were established and are maintained for the protection of her citizens, and citizens of other states and countries having dealings with the citizens of this state. An attorney who, for purposes of personal gain, seeks to make the courts of this state a clearing house for the domestic woes, real or imaginary, of the country at large, is certainly guilty of misconduct. Comp. Laws, § 2625; People ex rel. Maupin v. MacCabe, 18 Colo. 186, 19 L.R.A. 231, 36 Am. St. Rep. 270, 32 Pac. 280; People ex rel. Colorado Bar Assn. v. Taylor, 32 Colo. 250, 75 Pac. 914; Ingersoll v. Coal Creek Coal Co. 117 Tenn. 263, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 282, 295, 119 Am. St. Rep. 1003, 98 S. W. 178, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 829; People ex rel. Moses v. Goodrich, 79 Ill. 148; 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 911.

In People ex rel. Maupin v. MacCabe, supra, the supreme court of Colorado, by Mr. Justice Elliott, said: "The ethics of the legal profession forbid that an attorney should advertise his talents or his skill as a shopkeeper advertises his wares. An attorney may properly accept a retainer for the prosecution or defense of an action for divorce, when convinced that his client has a good cause. But for anyone to invite or encourage such litigation is most reprehensible. The marriage relation is too sacred; it affects too deeply the happiness of the family, it concerns too intimately the welfare of society; it lies too near the foundation of all good government,—to be broken up or disturbed for slight or transient causes. In the present case we are not called upon to deal with a matter of ordinary advertising, but with a peculiar kind of advertising. Respondent did not advertise for business openly, giving his name and office address. His advertisement was anonymous, and well calculated to encourage people to make application for divorces who might otherwise have refrained from so doing. When a lawyer advertises that divorces can be legally obtained very quietly, and that such divorces will be good everywhere, such advertisement is a strong inducement, a powerful temptation, to many persons to apply for divorces who would otherwise be deterred from taking such a step from a wholesome fear of public opinion. . . . The advertisement published by respondent, to the effect that divorces could be legally obtained very quietly which should be good everywhere, was the more mischievous because anonymous. Such an advertisement is against good morals, public and private; it is a false representation and a libel upon the courts of justice. Divorces cannot be legally obtained very quietly which shall be good anywhere. To say that divorces can be obtained very quietly is equivalent to saying that they can be obtained without publicity. Every lawyer knows that to obtain a legal divorce a public record must be made of the proceeding; the complaint must be filed; the summons must issue; process must be served upon the defendant either personally or by publication in a public newspaper; proof must also be taken; and a decree must be publicly rendered by the court having jurisdiction of the proceeding. All these public proceedings the statute imperatively requires, and for a lawyer, by an advertisement, to indicate that such public proceedings can or will be dispensed with by the courts having jurisdiction of such cases is a libel upon the integrity of the judiciary that cannot be overlooked when brought to our notice.

"In the case of People ex rel. Skelton v. Brown, 17 Colo. 431, 30 Pac. 338, this court said: 'When this court grants a license to a person to practise law, the public, and every individual coming in contact with the licensee in his professional capacity, have a right to expect that he will demean himself with scrupulous propriety, as one commissioned to a high and honorable office. A person enjoying the rights and privileges of an attorney and counselor at law must also respect the duties and obligations of the position.'

"The case of People ex rel. Moses v. Goodrich, 79 Ill. 148, was a disbarment proceeding under statutes from which ours were undoubtedly borrowed. Among other things, the complaint against Goodrich set forth that he had published advertisements without signature, representing that he could procure divorces without publicity, and by such advertisements solicited business of that character by communication through a particular postoffice box. The Goodrich Case, though similar to the one before us, was more aggravated in some respects. Mr. Justice Breese, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'This court, having power by express law to grant a license to practise law, has an inherent right to see that the license is not abused, or perverted to a use not contemplated in the grant. In granting the license, it was on the implied understanding that the party receiving it should, at all times, demean himself in a proper manner, and, if not reflecting honor upon the court appointing him, by his professional conduct, he would at least abstain from such practices as could not fail to bring discredit upon himself and the courts.

. . . The morale of defendant's professional conduct deserves special notice. He makes divorce cases a specialty. How many persons in our broad land weary of the chain that binds them? How many are eager to seize upon the slightest twig that may appear to aid them in escaping from a supposed sea of troubles in which wedded life has immersed them? How many are fretting under imaginary ills and what better devices than those practised by this defendant could be contrived to increase these disquietudes, and stimulate to effort, by perjury if need be, to free themselves from their supposed unhappy condition? Is it desirable that divorce cases should accumulate in our courts? If so, the defendant is justified in the means he has used, and is using, to that end. An honorable, high-toned lawyer will always aid a deserving party seeking a divorce, as coming strictly within his professional duties. He will render the aid, not solicit the case; and he will, in all things regarding it, act the man, and respect not only his own professional reputation, but the character of the courts, and discharge the unpleasant duty in all respects as an honorable attorney and counselor should do."

While this proceeding presents to the court a situation demanding punitive action, and while the higher interests of the public must not be underestimated, the effect upon the respondent of any action by this court must not be lost sight of, and should be given impartial consideration. An attorney is required to spend years in preparation for the practice of his profession, and this, together with his years of experience, is very often his greatest asset.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Ex parte Burr, 9 Wheat. 529, 6 L. ed. 152, covered the situation fully in the following apt words: "On the one hand, the profession of an attorney is of great importance to an individual, and the prosperity of his whole life may depend on its exercise. The right to exercise it ought not to be lightly or capriciously taken from him. On the other, it is extremely desirable that the respectability of the bar should be maintained, and that its harmony with the bench should be preserved. For these objects, some controlling power, some discretion, ought to reside in the court. This discretion ought to be exercised with great moderation and judgment; but it must be exercised; and no other tribunal can decide, in a case of removal from the bar, with the same means of information as the court itself."

As some extenuation of the respondent's unprofessional conduct, it appears that when the bar association of Reno called his attention to the fact that his methods of advertising were condemned by the association, he discontinued the objectionable advertising in newspapers and theater programs, and has since refrained from the same. As this is the first case of this character that has been brought to the attention of this court, we are disposed to be lenient with the respondent.

It is ordered that the respondent be, and he hereby is, suspended from the practice of the law for a period of eight months, and until further order of this court, and that he pay the costs of this proceeding.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, Resp't.,

v.

C. T. EAID, Appt.

(55 Wash. 302, 104 Pac. 275.)

Indictment — common law — statutory crime.

1. A common-law indictment for perjury is sufficient to support a conviction for the statutory crime, where the common law and statutory crimes are substantially the same.

Same — sufficiency.

2. An indictment for perjury is sufficient which sets forth the substance of the controversy in which the crime was committed, in what court the oath alleged to be false

Note. — Sufficiency of common-law indictment for perjury to support conviction for a similar statutory offense.

Since all that an indictment for perjury is required to do is to describe the offense with such reasonable certainty as to appraise the accused of the offense for which he is sought to be punished, and to state everything necessary to constitute the offense with certainty, it would seem that where the statute is merely declaratory of the common-law crime, and substantially the same, there would, as is stated in STATE v. EAID, be no reason why a common-law indictment for perjury would not support a conviction for the corresponding statutory offense. On the other hand, if the statute uses technical words to describe the offense, or if the statutory differs from the common-law crime, the common-law indictment might not be sufficient. It certainly would not where the crimes differed in essential elements, and where technical words are used in the statute it might be necessary to follow strictly the statute in order to fully and certainly describe the statutory was taken, and that such court had authority to administer the oath, with proper allegations of the falsity of the matter on which the perjury is assigned.

Same — duplicity — election.

3. The state need not be required to elect on which charge it will rely under an indictment for perjury charging false testimony that accused did not know of the execution of a contract, and that a named person claimed to be the owner of a specified piece of machinery.

Evidence — perjury — interest of witnesses.

4. One on trial for perjury alleged to have been committed in a civil action, the parties to which are witnesses against him, may show the status of such action for the purpose of showing that such parties would profit by his conviction, because the action is still pending and his conviction would render him incompetent to testify in it.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Thurston County convicting him of perjury. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Hoshor, for appellant:

As the statute has changed the common-law definition of perjury, it must be followed strictly in pleading.

2 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. 4th ed. § 925(2); State v. Smith, 3 Wash. 14, 27 Pac. 1028; State v. Morse, 1 G. Greene, 503; State v. Guse, 21 Wash. 269, 57 Pac. 831.

The court erred in denying defendant's motion to have the two charges in the indictment separated.

Wharton, Crim. Pl. & Pr. 4th ed. § 243; Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 442(4); People v. Cooper, 53 Cal. 647; State v. Bliss, 27 Wash. 464, 68 Pac. 87; State v. Snider, 32 Wash. 299, 73 Pac. 355.

The interest and feeling of a witness are always material elements to be considered by the jury in weighing his testimony, and the same may be shown by cross-examination or by other evidence.

offense, especially if other terms could not be substituted for the technical terms which would exactly express their meaning.

The rule that a common-law indictment for perjury will not support a conviction for the statutory offense where technical terms are used in the statute is well illustrated by the case of Allen v. State, 42 Tex. 12, where it is held that an indictment for perjury sufficient at common law was not good under the Texas Code, under which the statement upon which the perjury was assigned must be averred as having been "deliberately and wilfully" made.

30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1088; People v. Gregory, 120 Cal. 16, 52 Pac. 41; Beck v. Hood, 185 Pa. 32, 39 Atl. 842; Dillon v. Folsom, 5 Wash. 439, 32 Pac. 216; Stowe v. La Conner Trading & Transp. Co. 39 Wash. 28, 80 Pac. 856, 81 Pac. 97; State v. Griffin, 43 Wash. 591, 86 Pac. 951, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 95.

The allegations in the indictment are not sufficiently direct, positive, and certain as to the crime charged, and do not specify with sufficient particularity the acts and circumstances necessary to constitute the crime of perjury.

Leonard v. Territory, 2 Wash. Terr. 381, 7 Pac. 872.

Mr. John M. Wilson for respondent.

Rudkin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was convicted of the crime of perjury, and the present appeal is prosecuted from the final judgment and sentence of the court. A demurrer interposed to the indictment was overruled, and upon this ruling the first error is assigned.

The charging part of the indictment, so far as material to the present inquiry, is in these words: ". . . And whether or not the said C. T. Eaid was aware of and knew on the 21st day of October, 1907, and subsequently thereto knew, that one E. T. Young was the owner, or claimed to be the owner, of a certain donkey engine mentioned and set forth and described in the said contract, and the said witness, C. T. Eaid, did then and there upon his oath taken as aforesaid in the said cause, feloniously, wilfully, falsely, and corruptly and knowingly, and contrary to such oath, depose and swear, among other things, in substance, to the effect following, that is to say, that he, the said witness, C. T. Eaid, did not know of the prior execution of the said contract on or about October 21, 1907, and did not know that the said E. T. Young was the owner, or claimed to be the owner, of the said donkey logging engine, together with float and appurtenances, set forth in the said instrument in writing, to wit, the said contract sufficient where the common law and statutory crimes are not substantially the same is shown by Wile v. State, 60 Miss. 260, wherein it was held that the statutory provision that when any act is criminal, both by statute and at common law, it may be set out in an indictment in either the statutory or the common-law form, does not apply where the act charged as perjury is a misdemeanor at common law, and a felony by statute, it being further held that in such case the indictment must aver the statutory crime by charging that the act was done feloniously. See also State v. Morse, 1 G. Greene, 503. G. J. C.

hereinabove set forth on or about October 21, 1907, whereas in truth and fact the said witness, C. T. Eaid, did know of the prior execution of the said instrument and contract in writing on or about October 21, 1907, and was present at the time and place when the said instrument in writing and contract was signed and executed, and did actively participate and take part in the preparation and execution thereof, and did know at the said time of the execution of the said contract, to wit, on the 21st day of October, 1907, that the said E. T. Young was the owner, and claimed to be the owner, of the donkey logging engine, with float and appurtenances, as set forth and described in the said instrument in writing, and that the said witness, C. T. Eaid, feloniously, wilfully, falsely, and corruptly and knowingly, contrary to the said oath as aforesaid, in the manner and form as aforesaid, did then and there commit the crime of perjury, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Washington." The particular objection urged in support of the demurrer is that the indictment fails to charge that the appellant stated as true the facts or matters upon which the perjury was assigned. Section 7185, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes (Pierce's Code, § 1695), defines the crime of perjury as follows: "Every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly before any competent tribunal, officer, or person in any of the cases in which such an oath may by law be administered, wilfully and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury." The requisites of an indictment or information for perjury are thus stated: "In an indictment or information for perjury, or subornation of perjury, it is sufficient to set forth the substance of the controversy or matter in respect to which the crime was committed, and in what court or before whom the oath alleged to be false was taken, and that the court or person before whom it was taken had authority to administer it, with proper allegations of the falsity of the matter on which the perjury is assigned; but the indictment or information need not set forth the pleadings, record, or proceedings with which the oath is connected, nor the commission or authority of the court or person before whom the perjury was committed." Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes § 6857 (Pierce's Code, § 2110). Other sections of the Code bearing on the question under consideration are the following: Section 6849 (§ 2102): "Words used in a statute to define a crime need not be strictly pursued in the indictment or information, but other words conveying the same meaning may be used." Section 6850 (§ 2103): "The indictment or information is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom. . . . (6) that the act or omission charged as the crime is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended; (7) [that] the act or omission charged as the crime is stated with such a degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon a conviction, according to the right of the case." Section 6851 (§ 2104): "No indictment or information is insufficient, nor can the trial, judgment, or other proceedings thereon be affected, by reason of any of the following matters, which were formerly deemed defects or imperfections: . . . (4) For any surplusage or repugnant allegation, or for any repetition, when there is sufficient matter alleged to indicate clearly the offense and the person charged; nor (5) for any other matter which was formerly deemed a defect or imperfection, but which does not tend to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the defendant upon the merits." Our statutory definition of perjury does not differ materially from the definitions found in Hawkins, Bacon, Blackstone, and other common-law writers. Blackstone defines it as "a crime committed when a lawful oath is administered in some judicial proceeding, to a person who swears wilfully, absolutely, and falsely in a matter material to the issue or point in question." 4 Cooley's Bl. Com. 137. See also 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 69, § 1; Bacon, Abr. title "Perjury."

There is, perhaps, this difference between perjury as defined by § 7185, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, and perjury at common law. Under the statute the testimony itself must be false, while the common law punished the taking of a false oath, and a person was guilty of perjury if he swore to a fact of which he knew nothing, whether it be true or false. Section 7191, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes (Pierce's Code, § 1701), provides that "an unqualified statement of that which one does not know to be true is equivalent to a statement of that which one knows to be false," and, when the two sections are construed together, the common law and statutory crimes are substantially, if not identically, the same. If so, we see no reason why a common-law indictment should not be good under the statute, and the indictment under consideration follows the approved common-law forms. See 2 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 1738; Bishop, Directions &

Forms, §§ 871 et seq., and authorities cited. Furthermore, the act or omission charged as a crime is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. The indictment sets forth the substance of the controversy in which the crime was committed, in what court the oath alleged to be false was taken, that the court before which the oath was taken had authority to administer it, with proper allegations of the falsity of the matter on which the perjury is assigned. This in our opinion satisfies all the requirements of the law. A doubt as to the sufficiency of an information charging the crime of perjury in almost the identical language of this indictment was suggested in State v. Guse, 21 Wash. 269, 57 Pac. 831, but the point was not decided, and further consideration convinces us that the doubt was not well grounded.

The indictment charged that the appellant testified that he did not know "of the prior execution of the said contract on or about October 21, 1907, and did not know that the said E. T. Young was the owner, or claimed to be the owner, of said donkey engine." At the commencement of the trial, the appellant moved the court to require the prosecution to elect upon which charge it would rely, but the motion was overruled, and, upon this ruling, the second error is assigned. "An indictment for perjury may embrace in a single count all the particulars in which defendant is alleged to have sworn falsely; but each fact sworn to should be stated in definite and separate assignments, and each traversed, so that, if either assignment is proved, the indictment may be sustained. If one assignment of perjury is sufficient, an improper assignment in connection with it will not vitiate the indictment. The fact that an indictment states two distinct false statements under oath does not render the indictment bad, if the statements were both given under one oath and in one proceeding." 30 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1439. There was no error in the ruling complained of.

The appellant at the trial offered to prove the status of the civil action in which the false testimony is alleged to have been given, but an objection interposed by the state was sustained. This ruling was erroneous and prejudicial. The defendants in the civil action were the principal witnesses against the appellant on the trial of the criminal prosecution. If the judgment appealed from is affirmed, the appellant is rendered incompetent to testify in the civil action or any other case, unless he shall receive a pardon. Ballinger's Anno. Codes & 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Statutes, § 5992 (Pierce's Code, § 938). The defendants in the civil action would profit by the conviction of the appellant to that extent, and it was clearly competent to show that fact, and to have the jury properly instructed as to the effect of the conviction. In practice a prosecution for perjury is frequently continued until the proceeding in which the perjury is alleged to have been committed is ended. 30 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1324. But, if not continued, and the parties to the pending civil action are witnesses against the accused on the trial of the criminal action, the accused has an unquestionable right to show that they will profit by his conviction. For some reason the civil cause had not been decided at the time of the trial of the present action,—perhaps because of the death of the presiding judge,—and the appellant was permitted to show that fact; but he had a right to go further, and show that the civil action was still pending and for trial.

Reversed and remanded.

THOMAS C. McRAE, Admr., etc., of Dozier
L. Boswell, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

L. M. WARMACK.

(— Ark. —, 135 S. W. 807.)

Life insurance — assignment to one paying premium — wager.

1. An agreement by which an uncle undertakes to pay the premiums on policies of insurance to be taken out by his nephew in his own name, and assigned to the uncle with the privilege of redeeming one of them,

Note. — Validity of assignment of interest in life insurance policy to one paying premiums.

This question is discussed in the note to Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Ellison, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 935, in which the earlier cases will be found collected. Since the preparation of that note it was held in Bendet v. Ellis, 120 Tenn. 277, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 114, 127 Am. St. Rep. 1000, 111 S. W. 795, that a contract whereby one of the parties thereto was to procure insurance on his life, and assign the same to the other parties, who had no insurable interest in the first party's life, and the assignees were to pay the premiums upon the policies, was invalid so far as it provided for an interest in the insurance in the assignees.

And even where the assured obtained a policy of insurance upon his life in good faith, and years after assigned the same to but the uncle to have one policy absolutely, and in case the nephew does not pay the premiums to have the proceeds of both upon the nephew's death, is void, and the uncle cannot compel the nephew's administrator to account for the proceeds of the policy after he has collected them.

Same — insurable interest — uncle and nephew.

2. An uncle has not, merely because of his relationship, an insurable interest in the life of his nephew.

Same — setting aside assignment — recovery of premiums.

3. One who has paid the premiums of an insurance policy upon another's life, under an agreement for an assignment of the policy, may, in case the assignment is annulled as contrary to public policy, recover the premiums paid.

APP^{EAL} by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Nevada County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the proceeds of a life insurance policy which had been collected by the administrator of the assured. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas C. McRae, W. V. Tompkins, and D. L. McRae, for appellant:

A policy issued to a beneficiary who has no insurable interest in the life of the assured is a wagering policy and void.

Martin, 2 Wall. 70, 17 L. ed. 732; Re T. H. Bunch Co. 180 Fed. 519.

Frauenthal, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action instituted by L. M. Warmack, the plaintiff below, to recover the proceeds of the collection of an insurance policy issued on the life of Dozier out without an insurable interest in his life, in consideration of the latter paying the premiums, it was held in Russell v. Grigsby, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 94 C. C. A. 61, 168 Fed. 577, and Evans v. Moore, 28 Ohio C. C. 1, that such an assignment was invalid, except to the extent of the money actually disbursed in the matter by the assignee.

So, in Smith v. Agnew, 137 Ky. 83, 122 S. W. 231, it was declared that the assignment of a policy of insurance, with an agreement that the assignee should pay the premiums, and out of the proceeds retain the amount so paid and one half or any other part of the surplus, was void "as a wagering and speculative contract of insurance."

In Sullivan v. Maloney, 76 N. J. Eq. 104, 73 Atl. 842, Vice Chancellor Garrison said that he found it unnecessary to consider or decide the validity of an assignment of an insurance policy to one not having an insurable interest in the life of the insured, with an agreement that the assignee pay the premiums, "because of my opinion with respect to the other point involved, which is dispositive of the case."

In Waters v. Kopp, 34 App. D. C. 575, the court upheld the assignment by a father to his daughter of a policy of insurance, upon her agreement to pay the premiums, no question, of course, being raised as to the assignee's insurable interest in the life of the assured.

In Woods v. Riner, — Ky. —, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 233, 113 S. W. 79, it was held that a policy taken out by a son on the life of his mother was not invalidated, so far as the rights of the son were concerned, by a contract with a cousin to pay a portion of the premiums and share in the proceeds of the policy.

J. A. C.

L. Boswell, by reason of an alleged assignment thereof by said Boswell to him. Upon the death of said Boswell, the company issuing the policy agreed to make payment thereof, but, the administrator of said Boswell and the plaintiff both claiming to be entitled to the payment, the company threatened to institute an action of interpleader, whereupon the parties agreed that payment of the policy might be made by it to the administrator without affecting any right that plaintiff might have thereto. The plaintiff then presented to the administrator his duly verified claim against the estate for $2,500, the amount of said policy, and instituted this suit for the recovery thereof against said administrator. The sole defenses made by the administrator against a recovery by plaintiff were (1) that the assignment of the policy by Boswell to plaintiff was invalid because it was in the nature of a wagering contract; and (2) that plaintiff had surrendered to Boswell prior to his death the policy and all his interest therein. Upon the trial of the case, the court held that the assignment of the policy to plaintiff was not in the nature of a wagering contract, but was valid, and submitted to the jury the sole question as to whether or not plaintiff had surrendered the policy and his interest therein to Boswell prior to his death. The jury answered said question in the negative, and thereupon the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for the full amount of $2,500.

The testimony relative to the issuance and assignment of the policy is practically undisputed, and presents the following case: In May, 1907, D. L. Boswell and plaintiff entered into a verbal contract whereby it was agreed that said Boswell should apply to the insurance company for two policies of $2,500 each upon his life, and that plaintiff should pay the two first premiums thereon, and take an assignment of the policies with an understanding that one of the policies should be payable to plaintiff and the other to the estate of Boswell upon his death. In pursuance of the agreement, application for the policies was made, and, upon the receipt thereof, the verbal agreement was reduced to writing, and is as follows:

This writing witnesses that Dozier L. Boswell, who has this day accepted from the State Mutual Life Insurance Company of Rome, Georgia, two policies of insurance Nos. 18,811 and 18,812, of $2,500 each, on his life for his estate does hereby assign unto Lawrence M. Warmack the above named and numbered policies. It also is 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

agreed that Lawrence M. Warmack shall pay the first and second premiums on the above named and numbered policies. It is further agreed that Dozier L. Boswell may release from this assignment policy Number 18,811 after two years, by assuming the payments of the annual premiums on both of the above named and numbered policies. It is also agreed that should Dozier L. Boswell fail to pay the third or any subsequent annual premium, policy No. 18,811 reverts back to Lawrence M. Warmack. It is also agreed that should the death of Dozier L. Boswell occur during the first two years after that time, while the policies are being sustained by the insured, then $2,500 of the insurance, or policy No. 18,811, will be payable to the estate of the insured only.

[Signed] D. L. Boswell.

[Signed] L. M. Warmack.

The policies were, on the receipt thereof, turned over by Boswell to plaintiff under the above written contract, and plaintiff paid the first two premiums on both policies, amounting to $262. Before the third premiums matured, Boswell died. Shortly before his death, the plaintiff turned over the policies to Boswell, in order, as he claimed, that Boswell might show them to his wife, and they remained in his possession until his death. It appears that plaintiff was the uncle of Boswell, but in no way dependent upon him, and upon the trial of the issue as to whether or not he had surrendered the policies to Boswell, there was some testimony indicating that Boswell was indebted to him, but the testimony as to the nature and extent of that indebtedness was not fully developed. It was only introduced for the purpose of showing whether or not the plaintiff had surrendered the policies, and released all his interest therein when he turned same over to Boswell.

It is urged by counsel for defendant that plaintiff had no insurable interest in the life of Boswell, and that the contract for the assignment of the policies to him was a mere wager by which he was directly interested, not in his life, but in his early death, and on this account such assignment was against public policy and invalid. The principle upon which life insurance is based is that one who has a reasonable expectation of benefits and advantage growing out of the continuance of the life of the assured has such an interest in his life that he may insure the same; but where one is not thus interested in the life of the assured, but by insuring such life is rather interested in his early death, the contract of insurance is a mere wager, and against a sound public policy. Such contracts, it has been thought, would, if upheld, result in a mere traffic in human life, and would lend a great incentive to one thus disinterested in the life, but interested in the death, of the assured, to shorten that life. It is therefore well settled that the issue of a policy to one who has no insurable interest in the life of the insured, but who pays the premiums for the chance of collecting the policy, is invalid because it is a wagering contract, and against a sound public policy. Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643, 21 L. ed. 244; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924; Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74, 49 Am. Rep. 570; Corson's Appeal, 113 Pa. 438, 57 Am. Rep. 479, 6 Atl. 213; Deal v. Hainley, 135 Mo. App. 507, 116 S. W. 1; Bromley v. Washington L. Ins. Co. 122 Ky. 402, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 747, 121 Am. Elison*, 72 Kan. 199, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 934, and note, (72 Kan. 199, 115 Am. St. Rep. 189, 83 Pac. 410, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 909); Ruse v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 23 N. Y. 516; 1 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 246. And for the same reason it has been held by the great weight of authority that the assignment of a policy of insurance to one having no insurable interest in the life of the insured, though issued to one having such insurable interest, will be ineffective and invalid if such assignment was made in pursuance of an agreement made at the time of the issuance of the policy. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924; Gordon v. Ware Nat. Bank, 67 L.R.A. 550, 65 C. C. A. 580, 132 Fed. 444. See also cases cited in 1 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 273. In the case of Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924, it is said: "The assignment of a policy to a party not having an insurable interest is as objectionable as the taking out of a policy in his name. . . . If there be any sound reason for holding a policy invalid when taken out by a party who has no interest in the life of the assured, it is difficult to see why that reason is not as cogent and operative against a party taking an assignment of a policy upon the life of a person in which he has no interest. The same ground which invalidates the one should invalidate the other." There are a great many respectable authorities which hold that a policy which is valid at its inception is assignable like any other chose in action, and one should be permitted to dispose of a valid policy of insurance effect in good faith upon his own life. See cases cited in Gordon v. Ware Nat. Bank, 67 L.R.A. 550, 132 Fed. 444, 65 C. C. A. 580, at page 583, and in 1 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 273. But even by these authorities it has been held that an assignment made in pursuance of an agreement to that effect at the time of the issuance of the policy, to one who has no insurable interest in the insured, and who agrees to pay the premiums, is tainted with a wagering element, and is invalid.

It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to discuss or determine the various relations and circumstances which will be sufficient to constitute an insurable interest in the life of another. It has been uniformly held that the relationship of uncle and nephew is not in itself sufficient to constitute such insurable interest, where there is no reasonable ground of expectation of support to be furnished by the assured to the other. 2 Joyce, Ins. § 1069; Corson's Appeal, 113 Pa. 438, 57 Am. Rep. 479, 6 Atl. 213; 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 705; Singleton v. St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co. 66 Mo. 63, 27 Am. Rep. 321; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Elison, 72 Kan. 199, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 934, 115 Am. St. Rep. 189, 83 Pac. 410, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 909. It was not claimed by plaintiff that he had any expectation of support being furnished him by Boswell, or that he was in any way dependent on him, nor can such a claim be gathered from the contract under which the assignment was made. The right to the policy, and the validity of the assignment thereof, must be determined by the contract under which it was made. The object and purpose of the assignment, and the consideration therefor, are plainly set forth in this contract. According to that agreement, the assignment was made not in consideration of any debt that Boswell owed to the plaintiff, nor for the purpose of insuring any interest that plaintiff had as a creditor in his life, nor to insure the benefit that he would receive from any support from him. As alleged in the complaint, the sole reason why this assignment was made was that Boswell concluded to have his life insured, but was unable to pay the premiums therefor, and, in order to get the plaintiff to pay the premiums on both policies, he agreed that plaintiff should receive the proceeds of one of the policies upon his death.

It is urged that Boswell effected these policies himself upon his own life, in which he had an insurable interest, and that the policies were therefore valid at their issuance; and, being valid at their inception, it is insisted by counsel for plaintiff that a valid assignment of the policies could be made to one, although he had no insurable interest in the life of the insured. But, according to this contract, at the very inception of the purpose to apply for the policies, and at and before the issuance thereof, it was agreed that this assignment should be made to plaintiff. The policies, it is true, were issued in the name of and to the assured, who had an insurable interest in his own life, but immediately upon their issuance they were assigned, pursuant to this previous agreement, to the plaintiff, who had no insurable interest in the life of the insured. As has been seen above, such an assignment is as ineffective and invalid as if the policies had been made payable to plaintiff at their execution. Nor do the terms of the agreement providing that one of the policies should go to Boswell's estate, and the other only to plaintiff, in consideration of the payment by plaintiff of the premiums on both policies, make this assignment any the less a wagering contract. West v. Sanders, 104 Ga. 727, 31 S. E. 619. As before stated, the theory and validity upon which a contract of life insurance is based is that the person to whom the policy is payable is interested in the continuance of the life of the insured, whether such policy is made payable to him at its issuance or becomes payable to him by assignment thereof. He must be so related to the assured that the continuance of the life of the assured will be an advantage to him. And it is this interest resulting from that benefit or advantage which he would lose by the death of the insured, that he is permitted to insure. Because the estate of the insured would receive the proceeds of one of these policies upon the death of Boswell did not make the plaintiff interested in the continuance of his life; nor did it make such an assignment valid because the assured received some consideration therefor. The plaintiff was no more interested in the continuance of the life of Boswell whether the assignment was made with or without price. His insurable interest in the life of Boswell could only be grounded upon his relation to him, pecuniary or of near kin, none of which he possessed. Without such insurable interest in Boswell's life, the plaintiff, by the above contract, simply agreed to pay the premiums of the policies upon the chance of making a profit upon the money thus invested. That profit would more quickly come to him by the early death of Boswell. By this contract he stood to make $2,500 upon the payment of two premiums, if Boswell did not outlive him. The contract for the assignment of these policies was in the nature of a mere wager, under the terms of which the plaintiff was directly interested in the early death of Boswell, rather than in the continuance of his life. The assignment was therefore contrary to public policy, and was invalid.

But the contract for the assignment of the policies was not designed for the purpose of perpetrating a fraud upon anyone, and its execution did not involve any moral turpitude, and the assignment made in pursuance thereof was not void for any of these reasons. The ground for holding the assignment invalid is that such a transaction is not only in the nature of a gaming contract, but that it is against public policy, because it creates an interest in the early death of the insured on the part of the assignee, who has no corresponding interest in his life. The speculative or gaming feature of the contract of assignment consists in the assignee obtaining the full payment of the policy solely on the advancement of the premiums, and with no further interest therein. If, therefore, this speculative feature of the transaction is eliminated, the reason for declaring such assignment invalid would cease. To the extent that the assured was actually indebted to the assignee, and to the extent that he advanced the premiums on the policies, the assignee had an actual interest therein. Above such sums only was the contract of assignment speculative. It was lawful for the plaintiff to advance the premiums on the policies as they became due to the company, and it was lawful for the assured to assign to plaintiff the policies as security for the payment of those advances and all indebtedness due by him to the plaintiff. By the reimbursement of plaintiff for these sums only, any feature of the contract of assignment which otherwise might be of a wagering nature or against public policy would be eliminated. The plaintiff would thereby receive only the debt that was actually due to him, and would not receive any profit based upon a wager on human life. In the case of Warnock v. Davis, supra, the court, in speaking of an assignment of a policy made to one who had no insurable interest in the life of the insured, but who paid the premiums thereon, said: "Although the agreement between the trust association and the assured was invalid as far as it provided for an absolute transfer of nine-tenths of the proceeds of the policy upon the conditions named, it was not of that fraudulent kind with respect to which the courts regard the parties as alike culpable, and refuse to interfere with the results of their action. No fraud or deception upon anyone was designed by the agreement, nor did its execution involve any moral turpitude. It is one which must be treated as creating no legal right to the proceeds of the policy beyond the sums advanced upon its security. . . . The assignment was only invalid as a transfer of the proceeds of the policy beyond what was required to refund those sums." In the case of First Nat. Bank v. Terry, 99 Va. 194, 37 S. E. 843, it was held that an assignment of a life policy to a creditor who pays subsequent premiums entitled the assignee to the amount of his debt and the premiums paid, even if the assignment was absolute, and that to limit the recovery of the assignee to these sums would prevent any speculation in insurance on human life. Helmetag v. Miller, 76 Ala. 183, 52 Am. Rep. 316; Culver v. Guyer, 129 Ala. 602, 29 So. 779; Beard v. Sharp, 100 Ky. 606, 38 S. W. 1057; Cawthon v. Perry, 76 Tex. 383, 13 S. W. 268; Tate v. Commercial Bldg. Asso. 97 Va. 74, 45 L.R.A. 243, 75 Am. St. Rep. 770, 33 S. E. 382.

In the case at bar we think that the above contract for the assignment of the policies was invalid in so far as it made an absolute transfer of the proceeds of the insurance policies, because to that extent it was a wagering contract; but we also think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount which the assured actually owed to him and the premiums which he paid on account of the contract. The court therefore erred in holding that the contract for the assignment of the policy of insurance to plaintiff was valid, and that thereby the plaintiff was entitled to recover the entire proceeds thereof. He is only entitled to recover of the estate the amount which Boswell actually owed to him and the premiums advanced by him.

The judgment is accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Reno County, in plaintiff's favor, in a garnishment proceeding to recover, because of defect in quality of the property purchased, the proceeds of a draft which had been drawn against a bill of lading purchased by the defendant bank, and paid to its agent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. E. Gidney and J. U. Brown for appellant.

Messrs. Prigg & Williams for appellee.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

H. A. Paul, of Muskogee, Oklahoma, sent out a circular soliciting business as a shipper of potatoes. The Central Mercantile Company, of Hutchinson, Kansas, receiving a copy, wired Paul, asking him to quote price on a car. In the course of resulting correspondence he reported in effect that he had two cars of choice stock, and asked for a bank guaranty. Thereupon, at the request of the company, the Citizens' Bank of Hutchinson, on June 17, 1908, sent a telegram to the Oklahoma State Bank of Muskogee, reading: "We guarantee draft bill of lading attached, two cars choice potatoes for Central Mercantile Company, H. A. Paul, shipper." Two days later Paul shipped two cars of potatoes to Hutchinson, and drew upon the company for the agreed price, making two drafts, payable to the Oklahoma State Bank, which he delivered to that bank, with the bill of lading attached. The Oklahoma Bank sent the drafts and bill of lading to the Citizens' Bank with directions to collect and remit. The Mercantile Company paid the drafts to the Citizens' Bank, and received the potatoes. Before the money was remitted, the company sued Paul, principally on account of the quantity of dirt found in the potatoes, and served a garnishment summons on the Citizens' Bank. The bank filed an answer as garnishee, setting out that it still had the proceeds of the drafts, but did not know whether they belonged to Paul or to the Oklahoma Bank. The Oklahoma Bank was made a party and claimed the fund. The plaintiff in a reply maintained that the Oklahoma Bank had acted only as the agent of Paul, and also that its conduct made it a guarantor of the quality of the potatoes. Upon the trial the plaintiff was given judgment for $308.42, which was ordered paid out of the proceeds of the drafts. The Oklahoma Bank appeals.

Paul testified, in substance, that, in his business of marketing potatoes, not having sufficient capital to make purchases outright himself, he found it necessary for the buyer either to advance him the money, or to furnish him with a bank guaranty by means of which he could procure it, inasmuch as the grower always required payment before shipment; that in the present instance the Oklahoma Bank paid the price of the potatoes to the grower, and received in return the two drafts on the Mercantile Company, with the bill of lading attached; that the bank was the sole owner of the drafts, Paul retaining no interest in them. The testimony of an officer of the Oklahoma Bank was to the same effect. There was no evidence to the contrary. Therefore the transaction must be treated as what it appears to have been on its face. The contention that the bank was acting merely as the agent of Paul, and that the proceeds of the drafts belonged in whole or in part to him, is not substantiated. Consequently the plaintiff's attempt to enforce its claim against Paul by garnishment has failed.

In behalf of the plaintiff the argument is made that the telegram it caused to be sent amounted to a conditional acceptance of the drafts, the condition being that the potatoes covered by the bill of lading should be "choice," that the rights of the Oklahoma Bank are the same as though it were seeking to collect the drafts, that the use of the word "choice" in the telegram prevented it from being an innocent purchaser of them, and that the Mercantile Company can recover against the Oklahoma Bank whatever amount it could have recouped had Paul sued it for the agreed price of the potatoes. Whatever effect the word "choice" might have in an action founded upon the telegram, it can have none here. The Oklahoma Bank is not suing the Citizens' Bank upon its guaranty, or the Mercantile Company upon an acceptance of the drafts. The drafts have been paid by the Mercantile Company, the drawee, to the Citizens' Bank as agent for the Oklahoma Bank, the payee. No occasion arose to look to the guarantor. The act of the drawee in paying the drafts placed the payee in at least as good a position as though there had been an unqualified acceptance. The situation is the same as though payment had been made to the Oklahoma Bank directly. The proceeds of the drafts have become its property as effectually as though it had their actual possession. The plaintiff cannot hold any part of them unless upon a showing that it had a valid cause of action against the Oklahoma Bank. Unless the Oklahoma Bank was in collusion with Paul (and of that there is no evidence), it conducted an ordinary business transaction in an ordinary way, not being in fault in any respect. We perceive no ground of liability on its part, unless one who purchases and collects a draft with a bill of lading attached is deemed to guarantee the character or quality of the goods shipped. A few cases have so held, but two of the principal ones (Landa v. Lattin Bros. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 246, 46 S. W. 48; Finch v. Gregg, 126 N. C. 176, 49 L.R.A. 679, 35 S. E. 251), have been recently overruled (S. Blaisdell, Jr. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 96 Tex. 626, 62 L.R.A. 968, 97 Am. St. Rep. 944, 75 S. W. 202; Mason v. A. E. Nelson Cotton Co. 148 N. C. 492, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1221, 128 Am. St. Rep. 635, 62 S. E. 625). The general doctrine to the contrary is well settled. See notes in 49 L.R.A. 679; 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 242; 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1221; 91 Am. St. Rep. 212. In Hall v. Keller, 64 Kan. 211, 215, 216, 62 L.R.A. 758, 91 Am. St. Rep. 209, 67 Pac. 518, 519, it was said: "If the banks in whose favor such bills are drawn are made liable for damage on account of the defective quality of the property shipped and covered by the bill of lading, . . . a serious impediment would be placed in the way of shippers who need a part or all of the price of the commodity sold before its arrival in the market to which it is consigned."

In the plaintiff's brief it is suggested that, because the Oklahoma Bank has come into this case and litigated its rights to the money held by the garnishee, its situation is the same as though it were suing the Mercantile Company for the value of the potatoes. We cannot agree to this. The bank is not seeking to collect the drafts, but to hold the proceeds which have already been paid to its agent for its benefit. The statute (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 5834 [Code Civ. Proc. § 241], provides that, where the answer of a garnishee discloses that any other person than the defendant claims the indebtedness or property in his hands, the court may order the claimant to be made a defendant, and notice to be served upon him. Here the plaintiff made the Oklahoma Bank a defendant by so designating it in an amended petition. If the bank entered an appearance without waiting to be served with summons, its rights were in no way prejudiced thereby.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with direction to order the money paid to the Oklahoma State Bank.

Carrier — limiting rates — constitutionality.

Chapter 198 of the Laws of 1895, providing that the officers and men of the Kansas National Guard shall, when in the performance of military duty, be transported on all railroads of the state at the rate of 1 cent per mile, denies to the railroad companies the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Chapter 198 of the laws of 1895 provides that, whenever it may be necessary for any or all of the officers or men of the Kansas National Guard or Kansas Reserve Militia to travel upon any railroad of the state under orders from competent authority to perform military duty, the transportation shall be furnished at the rate of 1 cent per mile for the distance traveled by each person. Orders for transportation issued by the adjutant general must be honored in lieu of fare, and then be presented to the military board to be audited and paid at the fixed rate. Wilful refusal on the part of the agent of a railroad company to observe the terms of the act is punishable by fine. In June, 1909, the petitioner, as agent of the Union Pacific Railroad Company at Topeka, refused a requisition duly made for the transportation of Major Arthur Mills, of the Kansas National Guard, at the statutory rate. The petitioner was arrested, convicted, and fined, and ordered committed to the jail of Shawnee county until the fine and costs should be paid. After the time for an appeal had expired, he instituted this proceeding in habeas corpus to secure his release from custody under a commitment issued upon the judgment. The principal question raised upon the sheriff's return to the writ of habeas corpus is whether the statute denies the railroad company the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

In 1883 the legislature fixed 3 cents per mile as the maximum rate for carrying adult passengers, and this rate has not since been changed by law. In 1907 the board of railroad commissioners issued an order fixing the maximum rate at 2 cents per mile. The order is still in force, and at all times material to the controversy was being observed by the railroad companies. These measures were adopted pursuant to the power of the state to regulate rates, and protect the traveling public from unjust exactions, and they reflect the judgment of the constituted authorities as to what is reasonable for the railroads to charge, and for the people to pay. Presumably 2 cents per mile is a reasonable rate for all adult passengers, or it would not have been promulgated, and would not be maintained. Ordinarily, when the rate-making power of the state has been exercised, and a reasonable maximum fare for people generally has been established, it is not then competent for the legislature to compel the railroad companies to make exceptions in favor of certain individuals. The legislature of the state of Michigan amended the general railroad law of that state so that it required the sale of 1,000-mile tickets at a reduced rate, required such tickets to be issued on request to the purchaser, his wife, and children, and made them valid for two years from the date of purchase. The Supreme Court of the United States held this law to be in violation of that portion of the Constitution of the United States which forbids the taking of property without due process of law, and which secures the equal protection of the laws. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 692, 43 L. ed. 858, 862, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565, 568. The views of the court are indicated in the following extracts from the opinion: "The power of the legislature to enact general laws regarding a company and its affairs does not include the power to compel it to make an exception in favor of some particular class in the community, and to carry the members of that class at a less sum than it has the right to charge for those who are not fortunate enough to be members thereof. This is not reasonable regulation. . . . If the general power exist, then the legislature can direct the company to charge smaller rates for clergymen or doctors, for lawyers or farmers or school teachers, for excursions, for church conventions, political conventions, or for all or any of the various bodies that might desire to ride at any particular time or to any particular place. If the legislature can interfere by directing the sale of tickets at less than the generally established rate, it can compel the company to carry certain persons or classes free. If the maximum rates are too high in the judgment of the legislature, it may lower them, provided they do not make them unreasonably low, as that term is understood in the law; but it cannot enact a law making maximum rates, and then proceed to make exceptions to it in favor of such persons or classes as, in the legislative judgment or caprice, may seem proper." At page 694 of 173 U. S. "The legislature having fixed a maximum rate at what must be presumed, prima facie, to be also a reasonable rate, we think the company then has the right to insist that all persons shall be compelled to pay alike, that no discrimination against it in favor of certain classes of married men or families, excursionists, or others, shall be made by the legislature. If otherwise, then the company is compelled at the caprice or whim of the legislature to make such exceptions as it may think proper, and to carry the excepted persons at less than the usual and legal rates, and thus to part in their favor with its property without that compensation to which it is entitled from all others, and therefore to part with its property without due process of law. The affairs of the company are in this way taken out of its own management, not by any general law applicable to all, but by a discrimination made by law to which the company is made subject. Whether an act of this nature shall be passed or not is not a matter of policy to be decided by the legislature. It is a matter of right of the company to carry on and manage its concerns subject to the general law applicable to all, which the legislature may enact in the legal exercise of its power to legislate in regard to persons and things within its jurisdiction." Page 696. "In this case there is not an exercise of the power to fix maximum rates. There is not the exercise of the acknowledged power to legislate so as to prevent extortion or unreasonable or illegal exactions. The fixing of the maximum rate does that. It is a pure, bald, and unmixed power of discrimination in favor of a few of the persons having occasion to travel on the road, and permitting them to do so at a less expense than others, provided they buy a certain number of tickets at one time. It is not legislation for the safety, health, or proper convenience of the public, but an arbitrary enactment in favor of the persons spoken of, who, in the legislative judgment, should be carried at a less expense than the other members of the community. There is no reasonable ground upon which the legislation can be rested, unless the simple decision of the legislature should be held to constitute such reason." At page 698 of 173 U. S.

This court is not inclined to the view that the power of the legislature is completely exhausted by a maximum rate regulation, and does not so interpret the decision quoted. But members of the National Guard cannot be segregated from the body of the state's citizens, and made a preferred class, unless they sustain some relation to transportation by rail which, in the nature of things, indicates they should have the benefit of an exceptional rate. Classification to be valid must be based upon differences in character, condition, or situation which lead to that difference in regulation which the statute undertakes to make. Thus, in the case involving a reduced rate for school children on street cars (Com. v. Interstate Consol. Street R. Co. 187 Mass. 436, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 973, 73 N. E. 530, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 419), the considerations which moved the court to sustain the rate were, among others, that pupils go to and from the public schools at hours when other persons make little use of the cars; that they are of such a size and age that they occupy much smaller spaces than other passengers; and that the difference in rate was of so much importance to parents that twice as many pupils would ride at half rate as at full rate, so that the revenues of the carrier would not be materially reduced. This court neither approves nor disapproves the conclusion reached in that case, but the method employed for testing the classification upon which the rate was based is sound. In accordance with the principle recognized, the legislature might no doubt require that precedence be given to the transportation of troops over other traffic, that special facilities for the movement of troops be supplied, that special schedules be adopted, and that other exceptional services be rendered whenever the public interest demands them. But the law in question has no such basis for the discrimination which it makes. Major Mills stood upon precisely the same footing, so far as the expected service to him was concerned, as any other individual. The times when members of the National Guard will travel are as uncertain as for other people. The number who will travel at any particular time is wholly indefinite. They come to the railroad stations singly, in groups, or in larger bodies, just as other citizens come singly, in groups, or in crowds sufficient to load the cars of one or more trains. They occupy the same space, and have the same privileges, as other persons. Their movements are controlled by duty, and not by special inducements, and the matter of rate can have no effect upon the volume of traffic. They are taken up, carried, and set down without any mark or circumstance whatever to distinguish them from the general public, or to distinguish the subject of their transportation from that of the general public, except that they carry orders for transportation without payment of fare and at reduced rates. Without any ground, therefore, for the classification, and without any regard to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the regulation, the state simply demands that its troops be transported by rail at a purely arbitrary rate, which, so far as the principle involved is concerned, might be 1 cent per hundred miles, or nothing at all. No other corporation or individual in the state is obliged to conduct business upon any such partial and unequal conditions, or to make any such sacrifice for the support of the National Guard or any other public institution or purpose. Therefore the act denies the railroads the equal protection of the laws.

So far, the act in question has been regarded as one relating in some way to the subject of railroad regulation. That is not its true character. It is a revenue measure which seeks to protect the treasury and keep down the rate of taxation upon the general property of the state, by levying a special assessment upon railroad companies for the maintenance of the military department of the government. Viewed from this standpoint, the statute selects railroad companies from among other common carriers, corporations, and property owners of the state. places them in a class by themselves, and imposes upon them a specific burden, supposedly for the public welfare. In many instances this may be done, but it cannot be done where the exaction is made to defray an expense having no more relation to the business of railroading than it has to any other business enterprise conducted within the state. This limitation was clearly stated by Justice Field in the case of Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbs, 142 U. S. 386, 391, 35 L. ed. 1051, 1053, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, 256. The state of South Carolina created a board of railroad commissioners charged with a variety of duties respecting the conduct of railroad affairs, and assessed the expenses and salaries of the members of the board to the railroad companies. The court held that the existence and presence of the railroad companies and their property in the state, and the exercise of the privileges and franchises which they enjoyed, created the necessity for the supervisory board, that the services of the board were rendered for the benefit of the railroads as well as for the public, and, consequently, that the cost of the service might lawfully be imposed upon the railroads. But the opinion reads: "If the tax were levied to pay for services in no way connected with the railroads, as, for instance, to pay the salary of the executive or judicial officers of the state, whilst railroad corporations were at the same time subjected to taxation upon their property equally with other corporations for such expenses, and other corporations were not taxed for the salaries mentioned, there would be just ground of complaint of unlawful discrimination against the railroad corporations, and of their not receiving the equal protection of the laws."

The principle involved has been applied in many cases. A railroad company may be required to build fences and cattle guards (Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110); to erect gates, plank crossings, and maintain flagmen (Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. ed. 979, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581); and to bear the whole cost of making changes of grade at crossings (New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 38 L. ed. 269, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 437), because the expenditure is necessary for the protection of persons and property otherwise endangered by the operation of the road, and because the company itself is specially benefited by the greater security which it obtains for the prosecution of its business. Examinations of railway employees may be required, and the fees therefor be charged to the railway companies. (Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 32 L. ed. 352, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28. Fees for quarantine inspection are regarded as compensation for services rendered to the vessel. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Board of Health, 118 U. S. 455, 30 L. ed. 237, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114. Fees charged for the inspection of mines may be charged to the owner. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Illinois, 185 U. S. 203, 46 L. ed. 872, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 616. The salaries and expenses of a board of commissioners of electrical subways may be charged to the companies whose business renders the creation of the board a necessity, and for whom, as well as the public, the services of the board are performed. New York ex rel. New York Electric Lines v. Squire, 145 U. S. 175, 36 L. ed. 666, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 880. In all such cases, and many 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

more might be cited, there is no denial of the equal protection of the laws. It can scarcely be claimed, however, that the National Guard is maintained because of anything occasioned by the existence or operation of railroads in the state, or that the railroads derive any benefit from the existence of the National Guard which is not shared by every other person in the state. The presence in the state of this body of men is beneficial to the railroads just as the government of the state, the various municipal governments, the courts, and the whole body of public functionaries, are beneficial to them, and no other way; and the equal protection of the laws requires not only that all persons brought within the influence of a statute shall be treated alike, but that a classifying statute must bring within the equal influence of its provisions all persons who are under the same conditions.

An effort is made to justify the statute as an exercise of the military power of the state to preserve peace, to suppress riots and insurrections, and to repel invasion. These are ends which every sovereignty must have the power to attain, and every citizen holds his property upon the implied condition that it must be surrendered when needed for the preservation of the government. Fields and farms may be traversed and occupied, subsistence, stores, and other movables may be appropriated, and transportation lines may be seized and operated, under the stress of due occasion, just as city blocks may be demolished to arrest the progress of a fire. Doubtless, in cases where neither the power of taxation nor the credit of the government would avail, a forced loan could be effected by the seizure of money itself. The power exercised in such cases is lawful, although not derived from Constitutions or statutes. It rests upon the principle that every sovereignty may in time of peril adopt such extreme measures as may be necessary for its existence and perpetuity. But it is limited to emergencies which cannot wait upon due process of law. The law governing military impressment of private property was well stated by Chief Justice Taney in the case of Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How. 115, 14 L. ed. 75, as follows: "There are, without doubt, occasions in which private property may lawfully be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy; and also where a military officer charged with a particular duty may impress private property into the public service or take it for public use. Unquestionably, in such cases, the government is bound to make full compensation to the owner; but the officer is not a trespasser. But we are clearly of the opinion that in all of these cases the danger must be immediate and impending, or the necessity urgent for the public service, such as will not admit of delay, and where the action of the civil authority would be too late in providing the means which the occasion calls for. It is impossible to define the particular circumstance of danger or necessity in which this power may be lawfully exercised. Every case must depend on its own circumstances. It is the emergency that gives the right, and the emergency must be shown to exist before the taking can be justified. In deciding upon this necessity, however, the state of the facts, as they appeared to the officer at the time he acted, must govern the decision; for he must necessarily act upon the information of others as well as his own observation. And, if, with such information as he had a right to rely upon, there is reasonable ground for believing that the peril is immediate and menacing, or the necessity urgent, he is justified in acting upon it; and the discovery afterwards that it was false or erroneous will not make him a trespasser. But it is not sufficient to show that he exercised an honest judgment, and took the property to promote the public service. He must show by proof the nature and character of the emergency, such as he had reasonable grounds to believe it to be, and it is then for a jury to say whether it was so pressing as not to admit of delay, and the occasion such, according to the information upon which he acted, that private rights must for the time give way to the common and public good. . . . The case mentioned by Lord Mansfield in delivering his opinion in Mostyn v. Fabrigas, Cowp. pt. 1, p. 180, illustrates the principle of which we are speaking. Captain Gambier, of the British navy, by the order of Admiral Boscawen, pulled down the houses of some sutlers on the coast of Nova Scotia, who were supplying the sailors with spirituous liquors; the health of the sailors being injured by frequenting them. The motive was evidently a laudable one, and the act done for the public service. Yet it was an invasion of the rights of private property, and without the authority of law, and the officer who executed the order was held liable to an action, and the sutlers recovered damages against him to the value of the property destroyed. This case shows how carefully the rights of private property are guarded by the laws of England; and they are certainly not less valued, nor less securely guarded, under the Constitution and laws of the United States." When, however, the government is in no extremity in fact which requires the suspension, in whole or in part, of the civil laws, contributions to its support cannot be levied upon private persons or corporations, except pursuant to laws which prescribe the occasions, modes, conditions, and agencies for the appropriation, and which bear equally upon all those who are similarly situated.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

J. R. WATKINS MEDICAL COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

A. L. BRAND et al.

Guaranty — employee's faithfulness — notice of acceptance — necessity.

Notification of acceptance of the guaranty is not necessary to bind persons who sign an agreement to be responsible for the faithful performance of his contract by one about to be reappointed as salesman for the obligee for another year, since the guaranty is absolute, and not conditional, and it is immaterial that the contract has not been signed by either employer or employee when the sureties put their names to the guaranty which is attached to it.

Note. — Necessity of notice of acceptance to bind guarantor.

As is stated in the note to William Deering & Co. v. Mortell, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 352, of which this note is a continuation, notice to the guarantor is usually held necessary in case of offers of guaranty, as distinguished from contracts of guaranty, in which case notice is generally not required.

That notice of acceptance of guaranty is not necessary where the contract is absolute and unqualified, but that such a guaranty becomes effective as soon as acted upon by the guarantee, see Acorn Brass Mfg. Co. v. Gilmore, 142 Ill. App. 567 (guaranty of indebtedness for chattels to be sold); People's Bank v. Stewart, 152 Mo. App. 314, 133 S. W. 70 (written order to bank to "cash checks for R. & Company till next week. Will see it paid"—is absolute guaranty as to amount R. & Company were allowed upon the strength of the guaranty to overdraw); and Bond v. John V. Farwell Co. 96 C. C. A. 546, 172 Fed. 58 (writing executed to obtain credit, guaranteeing payment in full for all merchandise sold to a certain firm, not to exceed a specified amount, and to continue till notice of dis-

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Graves County in defendants' favor in an action on a guaranty bond for the faithfulness of plaintiff's salesman. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. N. Stanfield and Tawney, Smith, & Tawney for appellant.

Mr. B. C. Seay, with Messrs. Robbins & Thomas, for appellees:

The contract of guaranty was condition-continuance,—is absolute guaranty, binding on delivery of goods in reliance thereon).

So, where the terms of a proposed guaranty contemplate acceptance by the delivery of merchandise on credit to a third person, the offer can be accepted by the furnishing of merchandise pursuant to the terms of the guaranty, the contract becomes complete when credit is actually so furnished, and no notice of acceptance is necessary where not called for by the offer. Sheffield v. Whitfield, 6 Ga. App. 762, 65 S. E. 807; Sheppard v. Daniel Miller Co. 7 Ga. App. 760, 68 S. E. 451.

And where the guaranty acknowledges the receipt of a valuable consideration, the mutual assent is considered proved, and the delivery of the guaranty completes the contract, rendering notice of acceptance unnecessary. Emerson Mfg. Co. v. Rustad, — N. D. —, 120 N. W. 1094; Bank of California v. Union Pkg. Co. 60 Wash. 456, 111 Pac. 573.

And where prior arrangements are made whereby a bank is to extend credit to a third party on the guarantor's order, and such third party is permitted to overdraw on such orders, notice of acceptance of such orders is not necessary in order to bind the guarantor, as he completed the contract by delivering the order. People's Bank v. Stewart, 152 Mo. App. 314, 133 S. W. 17.

And no notice of acceptance of a guaranty is required where the guaranty was made pursuant to a request therefor by the guarantee. J. L. Mott Iron Works v. Clark, — S. C. —, 69 S. E. 227 (goods shipped to corporation on corporation officer's personal guaranty); Tilt-Kenney Shoe Co. v. Hagarty, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 335, 114 S. W. 386 (goods shipped to buyer on faith of third person's guaranty); Hili Mercantile Co. v. Rotan Grocery Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 127 S. W. 1080 (goods shipped to corporation on guaranty of officer); Fraser v. Douglas, 16 Manitoba L. Rep. 484 (goods shipped on furnishing of guaranty, as requested). But that such a guaranty merely amounts to an offer where approval is expressly stated as being necessary, see Detroit Free Press v. Pattengill, infra.

And where the making of a contract of sale and an absolute contract of guaranty incorporated in it are contemporaneous, and the sale and extension of credit in reliance on the guaranty are treated as one connected transaction, further notice of acceptance of the guaranty is not necessary, as it would be a vain act. Cumberland 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) al, and by its very terms guaranteed the performance of certain stipulations and undertakings of the said R. L. High, and hence, notice of its acceptance is required.

Greer Mach. Co. v. Sears, 119 Ky. 697, 66 S. W. 521; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1146; Steadman v. Guthrie, 4 Met. (Ky.) 147; Goff v. Janeway & Carpenter, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 525, 82 S. W. 267; Gano v. Farmers' Bank, 103 Ky. 514, 82 Am. St. Rep. 596, 45 S. W. 519; Kincheloe

Glass Mfg. Co. v. Wheaton, — Mass. —, 94 N. E. 803. But although the guaranty of the payment for goods sold was contemporaneous with the making of the contract of sale by the purchaser and the seller's agent, if the contract requires the approval of the seller for whom the agent was acting, notice of acceptance is necessary to bind the guarantor. J. S. Rowell Mfg. Co. v. Isaacs, 144 Mo. App. 58, 128 S. W. 760.

There is an exception, however, to the general rule that notice of acceptance is not necessary where the guaranty is absolute, and that is where there is a binding obligation to do the thing in respect of which the creditor is to be guaranteed, it being held in such case that notice that the guaranty has become operative must be given within a reasonable time. See Lascelles v. Clark, 204 Mass. 362, 90 N. E. 875.

That notice of acceptance of a guaranty is necessary to complete the guaranty where the undertaking is merely a contingent offer to become responsible, see Cumberland Glass Mfg. Co. v. Wheaton, — Mass. —, 94 N. E. 803 (sale on credit of manufactured articles); Detroit Free Press v. Pattengill, 155 Mich. 272, 118 N. W. 927 (guarantor signed in response to request of guarantee for guaranty of the payment of goods to be furnished upon approval by the guarantee of the guarantor); Brown v. Spiegel, 156 Mich. 138, 120 N. W. 579 (proposition by a debtor to guarantee payment of certain notes if his creditor would accept them); Burns v. Poole, 106 Minn. 69, 118 N. W. 156 (rule assumed); J. S. Rowell Mfg. Co. v. Isaacs, 144 Mo. App. 58, 128 S. W. 760; People's Bank v. Stewart, 152 Mo. App. 314, 133 S. W. 70 (order on bank to cash checks on third party, stating that payment would be guaranteed—amounts simply to proposal to guarantee); and Columbia Baking & Mfg. Co. v. Schissler, 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 621 (writing—"To whom it may concern: This is to certify that the undersigned faithfully agrees to act as security" for a certain agent in a certain amount—is a guaranty of a future liability, where the agent owed nothing at the time, and therefore merely an offer of guaranty).

But in Lascelles v. Clark, 204 Mass. 362, 90 N. E. 875, it was held that in case of offers of guaranty, notice is necessary only where the act to be done is of such a kind that knowledge of it will not come quickly to the guarantor, the case forming an exception to the general rule. G. J. C.

v. Holmes, 7 B. Mon. 5, 45 Am. Dec. 41; Lowe v. Beckwith, 14 B. Mon. 189, 58 Am. Dec. 659; Thompson v. Glover, 78 Ky. 195, 39 Am. Rep. 220.

Hobson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The J. R. Watkins Company had in its service R. L. High as a traveling salesman, and took from him annually a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties. The last bond was executed on December 19, 1906, and High having failed to pay over to the company $705.04, which he had received for it under the bond, this action was brought by the company against A. L. Brand and G. R. Allen, who, by a written indorsement on the bond, guaranteed his faithfulness. The company's headquarters are at Winona, Minnesota. It mailed the bond to R. L. High at La Center, in Ballard county, Kentucky. He, without signing it, mailed it to a friend in Graves county to procure the signatures of Allen and Brand, who lived there and had signed his previous bonds. His friend took it to them, and they signed it. He then returned it to High, who then signed it and returned it to the company. The company accepted the bond, but did not notify Allen and Brand thereof. They defended the suit on the ground that they were only guarantors, and were not bound, as they had received no notice from the company that their guaranty was accepted. The circuit court sustained this defense, and dismissed the petition. The plaintiff appeals.

The writing consists of three parts: The first is a statement of what the company shall do, and a promise by High to perform his part of the agreement printed on the back. At the end of this are printed these words as a signature, "The J. R. Watkins Medical company, by _____, President." Following this, and under it, High placed his name. Just under this are the words which Allen and Brand signed, as follows:

For and in consideration of the appointment of the above-mentioned traveling salesman, we hereby agree to be jointly and severally responsible to said the J. R. Watkins Medical Company for the faithful performance of this contract on the part of said traveling salesman (as outlined on the back of this agreement), and for the payment of any balance that may be due said company by him at the date of the acceptance of this contract.

G. R. Allen, Mayfield, Kentucky.

A. L. Brand, " "

On the back of the agreement is a statement as to certain things that the salesman agrees to do, and this also was signed by High. When Allen and Brand signed the paper, there were no other signatures to it; and after High had signed it, and returned it to the company, the vice president wrote his name in the blank left for the president's.

The circuit court seems to have based his judgment upon the case of Greer Mach. Co. v. Sears, 119 Ky. 697, 66 S. W. 521. In that case the Greer Machine Company proposed to C. B. Chandler to appoint him their agent to sell certain implements. The proposition was made upon a printed form used by the company. It contained, among other things, a provision that it was not to be "binding until signed by the president of the Greer Machine Company." Chandler accepted the writing by an indorsement on it, and on the same day Sears signed a writing guaranteeing that Chandler would comply with the contract. The paper was then sent to Knoxville, Tennessee, where it was approved by the president of the Greer Machine Company, and the contract closed. But Sears had no notice of this. It was held that he was not bound unless he knew the contract was accepted; that actual notice to him was unnecessary if he in fact knew the contract was accepted, or that Chandler had been appointed agent and the goods consigned to him under the contract.

But the ruling in that case is rested upon the peculiar language of the contract. The court said: "In this case the contract was not completed at the time of the execution and delivery to the Greer Machinery Company of the writing signed by appellee. It expressly stipulated that it was not to be binding until signed by their president, and it was understood by all the parties that the contract was to be sent to appellant's president for his approval or rejection, and until it was signed by him it was not a contract at all. We think this stipulation makes the guaranty of appellee a conditional one, and that he was entitled to notice of his acceptance before liability attached."

There is no such language in the contract before us. A contract more like this was before us in White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Powell, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 94, 74 S. W. 746. In that case the appellees executed to the machine company a written obligation by which they agreed to pay it any sums of money in which its agents, Willis & Willis, might become indebted to it. Suit was brought on the contract to recover of the sureties on account of an indebtedness of Willis & Willis to the company, and they insisted that they were only guarantors, and were not bound, as the company had failed to give them notice of its acceptance of the guaranty. The court held the defense not good. It said: "The writing sued on shows an absolute guaranty on their part. In 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1141, it is said: "An absolute guaranty is an unconditional promise of payment or performance on default of the principal. To bind the guarantor it is not necessary that there should be notice of acceptance of the guaranty, or notice of default of the principal, or that any steps should be taken to enforce the contract guaranteed against the principal.'"

No written contract is closed until it is executed and accepted. If appellees are not bound, because they were not notified that appellant had accepted the contract, then such notice in every case is necessary, and the rule that notice is unnecessary in the case of an absolute guaranty has no application. The promise not being conditional, to hold that the rule does not apply to it is practically to repudiate the rule.

It is insisted, however, that the rule does not apply because here the sureties signed the paper when there were no other signatures to it. But we cannot see that the order in which the names were placed on the paper is material. The company sent the bond to High. When he had procured the signatures of his friends and added his own, he sent it back to the company. When the company received the paper from High, it was not called upon to inquire in what order the names had been placed upon the paper. If it had simply accepted the paper as High returned it to it, and the vice president had not inserted his name in the blank left in it, the instrument would have been valid. The sureties, when they signed the paper leaving blanks in it, by necessary implication gave authority for the filling of the blanks in the usual way; that is, it was implied, when they signed the paper and returned it to High, that High was to sign it and return it to the company. When the company received it from High, and accepted it, it became an absolute contract. There was no act to be done by the company before the obligation would become absolute. Appellees agreed by the paper, for the consideration named, to be responsible to the company for the faithful performance of the contract by High. It is an absolute guaranty of High's faithfulness. It is not a conditional contract, but an unconditional undertaking. The order in which the names were placed upon the paper in no wise affects its legal character. If High had signed the paper before he sent it to Allen and Brand, and they had then signed it and returned it to him to return to the company, the legal effect of the transaction would be unchanged. The vice president's putting his name in the blank left for it was only to show the acceptance of the contract. If the contract had been accepted without his filling the blank, the effect would have been the same. High was notified of the acceptance of the contract, and received credit by virtue of it. He was the proper person to return it to the company. Notice to the defendants of the acceptance of the absolute guaranty was unnecessary. On the facts found by the circuit court, he should not have entered a judgment for the defendants.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith. If the evidence is the same on another trial, judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiff.

NATIONAL EXCHANGE BANK OF BALTIMORE, Appt.,

v.

EDWIN GINN et al., Trading as Ginn & Company.

(114 Md. 181, 78 Atl. 1026.)

Banks — payment of insolvent's check — recovery.

Note. — Right of bank to recover amount paid on check in ignorance of insolvency of drawer, who was indebted to it.

The decision in NATIONAL EXCH. BANK v. GINN, to the effect that a bank which has paid a check on a deposit in ignorance of the drawer's insolvency cannot compel the payee to return the funds merely to enable it to set off such funds against indebtedness of the depositor to it on the ground that the insolvency of the drawer matured his indebtedness, in consequence of which there was no money to pay the check, wherefore the check was paid as the result of a mistake as to the true condition of the drawer's account, is supported by American Nat. Bank v. Miller, 185 Fed. 338, which seems to be the only additional case directly involving the question under annotation. In the latter case the drawee bank, in ignorance of insolvency of the drawer, who was indebted to it, credited, which was equivalent to payment, the amount of the check to the payee bank, which acted in good faith in presenting the check for payment, and it was held that the

Hobson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The J. R. Watkins Company had in its service R. L. High as a traveling salesman, and took from him annually a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties. The last bond was executed on December 19, 1906, and High having failed to pay over to the company $705.04, which he had received for it under the bond, this action was brought by the company against A. L. Brand and G. R. Allen, who, by a written indorsement on the bond, guaranteed his faithfulness. The company's headquarters are at Winona, Minnesota. It mailed the bond to R. L. High at La Center, in Ballard county, Kentucky. He, without signing it, mailed it to a friend in Graves county to procure the signatures of Allen and Brand, who lived there and had signed his previous bonds. His friend took it to them, and they signed it. He then returned it to High, who then signed it and returned it to the company. The company accepted the bond, but did not notify Allen and Brand thereof. They defended the suit on the ground that they were only guarantors, and were not bound, as they had received no notice from the company that their guaranty was accepted. The circuit court sustained this defense, and dismissed the petition. The plaintiff appeals.

The writing consists of three parts: The first is a statement of what the company shall do, and a promise by High to perform his part of the agreement printed on the back. At the end of this are printed these words as a signature, "The J. R. Watkins Medical company, by _____, President." Following this, and under it, High placed his name. Just under this are the words which Allen and Brand signed, as follows:

For and in consideration of the appointment of the above-mentioned traveling salesman, we hereby agree to be jointly and severally responsible to said the J. R. Watkins Medical Company for the faithful performance of this contract on the part of said traveling salesman (as outlined on the back of this agreement), and for the payment of any balance that may be due said company by him at the date of the acceptance of this contract.

G. R. Allen, Mayfield, Kentucky.
A. L. Brand, " "

On the back of the agreement is a statement as to certain things that the salesman agrees to do, and this also was signed by High. When Allen and Brand signed the paper, there were no other signatures to it: and after High had signed it, and returned it to the company, the vice president wrote his name in the blank left for the president's.

The circuit court seems to have based his judgment upon the case of Greer Mach. Co. v. Sears, 119 Ky. 697, 66 S. W. 521. In that case the Greer Machine Company proposed to C. B. Chandler to appoint him their agent to sell certain implements. The proposition was made upon a printed form used by the company. It contained, among other things, a provision that it was not to be "binding until signed by the president of the Greer Machine Company." Chandler accepted the writing by an indorsement on it, and on the same day Sears signed a writing guaranteeing that Chandler would comply with the contract. The paper was then sent to Knoxville, Tennessee, where it was approved by the president of the Greer Machine Company, and the contract closed. But Sears had no notice of this. It was held that he was not bound unless he knew the contract was accepted; that actual notice to him was unnecessary if he in fact knew the contract was accepted, or that Chandler had been appointed agent and the goods consigned to him under the contract.

But the ruling in that case is rested upon the peculiar language of the contract. The court said: "In this case the contract was not completed at the time of the execution and delivery to the Greer Machinery Company of the writing signed by appellee. It expressly stipulated that it was not to be binding until signed by their president, and it was understood by all the parties that the contract was to be sent to appellant's president for his approval or rejection, and until it was signed by him it was not a contract at all. We think this stipulation makes the guaranty of appellee a conditional one, and that he was entitled to notice of his acceptance before liability attached."

There is no such language in the contract before us. A contract more like this was before us in White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Powell, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 94, 74 S. W. 746. In that case the appellees executed to the machine company a written obligation by which they agreed to pay it any sums of money in which its agents, Willis & Willis, might become indebted to it. Suit was brought on the contract to recover of the sureties on account of an indebtedness of Willis & Willis to the company, and they insisted that they were only guarantors, and were not bound, as the company had failed to give them notice of its acceptance of the guaranty. The court held the defense not good. It said: "The writing sued on shows an absolute guaranty on their part. In 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1141, it is said: "An absolute guaranty is an unconditional promise of payment or performance on default of the principal. To bind the guarantor it is not necessary that there should be notice of acceptance of the guaranty, or notice of default of the principal, or that any steps should be taken to enforce the contract guaranteed against the principal.'"

No written contract is closed until it is executed and accepted. If appellees are not bound, because they were not notified that appellant had accepted the contract, then such notice in every case is necessary, and the rule that notice is unnecessary in the case of an absolute guaranty has no application. The promise not being conditional, to hold that the rule does not apply to it is practically to repudiate the rule.

It is insisted, however, that the rule does not apply because here the sureties signed the paper when there were no other signatures to it. But we cannot see that the order in which the names were placed on the paper is material. The company sent the bond to High. When he had procured the signatures of his friends and added his own, he sent it back to the company. When the company received the paper from High, it was not called upon to inquire in what order the names had been placed upon the paper. If it had simply accepted the paper as High returned it to it, and the vice president had not inserted his name in the blank left in it, the instrument would have been valid. The sureties, when they signed the paper leaving blanks in it, by necessary implication gave authority for the filling of the blanks in the usual way; that is, it was implied, when they signed the paper and returned it to High, that High was to sign it and return it to the company. When the company received it from High, and accepted it, it became an absolute contract. There was no act to be done by the company before the obligation would become absolute. Appellees agreed by the paper, for the consideration named, to be responsible to the company for the faithful performance of the contract by High. It is an absolute guaranty of High's faithfulness. It is not a conditional contract, but an unconditional undertaking. The order in which the names were placed upon the paper in no wise affects its legal character. If High had signed the paper before he sent it to Allen and Brand, and they had then signed it and returned it to him to return to the company, the legal effect of the transaction would be unchanged. The vice president's putting his name in the blank left for it was only to show the acceptance of the contract. If the contract had been accepted without his filling the blank, the effect would have been the same. High was notified of the acceptance of the contract, and received credit by virtue of it. He was the proper person to return it to the company. Notice to the defendants of the acceptance of the absolute guaranty was unnecessary. On the facts found by the circuit court, he should not have entered a judgment for the defendants.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith. If the evidence is the same on another trial, judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiff.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

NATIONAL EXCHANGE BANK OF BALTIMORE, Appt.,

Note. — Right of bank to recover amount paid on check in ignorance of insolvency of drawer, who was indebted to it.

The decision in NATIONAL EXCH. BANK v. GINN, to the effect that a bank which has paid a check on a deposit in ignorance of the drawer's insolvency cannot compel the payee to return the funds merely to enable it to set off such funds against indebtedness of the depositor to it on the ground that the insolvency of the drawer matured his indebtedness, in consequence of which there was no money to pay the check, wherefore the check was paid as the result of a mistake as to the true condition of the drawer's account, is supported by American Nat. Bank v. Miller, 185 Fed. 338, which seems to be the only additional case directly involving the question under annotation. In the latter case the drawee bank, in ignorance of insolvency of the drawer, who was indebted to it, credited, which was equivalent to payment, the amount of the check to the payee bank, which acted in good faith in presenting the check for payment, and it was held that the

2. Failure of a bank to comply with the rules of a clearing house association, necessary to enable it to compel a return by another member of the association of funds paid upon a worthless check, does not destroy its right to compel a return by the payee of the check after they reach his hands, since his rights or liabilities are not affected by such rules.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court of Baltimore City in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover money paid on the check of a depositor under an alleged mistake of fact. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles G. Baldwin and G. Ridgely Sappington, for appellant:

The paper, passing through the clearing house, could not be regarded as accepted or paid before the debtor bank makes its settlement with the clearing house.

Whenever a banker advances money to a customer, he has a lien on all the securities in his hands for the amount of the balance, and an equitable set-off against any funds on deposit to the credit of the customer.

drawee bank was not entitled to rescind the payment and credit the amount thereof against the drawer's indebtedness to it. The court said that when the amount was credited to the payee's deposit account, the check was paid, and the completed transaction could not be rescinded except for fraud or mutual mistake, and that the doctrine of mutual mistake did not apply, although the drawee had made a mistake and by it lost the opportunity to exercise the option whether to pay the check, or to refuse it for the purpose of offsetting the deposit account against the indebtedness of the drawer to it.

Urner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by a bank to recover money paid on the check of a depositor, and recovery is sought upon the ground that the payment was made under a mistake of fact.

It appears, without contradiction, from the record that on October 19, 1909, the William J. C. Dulaney Company drew its check on the National Exchange Bank of Baltimore, the appellant, payable to the order of Ginn & Company, the appellees, for the sum of $5,000. The check was mailed to the appellees in New York, and was by them deposited on October 20, 1909, in the National Park Bank of that city. On the same day it was forwarded by that bank to the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank of Baltimore for collection. It was received by the latter bank on the morning of October 21st, and about 9 o'clock on that morning the check was passed through the clearing house, and was paid about 11 o'clock by the appellant in the regular course of its clearance settlements. At 10 o'clock, approximately, on the same morning receivers were appointed for the Dulaney Company upon a bill alleging, and its answer admitting, its insolvency. The company's deposits with the appellant just prior to the payment of the check in question amounted to $9,019.18. It was indebted to the appellant in the aggregate sum of $21,020.80, including $5,000 upon a promissory note which matured that day, and $5,792.02 upon a demand note. The appellant might have set off the Dulaney Company's indebtedness against its deposit credits, but, supposing it to be solvent, and in ignorance of the receivership, the bank honored the $5,000 check when it was presented in due course for payment. About fifteen minutes before 12 o'clock, and within an hour after it paid the check, the appellant learned for the first time of the appointment of receivers for the Dulaney Company and of its insolvency. One of the officers of the appellant thereupon immediately offered to return the check to the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank, and requested repayment. This was refused, and the appellant then proceeded against the appellees as nonresident debtors, and attached, in the hands of the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank as garnishee, the funds which had been paid on the check. The suit against the appellees was tried upon issue joined on general issue pleas to the common counts in assumpsit, including account for money had and received and resulted in a verdict for the defendants under the direction of the court. There is but one exception in the record, and that refers to the action of the trial court in thus withdrawing the case from the jury.

Upon the undisputed facts we have stated, the question to be determined is whether the appellant, because of its ignorance of the drawer's insolvency at the time of the payment of the check, is entitled to recover the amount paid to the holder, in order that the bank's right of set-off against the drawer may be utilized. It is to be observed that this very interesting and important question is not here complicated by any of the elements of deception or imposition which are sometimes found in cases of erroneous payments. The conduct of every party concerned was characterized by absolute good faith. When the check was given, the drawer had ample funds in the bank on which it was drawn. It was issued in the usual course of business, and was used in payment of a valid claim. It was honored solely in consequence of a mistake as to the existence of a condition which, if known, would have induced a contrary course of action. It was correctly assumed in the argument that the receivership created for the Dulaney Company could not under the circumstances be regarded as influencing the result of this suit, because not only was the payment of the check made without knowledge of that proceeding, but it is clear that the appellant has a right of set-off which would absorb the fund if recovered. Colton v. Drivers' Perpetual Bldg. & L. Asso. 90 Md. 94, 46 L.R.A. 388, 78 Am. St. Rep. 431, 45 Atl. 23; Dubreuil v. Gaither, 98 Md. 544, 56 Atl. 965. As the suit is directly against the payee of the check, the situation is not affected by the rules of the clearing house through which it was presented and collected. One of these rules provides "that errors in exchange and claims arising from the return of checks or other causes are to be adjusted by 11 o'clock A. M., directly between the banks which are parties thereto, and not through the clearing house," and that, "upon request made before 11 o'clock A. M., every bank shall extend until 12 o'clock the time for returning to its checks 'not good.'" When the offer was made at about a quarter to 12 o'clock to return the check under consideration, it was refused upon the ground that it was made after 11 o'clock, and that there had been no request prior to that hour for an extension of time. It is well settled that such a regulation is binding only upon the members of the Clearing House Association. Its rules are designed exclusively for their convenience and protection as among themselves, and have no effect upon the rights or liabilities of other parties. 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 614; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. National Bank, 139 Mass. 518, 2 N. E. 89; Overman v. Hoboken City Bank, 30 N. J. L. 61. The failure of the appellant to offer to return the check and to demand repayment within the time prescribed by the rules of the clearing house would therefore not impair its claim against the payee for the restoration of the fund, if its right of recovery should be found to be otherwise perfect. So far as the purposes of this case are concerned, the situation is precisely the same as if the appellees had in person presented the check to the appellant, and had received the money over its counter. Whether they are liable to repay it under the circumstances of the case is the sole question to be considered.

The appellant's theory is that the insol-

veny of the Dulaney Company matured its obligations to the bank, that the deposits of the company thereupon became applicable to its indebtedness, and that consequently there was no money really available for the payment of the check when it was presented. It is argued, therefore, that the check was paid as the result of a mistake as to the true condition of the drawer's account. In the case of Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Swift, 70 Md. 515, 14 Am. St. Rep. 381, 17 Atl. 336, a check was paid by the bank on which it was drawn, although the drawer "had no funds in the bank at the time of payment properly applicable to this purpose." The check was originally drawn against an account opened by the drawer in his name as sole trustee, by the indorsement and deposit in that form of a check payable to the order of himself and another as trustees jointly. The payment accomplished by the check given by the trustee had no relation to the trust estate to which the deposit really belonged, but the bank was misled into the contrary belief by an order of court which had been brought to its attention, permitting the trustee who made the deposit, on account of the absence of his cotrustee, "to act as fully in all matters pertaining to said trust, as if both were present and acting." Under the misapprehension thus induced, the acting fiduciary was allowed to add to the check given by him as sole trustee the name of his cotrustee as a drawer. The deposit account being also changed so as to stand in the name of the two trustees, it was then charged with the check as corrected. The bank having been required to restore the funds thus misappropriated from the trust estate, on the ground of its actual, though unintentional, participation in the breach of trust (Swift v. Williams, 68 Md. 236, 11 Atl. 835), brought suit against the payee of the check; but recovery was denied by this court because the bank had been neglectful of its means of knowledge, and because "it is the duty of a bank to know the state of its depositor's account, and, if it makes a mistake in this respect, it must abide the consequences. The presentation of a check is a demand for payment. If it is paid, all the rights of the payee have been satisfied, and he is not entitled to ask any questions. It would forever destroy the character of a bank in all commercial circles if, when it was ready and willing to pay a check, it permitted the holder to inquire if the drawer had funds there to meet it. It is a matter with which he has no concern. In the absence of fraud on the part of the holder, the payment of a check by a bank is regarded as a finality. And the fact that the drawer had no funds on deposit will not give the bank any remedy against the holder." One of the decisions cited in the Swift Case as an authority in support of the proposition we have quoted was that of Oddie v. National City Bank, 45 N. Y. 735, 6 Am. Rep. 160. There the check was presented for deposit to the bank on which it was drawn, and was credited to the payee's account. This was treated as equivalent to payment of the check by the bank, and it was held that "when a check is presented to a bank for deposit, drawn directly upon itself, it is the same as though payment in any other form was demanded. It is the right of the bank to reject it, or to refuse to pay it, or to receive it conditionally; . . . but, if it accepts such a check and pays it, either by delivering the currency or giving the party credit for it, the transaction is closed between the bank and such party, provided the paper is genuine."

In a situation somewhat analogous to the present, the supreme court of Michigan, speaking through Judge Cooley, said: "This case is certainly novel and peculiar. The drawees seek to recover from the payees the amount of a bill which they have accepted and paid, and the genuineness of which is not disputed. The ground upon which they plant their right of recovery is that they have paid under a mistake of fact. The mistake consisted in their security from the drawer of the bill being fictitious, when they supposed it to be genuine and reliable. Admitting this to be so, how does the fact concern the payees? Do they assume to guarantee the fairness of the dealings of the drawers with the drawees, or the adequacy of any security upon which the dealings are based? Not, certainly, in ordinary cases. . . . What is peculiar in the present case is that the security which was sent forward with the bill proved to be fictitious. It is said that the drawees relied upon this security, and would not have paid the bill but for a belief that it was valid. It is in this that the mistake consists on which they rely for a recovery. If a mistake regarding their security will authorize the drawees to recall the payment made to the payee, no reason is perceived why a mistake regarding the responsibility of the drawer, or regarding his honesty and integrity, or anything else upon which they relied for protection in their dealings, should not justify the like action. If they suppose the drawer to be responsible when he is not, is not this as genuine a mistake of fact on their part as if they supposed a security to be good where it is fictitious?" The learned judge then proceeded to declare that "it would be an exceedingly unsafe doctrine in commercial law, that one who has discounted a bill in good faith, and received in its payment the strongest possible assurance that it was drawn with proper authority, should afterward hold the money subject to such a showing as the drawee might be able to make as to the influences operating upon his mind to induce him to make payment. The beauty and value of the rules governing commercial paper consist in their perfect certainty and reliability. They would be worse than useless if the ultimate responsibility for such paper, as between payee and drawee, both acting in good faith, could be made to depend on the motives which influenced the latter to honor the paper." First Nat. Bank v. Burkham, 32 Mich. 328.

The New Jersey court of errors and appeals, in National Bank v. Berrall, 70 N. J. L. 757, 68 L.R.A. 599, 103 Am. St. Rep. 821, 58 Atl. 189, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 630, had under consideration a case in which the bank inadvertently paid a check drawn upon it after payment had been countermanded by the drawer, and it was held that "where a bank receives in the ordinary course of business a check drawn upon it and presented by a bona fide holder, who is without notice of any infirmity therein, and the bank pays the amount of the check to such holder, it finally exercises its option to pay or not to pay, and the transaction is closed as between the parties to the payment."

The same rule was applied by the Virginia supreme court of appeals to the payment of coupons by a bank on bonds of one of its depositors, under the erroneous belief that there were funds on deposit available for that purpose. Citizens' Bank v. Schwarzschild & S. Co. 109 Va. 539, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1092, 64 S. E. 954. In a note to the last mentioned case, as reported in 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1092, it is stated to be the "general rule that, in the absence of fraud, the payment of a check or note by a bank upon which it is drawn or at which it is payable, under the mistaken belief that the drawer of the check or the maker of the note has sufficient funds to his credit to pay it, cannot be recovered by the bank;" and numerous authorities are collected in support of this proposition.

A similar principle has been recognized by this court in cases where payments of forged checks have been made by banks upon the supposition that they were genuine. Commercial & F. Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 30 Md. 11, 96 Am. Dec. 554; Hardy v. Chesapeake Bank, 51 Md. 562, 34 Am. Rep. 325.

If, therefore, in the present case the appellant had actually set off the Dulaney

Company's indebtedness against its deposits, thus producing an overpayment, and had then inadvertently paid the check in question, it would clearly, under the authorities cited, have no right of action against the appellees. This is not in reality the precise condition with which we are now dealing, but we see no reason for applying to the case at bar a different rule from that which governed the cases to which we have referred. The mistake of paying the check of a drawer who has no funds to meet it is just as much due to ignorance of the real facts as is the mistake of making such payment in consequence of the erroneous assumption of the drawer's solvency. In every such instance the error results from a misconception which may have been more or less readily avoidable according to the particular circumstances. In the case of a check drawn against an insufficient deposit, the bank has immediately at hand the means of learning the true state of the account, while in a case like the present, where its action is influenced by consideration of the financial responsibility of a customer, the usual sources of information may not be equally convenient. But whether the mistake relates to the condition of a drawer's deposit, as in the Swift Case, or as to the value of a security, as in the Michigan decision from which we have quoted, or as to the credit of a borrower, as in the case before us, it is occasioned by misapprehension as to facts which might have been ascertained, and with which a bank is presumed to have the ability to acquaint itself in the prosecution of its business. In the present instance it was not the appointment of receivers for the Dulaney Company, but the insolvency which that proceeding demonstrated, that made it desirable for the appellant to apply the company's deposits to its notes, instead of honoring its checks. Insolvency without a receivership would have produced the same situation. It does not appear from the record how long the company was in failing circumstances prior to the payment now sought to be revoked. But, if mere ignorance of the insolvency could be held to be a sufficient ground of recovery, it would make no difference in principle for what period of time that condition had existed. If the rule contended for by the appellant were to prevail, "no one," to use the language of this court in the Swift Case, "could know when he could safely receive payment of a check." There does not seem to us to be any sound or reasonable basis upon which to distinguish this case from those we have cited, in the application of the rule they announce, and to require the payees of the check here involved, who were in a much less favorable position than the appellant for knowing the responsibility of the drawer, to restore the money they have received in satisfaction of a bona fide debt. In order that the appellant may be relieved of the necessity, to which they would then be subjected, of resorting to the insolvent estate of the debtor.

The appellant relied upon the general rule that money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered. There are, of course, many cases in which recovery has been permitted on the ground of mistake, such as George's Creek Coal & I. Co. v. Allegany County, 59 Md. 255; Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Faunce, 6 Gill, 68, 46 Am. Dec. 655; Citizens' Bank v. Grafflin, 31 Md. 507, 1 Am. Rep. 66; Buchanan v. Pue, 6 Gill, 112; Baltimore v. Lefferman, 4 Gil. 425, 45 Am. Dec. 145, and other authorities cited by the appellant. In all of these the facts were quite different from those presented in cases like the one now before us, which involve exceptional considerations relating to the convenience and certainty of commercial transactions as dependent upon reliability and finality in the disposition of negotiable paper, and which accordingly constitute an exception to the general rule. The case of Second Nat. Bank v. Western Nat. Bank, 51 Md. 128, 34 Am. Rep. 300, was cited by the appellant as supporting its contention that such a mistake as the one here shown may be corrected. In that case the bank was permitted to cancel its certification of a note for payment, where it had been so marked contrary to a written order of the maker which had been overlooked, and where no rights or liabilities had been incurred or losses sustained in consequence of the error. We do not find this case at all inconsistent with that of Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Swift, supra, establishing the doctrine which must control our present decision. The cases from other jurisdictions cited by the appellant were mainly suits between members of clearing house associations, and were largely concerned with their regulations.

The court below in our opinion committed no error in directing a verdict for the defendants in accordance with their prayer, and its judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

EX PARTE JOSEPH E. FARNSWORTH.
(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 135 S. W. 535.)

Initiative and referendum — power of legislature to confer on municipality. The legislature cannot confer upon the residents of a municipal corporation the power to enact ordinances by initiative and referendum, where the Constitution delegates to it the legislative power, and merely reserves to the people the right to assemble and apply to those invested with the powers of government for redress of grievances, while it forbids any change in the form of government.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure release from custody to which applicant had been committed for alleged violation of an ordinance for the establishment of telephone rates. Applicant discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. P. Wozencraft, W. S. Bramlett, and D. A. Frank, for relator:

The act of the legislature, if it does so, vesting in the voters of the city of Dallas the power to initiate and adopt by their votes ordinances regulating the rates of telephone companies, is unconstitutional, as no provision is made therein or can be made for an investigation to determine the reasonableness of such regulation.

Mr. C. E. Lane for the State.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original writ of habeas corpus.

Applicant was arrested for violating a city ordinance of the city of Dallas, which was put into operation under what is termed the "initiative and referendum" clause contained in the charter of said city. The ordinance in question fixed rates for telephone service. The city charter of Dallas (Sp. Acts 30th Leg. Chap. 71) grants authority to the board of commissioners to determine and regulate charges, fix fares and rates of persons, firms, and corporations enjoying franchises or other privileges in that city, and to prescribe the service to be rendered. The charter also provides that this "board of commissioners," known as the "city council," shall fix and regulate the rates of water, gas, electric lights, and regulate and fix fares, tolls, and charges of local telephones and exchanges. These powers are

Note. — Initiative and referendum.

The constitutionality of this principle of government is discussed in the note to Ex parte Pfahler, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1192. Since the preparation of that note, it has been held in Ex parte Wagner, 21 Okla. 33, 95 Pac. 435, 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 197, following Kaddery v. Portland, 44 Or. 119, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222, set forth in the note above referred to, that the initiative and referendum provisions of the Oklahoma Constitution were not in conflict with that provision of the Federal Constitution which guarantees to every state a republican form of government.

In State v. Pacific States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 53 Or. 162, 99 Pac. 427, the court declared that whether the initiative and referendum provision of the Oregon Constitution was invalid because repugnant to provisions of the Federal Constitution was thoroughly considered in Kaddery v. Portland, supra, and the views of the court then and now were indicated in that opinion, and that it was needless to restate them.

In Kiernan v. Portland, — Or. —, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 112 Pac. 402, a provision of the Constitution of Oregon that the initiative and referendum powers reserved to the people by the Constitution were "further reserved to the legal voters of every municipality and district as to all local, special, and municipal legislation, of whatever character, in or for their respective municipalities and districts," was not violative of that provision of the Federal Constitution guarantying to the states a republican form of government.

In Hartig v. Seattle, 53 Wash. 432, 102 Pac. 408, it was held that, under the provision of the Constitution of Washington authorizing the cities of that state to frame a charter for their own government, consistent with and subject to the Constitution and laws of the state, a city, subject to such limitation, could undoubtedly adopt and carry into effect the initiative and referendum plan of government; "for," said the court, "it can scarcely be contended that this plan is inconsistent with a republican form of government, the central idea of which is a government by the people."

In Eckerson v. Des Moines, 137 Iowa, 452, 115 N. W. 177, the court, in discussing the initiative and referendum features of a general statute providing for the government of certain cities, said that the contention that it would be violative of that clause in the Federal Constitution guarantying a republican form of government to the states, was sufficiently disposed of by the fact that this guaranty was intended to be to the states as such, and was not intended to have any relation to systems of local government provided by the several states for the regulation of municipalities or other subdivisions. The reasoning in this case was relied upon in Walker v. Spokane, — Wash. —, 113 Pac. 775, in arriving at the same conclusion.

by the terms of the charter to be exercised by the mayor and the four commissioners, unless otherwise provided. The initiative and referendum" is also provided for in the charter. When an ordinance has been voted into operation under the referendum clause, it is also provided that said ordinance cannot be repealed or amended except by a vote of the people. This is a sufficient statement of the case.

We may condense applicant's main contention into one general proposition, to wit: The legislature is without authority to authorize a city to carry on its affairs as a municipal corporation under what is known as the "initiative and referendum," especially as applied to the fixing of rates, fares, etc. As applicant was arrested for violating the particular ordinance put into operation by the "referendum vote," its validity is the essential basis for his prosecution. Without that ordinance this prosecution could not be had. We find upon an inspection of the Constitution that the people have reserved to themselves in article 1, § 27, the right, in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for their common good, and "apply to those invested with the powers of government" for redress of grievances or other purposes by petition, address, or remonstrance. We find by the provisions of § 29 of the same article that all the powers delegated by the Constitution are "excepted out of the general powers of government," and declared to be "forever inviolate," and everything contrary thereto "shall be void." That our citizenship may do the things specified in § 27, supra, is, we think, not to be questioned, inasmuch as they expressly reserve to themselves, and have excepted out of the "general powers of the government" the matters therein specified. Under our theory of government "all power is inherent in the people," as especially set out in article 1, § 2, of the Bill of Rights. The people do not by the provisions of § 27, supra, undertake the resumption of their latent and inherent or any delegated power, but, on the contrary, provide that they may make known their wishes by assembling themselves together, or by petition, address, or remonstrance. When these matters go unheeded, the people are not without ample power to resume their original authority or control those invested with authority. The Constitution can be amended and changed to suit occasion, and their "inherent power" thus exercised. Under the provisions of article 15 of the Constitution, the higher state officials may be impeached and ousted from office. At recurring elections, the people may set aside official incumbents, and invest "the powers of government" in those who will faithfully execute the delegated trust and instruct legislators for the changing of unjust, oppressive, or undesirable legislation. If those "invested with the powers of government" are not included within the rule of impeachment, they may be charged with dereliction, incompetency, or corruption, and tried before such proper tribunal as is provided by the Constitution or legislation thereunder.

In the way provided in § 27, art. 1, and to this extent, the "initiative" may be considered as within the contemplation of the Constitution, but it is not therein provided that the people may resume their original and "inherent power." Such idea is excluded by the language employed in § 27, supra. The resumption of such inherent power is provided for and to be exercised under the terms of article 17 of the Constitution. In article 2 of the Constitution we find it ordained that the powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments, with delegation of power to the legislature to enact law; and in article 3 these matters of legislation are amplified, and in article 1, § 27, we ascertain how the people make known their wishes to "those invested with the powers of government." All authority in Texas acts from delegated power, and is to be controlled in official action by such authority. The people themselves are bound by the Constitution until changed as provided in the instrument itself. In other words, the Constitution furnishes the rule and basis for the action, not only of the people who made it, but "those who are invested with the powers of government" under it. While § 27 of article 1 may be considered in the nature of a qualified "initiative," it does not confer upon the legislature the authority to inaugurate and put into operation what is known as the "referendum." On the contrary, it refutes and excludes such conclusion. Under the terms of this section, legislation cannot be referred to the people for enactment by their vote. That the referendum is adverse to our constitutional form of government as a means of putting into operation enactments by the legislature has been expressly decided in this state as early as State v. Swisher, 17 Tex. 441. That case has been recognized and followed in subsequent decisions. See Stanfield v. State, 83 Tex. 317, 18 S. W. 577, and also Werner v. Galveston, 72 Tex. 22, 7 S. W. 726, 12 S. W. 159. In the last-cited case, Judge Gaines, writing the opinion, uses this language: "It is a well-settled principle that the legislature cannot delegate its authority to make laws, by submitting the question of their enactment to a popular vote." These decisions have been followed by this court in its decisions. In Ex parte Massey, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. at page 67, 122 Am. St. Rep. 784, 92 S. W. at page 1089, Judge Henderson uses this language: "As early as the case of State v.

Swisher, supra, it was held that the legislature could not delegate to voters or the people the power to pass laws, in the absence of some constitutional provision authorizing this." In the Swisher Case, supra, this language is found: "But, besides the fact that the Constitution does not provide for such reference to the voters to give validity to the acts of the legislature, we regard it as repugnant to the principles of the representative form of government by our Constitution. Under our Constitution, the principle of lawmaking is that laws are made by the people, not directly, but by and through their chosen representatives. By the act under consideration, this principle is subverted, and the law is proposed to be made at last by the popular vote of the people, leading inevitably to what was intended to be avoided,—confusion and great popular excitement in the enactment of laws."

It is equally certain that the people cannot be reinvested by the legislature with the functions of legislation conferred by them on a department of government, nor can the legislature render the enactment of a law dependent upon the acceptance by the people by popular vote. See cases already cited. Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 17 Am. Rep. 425; Morford v. Unger, 8 Iowa, 82; Santo v. State, 2 Iowa, 165, 63 Am. Dec. 487; State v. Beneke, 9 Iowa, 203; State ex rel. Dome v. Wilcox, 45 Mo. 458; Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 283; Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. 77. This inability arises no less from the joint principle applicable to every delegated authority requiring knowledge, discretion, and rectitude in its exercise, than from the positive provisions of the Constitution itself. The people in whom the power resided have voluntarily transferred its exercise, and have positively ordained that it shall be invested in the legislature. To allow the legislature to cast it back on the people would be a subversion of the Constitution, and would change its distribution of power without the action or consent of those who created the Constitution. See Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. 77. Locke's Appeal, 72 Pa. 508, 13 Am. Rep. 716, is authority for the clearly stated proposition that, if the legislature can delegate the lawmaking to a majority of the voters, it can as well confer such power upon the minority. This doctrine would inevitably lead to the conclusion that the legislature has as much authority to refer such question to a single individual as to the whole people. If the power to refer is conceded, the number to whom referred would make but little or no difference. At least, it would but resolve itself into a question of legislative policy. There is to be noted, however, a real or an apparent exception to this rule or 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

doctrine. However, when correctly viewed, if it is an exception, it is an innovation on the general principle which serves to emphasize and accentuate the truth of the main doctrine announced. This apparent exception is an innovation always to be found in the Constitution itself, and notably in those provisions of that instrument which relate to local option laws in regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors and preventing stock running at large. Where this is the case, the referendum is the only rule of final enactment. The people under such exception by majority adopt or vitalize a legislative act in the territory to be affected. Unless expressly authorized so to do, these laws cannot be enacted. State v. Swisher, supra, and cases already cited. Referring to the people for their approval, the matters provided in such exceptions serve to emphasize the fact that in no other contingencies can such referendum be had. These exceptions manifest the correctness, certainty, and exactions of the general rule that the laws must be enacted by the legislature. This doctrine also flows from the very framework of our form of government. It is the basic principle and theory of republican form of government as set out in the Constitution, and right here it may be observed that there is a wide distinction to be noted between the "right of petition and remonstrance," provided for in the Bill of Rights, and the referring to a vote of the people the enactment of laws. Ours is a government of division and distribution of powers and authority. Ours is also a representative democracy; that is, it is republican in form of government as contradistinguished from a social or pure democracy on one hand, and a government by the minority on the other, and excludes all others save and except one by the people through their selected representatives. The transfer of the enactment of laws to the people, to be made operative by their votes, is therefore directly subversive of our constitutional form of government, and can only be upheld when expressly authorized by some provision to be found in the Constitution itself.

Article 1, § 2, of the Bill of Rights, prohibits any change in our ordained form of government, even by the people themselves, which would be destructive of a republican form of government, and they expressly there reserve to themselves the "inalienable right" and authority to alter, change, or abolish such ordained form of government. Therefore, not only was there no power granted to the legislature to in any manner change the form of government, but it is expressly withheld and retained by the people in themselves exclusively. One of the most dangerous, if not fatal, propositions to our form of government, is that the legislative department may "change from an immediate state of procuration and delegation of power to a course of acting as from original power." This, it has been said, "is the way in which all magistracies have been perverted from their purpose." Any change by any department of government from that ordained in the Constitution is a pure assumption of power in conflict with and directly subversive of the Constitution. If the legislature may authorize referendum, then the result of such referendum would or could suspend legislative acts or even the Constitution itself. This is not to be entertained. The legislature only may suspend laws by virtue of article 1, § 28, of the Constitution, but it cannot suspend the Constitution, nor can it authorize any other department of the government—municipal or state—to suspend any law. And attempt to authorize a municipal body to suspend a law would be in plain derogation of said § 28. To hold that a law could be suspended by the referendum, or enacted by the referendum, would or might easily result in the deprivation of our citizenship of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The ordinance in question may be a fair illustration and verification of that statement. Such a proceeding would condemn without charges or specifications, without a hearing, or the forms of a trial, in the absence of evidence, without a jury and even without a court, to be exercised only by the secret inquisition of the ballot box. The referendum not only sets at defiance these constitutional guaranties, but it as well destroys the purpose and authority of the legislative department; or, on the other hand, may make that body omnipotent and superior to the Constitution, from which its authority is derived. It would reinvest the people with the functions of legislation conferred upon that department of government. It is also a direct attack upon the judicial system provided by the Constitution. The courts were ordained for the purpose of the trial of causes, awarding to the citizenship tribunals in which their matters may be tried and adjusted. Referendum refuses a hearing. It takes the place of the constituted judiciary, and tries the rights of property through the ballot box. By this means every officer in the state from governor to constable may be ousted from office and declared incompetent or corrupt, without charges, evidence, or trial. The property of the citizen may be confiscated, and he made a bankrupt without a hearing and without due process of law. Successful revolt from a monarchical form of government eliminated the idea of minority rule, and the provisions of the constitutional form of government discarded the idea of a pure democracy and rejected it as vicious. These matters were all discussed at the inception of the government, and fully decided. The referendum, therefore, is wrong, first, as being directly subversive of the principles of republican government; second, violative of the Constitution itself, and not to be entertained, unless expressly provided in the Constitution; and, third, its most insidious and far-reaching danger may be found in the fact, that it is made to begin at the bottom of our framework of government, in the small divisions, and thence will undermine the entire fabric. It is in the small divisions of territory and their local governments that we expect to find the sentiment of our people, as a rule, formed and crystallized into definite shape, and it is there the most dangerous and insidious attacks are engendered and made on existing plans of government. The consequences of constantly or oft-recurring local elections incident to the referendum plan should be avoided as most dangerous. They engender unnecessary strife and bitterness, bring confusion which destroys the peace of the community, and this generally without hope of corresponding good results. They have the tendency to bring disgust with existing conditions, which sooner or later may, and probably will, end in or produce the occasion for a movement to substitute for the present form of representative government a much stronger one to be dominated by a minority rule at the hands of a select few or even a single individual. What has been said may also be said as to the baneful effect the referendum would have in its destructive influence on local self-government. Local self-government is that, and that only, which is provided or authorized by the Constitution, is to be found in the delegation of authority, is based on the idea of representative government, and cannot under any circumstances under our Constitution be a pure democracy. All government with us finds its initial source in the Constitution, not outside of it, and any government that is in contravention or subversive of the Constitution is necessarily vicious and void. Our municipal government is to be upheld in consonance and conformity with the general plan of government and in harmony with it. If what has been stated is correct, then the ordinance in question is void. It deprives those whom it affects of their constitutional rights and their rights as citizens to be heard when their property is sought to be taken or hampered with such rates and charges as would prove destructive. Any law, state or municipal, which would undertake to deprive a man of his life, liberty, or property without giving him a hearing, or in any manner affect his rights without a hearing, would necessarily be vicious and unconstitutional. Ours is a country of law, and, whenever a man is affected in his life, liberty, or property, he has the right to resort to some legal tribunal where those matters can be honestly and fairly adjudicated.

The ordinance being void, it is ordered that applicant be discharged from custody.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

JOSEPH W. SELVAGE, Appt.,

v.

HENRY M. TALBOTT.

(— Ind. —, 95 N. E. 114.)

Broker — written employment — police power.

1. The police power extends to requiring contracts to compensate one for procuring a purchaser for real estate to be in writing.

Constitutional law — requiring broker's contracts to be in writing.

2. A statute requiring the employment of one to secure a purchaser of real estate to be in writing is not in conflict with a constitutional provision that no person's property or particular services shall be taken without just compensation.

Same — equal privileges and immunities.

3. No unequal grant or privileges or immunities, contrary to the Constitution, is effected by a statute requiring contracts to make compensation for procuring a purchaser for real estate to be in writing.

Same — Federal Constitution — interference with state police power.

4. A state statute requiring contracts to make compensation for procuring purchasers for real estate to be in writing is not forbidden by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, since that Amendment was not intended to interfere with the police power of the states.

Contract — implication — statutory requirement.

5. No contract to compensate one for services can be implied where the statute requires an express contract to do so to be in writing.

Note. — Power of legislature to require that contracts for commissions for finding a purchaser for real estate shall be in writing.

Although statutory provisions of the kind in question exist in several states, apparently the only other decisions as to their constitutionality are Baker v. Gillan, 68 Neb. 368, 94 N. W. 615, and Ross v. Kaufman, 48 Wash. 678, 94 Pac. 641, the portions of the opinions in which, bearing upon the question, are set forth in SELVAGE v. TALBOTT.

Same — quantum meruit.

6. No recovery can be had on quantum meruit for services rendered in procuring a purchaser for real estate, where there is no written contract to make compensation, as required by statute.

(May 23, 1911.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County in defendant's favor in an action to recover for services rendered in procuring a purchaser for real estate. Affirmed.

Ann. Cas. 975.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant sued appellee for services, on an oral contract, in negotiating a sale of real estate. The complaint is in three paragraphs, the first of which declares on an agreement for a commission of 2½ per cent on the amount of the sale price, the second on an agreement for a reasonable compensation, and the third is based solely on the quantum meruit. The latter paragraph alleges the rendition of services by plaintiff to defendant at his special instance and request in finding for him a purchaser of certain real estate, the reasonable value of the services, and that the claim is due and unpaid. To each paragraph of complaint the lower court sustained a demurrer for insufficient facts. This action of the court is here assigned as error.

It is conceded by appellant that the lower court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the first and second paragraphs of complaint of § 1 of the act of March 5, 1901, relating to contracts for services in selling real estate, is a valid enactment, but appellant claims that this section is unconstitutional and void because it conflicts with §§ 21 and 23 of article 1 of the Constitution of Indiana, and also with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Appellant further insists that, even though the act in controversy is constitutional, it applies only to express contracts, and therefore the third paragraph of complaint, which is on an implied obligation, is sufficient to repel a demurrer.

Appellee contends that the statute in controversy is valid, and that the contract sued on is invalid because not in writing. The section of the statute in question reads as follows: "That no contracts for the payment of any sum of money, or thing of value, as and for a commission or reward for the finding or procuring, by one person, of a purchaser for the real estate of another, shall be valid, unless the same shall be in writing, signed by the owner of such real estate, or his legally appointed and duly qualified representative." Acts 1901, p. 104; Burns's Stat. 1908, § 7463. Section 21, art. 1, of our Constitution, is as follows: "No man's particular services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation; nor, except in case of the state, without such compensation first assessed and tendered." Section 23 of the same instrument reads as follows: "The general assembly shall not grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens."

At the outset, it may be conceded that this statute is in derogation of the common law, and therefore must be strictly construed. Thornburg v. America Strawboard Co. (1895) 141 Ind. 443, 50 Am. St. Rep. 334, 40 N. E. 1062.

It may be further conceded, as appellant contends, that, when the general assembly makes a classification of the subjects of legislation, it must have some reasonable basis on which to stand, and must operate equally upon all within the class; that the reason for the classification must inhere in the subject-matter, and must be natural and substantial. A proper classification treats all brought under its influence alike under the same conditions, and must embrace all within the class to which it is naturally related. Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough, 163 Ind. 671, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 418, 80 N. E. 529, and cases cited.

But it cannot be questioned that the state, under its police power, has the right to regulate any and all kinds of business, to protect the public health, morals, and welfare, subject to the restrictions of reasonable classification. Walker v. Jameson (1894) 140 Ind. 591, 28 L.R.A. 679, 49 Am. St. Rep. 222, 37 N. E. 402, 39 N. E. 869; Adams Exp. Co. v. State (1903) 161 Ind. 706, 67 N. E. 1092; Seelyville Coal & Min. Co. v. McGlosson (1906) 166 Ind. 561, 117

Am. St. Rep. 396, 77 N. E. 1044, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 234; Knight & J. Co. v. Miller (1909) 172 Ind. 27, 87 N. E. 823, 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1146. Several states have laws similar to the one in controversy. In Baker v. Gillan, 68 Neb. 368, 94 N. W. 615, the supreme court of Nebraska, in deciding a case involving the matter in issue here, used the following language: "The only question suggested by the petition in error and discussed in the briefs is whether an oral agreement like the one upon which plaintiff relies is valid and enforceable. The first section of the act of 1897 (Sess. Laws 1897, chap. 57, p. 304) is as follows: 'Every contract for the sale of lands, between the owner thereof and any broker or agent employed to sell the same, shall be void, unless the contract is in writing and subscribed by the owner of the land and the broker or agent, and such contract shall describe the land to be sold, and set forth the compensation to be allowed by the owner in case of sale by the broker or agent.' It is conceded that the case falls within the provisions of this section, and that, if the law is constitutional, the judgment is right. We think the law is constitutional, and that the argument in support of the claim that it is special legislation is obviously unsound. It is, of course, competent for the legislature to classify objects of legislation, and if the classification is reasonable, and not artificial or arbitrary, it will be upheld as a legitimate exercise of legislative power. The statute here considered is only a new instance of the exercise of that power. It may be that it is without exact precedent, but it has many familiar analogies in the legislation of this and other states. It is no more special legislation than are those provisions of the statute of frauds which require certain contracts to be evidenced by writing. It is in fact a virtual extension or enlargement of the statute of frauds, and like that statute, was designed to prevent the bringing of actions which experience had shown were often conceived in fraud and maintained by perjury. It purports to be, and it is, a general law. Its operation is uniform throughout the state. It affects alike all persons under the same conditions and circumstances, and its object being the suppression of an evil believed to be peculiarly connected with the class of contracts with which it deals, it is not, in our judgment, open to the constitutional objection urged against it." In Ross v. Kaufman (1908) 48 Wash. 678, 94 Pac. 641, the supreme court of the state of Washington, in passing on the constitutionality of a statute similar to ours, said: "The appellants argue here that the act of 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 110), which requires contracts of this kind to be in writing, is unconstitutional because, first, it is class legislation; and, second, it is an unwarranted interference with the rights of contract. Neither of these reasons requires extended notice. All class legislation is not prohibited by the Constitution. . . . This statute does not affect the right of contract further than to require certain contracts to be in writing; and this is without doubt within the legislative power. Otherwise the legislature could require no contract to be in writing. We think the act is constitutional." It is a matter of common knowledge that before the enactment of this statute numerous suits were being instituted from time to time by agents and brokers who claimed commissions in sales of land on the ground that they had been instrumental in procuring purchasers, and these claims were often resisted by the defendants, because, as alleged, there was absolutely no basis for the same; on the other hand, brokers and agents complained that owners, when sales were once effected by the agents, often after an expenditure of great effort, were given to the repudiation of their honest obligation. An examination of court records will reveal the contradictory testimony of the interested parties in such cases, and show the extreme difficulty imposed on courts and juries in ascertaining the truth. No doubt the principal motive which actuated the members of the general assembly in enacting the statute was to put an end to such disputes and prevent fraud and perjury, and we believe the enactment is well within the police powers of the state.

Appellant maintains that the classification in this act is purely artificial and arbitrary; that it singles out a particular class of agents,—those engaged in real estate sales,—and imposes restrictions on them not imposed on any other class of agents; that, in fact, it only applies to those real estate agents engaged in the selling, and not to those engaged in the purchase, of real estate. In regard to the latter claim, it is sufficient to say that it is a matter of common knowledge that brokers usually look to the owner of the real estate for compensation, rather than to the purchaser. This is a sufficient reason to warrant the exclusion of agency contracts for the purchase of land from the operation of the law. The act in controversy is not in conflict with either § 21 or § 23 of article 1 of our Constitution. New Albany v. New Albany Street R. Co. 172 Ind. 487, 87 N. E. 1084.

Nor is this statute in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. This Amendment, broad as it is, was not designed to interfere with the police power of the state to regulate business and occupations for the promotion of the peace, morals, and welfare of the people. Knight & J. Co. v. Miller (1909) 172 Ind. 27, 87 N. E. 823, 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1146; Cincinnati, I. & W. R. Co. v. Connersville, 170 Ind. 316, 83 N. E. 503; Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, 172 Ind. 423, 87 N. E. 229; Smith v. Stephens, 173 Ind. 564, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 704, 91 N. E. 167.

No error was committed by the lower court in sustaining the demurrer to the third paragraph of complaint. Where the law makes an express oral contract for services invalid, it will not create, by implication, a liability for such services. It is admitted by counsel for appellant that this rule is declared in Beahler v. Clark (1903) 32 Ind. App. 222, 68 N. E. 613, but counsel claims it is erroneous. Where the question has been raised in other injunctions, a similar rule has been adopted. Blair v. Austin, 71 Neb. 401, 98 N. W. 1040; Leimbach v. Regner, 70 N. J. L. 608, 57 Atl. 138; Jamison v. Hyde, 141 Cal. 109, 74 Pac. 695; Keith v. Smith, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 975, and note (46 Wash. 131, 89 Pac. 473). In Zimmerman v. Zehendner, 164 Ind. 466, 73 N. E. 920, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 655, this court said: "In short, the contract, in so far as it relates to this action, is only partially in writing. The important feature—the amount of commission to be paid—is to be ascertained by parol testimony in regard to an understanding which may prove to be a misunderstanding,—the exact thing which the statute was designed to prevent."

A contract partly written and partly verbal is a parol contract, and contracts required by law to be in writing must be wholly written to be enforceable.

Under this statute, no recovery can be had on the quantum meruit.

There is no error in the record. Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
App't.,
v.
W. T. BERRY.

(141 Ky. 477, 133 S. W. 212.)

Obstructing justice — spiriting away witness.

One who persuades a person having knowledge of the commission of a crime to leave the jurisdiction of the court without disclosing his knowledge to the grand jury is guilty of obstructing justice, although such person had not been subpoenaed and was under no obligation to appear before the grand jury.

(January 10, 1911.)

APPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hickman County sustaining a demurrer to, and dismissing, an indictment charging defendant with obstructing justice. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Breathitt, Attorney General, Tom B. McGregor, and Robert L. Smith for the Commonwealth.

Hobson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. T. Berry was indicted in the Hickman circuit court for the offense of obstructing justice. The circuit court sustained his demurrer to the indictment, and dismissed it. The commonwealth appeals.

The offense is set out in the indictment in these words: "The said W. T. Berry in Note. — Procuring one having knowledge of offense to leave the jurisdiction.

This note does not include cases where the person in question had been subpoenaed or recognized to appear as a witness.

It seems to be well settled, although the decisions are not numerous, that one who procures a person having knowledge of an offense to leave the jurisdiction of the court to avoid giving evidence is guilty of obstructing public justice, although such person has not been subpoenaed or bound by recognizance to appear as a witness. This offense being one against the very object and purposes for which courts are established, and not merely against their process, it is immaterial that the person procured to absent himself had not been regularly summoned or legally bound to attend as a witness. The case relied on in the decision of Com. v. Berry are sufficiently set out in the opinion therein.

The question as to the effect of the fact that a person procured to absent himself had not been subpoenaed or recognized to appear as a witness has more often arisen in cases under statutes designed to prevent interference with witnesses.

Thus, one who offers and pays to the prosecuting witness in a pending criminal proceeding a sum of money to leave the county and go beyond the jurisdiction and process of the court, and not appear against the defendant or testify as a witness against him, is guilty of the statutory offense of attempting to corrupt a witness, although it is not alleged that such witness was either subpoenaed or recognized to appear and testify as a witness in the case. Christman v. State, 18 Neb. 107, 24 N. W. 434, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 175.

And one who attempts, by bribing, to induce a witness to absent himself for the

the said county of Hickman on the 11th day of February, 1910, and before the finding of this indictment, did unlawfully obstruct the action of the grand jury of Hickman county, Kentucky, which was duly impaneled and sworn as such and engaged in investigating the commission of crimes in Hickman county, Kentucky, by persuading, contriving, and intending to impede and obstruct said investigation, did then and there unlawfully and corruptly entice, solicit, and persuade one T. J. Moore to absent himself from Hickman county, and to get beyond the jurisdiction of the Hickman circuit court, and not appear before the said grand jury, and give evidence before them concerning crimes they were then and there investigating, and which was known to the said T. J. Moore, and said T. J. Moore having appeared in Hickman county at the request of the circuit judge of the Hickman circuit court to give said evidence, and this fact was well known to the said W. T. Berry at the time he solicited and persuaded the said T. J. Moore to leave Hickman county, and said persuading, enticing, and soliciting was done for the unlawful purpose of obstructing said grand jury in their investigation of said crimes, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Kentucky."

No brief has been filed for the appellee, but it seems that the circuit court sustained the demurrer to the indictment on the ground that it does not show that the witness had been subpoenaed or was legally bound to appear before the grand jury. Grand juries are impaneled to inquire into offenses committed in their counties. If persons may, with impunity, spirit away the witnesses before they can be legally summoned, the effectiveness of grand juries would be practically destroyed. Those who conduct gaming houses and the like may anticipate that the grand jury will investigate these matters, and, if they may spirit away the witnesses just before the grand jury meets, legal prosecutions of these matters may be thus stifled. The obstruction of legal justice was a misdemeanor at common law, and the spiriting away of a witness to prevent him from testifying was always regarded as a phase of the offense. In State v. Keyes, 8 Vt. 66, 30 Am. Dec. 455, the supreme court of Vermont had before it the precise question, and in disposing of it the court, by Judge Redfield said: "If the respondent knew of his being purpose of avoiding giving evidence in a certain pending criminal case, is guilty of the statutory offense of bribing "any witness," although the person sought to be bribed had not been summoned as a witness. State v. Biebusch, 32 Mo. 276.

Under the United States statute providing for the punishment of "every person who corruptly . . . endeavors to influence . . . any witness . . . in any court of the United States in the discharge of his duty, or corruptly . . . obstructs or impedes, or endeavors to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein," one is guilty who has procured another to leave the country to evade the service of an outstanding grand jury subpoena. Heinze v. United States, 104 C. C. A. 510, 181 Fed. 322.

But in United States v. Bittinger, Fed. Cas. No. 14,598, it was held that one who corruptly influences another to secrete or so dispose of himself as to prevent process to be served on him as a witness is not guilty under such statute, unless he knows that the person so influenced has been designated as one to be used as a witness, either by the issuing of a subpoena, or by the indorsement of his name on a complaint lodged with a United States commissioner, charging an offense against the laws of the United States.

In Texas, it has been held that one who offers to give a material and important witness in a pending criminal case a certain sum of money if he will leave the county, and keep out of the way, and not appear as a witness in such case, is guilty of the statutory offense of offering to bribe a witness to avoid the service of a subpoena, although no subpoena or other legal process for such witness has yet been issued. Jackson v. State, 43 Tex. 421; Scoggins v. State, 18 Tex. App. 298.

But in State v. Hughes, 43 Tex. 518, it was held that an indictment charging merely that defendant, knowing a certain person to be a witness, offered him certain money and property to secrete himself and be absent from the court at a certain term, and not be a witness before the grand jury at that term nor a witness against the defendant in the court at that term, does not charge such statutory offense of offering to bribe a witness "to disobey a subpoena or other legal process, or to avoid the service of the same by secreting himself, or by any other means."

In Com. v. Bailey, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 583, 82 S. W. 299, it was held that one who offers a witness on an indictment certain property if he will absent himself from the court, and not testify as a witness on the trial, is guilty of bribery, although the witness sought to be bribed has not been summoned or recognized as a witness.

In Com. v. Reynolds, 14 Gray, 87, 74 Am. Dec. 665, it was held that the summoning of the witness, being alleged only by way of inducement to the substance of a charge of dissuading, hindering, and preventing him from appearing pursuant to a summons to give evidence of what he knows relating to the matter of a certain complaint against the defendant, need not be alleged with the same certainty as to time and place as the substance of the charge.

a witness and about to be compelled, in due course of law, to attend the trial, and endeavored to dissuade and hinder him therefrom, in the language of the indictment, his offense is complete. In this case, knowledge is carried home to both. It will not do for a moment to admit that the respondent might anticipate the officers of justice, and secrete, bribe, or intimidate the state witnesses from attending the trial of public prosecutions, and not be liable for any act done until a subpoena had been legally served upon the witness. This view will leave untouched the most corrupting field for offenses of this character."

This case was followed by the court of errors and appeals of Delaware in State v. Horner, 1 Marv. (Del.) 511, 26 Atl. 73, 41 Atl. 139. The court by Robinson, Chief Justice, said: "The contention is that, in order to constitute the offense of spiriting away a witness, the party persuaded must have been summoned or recognized to appear. It is not denied that offense of spiriting away a witness is an indictable offense at common law. It was early recognized as being absolutely essential to the existence of courts and their efficiency in performing the functions for which they were created, that such offenses against them should be punishable as crimes. The great object of their existence is the ascertainment of truth in its relations to the transactions of men, and they can only do so fairly and impartially when all persons having knowledge of the transactions inquired of are brought or allowed to come before them for examination without let or hindrance from anyone. . . . Nor do we think that this offense can only be committed where the witness has been legally summoned or is at the time bound by recognition to appear. The offense is committed, not against the process of the courts, but against the sole object and purpose of their existence and the reason of their being, which, as we have said before, is the ascertainment of the truth; and it is indictable, because it is an attempt to stifle the truth, and not because it is a contempt of any process of the courts."

The same rule was followed by the supreme court of Maine in State v. Holt, 84 Me. 509, 24 Atl. 951, where the defendant had gotten a witness drunk to prevent him from testifying. A conviction was sustained, although the witness had not been subpoenaed. The court said: "Intentionally and designedly to get a witness drunk, for the express purpose of preventing his appearance before the grand jury, or in open court, is such an interference with the proceedings in the administration of justice as will constitute an indictable offense, and one for which the guilty party ought to be promptly and severely punished. And it is important that it should be understood that the suppression of evidence by such, or by any similarly wicked and corrupt means, cannot be practised with impunity."

In State v. Desforges, 47 La. Ann. 1201, 17 So. 814, the supreme court of Louisiana, having the same question before it under a statute which was only declaratory of the common law, said: "If the prosecution is in contemplation, and, aware that it is about to be begun, a party, with the view to defeat the investigation, approaches one known to be an indispensable witness, and by bribes and persuasion attempts to prevent him from appearing or giving testimony, in our view the crime of guilty persuasion is accomplished."

The supreme court of Washington, in State v. Bringgold, 40 Wash. 20, 82 Pac. 132, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 716, reached the same conclusion, and in this opinion it is stated that there are no decisions to the contrary. See also Wharton, Crim. Law, § 2287.

The course of public justice must not be impeded. The gist of the offense is not a contempt of the court, or an abuse of its process, but the obstruction of justice. He who knows that another will be witness, or has reason to know it, and, so knowing, causes the witness to absent himself for the purpose of preventing his testifying, is guilty of obstructing justice, although the witness may not have been subpoenaed, or his testimony, if given, would not have been important. The law does not tolerate that its proceedings shall be stifled, and the running off of a witness to stifle a prosecution is none the less an offense because it is done before the grand jury is impaneled. We therefore conclude that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the indictment.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the circuit court to overrule the demurrer.

RUTH H. COBE.

(— Mass. —, 94 N. E. 476.)

Will — annuity — right to principal.

1. The beneficiary is entitled to receive the principal of a fund in due course of administration, where the will directs the laying out by trustees of a certain sum in the purchase of an annuity for him.

Executor — annuity — interest.

2. A bequest of a certain fund to be expended in the purchasing of an annuity for the legatee carries interest from the expiration of the period applicable to bequests generally, and not from the death of the testator.

Party — right of legatee — dispute as to interest.

3. To a proceeding by executors to determine whether or not a legatee is entitled to immediate possession of a sum devised for the purchase of an annuity for him, the residuary legatees are not necessary parties, where the only question in which they are interested is the matter of interest on the bequest, as to which there is no dispute between them and the annuitant.

And even where discretionary power only was given the trustees to lay out a sum in purchasing an irredeemable annuity, it has been held that the trustees properly paid the principal to the annuitants. Messeena v. Carr, L. R. 9 Eq. 260, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 216, 22 L. T. N. S. 3, 18 Week. Rep. 416.

It has been said that the giving of an absolute and unqualified annuity is the same in effect as giving a legacy of a sum 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the determination of the full bench, of a petition by the executors of the will of Herbert F. Hanson, deceased, for the construction of that part of the will containing provision for respondent. Decree for respondent.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank K. Linscott, for petitioners: The doctrine followed by the courts of England, that, under certain circumstances, an annuitant has the right to elect to receive payment of the fund in full, or to receive only the payment of the annuity, does not apply here.

Wemyss v. White, 159 Mass. 484, 34 N. E. 718; Gray, Restraints on Alienation of Property, 2d ed. § 85a.

The trust in the hands of the executors is not a dry one that should be terminat-that will purchase the annuity. Re Brunning [1909] 1 Ch. 276, 78 L. J. Ch. N. S. 75, 99 L. T. N. S. 918; Re Robbins [1907] 2 Ch. 8, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 531, 96 L. T. N. S. 755 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 485; Dawson v. Hearn, 1 Russ. & M. 606, Tamlyn, 465, 9 L. J. Ch. 249; Bayley v. Bishop, 9 Ves. Jr. 6, 7 Revised Rep. 132.

And the basis of the decisions allowing the annuitant to receive the corpus in lieu of the annuity is that it would be idle form for the court to direct the purchase of an annuity where the annuitant might, by reselling immediately, render the direction and act nugatory, and the court will not compel the performance of vain acts. This rule is expressly applied in the following cases: PARKER v. COBE; Reid v. Brown, 54 Misc. 481, 106 N. Y. Supp. 27; Re Brunning [1909] 1 Ch. 276, 78 L. J. Ch. N. S. 75, 99 L. T. N. S. 918; Re Mabbett [1891] 1 Ch. 707, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 279, 64 L. T. N. S. 447, 39 Week. Rep. 537; Yates v. Yates, 28 Beav. 637, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 872, 6 Jur. N. S. 1023, 3 L. T. N. S. 9; Ford v. Batley, 17 Beav. 303, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 225; Dawson v. Hearn, 1 Russ. & M. 606, Tamlyn, 465, 9 L. J. Ch. 249; Barnes v. Rowley, 3 Ves. Jr. 305.

But where the annuity is not absolute, there seems to be a conflict as to whether the annuitant is entitled to receive the principal in lieu of the purchase of the annuity.

Thus, in Wright v. Callender, 2 De G. M. & G. 652, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 787, 16 Jur. 647, where the testator directed the investment of funds sufficient to produce an annuity for life, and then the same to fall into the residue, it was held that the annuitant was not entitled to have the annuity valued and the amount of the valuation paid to him, it being said that the annuitant, as against those entitled to the residuary estate, could not demand such valuation and payment over.

And in Re Grove, 1 Giff. 74, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 536, 5 Jur. N. S. 855, 7 Week.

Clafin v. Clafin, 149 Mass. 19, 3 L.R.A. 370, 14 Am. St. Rep. 393, 20 N. E. 454; Young v. Snow, 167 Mass. 287, 45 N. E. 686; Danahy v. Noonan, 176 Mass. 467, 57 N. E. 679; Hoffman v. New England Trust Co. 187 Mass. 205, 72 N. E. 952.

To terminate the trust and pay to the beneficiary the fund in toto would defeat the intention of the testator, and would be contrary to the principles of law.

Saunderson v. Stearns, 6 Mass. 37; Young v. Snow, 167 Mass. 287, 45 N. E. 686;

Rep. 522, it was held that a gift to executors of money to purchase an annuity, with directions to pay the same for the sole and separate use of the annuitant, did not entitle him to the corpus of the fund. The decision was upon the ground that there was nothing in the will to indicate an intention to give the legatee such corpus, and that there must be a declaration to that effect before the annuitant can have a sufficient sum appropriated to answer the annuity, the court proceeding upon the presumption that an annuity is for life only, unless otherwise provided.

But in Kerr v. Middlesex Hospital, 2 De G. M. & G. 576, it was held that a direction to purchase an annuity out of an estate renders the annuity perpetual, and entitles the annuitant to the corpus. The principle upon which the Grove Case was decided was referred to and distinguished in the following language by the lord chancellor: "It is perfectly settled that if an annuity be given simpliciter, that is, to one generally, a life interest only passes. It is equally, I believe, undisputed, that if an annuity be directed to be provided out of the proceeds of property, or out of property generally, if an annuity is to be brought into existence by the application of property, and that annuity is given to a party generally, he will take the property appropriated to purchase the annuity, and therefore the annuity in perpetuity, if purchased."

A conflict of authority also arises as to the effect of a stipulation for forfeiture of an annuity upon the happening of certain contingencies.

Thus, in Hatton v. May, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 148, 24 Week. Rep. 754, where it was expressly provided that the annuitant should not elect to receive the price or value of the annuity in lieu thereof, and that it should cease and be void if he should in any manner dispose of or anticipate it or any part thereof, it was held that such restrictions were effectual, and that the annuitant was not entitled to the value of the annuity. Power v. Hayne, L. R. 8 Eq. 262, 17 Week. Rep. 782, and Re Draper, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 942, 58 L. T. N. S. 942, 36 Week. Rep. 783, are to the same effect. See also Carr v. Ingleby, 1 De G. & S. 362, where the annuity was given subject to the happening of a con-

Brown v. Wright, 168 Mass. 506, 47 N. E. 413.

The testator, by using the word "annuity," made his intention sufficiently clear that respondent, Cobe, should not have the sum in gross; in using the word "annuity," he used it, not as it is understood in England, but as it is understood in Massachusetts.

Cummings v. Cummings, 146 Mass. 501, 16 N. E. 401; Re Hooper, 120 Mass. 102.

If the court shall find that the respondent, Cobe, is entitled to payment of said sum outright as a legacy, then she will be tingency, and it was held that the annuitant was not entitled to the corpus. These decisions are upon two grounds: first, that the intention of the testator must govern; and, second, that if the corpus were paid over and the annuitant violated the forfeiture clause, the executors would be liable over again to the testator's estate.

But in Day v. Day, 1 Drew, 569, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 878, 17 Jur. 586, it was held that such a restriction on alienation and anticipation did not affect the question, and that the annuitant's representatives were entitled to the corpus where the annuitant died without having violated the forfeiture clause. But this case was severely criticized in the Hearn and Power Cases.

And again in Hunt-Foulston v. Furber, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 285, 24 Week. Rep. 756, where it was directed that the annuitant should not be entitled to have the value of his annuity in lieu thereof, and that it should cease and revert upon any attempt to sell, it was held that the annuitant was absolutely entitled to the annuity, the court saying: "Where a testator makes an absolute gift by will to an individual, he cannot take it away in a subsequent part of the will, unless he uses clear and distinct language to that effect. No doubt there was an intention to prevent the annuitant from selling the annuity, and also an attempt to make the fund form part of the residuary estate; but there being a previous absolute gift, the latter intention is inconsistent with the gift itself."

And to the same effect is Stokes v. Cheek, 28 Beav. 620, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 922, where it was held that a provision following a direction to purchase an annuity, that the annuitant should not "be allowed to accept the value of the annuity in lieu thereof," was ineffectual, and that the annuitant was entitled to receive the principal instead of the annuity. (Quoted with approval in Reid v. Brown, 54 Misc. 481, 106 N. Y. Supp. 27.)

And in Woodmeston v. Walker, 2 Russ. & M. 197, 9 L. J. Ch. 257, where the annuity was given without power to sell or assign the same by anticipation, a similar conclusion was reached, but there was no gift over, and the naked prohibition was not guarded by any clause of forfeiture.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is settled law of England that a bequest of money to be used in the purchase of an annuity gives the legatee a right to the money, and he can insist that the annuity shall not be bought. Yates v. Compton, 2 P. Wms. 308; Barnes v. Rowley, 3 Ves. Jr. 305; Bayley v. Bishop, 9 Ves. Jr. 6, 7 Revised Rep. 132; Dawson v. Hearn, 1 Russ. & M. 606, Tamlyn, 465, 9 L. J. Ch. 249; Kerr v. Middlesex Hospital, 2 De G. M. & G. 576, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 355, 17 Jur. 49, 1 Week. Rep. 93; Ford v. Patley, 17 Beav. 303, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 225; Stokes v. Cheek, 28 Beav. 620, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 922; Re Mabbett [1891] 1 Ch. 707, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 279, 64 L. T. N. S. 447, 39 Week. Rep. 537; Re Robbins [1907] 2 Ch. 8, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 531, 96 L. T. N. S. 755, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 485. For further cases, see 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 399. In the United States there is a decision to the same effect by an inferior court (Reid v. Brown, 54 Misc. 481, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

106 N. Y. Supp. 27), and so far as we know, no case to the contrary.

This rule has found its most frequent application in case of bequests to be laid out in the purchase of annuities. But it is a general rule, applicable to a bequest to be laid out in the purchase of any object. See, for example, Barlow v. Grant, 1 Vern. 255; Nevill v. Nevill, 2 Vern. 431; Barton v. Cooke, 5 Ves. Jr. 461; Lonsdale v. Berchtoldt, 3 Kay & J. 185, 3 Jur. N. S. 328.

The reasoning on which the rule is established is that the legatee can sell the particular object as soon as it is bought, and the law will not require the performance of a nugatory act. Consequently it is of no consequence that the particular object is to be bought by the executor, and not by the legatee. See for example Dawson v. Hearn, 1 Russ. & M. 606, Tamlyn, 465, 9 L. J. Ch. 249; Ford v. Batley, 17 Beav. 303, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 225; Stokes v. Cheek, 28 Beav. 620, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 922; Re Robbins [1907] 2 Ch. 8, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 531, 96 L. T. N. S. 755, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 485; Re Brunning [1907] 1 Ch. 276, 78 L. J. Ch. N. S. 75, 99 L. T. N. S. 918; Reid v. Brown, 54 Misc. 481, 106 N. Y. Supp. 27.

The case at bar is not a case where $75,000 was left upon the trust that the income of it should be paid to Ruth Cobé during her life, but it is a case where the $75,000 was to be laid out by trustees in the purchase of an annuity for Ruth Cobé during her life. For that reason it is not a case within the rule of Claffin v. Claffin, 149 Mass. 19, 3 L.R.A. 370, 14 Am. St. Rep. 393, 20 N. E. 454.

The $75,000 was to be laid out in the purchase of an annuity in the case at bar by trustees, and not by executors. In our opinion that makes no difference. Where the only duty to be performed by a trustee is to buy a particular piece of property for the cestui que trust, which piece of property the cestui que trust can sell as soon as it is bought, the rule of a bequest for a particular object applies, and the cestui que trust is entitled to the money. The purchase is as much a nugatory act in case of a trust as it is in case of a bequest, and the same rule governs both cases.

We are of opinion that interest should be paid on the $75,000 from the expiration of one year from the testator's death, under the usual rule, as to which see Thayer v. Paulding, 200 Mass. 98, 100, 85 N. E. 868, where the cases are collected, and Claffin v. Holmes, 202 Mass. 157, 88 N. E. 664. The bequest in the case at bar was a bequest of $75,000 to be laid out in the purchase of an annuity; not the bequest of such sum as would purchase an annuity of a specified annual amount as was the case in Re Robbins [1907] 2 Ch. 8, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 531, 96 L. T. N. S. 755, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 485, where it is held that the annuity ran from the death of the testator.

The question decided in the case at bar was a question between Ruth Cobe and the executors. The only possible interest which the residuary legatees could have had in the matter was in the payment of interest on the $75,000. It affirmatively appears that there was no difference between them on that point. There was no occasion for making them parties defendant.

A decree should be entered directing the plaintiffs to pay to Ruth Cobe $75,000 with interest from the expiration of a year from the death of the testator.

So ordered.

HATTIE GRIMES, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.

(— Miss. —, 54 So. 839.)

Assault — threatening gestures with weapon.

Making threatening gestures towards another with an ax does not constitute an assault if one is not within striking distance of him, or sufficiently near to put him in fear of being struck.

(April 17, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Forrest County convicting her of assault. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. M. Watkins for appellant.

Mr. James R. McDowell, for the State:

The use of the deadly weapon by defendant is prima facie evidence of an intent.

Jeff v. State, 37 Miss. 321, 39 Miss. 593.

Note. — Assault: demonstration of force or violence outside of range of actual injury.

This note does not cover the question of whether actual or apparent ability is sufficient to constitute an assault. Its scope is confined to cases similar to GRIMES v. STATE, where the defendant was not within striking distance, or sufficiently near to put the person upon whom the assault was alleged to have been committed in fear of being struck.

In 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 95, it is said: "The present apparent ability to execute the unlawful intent is absolutely 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

An assault has been held to be "any attempt to commit a battery, or any threatening gesture showing in itself, or by efforts accompanying it, an immediate intention coupled with the ability to commit a battery."

Garnet v. State, 1 Tex. App. 605, 28 Am. Rep. 425; McKay v. State, 44 Tex. 43, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 46; State v. Wyatt, 76 Iowa, 328, 41 N. W. 31.

Defendant was guilty of assault with intent to kill.

Alvarez v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 58 S. W. 1013, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 137; Smith v. State, 83 Ala. 26, 3 So. 531.

Anderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was indicted for an assault with an ax with intent to kill and murder, was convicted of an assault, and appeals to this court.

It is said in 2 Bishop's New Criminal Law, p. 19, §§ 31 and 32: "One who rushes upon his adversary to strike, though not near enough for the blow to take effect, commits the offense [assault], provided he is sufficiently near to create in a person of ordinary firmness a fear of immediate violence unless he strikes in self-defense."

There is no need for the party assailed to be put in actual peril, if only a well-founded apprehension is created. For his suffering is the same in the one case as in the other, and the breach of the public peace is the same." Applying this rule to the undisputed facts of this case, it is clear the appellant is not guilty of the charge of which she was convicted. The evidence shows without conflict that the appellant was not in striking distance with the ax of the state's witness Natalie Kelly, nor was she sufficiently near to put her in fear of being struck, nor was she prevented by any person, or other means, from striking. The court below, on the motion for a new trial, should have set aside the verdict, and discharged the appellant.

Reversed and remanded.

necessary to constitute an assault, or in other words the act and the means must be reasonably adapted to the end."

As would be expected, few courts seem to have been called upon to consider the question under discussion.

In Lott v. State, 83 Miss. 609, 36 So. 11, where it was impossible for defendant to see or shoot the person whom he was charged with having assaulted, or for such person to see the defendant because of a sand house between them, it was held that he was not guilty of an assault with intent to kill.

And in Thomas v. State, 99 Ga. 38, 26 S. E. 748, where it was held that there need be no actual present ability to commit a battery, but that a demonstration of violence, coupled with an apparent ability to inflict the injury, so as to cause the person against whom it was directed reasonably to fear the injury unless he retreat was sufficient to constitute an assault, the court implied that where there was no actual or apparent ability to commit a battery, there could be no assault.

In People v. Lilley, 43 Mich. 521, 5 N. W. 982, the defendant was not within striking distance, and it does not appear that he was near enough to put the one against whom the assault was alleged to have been committed in fear. It was held that, in order to constitute the crime of assault with intent to murder, the attempt must be made within striking distance, and that if the defendant before he got within striking distance stopped and voluntarily abandoned his purpose, or before coming within such distance was stopped by others and then voluntarily abandoned his purpose, he would not be guilty of an assault with intent to murder.

And where defendant, after threatening to blow prosecutor's brains out, went into the house and took down his rifle, and worked the lever as though throwing a shell into the chamber, after which his wife took the rifle from him, he being all the while invisible to the prosecutor, it was held that he was not guilty of an assault under a statute making it a simple assault to use any dangerous weapon or the semblance thereof in an angry or threatening manner, with intent to alarm another, and under circumstances calculated to effect that object. Spradling v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 71 S. W. 17.

For note on pointing unloaded firearm as assault, see Price v. United States, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1272. J. T. W.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

MARY FITZGERALD, Admr., etc., of Martin Fitzgerald, Appt.,
v.

UNION STOCK YARDS COMPANY, Limited.

(— Neb. —, 131 N. W. 612.)

Joint tortfeasors — several actions.

1. Several actions may be brought and several judgments recovered against several wrongdoers, although but one satisfaction can be had.

Same — satisfaction by one.

2. If one of several joint wrongdoers makes full payment of damages caused by injury done, there can be no further recovery for the same injury.

Release — joint tortfeasors — payment by one.

3. If one of several joint wrongdoers makes settlement with the injured party, and pays him damages, which he agrees to receive and does receive as full compensation for all damages sustained, it will release all of the joint wrongdoers.

Same — partial settlement.

4. Settlement with one of several joint wrongdoers and payment of damages is not a defense to an action against another, unless it was agreed between the parties to the settlement that such payment was in full of all damages suffered. If the settlement is in writing, oral evidence is competent to show the intention of the parties thereto in an action against one not a party to the settlement. Affixing a private seal to such writing is without effect.

Trial — conflicting evidence — question for jury.

5. If the evidence is substantially conflicting upon a material issue, it presents a question for the jury. Evidence in this case is found to be insufficient to justify the court in directing the verdict.

Note. — Right to show by extrinsic evidence that payment of judgment against, or consideration for release of, alleged joint tortfeasor, was not a satisfaction of claim.

The present note is supplemental to one on the same subject in 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 330. As therein remarked, instances in which extrinsic evidence has been received to show the nature of a settlement with an alleged joint tortfeasor are more frequently met with than judicial discussions of the question.

That parol evidence is admissible to show the intention of the parties to a release given to one joint wrongdoer is, however, expressly held in El Paso & S. W. R. Co. v. Darr, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 93 S. W. 166, in which the court said: "We are unable to perceive that more sanctity attaches to a release of a wrongdoer than to a deed or mortgage, and if parol testimony is permissible to show the intent of the parties to the instruments last named, it is proper in regard to such release. There was no attempt to vary the terms of the release, but evidence was introduced merely to show the circumstances under which it was executed, and to more fully explain the intent of the parties as set out in the written instrument."

An instance in which extrinsic evidence was received may be found in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Classin, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 358, in which plaintiff was permitted to testify that a release of other corporations from liability by reason of the injury for which suit was brought, and which recited that the payment was not to be construed as an acknowledgment of liability, was signed with the distinct understanding that it did not debar plaintiff from bringing an action for damages against the defendant.

The release of the Burlington Company did not release the Stock Yards Company, because it was not the intention to do so.

Co. 160 Ala. 590, 49 So. 340, it was held that in view of the distinction between a technical release under seal and a release under the Alabama statute, which operates according to the intention of the parties, it could not be said as a matter of law that a release made after the commencement of the action against the defendant, containing no allusion to such action, acknowledging the payment of a sum of money, "in full payment for such pain I suffered and loss of time caused by same," and releasing only the other party thereto "from all damages and responsibility for the same,"— was intended as a release to all damages for the entire tort, so as to operate as a release to an alleged joint tort feisor, but that it was a question of fact whether or not what 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) the releasor had received was received in full satisfaction.

Cas. 344; Wardell v. McConnell, 25 Neb. 558, 41 N. W. 548.

Sedgwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Martin Fitzgerald, a young man about twenty-three years of age, was in the employ of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company as a switchman in the yards at South Omaha. Because of a defect in one of the cars of the company, it was necessary to use a chain in coupling it with the tender of the engine, and Fitzgerald was directed by the foreman to go between the car and the tender for that purpose. While he was so employed, the defendant company drove a train of cars against the train on which he was working, which forced the car and locomotive together, and instantly killed him. His mother, the plaintiff, as administratrix of his estate, brought this action against the defendant for damages caused by his death. The defendant denied that it was negligent, and alleged that this plaintiff and the father of the deceased had brought an action against the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company upon the same cause of action, and that the negligence of the defendant in that action was the cause of the injury complained of, and that the same parties also brought an action against the same railroad company as beneficiaries of the relief department of that company, and that afterwards both of the said actions were settled, and that the railroad company paid the plaintiff $4,400 in full settlement of the damages caused by the death of the said Fitzgerald, and $2,200 in full settlement of the benefits to which they were entitled from the relief fund. Upon the conclusion of the evidence, the court instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed.

The parties agree that there are three principal questions to be determined in the case: (1) Were the defendant and the railroad company jointly liable for the death of the deceased; that is, were they joint tortfeasors? (2) If they were joint tortfeasors, could the plaintiff settle with and release one of them without releasing the other? (3) If the plaintiff could settle with and release the railroad company from liability and at the same time reserve its right of action against this defendant, is the testimony in the case sufficient to establish that it was the intention and agreement of the parties to settle with and release only the railroad company, and reserve a right of action against this defendant? It was also contended by the defendant that in any event the evidence was not sufficient to show that this defendant was negligent, and that that negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

Upon the first question there is some controversy in the evidence, and we do not find it necessary to discuss this evidence in view of our conclusion upon the second proposition. If both parties are liable for the same injury, they are jointly and severally liable; that is, for the purpose of the case, they are joint tortfeasors. It is conceded in the pleading and briefs that the railroad company was liable. If this defendant was not guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the death of young Fitzgerald, then that of itself is a sufficient defense in this action. If it is conceded that the railroad company and this defendant were joint tortfeasors, would the settlement with the railroad company operate as a release of this defendant? While the action of Mr. and Mrs. Fitzgerald, as the parents of the deceased, was pending against the railroad company, they compromised with the railroad company by an agreement in writing, called a receipt and contract of settlement and release, as follows:

"Burlington Route. Feb., 1908. Audit Number, 253. Department Number, F. B. T. 1468. Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company, Lines West of the Missouri River. 2-29-08. This court, so far as we have noticed, has not considered and determined the precise question involved. In Wardell v. McConnell, 25 Neb. 558, 41 N. W. 548, the syllabus is as follows: "The rule is that, where the damages are uncertain, accord and satisfaction before judgment by one of several joint wrongdoers is satisfaction as to all; but the discharge of a party not shown to be a joint wrongdoer will not operate as a discharge of the other defendants." The point involved in the case and decided by the court is stated in the last paragraph of the syllabus. It is said in the opinion that "the testimony fails to show that Huber had ever sold intoxicating liquor to J. B. McConnell, the husband of the plaintiff in that action, and it is expressly proved that Mrs. McConnell had no facts in her possession at the time of bringing the action to justify her in joining Huber as defendant, and, if the testimony before us is to be believed, a verdict must have been rendered in his favor."

The opinion cites McReady v. Rogers, 1 Neb. 124, 93 Am. Dec. 333, in which it is stated: "Several actions may be brought and several judgments recovered against several wrongdoers, although but one satisfaction can be had." In Iddings v. Citizens' State Bank, 3 Neb. (Unof.) 750, 92 N. W. 578, Wardell v. McConnell, supra, is cited, and the point decided in that case is reaffirmed in these words: "The discharge of a party not shown to be a joint wrongdoer will not operate as a discharge of the other defendants." It must not be inferred, therefore, from these cases that this court has passed upon the question whether a settlement and release of one of several joint wrongdoers will necessarily amount to an accord and satisfaction of all damages suffered, and so discharge all of the parties liable therefor. In Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. 1, 18 L. ed. 129, the following propositions are decided: A judgment not fully satisfied against one or more cotrespanders is no bar to an action against one not joined in the first suit. Persons engaged in committing the same trespass are joint and several trespassers, and not joint trespassers exclusively. Satisfaction accepted in full for injury done precludes plaintiff from second recovery for same damages, though he may have obtained two or more judgments for the same tort. This is the leading case in that court upon those propositions, and has been followed as such in subsequent cases in that court, and in the various state courts.

In the case at bar we have a complete settlement and release of one of the parties liable, from all claims of damage arising from one injury caused, as we are now supposing, by the joint action of several parties. Whether this should operate as release of all the parties jointly liable is a question that has been much discussed by the courts in this country and in England, and upon which there have been conflicting opinions. In ancient times it was quite uniformly answered in the affirmative. Such releases were usually formal and executed under seal; and, if they recited that all the damages occasioned by the injury had been satisfied, they were held to be conclusive upon the parties executing them. The rule then was, as it has since universally been held to be, that a party was not entitled to more than one satisfaction for an injury done him. If the injury had been fully compensated, he had no further right of action, and the release executed under seal acknowledging full compensation for the injury could not be contradicted or explained. It would seem that, if the courts in later decisions had kept this principle in mind, some of the uncertainty of the law upon this question might have been avoided. If a settlement by one of several joint wrongdoers, in which he admitted that the damages caused by the wrong done amounted to a certain specified sum, was not conclusive against the other wrongdoer, it is a little difficult to understand by what reasoning it could be made conclusive in his favor. It would seem that the real question would be whether the party injured had in fact been fully compensated for his injury, and his admission that his injury was limited to a certain sum, which admission was made for the purpose of obtaining a settlement with one of the parties who caused his injury, might under some circumstances have been considered open to explanation. When, however, he made such admission with due solemnity and under seal, it was, in the earlier cases at least, held to be conclusive against him. There is reason in holding that, if one of the joint wrongdoers acted for all and assumed to settle the whole matter and make full settlement of all claims of the injured party, such settlement might be binding upon all parties. We do not see upon principle why a part satisfaction and release of one wrongdoer should operate in favor of the other wrongdoer. It is generally held that there is no right of contribution existing between wrongdoers, and the collection of part satisfaction from one is not an injury, but rather a benefit to the others. It is not the policy of the law to encourage litigation, but rather to favor settlement. Several wrongdoers who are jointly and severally liable for the injury done may not agree as to their liability, nor as to the desirability of adjusting the matter. Some of them might be willing to compromise with the injured party by paying a just proportion of the whole damage done, and be unwilling or even unable to pay the whole damage. Some men are quite eager for litigation; others will do anything reasonable to avoid it. If some of the wrongdoers are willing to adjust the matter by paying their reasonable proportion of the damage done, and the injured party can accept such payment and still reserve his claim against the more stubborn ones, such a construction of the law would seem to facilitate settlement and tend to avoid litigation. This idea is stated and elaborated in Louisville & E. Mail Co. v. Barnes, 117 Ky. 860, 64 L.R.A. 574, 111 Am. St. Rep. 273, 79 S. W. 261. See also Bloss v. Plymale, 3 W. Va. 393, 100 Am. Dec. 752; Robertson v. Trammell, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 53, 83 S. W. 258; O'Shea v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. 44 C. C. A. 601, 105 Fed. 559; Carey v. Bilby, 63 C. C. A. 361, 129 Fed. 203; Gilbert v. Finch, 173 N. Y. 455, 61 L.R.A. 807, 93 Am. St. Rep. 623, 66 N. E. 133; Home Teleph. Co. v. Fields, 150 Ala. 306, 43 So. 711; El Paso & S. W. R. Co. v. Darr, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 93 S. W. 166; Chicago v. Babcock, 143 Ill. 358, 32 N. E. 271. In 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 307, the law is stated as follows: "But it is a well-settled rule that, where a release of one wrongdoer is not a technical release under seal, then the intention of the parties is to govern, and it becomes a question of fact for the court or jury whether or not what the releasor has received was received in full satisfaction of his wrong; and, if it appears that it was not so received, it is only pro tanto a bar to an action against the other wrongdoers." Private seals do not affect the equity or legality of written instruments or contracts in this state. Comp. Stat. 1909, chap. 81, § 1. If this defendant was not a joint trespasser with the railroad company, it is conceded that the defense of settlement fails, and that, if defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, the court should have submitted the case to the jury, with instruction to ascertain the amount of the plaintiff's damages, and, after allowing the amount that had been received thereon, find their verdict for the remainder. If the de-defendant and the railroad company were joint tort feorsors, as we have assumed in this discussion, the question is, Has the plaintiff been fully recompensed for the injury done? If the plaintiff received this money from the railroad company as full compensation for the damages caused by the injury complained of, and agreed with the railroad company to so receive it, and the parties were jointly liable for the wrong done, it would seem that the authorities generally hold that she is bound by that agreement, and cannot now maintain this action against this defendant, even though this defendant did not directly nor indirectly take any part in the settlement, or contribute anything towards the consideration therefor. It was held by this court in the cases cited above that even where there had been an accord and satisfaction with one party for the injury done, and that party formally released, it would not operate as a defense for the party whose wrongful act caused the injury, unless the party released was also in fact a joint wrongdoer. If this principle is conversely stated, an injured party who releases one of several joint wrongdoers from liability for a consideration which he agrees to accept as full compensation for the injury done thereby releases all who were jointly and severally liable therefor. This is in harmony with the authorities in general. This court considers itself committed to this rule.

The evidence is not such as to require the court to find as a matter of law that there was such an agreement. The rule that oral evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of written instruments is generally applied only in suits between parties to the instrument. "It cannot affect third persons who, if it were otherwise, might be prejudiced by things recited in the writings, contrary to the truth, through the ignorance, carelessness, or fraud of the parties; and who therefore ought not to be precluded from proving the truth, however contradictory to the written statements of others." 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 279. It will be seen that there is no such express provision in the receipt and contract of settlement. When these papers were presented to the plaintiff for her signature, the question was asked: "Does this release only the Burlington?" And it was answered by both the plaintiff's counsel and Mr. Thomas, who represented the railroad company, that it only released that company, and the papers were thereupon executed by this plaintiff. We do not think the court should so construe the transaction as matter of law. Under the circumstances disclosed in this record, the question was for the jury. The plaintiff can have but one satisfaction for the injury. She can only recover from this defendant, in any event, the amount of damages occasioned by the injury less such payment as she has received thereon.

In this discussion, we have also assumed that the defendant was negligent, and that its negligence was a proximate cause of the injury complained of, but this has been assumed only for the purpose of discussion. The evidence is conflicting as to the negligence of this defendant, and whether such negligence, if any, was the proximate cause of the injury. This question also should be submitted to the jury for its determination.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Reese, Ch. J., concurs in the conclusion.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

JAMES MCLENNAN

v.

NORTH CAROLINA RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(— N. C. —, 70 S. E. 1066.)

Railroad — lowering safety gates upon team — liability.

1. A railroad company which begins to lower a safety gate at a street crossing upon approach of a train, at a time when a traveler in a vehicle is upon the track, is bound to arrest the descent of the gate to give him opportunity to escape, and will be liable for the injury caused by lowering the gate upon his horses.

Same — negligence of travels — attempt to escape from track.

2. It is not negligence per se for a traveler in a vehicle who is upon a railroad track at a street crossing when the signal sounds for approach of a train and the safety gates begin to lower, to attempt to escape by driving his horse forward at a trot, rather than take the risk of remaining on the track inside the gates while the train passes, where he has less than 60 feet to go to get beyond the gate.

Note. — Railroads: duty as to operation of safety gates at railroad crossings.

This note does not cover the question of what contributory negligence will excuse liability on the part of a railroad where an injury has resulted from a failure properly to operate its gates, nor does it cover the question of whether raised gates are an invitation to go upon the crossing upon which a traveler may rely upon in going thereon.

For a note on violation of police ordi-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Durham County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent operation of safety gates at a railroad crossing by defendant's lessee. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Guthrie and Guthrie and J. Lathrop Morehead, for appellant.

The presence of the raised gate did not justify plaintiff's total indifference and disregard to danger which was evident to him.

Hodgin v. Southern R. Co. 143 N. C. 93, 55 S. E. 413, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 41; Koch v. Southern California R. Co. 148 Cal. 677, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 521, 113 Am. St. Rep.

nance as to safety gates, as ground for private action, see Sluder v. St. Louis Transit Co. 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 246.

For a note on right of railroad company to delegate to independent contractor the maintenance of gates or flagmen at a street crossing, see Boucher v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1177.

For a note on the power of municipality to require safety gates at crossing, see Pennsylvania R. Co's. Appeal, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 141.

Although the letter of an ordinance requiring companies operating cars on or over public streets, to erect safety gates at points where their tracks cross public streets, is silent as to any operation of such gates, its entire purpose would be frustrated unless they were also charged with the duty of properly operating them, and such duty is implied from the name, form, and purpose of such gates. Record v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 76 N. J. L. 800, 72 Atl. 62.

And although an act requiring a railway to employ "proper persons" to open and close its gates does not expressly say that it is the duty of such persons to see that the railway is reasonably safe when they open the gates, it implies that they are to exercise reasonable caution to see that the line is clear, and that they are not to open the gates when it is otherwise. And although a railroad is not required to maintain gates and a flagman at a crossing, if it assumes to do both for such a period that the public have acquired knowledge of such fact, it is as much bound properly to operate them as if the municipal authorities had directed it to do so, and a failure to perform such duty is negligence. It is generally held that it is the duty of railroad companies to exercise ordinary 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Messrs. Bryant & Brogden, for appellee:

When, in compliance with a municipal regulation or statute, or in the absence of either, a railroad company maintains and care in the management of their gates at crossings, and that they are responsible to a traveler who, being without fault himself, is injured by negligent management of such gates.

In Feeney v. Long Island R. Co. 116 N. Y. 375, 5 L.R.A. 544, 22 N. E. 402, it was held that the jury were warranted in finding want of due care where there was evidence that when the person injured approached the crossing on a rainy evening the gates were up, but that after she had passed one gate they were lowered more rapidly than usual, without warning and without a light, by reason of which the plaintiff was struck on the head by the gates and injured. The court said: "The evidence warranted the jury in finding that the defendant omitted to observe that degree of care required by the circumstances, and that, owing to such omission, the plaintiff was injured. It was the duty of the defendant to use due care in operating the gates, so as to protect persons traveling upon the public highway not only from being run over by the cars, but also against injury from the gates themselves. If, on reaching a crossing protected by safety gates, a person finds them raised and motionless, he is at liberty to go on, and, if it becomes necessary to lower the gates while he is passing between them, it should be done with all the care demanded by the peculiar situation, and with due regard to the safety of human life."

Gates raised when crossing is unsafe.

It is clearly the duty of a gate tender to have his gates down when trains are approaching or passing over the crossing. Sager v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 70 Kan. 504, 79 Pac. 132; Callaghan v. S. 275, 22 Week. Rep. 561.

And it is the duty of a gateman to know when a train coupling cars near a crossing operates gates at a public highway or street, it is its duty to operate them not only with due regard to those approaching the crossing, but with due regard to those who have entered upon the crossing, and are between the gates.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts are that the defendant operated is to pass the crossing, and to protect the public by closing the gates during its movements. Walter v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 App. D. C. 20.

And it is likewise his duty to open the gates at such times as travel can pass in safety. Sager v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 70 Kan. 504, 79 Pac. 132.

It has been held that a railroad is not in the exercise of due care required in the operation of its gates, —where the gates were left open when a train was approaching. Jenkins v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 98 Md. 402, 56 Atl. 966; Evans v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 88 Mich. 442, 14 L.R.A. 223, 50 N. W. 386; Wilson v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 18 R. I. 491, 29 Atl. 258; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eckman, 137 Ky. 331, 125 S. W. 729;

—where there was evidence that, at time of the accident, there was no watchman in charge of the gates, and that they were raised. Hughes v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 1 Lack. Leg. News, 215;

—where the gates were open, and no signal or warning of the approach of a train given. Walsh v. Boston & M. R. Co. 171 Mass. 52, 50 N. E. 453; Glushing v. Sharp, 96 N. Y. 676;

—where the crossing gates were raised, and no bell was rung, and the flagman, who was on the way home, gave no warning until an instant before the accident. Fitzgerald v. Long Island R. Co. 10 N. Y. S. R. 433;

—where there was evidence that the gate at the crossing was raised, and that the flagman only swung a signal of safety, that no signal from an approaching train was given, and that the view of the train was obstructed by trees. Fitzgerald v. Long Island R. Co. 21 N. Y. S. R. 942, 3 N. Y. Supp. 230, affirmed in 117 N. Y. 653, 22 N. E. 1133.

—where there were carriage gates at a crossing for carriages and a turnstile for foot passengers, and one of the carriage gates was open and no keeper present, and a foot passenger was killed. Stapley v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 1 Exch. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

21, 4 Hurlst. & C. 93, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 7, 11 Jur. N. S. 954, 13 L. T. N. S. 406, 14 Week. Rep. 132;

—where the gates were raised after the passing of one train, and one started to cross and was struck by another train, of the approach of which he was not aware. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wilson, 124 Ky. 836, 100 S. W. 302;

—where, in violation of an ordinance, the gates were raised before a train had passed, and deceased went on crossing and was struck by a train going in an opposite direction and traveling at an unlawful speed. Smith v. Michigan C. R. Co. 35 Ind. App. 188, 73 N. E. 928;

—where a railroad required by a city charter to maintain gates at grade crossings, and to close them on the approach of trains, allows the gate to remain open, it appearing that the accident would not have happened if the gate had been closed on the approach and passing of the train. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Stumpf, 97 Md. 78, 54 Atl. 978;

—where the complaint in substance alleged that the crossing at which plaintiff was injured was a public one, that defendant had for sometime to the knowledge of plaintiff maintained guard gates there, that, relying on the fact that there were such gates and that they were always lowered on the approach of trains, plaintiff, because the gates were not lowered, approached crossing, and was about to pass over it when a train passed and caused his horse to run away and inflict injury. Rohde v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 86 Wis. 309, 56 N. W. 872;

—where there was evidence that a crossing in a city street was partially obstructed by standing cars, that it was approached by a train at the rate of 10 miles per hour, without any warning until a collision was imminent, and that the safety gates, constructed in accordance with the city ordinance, were open and tended to mislead the plaintiff. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Frantz, 127 Pa. 297, 4 L.R.A. 389, 19 Atl. 22;

—where it appeared that the railroad's railway gates on both sides of Corcoran street crossing in the city of Durham, for the protection of its tracks, as well as those of the Norfolk & Western and Seaboard Air Line Railways. On 22d of December, 1909, the gates being up, plaintiff entered upon the crossing, going south, driving a horse and buggy. When within 59 feet of the south gate, the gong in the gate tower sounded, a signal that a train was approaching and that the gates would close. The plaintiff was then on the Norfolk & Western track, and his horse in a trot. He did not stop, but drove on, attempting to get through the south gate before it closed. The gate descended on the horse's back, causing the animal to plunge through the gate, throwing plaintiff out, and seriously injuring him.

The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove it was defendant's custom to sound the gong as a warning to those between the gates, and to give them an opportunity to pass out before the gates were lowered, and that plaintiff was acquainted with and relied upon this custom. To this evidence defendant excepted. We think it was competent to prove the custom of defendant in sounding the gong, and that plaintiff knew of the custom and relied on it. Parrott v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. 140 N. C. 549, 53 S. E. 432; 1 Wigmore, Ev. §§ 92, 376. But a discussion of this exception is unnecessary, as it is proven by defendant's witnesses that there was a gong on the tower used for employees were coupling cars near a crossing on a dark stormy night, that there was no light or brakeman on the rear car, which was pushed backward over the crossing, and that the gates were up and with a light upon them, and that the gateman did not come out until after the train began to move, and just to late to close the gates and prevent a buggy from going on the track, and that one of the employees saw the buggy approaching, but made no attempt to prevent it, although he suspected something might happen. Walter v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 App. D. C. 20;

—where a lessor railroad failed, on the approach of lessee's engine, to lower its gates on one side of a way at the time those on the other side were lowered, and when the gates at a crossing some distance away, which gave notice that trains were about to pass, were lowered, and it appeared that the person injured could not have gone upon the track, if they had been properly lowered. Startz v. Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. 42 N. Y. S. R. 457, 16 N. Y. Supp. 810;

—where an ordinance directed that gates shall be lowered whenever engines or cars approached under circumstances which made it appear reasonable to the gateman to suppose that they were coming upon or going across the crossing, where he failed to lower them, although he could see no one approaching the crossing at the time. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Wise, 206 Ill. 453, 69 N. E. 500;

—where the uncontradicted testimony of a number of witnesses showed that the gates at the crossing were not properly operated at the time a boy was killed, that they were raised and a horse and wagon on which he was riding were permitted to be driven onto the crossing when a train was approaching at the rate of 40 miles an hour, and was so near that the wagon was struck and the boy killed, although the horse was moving all the time. Bracken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 22.

But a railroad has been held not guilty of negligence,—where, by reason of frost, the gates could not be lowered, and the gateman signaled with his lantern and shouted. Canadian P. R. Co. v. Fleming, 22 Can. S. C. 33.

And it was held in Roland v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 224 Pa. 630, 73 Atl. 958, that a failure to have the gates lowered was evidence of negligence to be taken into consideration by the jury in passing upon that question, but was not in itself, without regard to anything else proved, conclusive evidence of negligence.

And in Rainey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 68 Hun, 405, 23 N. Y. Supp. 80, the mere violation of an ordinance requiring a railroad to attend the gates at all times, by failing to keep a gateman in attendance during the night, was held not to establish a cause of action, but to be evidence bearing upon the question of negligence.

Injuries from gates.

In O'Keefe v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 108 Mo. App. 177, 83 S. W. 308, where the plaintiff was struck by a gate which was being lowered, the court stated the law as follows: "In respect to the first proposition, the law is that it was the duty of the gateman to exercise ordinary care in the operation of the gates to avoid letting them down on anyone in the street. This duty was not performed by the gateman merely glancing at the street as he began to turn the crank and lower the gate, and then turning his eyes in another direction and looking away from the gate he was lowering until after it was down. The exercise of ordinary care required the gateman to keep the gate under his control at all times, and to keep his eyes on the street while lowering the gate. If he had performed this duty, the accident would not have happened."

So, a gateman is bound to presume that persons might be on the street, and it is his duty to look out for them and keep his gates under control as he lowers them, so as not to injure travelers. Ibid.

And where a gate is lowered by turning a crank, and comes down slowly when properly operated, and can be stopped at the purpose of giving notice of the lowering of the gates, and the gate keeper testified that he sounded the gong on this occasion. This is a very proper precaution, for the sounding of the gong not only serves to notify these then on the tracks to hasten off, but to those approaching the crossing it is a signal to stop, which they must heed at their peril.

The other exceptions to the evidence, upon examination, we think are without merit, and need not be discussed.

In apt time defendant moved to nonsuit:

(1) Upon the ground that there is no evidence of negligence; and (2) that the plaintiff, as matter of law, was guilty of contributory negligence upon his own showing.

The evidence of negligence is plenary. It was the gate keeper's duty to observe those who were crossing the tracks when he commenced to lower the gates. When he saw plaintiff trotting his horse in his endeavor to get through the gate, it was the gate keeper's duty to momentarily arrest the descent of the gate, and not let it come down on the horse's back. It is said the gate was operated by compressed air, and could not be stopped. The defendant's witness, the gate keeper, testified that he had never had occasion to stop the gates when he started them down, and further stated: "I expect you can stop them in any position, if they are in proper order. Gates were in pretty good condition that day; about as good as they had been." The fact is that the gate keeper made no attempt to stop the gates, although he saw plaintiff, and must have known that his purpose was to escape from the peril he was in by being on the tracks when a train was approaching on one of them.

Upon the question of contributory negligence, the evidence shows that, when the gong sounded as a signal that a train was approaching, and that the gates would be closed, plaintiff was only 59 feet from the south gate on the Norfolk & Western track, and his horse at a trot. We cannot say as matter of law that he should have stopped and waited on the track until the train passed. It is a very dangerous and unpleasant position to occupy, to be in a buggy between closed gates inclosing three railroad tracks, when a train is passing on one of them. The plaintiff was in a position of danger, and doubtless his first impulse was to push ahead and drive on through the gate. We think upon this issue the trial judge gave the defendant all it was entitled to, when he submitted plaintiff's conduct under the circumstances to the judgment of the jury under the rule of the prudent man.

any point in its descent, it is the duty of the gateman to have the gate under control, and avoid letting it down on anyone who may be in the street; and he has no right to assume that people whom he has seen on the sidewalk would not step upon the street and pass under the gate, where the evidence tends to show people were in the habit of doing this. Ibid.

So, the case is properly submitted to the jury where, in an action for injuries sustained through being struck by the gate, there was evidence tending to prove that the gates were not in proper condition, in that the automatic bell was not ringing as usual, and that there was nothing to obstruct the gateman's view of the plaintiff, although he testified that he did not see her. Smith v. Atlantic City R. Co. 86 N. J. L. 307, 49 Atl. 547.

But it was held in McKenna v. Alabama & V. R. Co. 87 Miss. 652, 40 So. 426, that the fact that an injury to a pedestrian resulted from being struck by the beam of the gate at a crossing did not raise a presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad.

And it was held in Tuohy v. Long Island R. Co. 89 App. Div. 198, 85 N. Y. Supp. 824, that a railroad was not liable for an injury resulting to one being struck by gates, where the gateman securely fastened them up and went to the water-closet when no train was due to pass for twenty minutes, and the gates were lowered by a person not in the railroad's employ, and it not appearing that they had before been interfered with.

Miscellaneous.

So, it has been held that the railroad was not in the exercise of due care in the operation of its gates, and that its negligence would render it liable;

—where the gate tender allowed a child less than seven years old, who was in company with his mother, to pass on the tracks when an approaching locomotive was partly hidden by a train which had just passed. Tubello v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 67 N. J. L. 581, 52 Atl. 561;

—where a private way crossed the railway at nearly right angles, and the gate on one side was private, but on the other there was one gate for both private and public use, which was tended by the gateman, and the gateman in response to a query from one who had opened the private gate to cross, to know if the line was clear, answered in the affirmative when a train was so near that it struck the person crossing. Lunt v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. 277, 12 Jur. N. S. 409, 35 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 105, 14 L. T. N. S. 225, 14 Week. Rep. 497;

—where the gateman put down the gates and indicated to the trowman that the crossing was ready for the passage of an engine standing 200 feet away, and about to back over the crossing, when plaintiff's foot was caught in the track. Garafalo v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 206 Mass. 539, 92 N. E. 723;

—where there was evidence that after the gates were closed, a stranger had raised one of them to enable her to cross, shortly before deceased drove up. Haywood v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 35 N. Y. S. R. 748, 13 N. Y. Supp. 177, affirmed in 128 N. Y. 596, 28 N. E. 251;

—where plaintiff, to avoid fright to his horse, drove into a yard adjoining a crossing and, as a train was clearing the crossing, the gateman raised the gates and motioned plaintiff to cross, upon which he started for the crossing at a slow trot, and, as he came within a short distance of the crossing, a train suddenly appeared and the gates were lowered in front of his horse, which took fright and ran away, the court holding it error to grant a nonsuit. Gray v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 77 App. Div. 1, 78 N. Y. Supp. 653;

—where a railroad undertook to maintain a gate at a crossing, and it was held a question for the jury whether it was negligence to withdraw the keeper at 7 P. M., and leave the gates fastened back and open. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Killips, 88 Pa. 405.

But a railroad has been held not guilty of negligence in the operation of its gates, —where a mere volunteer or trespasser raised the gates at a railroad crossing to permit a team to pass, after they had been lowered by the regular gateman, and without his knowledge, and again lowered them before the team had crossed the track. Haines v. Atlantic City R. Co. 65 N. J. L. 27, 50 L.R.A. 862, 46 Atl. 595;

—where a gateman closed the last gate behind a street car which was going west, and when it had passed the west gate started to close that, but a car going east ran under it so he could not get the gate down lower than the trolley, and, seeing a train coming, he then raised the east gate to give the car going east a chance to get through. Renders v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 144 Mich. 387, 108 N. W. 368;

—where the gate tender had lowered the gates while a freight engine was partly on the crossing, and kept them down, but failed to call to or otherwise further warn a twelve-year-old girl of sufficient intelligence to work in a shirt factory, who passed under or around the gates and attempted to cross the tracks, and was struck by a train on a track other than the one first mentioned. State use of Lilley v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. 114 Md. 1, 78 Atl. 730. The court said: "He had warned them of danger as they approached the crossing by lowering the safety gate in their faces. He had continued to warn them of further danger, after the shifting had been suspended or completed, by maintaining the gates in a lowered position in their plain sight. That was the most appropriate warning he could give them. With the gates still lowered, the danger signal in full sight, the two girls deliberately disregarded the warning provided by law for their protection, and fully displayed by the gate keeper. Even when they had passed the shifting engine, and were going toward the track on which the train was approaching, he continued to warn them of their danger by keeping the gate lowered in their full view, and, in accordance with the testimony of the survivor of them, showing, by leaning on it with folded arms, that the time had not arrived when it could with propriety be raised. If they acted upon the mistaken belief that the gates were down solely because of the shifting of cars, it was their misfortune, for which the appellee should not be held liable. Even when the gate keeper saw the two girls approaching the track on which the train was coming, it was not his duty to anticipate that, in spite of the danger signal of the lowered gate plainly visible to them, they would attempt to cross in advance of the coming train."

But where a gateman knew that a train was late and liable to pass at any moment, he was bound to use more than ordinary care, and if he saw persons on the track where they were liable to be hit by the train, it was his duty to do more than lower the gate; and if he failed to give other warning when he might have done so, he is guilty of negligence. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Ehlert, 10 Ohio C. D. 443.

A railroad is not negligent in not having a gateman upon the ground at the crossing, and in operating its gates from a tower from which an attendant operated gates located at two crossings, where the gates were properly lowered, and it does not appear that if a gateman had been present he could have prevented plaintiff's runaway horse from breaking through the gates. Brooks v. Boston & M. R. Co. 188 Mass. 410, 74 N. E. 670.

And the fact that a gate tender could not read or write, nor tell the time by a watch or clock, is immaterial where there is no evidence that he could not see or hear a train approaching, and there is nothing to show that his ignorance contributed to the accident. Roland v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 224 Pa. 630, 73 Atl. 958.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eckman, 137 Ky. 331, 125 S. W. 729, where plaintiff had driven his automobile on the crossing when the gates were raised, and suffered injury by colliding with a train, the court said: "If, by keeping up the crossing gates when they should have been down, appellant's servants induced appellee to go upon the crossing when it was not safe for him to do so, and while thereon he was injured by a train, also in charge of appellant's servants, which in passing gave him no warning of its approach, such acts would undoubtedly constitute negligence. It is equally true that if, by the negligence of appellant's servants in failing to lower the gate, appellee was induced to run his automobile upon the crossing, and while thereon and awaiting the raising of the west gate in order to leave the crossing, appellant's train passed so near the automobile that the vibration of the ground therefrom caused the automobile to move and run against the train, thereby inflicting appellee's injuries, or breaking his automobile, it would manifestly be but right to conclude that the negligence of appellant's servant in failing to lower the east gate in time to warn appellee not to go upon the crossing was the proximate cause of the injuries sustained; and this would be true although the passing train with which the automobile collided, in approaching the place of the collision, gave the usual signals of its coming. On the other hand, if, as claimed by appellant's counsel, appellee, notwithstanding his having been induced to go upon the crossing by the negligence of appellant's servant in failing to lower the gate in time to warn him not to do so, after getting thereon, knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the approach of the train, and thereafter negligently started his automobile, or negligently permitted it to be put in motion, and by reason thereof it ran into or against the train, there should have been no recovery, although appellant's servants in charge of the train may have been guilty of negligence in failing to give the usual signal of its approach, for in such case appellee's own negligence would have been the proximate cause of the injuries to his person and machine."

And where a gateman raised a gate when, by the exercise of ordinary care, he could have known that it was not safe for waiting carriages to go upon the crossing, the fact that he almost immediately closed them, and protected plaintiff from injury from the trains, will not relieve the railroad from responsibility for an injury resulting from a buggy preceding the plaintiff backing into the one in which the plaintiff was driving. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Ruoff, 141 Ky. 623, 133 S. W. 553.

So, the fact that the gate tender at night lowered the gates about an hour before an accident happened will not relieve the railroad from liability, providing the time elapsing and the circumstances surrounding the occurrence were sufficient to indicate that the fact that the gates had been raised could have been discovered by the gate tender by the exercise of reasonable care, and it need not be affirmatively established that the raising of the gates was the railroad's act. Palmer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 129 N. Y. Supp. 658.

And testimony of a witness who was the first person to reach one injured at a crossing, that he saw the gateman leave his house and go toward the crossing before the accident, and that when he got to the crossing the gateman was there, tends in some degree to show that the gates were intended to be and would have been shut before the train arrived if the gateman had not been negligent. Chicago & 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A. R. Co. v. Redmond, 70 Ill. App. 119, affirmed in 171 Ill. 347, 49 N. E. 541.

And the negligence of a gateman at a railroad crossing in allowing a street car to get almost, if not entirely, upon the track before giving any warning that an engine was approaching, and then in giving contradictory signals as to stopping or going ahead, may render the railway company liable for an injury to a passenger in the street car, in jumping from the car under a reasonable apprehension of danger, although there was no real danger because the engine was under perfect control. Kleiber v. People's R. Co. 107 Mo. 240, 14 L.R.A. 613, 17 S. W. 946.

And a statute providing that before a street car crosses the tracks of a steam road, an employee shall go ahead and ascertain if the way is clear, does not relieve the steam road of the duty of so operating its gates as to indicate to the person operating the street car whether the track is clear, since the duties are concurrent. Kopp v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 25 Ohio C. C. 546.

If the railroad using the tracks of another company accepts the services of the gateman of the other company, they become its servants, and it is liable for their negligence; and if it does not accept the services of such gatemen, its duty is to place competent gatemen there, and it is responsible for an omission to do so. Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Schneider, 45 Ohio St. 678, 17 N. E. 321.

And where three railroads cross the street, and one company hired a gateman and the others contributed toward his support, one who is injured through the negligence of such gateman in raising the gate before the passage of a train may recover of the company which hires and pays the gateman, although the train belonged to another road. Brow v. Boston & A. R. Co. 157 Mass. 399, 32 N. E. 362.

And both the company which installed and maintained the gates at a crossing, and another company which provided no other means of warning, but availed itself of the use of such gates and gatemen, are liable for the negligence of the gateman in failing to place lights on the gates when they are lowered at night, by reason of which an automobile collides with them, the responsibility of each company being the same as if it had used the gates alone. Record v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 76 N. J. L. 800, 72 Atl. C2.

And both the company owning a railroad and a company running over its tracks are liable for the inattention of a gate tender and his failure to lower the gate at a crossing when a train is approaching, by reason of which an accident occurs, notwithstanding a contract between the companies by which the owner of the road undertook to guard the crossing. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Roth, 130 Ky. 759, 114 S. W. 264, the court said: "The contract between the two companies did not relieve either of them of this responsibility. Although as between them it was the duty of the bridge company to perform this service, yet as to the public it was the duty of both, and neither could escape liability for this negligence upon the ground that, by a contract between them, it was the duty of the other to maintain these gates. The duty of protecting a crossing like this cannot be delegated to one of the companies using the track, or to the owner of the track, so as to absolve the company whose trains commit an injury, or the owner of the track, from liability to the person injured."

Where it is claimed that there was negligence in failing to lower gates, it is error to exclude evidence that because of the severity of the weather ice had formed so that they could not be operated, and that the railroad was in the act of removing it when the accident in suit occurred. Recktenwald v. Erie R. Co. 114 App. Div. 490, 99 N. Y. Supp. 1094. The court said: "Its duty with respect to the gates was the same as its duty with respect to other signals. The exercise of reasonable care in the construction and inspection of the gates, to maintain them in working order, was a full discharge of the defendant's duty with respect to the gates."

It cannot be said as a matter of law that the failure of a railroad to operate its gates at night was not the proximate cause of an injury occurring at a crossing, where an ordinance required the operation of the gates at day and night, although, as the electric car in which plaintiff was riding approached the crossing, the conductor went forward to see if the car could safely cross, and, through a misunderstanding of his signal, the motorman ran onto the crossing and the injury occurred. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Averill, 224 Ill. 516, 79 N. E. 654.

And where it was contended by the plaintiff, who was riding a tandem when injured, that the gates at a crossing were suddenly dropped between the tandem riders and that he was thereby thrown, and it was contended by the defendant that the gates were down and that the plaintiff was injured by running into them, and five witnesses testified that the gates were open and eight that they were closed, there is no such preponderance of testimony as to justify an interference with a verdict for the plaintiff. Edgerley v. Long Island R. Co. 44 App. Div. 476, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1062.

Where there is evidence that gates are operated on Sunday, the fact that it was Sunday on which an accident occurred, and that the business of the town was not active, will not relieve a railroad company from negligence in failing to operate its gates. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Redmond, 70 Ill. App. 119, affirmed in 171 Ill. 347, 49 N. E. 541.

And the question of whether an admission that gates are necessary at a crossing is more applicable to the busy parts of the week than on Sunday is rather for the jury than the court. Merrigan v. Boston & A. R. Co. 154 Mass. 189, 28 N. E. 149.

The law does not require a railroad to have a light on the arm of a gate extending across the sidewalk, all that is necessary is to have sufficient light to enable a person exercising ordinary care to see the arm of the gate. McDonald v. Covington & C. Elev. R. Transfer & Bridge Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 992, 107 S. W. 226.

A railroad track at a street crossing is not a warning of danger from the negligent lowering of the gates by the gateman. Sager v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 70 Kan. 504, 79 Pac. 132.

An injury resulting from the operation of gates does not raise the statutory presumption of negligence attending injuries by rolling stock of a railroad. McKenna v. Alabama & V. R. Co. 87 Miss. 652, 40 So. 426.

Where one receiving an injury at a crossing has actual notice of trains passing in front of him, he has all the warning that gates can give, and the condition of the gates as to him is immaterial. Theobald v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 75 Ill. App. 208.

So, where the driver of a horse sees a train passing a crossing, and remains near by until a locomotive owned by one not a party to the suit passes and frightens the horse, the injury resulting is not the result of a failure to lower the crossing gates since she is warned by the view of the passing train, and has all that the warning gates can give. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Piper, 100 Ill. App. 356.

A railroad company, in an action for personal injuries suffered at a crossing at night, cannot set up a failure of a municipality to notify the company, as required by statute, of the passage of an ordinance requiring the erection and operation day and night of gates at a crossing, where, in pursuance of such ordinance, it had erected the gates and for years operated them during the day, since it thereby waives the prescribed notice. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Averill, 224 Ill. 516, 79 N. E. 654; Perkins v. Wabash R. Co. 233 Ill. 458, 94 N. E. 677. J. T. W.

(83 Ohio St. 204, 93 N. E. 1098.)

Trust — promise to divide legacy — enforcement.

ated, and although the legatee at the time of the promise intended no fraud, a court of equity may interfere to prevent a wrong, and declare the legatee a trustee ex maleficio for the protection of the testator's intended beneficiary.

Evidence — establishment of trust.

2. A trust in an absolute legacy may be established by parol evidence, and the contemporaneous declarations of the testator, and subsequent declarations of the legatee, that the bequest was made for the benefit of a third person upon the promise of the legatee to hold it in trust, are admissible for that purpose.

Same — joint legacy — promise to one.

3. Where such legacy is a joint legacy, the trust may be established as to all of the legatees by proof that the promise was made by one in behalf of all, and the subsequent declarations of either of the legatees are admissible against all.

Same — trust legacy for lodge.

4. Where a testator, desiring to leave his property to his lodge, was advised by his lawyer that he could not do so directly, but that he could will it to three members of the lodge in whom he had confidence that they would do with it what he delegated to them to do, namely, to turn it over to the lodge, and he does so bequeath it to the three upon the promise of one, made in behalf of all, that they will transfer it to the lodge, equity may interfere to prevent the legatees from converting the property to their own use, and will declare them trustees ex maleficio.

Note. — May a constructive trust be based upon an undertaking to hold, for the benefit of another, property received through devise or inheritance, where no actual testamentary intention has been frustrated?

It is the aim of this note to present those cases in which the question whether a constructive trust, or, as it is often termed, a trust ex maleficio, arises from a promise to a decedent to apply property devolving upon the promisor by bequest or inheritance to certain purposes, as to which the promisee entertained no intention to make a direct provision which he was induced to forego by the promisor, but which, on the contrary, he designed to accomplish by conferring the intended benefit indirectly through the hands of a third person, practically, though perhaps not nominally, creating an express trust for such purpose. It is therefore complementary to a note in 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 698, and its continuation in 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 176, which contain the decisions in which the decedent's intention to give the property directly to a third person has been frustrated by the fraudulent conduct of an heir, devisee, or legatee.

The reader may also find useful in the present connection a note upon Gifts by will as affected by promises made to the testator, and by secret trusts, in 20 L.R.A. 465.

Since in the class of cases herein under discussion the element of personal fraud is wanting, its very existence being often expressly negatived by the continued willingness of the promisor to carry the decedent's wishes into execution, the only fraud which can justify the interposition of equity is the so-called "constructive fraud" upon the decedent, which would be occasioned by a failure to execute his wishes. The question stated is therefore merely a concrete aspect of the general question whether constructive fraud, as well as actual and intentional fraud, is sufficient to raise a trust ex maleficio. This general question, which has already received some discussion in the note in 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 698, above mentioned, in its relation to the decisions therein presented, is one upon which there is a conflict of opinion.

From what may be termed the technical point of view, the doctrine that a trust ex maleficio may be erected upon the anticipated breach of a parol promise to devote property received from the promisee to certain purposes is open to the serious objection that, by the simple expedient of giving it another name, it gives effect to a trust created by parol, and thus evades the express provision of the statute of frauds with respect to the creation or evidencing of trusts in realty, and the provisions of the statute of wills with respect to the formalities necessary to a valid testamentary disposition, unduly extending the judge-made exception which obtains where property has been acquired by actual fraud. For this reason the doctrine has been repudiated by some courts, as well as by so discriminating an author as Mr. Pomeroy. See Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1054.

On the other hand, looking at the matter from a practical view point, with the idea of doing justice to the parties, unhampered by artificial restrictions, and bearing in mind that the essential purpose of the statutes of frauds and wills is to interpose a safeguard against fictitious claims by requiring a satisfactory form of proof, the objections which stand in the way of the enforcement of a parol undertaking to hold property for the benefit of a third person, though unaccompanied by actual fraud, seem to be satisfactorily overcome by the court's insistence on clear and convincing proof of such undertaking.

If, then, the constructive fraud which would arise in case of nonperformance of a promise to apply property acquired from the promisee to the purposes agreed upon is sufficient to warrant a court of equity in enforcing performance, it is difficult to see why the same basis does not exist where the nominal as well as the real intention of the promisee was to create a trust. It would seem, therefore, as though the courts clared trustees ex maleficio is not an action upon a contract not in writing, either express or implied, and, as such, barred in six years by the statute of limitations.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Montgomery County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action to recover money, together with interest, willed by testator to defendants upon their promise to hold the same in trust for a certain lodge. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carr, Allaman, Kennedy, & Retter and McMahon & McMahon, for plaintiffs in error:

A will cannot be reformed, except it contains the data for reformation within its own limits.

Kent v. Mahaffey, 10 Ohio St. 204; Giffin v. Brooks, 48 Ohio St. 211, 31 N. E. 743.

The jurisdiction to establish trusts ex maleficio is based on fraud, where the promise is not made in conformity with law, viz., in writing.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1054-1056; Bispham, Eq. §§ 91, 218; Kent v. Mahaffey, 10 Ohio St. 220.

Assuming that the mere silence of Smart, when Kern said to the testator in his presence that the will would be all right if he had confidence that the legatees would carry out his wishes, amounted to an implied contract to turn over the money, the failure which are willing to accept this doctrine might as well abandon the pretense that they are enforcing a trust ex maleficio; and instead announce that the statute of frauds will not in all cases preclude the enforcement of a parol trust, but that such a trust arising out of an understanding between the parties to a transfer of property may be enforced where its existence has been indubitably established. Such a course would do away with the difficulty of observing the tenuous boundary between the rule that the mere breach of a promise to hold property in trust is, in the absence of fraud in procuring the transfer, insufficient to raise a trust ex maleficio, and the doctrine that the constructive fraud upon the promisee in event of nonperformance of a promise in reliance upon which property is transferred will warrant a court of equity in constructing such a trust.

Of the cases comprised within the scope of this note, it may be said that the weight of authority supports the doctrine that equity will construct a trust upon the promise of an heir or legatee to devote all or a portion of the property received by inheritance or bequest to certain purposes, notwithstanding no actual fraud was contemplated by the promisor, and no specific testamentary intention was frustrated. This result is reached by adopting the somewhat forced inference that otherwise a direct testamentary gift would have been made. Where the purposes are such that an express trust or direct bequest would have been valid, equity will enforce performance of the promise; or, to the extent which a direct provision would have been invalid, will raise a trust for the benefit of the testator's heirs and next of kin.

A case in which a trust ex maleficio was held to arise notwithstanding the want of actual fraud on the part of a legatee is Curdy v. Berton, 79 Cal. 420, 5 L.R.A. 189, 12 Am. St. Rep. 157, 51 Pac. 858, where testatrix gave to a scrivener of the will certain property "in trust . . . to be distributed according to the private instructions I give him." The legatee having distributed the property in accordance with the instructions given him, an action was brought by an heir at law of testatrix to have it decreed that the legatee held the legal title to the property in trust for the heirs. It was held that equity would raise a constructive trust in favor of the beneficiaries intended by testatrix, upon the ground that a legatee will not be countenanced in perpetrating a fraud by encouraging a testator to make a bequest which would not otherwise have been made, and then refusing to execute his promise.

So also, in Barrell v. Hanrick, 42 Ala. 60, it appeared that, in pursuance of an agreement between them, a testator devised certain property absolutely to a friend upon the understanding that he should hold it for the use and benefit of testator's brother, to whom, on account of his then being an alien enemy, the property could not be directly given; and that in view of the relations of the testator and the legatee it was a fair inference that the bequest and the parol stipulation relative thereto had birth as the result of the latter's suggestion and advice; that there was no reason to believe that the legatee practised any fraud or deceit in procuring the bequest, but, on the contrary, that there was every reason to believe that at the time of the execution of the will the legatee intended honestly and fairly to execute the trust in question, being prevented from doing so, however, by his death. Upon this state of facts it was held that evidence that the legatee's failure to fulfil his engagement was the result of an original fraudulent design was not essential to raise a trust ex maleficio, but his failure to execute the trust from whatever cause was a constructive fraud, against which relief should be decreed.

In Hooker v. Axford, 33 Mich. 453, where a wife, desirous of devising her property so as to benefit her husband, and also so as to prevent his creditors from depriving him of it, on her attorney's suggestion willed it to such attorney and her nephew upon the oral understanding that they would hold it for his use, it was held that equity would enforce the trust, both as against to carry out such contract does not constitute a fraud.

In Smullin v. Wharton, 73 Neb. 607, 103 N. W. 288, 106 N. W. 577, 112 N. W. 622, 113 N. W. 267, where a husband, desiring that his wife might continue to live in the manner to which they had been accustomed, but at the same time preferring that his property should go ultimately to his own family rather than to hers, requested her, at the time of his executing a will, leaving all his property to her, to use any surplus income for the benefit of his family, and to make a will leaving all the property to them at her death, it was held that by her promise to comply with such request, made at the time of the execution of the will, and reliance upon it by her husband in signing that instrument, and her refusal to carry out her promise, she thereby became a trustee ex maleficio, if the trust was defined and certain enough to be capable of enforcement.

In Re O'Hara, 95 N. Y. 403, 47 Am. Rep. 53, a testatrix gave to three persons, who were her lawyer, her doctor, and her priest, absolutely, but as joint tenants, the bulk of her estate, in reliance upon the promise of the legatees to devote it to certain charitable uses dictated in a letter of instructions, her intention in making such disposition being to accomplish certain purposes, some of which could not be legally carried out by express provisions in her will. The legatees were not actuated by fraudulent motives, and continued willing to carry out the instructions, being prevented therefrom by the contention of the heirs at law that a trust ex maleficio arose, which, failing as to the intended beneficiaries, resulted to them; and this contention was sustained by the court.

In Amherst College v. Ritch, 151 N. Y. 282, 37 L.R.A. 305, 45 N. E. 876, a testator, desiring to evade the provisions of a statute limiting the proportion of an estate which may be given by will to charitable purposes, made certain persons in whom he had confidence his residuary legatees; one of whom undertook that they would respect his intentions as to the disposition of the property. The legatees were not actuated by fraudulent intentions, but continued willing, and in fact attempted, to carry out the testator's wishes. Upon this state of facts it was held that a constructive trust arose in favor of the charitable institutions to the extent to which the law permits property to be willed away from the heirs and next of kin to such institutions, and as to the balance, in favor of the heirs and next of kin.

So also in Edson v. Bartow, 154 N. Y. 215, 61 Am. St. Rep. 609, 48 N. E. 541, where a testatrix, in order to prevent the defeat of her testamentary intentions by a statute rendering void all legacies to charitable uses contained in wills executed less than two months before death, provided that if any legacies should fail, the amount thereof should go absolutely to the persons named as her executors, one of whom was the draftsman of the will, expressing her belief that in the use of same they would follow what they believed to be her wishes, it was held that, as the draftsman of the will impliedly consented to carry her wishes into effect as to such property, and the secret trust being void, as having for its object a circumvention of the statute referred to, equity would not permit the legatees to hold their legacies, but would declare a trust in favor of the heir at law and next of kin.

request of the son, who was involved in debt, executed a codicil giving the whole tract to the daughter, who, at the time, was charged by her mother to remember that half belonged to her brother, and assented thereto, it was held that a trust ex maleficio arose in favor of the son.

In Schultz's Appeal, 80 Pa. 396, where a testator, desiring to bequeath his estate to charitable uses, but fearing that such disposition would be rendered invalid by law by his death within thirty days thereafter, bequeathed his property absolutely to a person in whom he had confidence, the court stated the law to be that if an absolute estate is devised, but upon a secret trust, assented to by the devisee, either expressly, or impliedly by knowledge and silence before the death of the testator, a court of equity will fasten a trust on him on the ground of fraud, though if he have no part in the devise, and no knowledge of it until after the death of the testator, there is no ground upon which equity can fasten such a trust on him, even though, after it comes to his knowledge, he should express an intention of conforming to the wishes of the testator.

In Shields v. McAuley, 37 Fed. 302, where a woman to whom certain real estate had been devised by a brother died intestate, leaving an instrument stating that by the request of such brother the realty should be sold at her death, and the proceeds divided between two charitable institutions, it was held that since evidently the brother had communicated his intention to her, and she had accepted the trust, the case came within the rule that if a testator make a devise in terms absolute, but upon a private understanding had with his devisee, whether by the latter's express promise or his assent implied from his silence, that he will apply the devised estate to some purpose designated by the testator, a trust arises which a court of equity will enforce unless unlawful in itself.

In De Laurencel v. De Boom, 48 Cal. 581, where a testator, after making a will giving all his property absolutely to a certain person, wrote a letter of instructions 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

explaining the purposes to which he desired his property to be put, and the legatee in the testator's lifetime bound himself in writing to execute the wishes of the testator expressed in the letter, it was held that when the legatee thus accepted the terms of the trust, this created a valid trust which a court of equity would enforce, the court saying: "The presumption is, that the testator would have revoked or modified the will, except for the fact that the defendant, by a solemn instrument, accepted the trust, and promised to execute it. It would be a fraud upon the testator and upon cestui que trusts to permit the defendant to repudiate the trust on the faith of which the estate was devised to him."

In Re Minturn, 5 Dem. 508, a testatrix gave her entire estate to her executors in trust to pay the income to her brother for life, with remainder over. Among her papers after her decease was found an agreement under seal, signed by the brother, reciting the testamentary provision, and containing a covenant that, after enjoying the income for three years, he would execute a release thereof for any future time. It was held that although there was no direct evidence of an actual personal conference between the testator and the beneficiary, or that testatrix ever avowed an intention of so altering her testamentary disposition as to limit her brother's interest in her estate to the enjoyment of the income for three years, the fact of her having possession of the agreement was sufficient to bring the case within the doctrine of trusts ex maleficio.

On the other hand, in Evans v. Moore, 247 Ill. 60, 93 N. E. 118, where it appeared that a testator, at the time he made his will, did not desire or intend then to place the title in a nephew, on account of whose dissipation he thought better to place the title in someone else for the time being; that the devisee did not solicit or request that the devise be made to him to hold for the benefit of the nephew, and did nothing to induce it to be so made, beyond possibly promising testator to hold the title for 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 514, 29 Week. Rep. 45; Hooker v. Axford, 33 Mich. 453.

Summers, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John O'Kell, an old bachelor, had been for many years a member of Miami Lodge at Dayton, Ohio. He had been a daily visitor at the rooms of the lodge, and had spent most of his time there, and considered it his home. He became sick, and, having no heirs of his body, and his relatives all being in good circumstances, he desired to will his property to the lodge. In November, 1898, he requested the plaintiff in error A. Ferris Smart, who was one of the trustees of the lodge to write his will. Smart persuaded him to have it done by a lawyer, and by direction of O'Kell went to a lawyer and requested him to draft a will giving the property to the lodge. The lawyer, learning that O'Kell probably would not live a year under the mistaken notion that in that event the bequest would be void under the charitable bequests statute, on that ground advised that O'Kell make an immediate transfer of his property to the lodge. Smart communicated the lawyer's advice to O'Kell, and later returned to the lawyer with the statement that O'Kell was unwilling to make an immediate transfer, as he might get well and need the property. The lawyer then suggested that what O'Kell wished might be effected by his making a will giving the property to two or three members of the lodge whom he would trust to give it the benefit of the nephew until he was more mature in years and less given to dissipation, it was held that the case was within the rule that a mere parol promise of a grantee or devisee to hold the title of the property in trust, unattended with any fraud in procuring the conveyance or devise to be made, does not raise a constructive trust.

And in Orth v. Orth, 145 Ind. 184, 32 L.R.A. 298, 57 Am. St. Rep. 185, 42 N. E. 277, a testator gave his entire estate absolutely to his wife, requesting her in an accompanying letter to make certain provisions for their children. The wife having died, an action was brought by one of the children upon the theory that, as the wife had promised testator to carry out the requests and intention expressed in the letter, a trust ex maleficio arose from her failure to do so. It was held that if the wife by fraud had procured the execution of the will, or had dissuaded testator from executing a will creating a trust for the benefit of his children, equity would have held her a trustee for the benefit of those entitled by law to the property; but that her mere failure to comply with the requests contained in the letter, having promised her husband that she would comply with them, was not such fraud as will raise a trust ex maleficio. "Such a trust," says the court, "in its very nature, implies the absence of an intention on the part of the parties to create a trust by their own expression, for it would be to repeal the statute of trusts . . . forbidding the creation by parol of a trust concerning lands, to permit the parties, after declaring a parol trust and violating it, to then plead that violation as the fraud calling for the equitable construction of that particular trust. . . . There are, perhaps, cases where parol trusts, ineffectual under the statute, have been procured by such fraud and deceit as that equity will grant relief for the fraud, without regard to the declared trust; but such cases do not proceed upon the idea that equity enforces the trust which is inhibited by the statute, but rather upon the idea that equity constructs a trust."

In Whitehouse v. Bolster, 95 Me. 458, 50 Atl. 240, it was held that no constructive trust arose from the promise of a decedent's father that her wishes should be carried out, where it appeared that the daughter did not rely upon such promise as an effectual disposition of her estate, but intended to make a will, being prevented however from doing so by a sudden illness and death, the court saying: "There is one principle which runs through all the cases, and which, in our view of this case, must be decisive here. It must always appear that the decedent relied upon the promise of the heir or devisee as an effective arrangement for the future disposition of his property. This principle is fundamental and universal. Such a trust as this is claimed to be has its origin in fraud. It is forced, if necessary, upon the conscience of the party to prevent the accomplishment of a fraudulent result. It is constructed to compel the donee to do with the estate coming to him as he has induced his ancestor or testator to believe that he will do. It is upheld when and only when it would be unconscientious for the donee to retain the estate to his own benefit. It exists only because the decedent relied upon the promise of the heir. If the decedent did not rely upon the promise, there is no fraud, and the trust fails. It is not a fraud not to keep a promise that was not relied upon."

In Moore v. Campbell, 102 Ala. 445, 14 So. 780, it was held that a bill charging that a residuary devisee and legatee accepted the gift upon a distinct promise and agreement with testatrix at the time the will was made that out of the proceeds of the residuary estate he would give a certain person a sum of money was, so far as it might be considered as seeking to enforce a parol trust in real property devised by the will, without equity. This decision, however, seems to proceed upon the theory to the lodge. Smart again went to consult O'Kell and returned to the lawyer, and stated that his advice would be acted upon, and gave him three names, his own and those of John H. Winder and Lewis P. Williams, the other plaintiffs in error. A will was immediately drafted by the lawyer and executed by O'Kell, giving all of his property to the three persons named, and naming them as executors. In December O'Kell died, his will was probated, the three friends were appointed executors, and in January, 1899, they filed their first and final account, showing that they had received more than $5,000 and had something more than $4,000 for distribution. At different times shortly after O'Kell's death the executors, severally and to different members of the lodge, made statements of the purport that O'Kell had given his property to them for the lodge, and that it would be turned over after the time had expired in which his heirs could contest the will. Nothing ever was turned over, and in 1906 this action was commenced to recover from the defendants the fund on hand for distribution together with interest. The common pleas court found for the lodge, and on error in the circuit court its judgment was affirmed.

Counsel for defendants say that there is no reported case in Ohio in which a trust has been ingrafted on a will by parol, and contend that a beneficiary under a will can be declared a trustee ex maleficio only when the testator was influenced by the legatee's actual intentional fraud. Pomeroy on that the purpose of the bill was to enforce performance of an express, rather than of a constructive, trust.

That a constructive trust cannot arise from a promise to carry out a trust indefinitely declared by a will is held in Olliffe v. Wells, 130 Mass. 221. It there appeared that a testatrix before, and at the time of, and after the execution of her will, orally made known to the legatee to whom she bequeathed her residuary estate "to distribute the same in such manner as in his discretion shall appear best calculated to carry out wishes which I have expressed to him, or may express to him," her wish and intention that he should dispose of such property for charitable uses and purposes according to his discretion and judgment. The residuary legatee was apparently willing to proceed with the execution of the trust, to which objection was made on the part of the next of kin. It was held that, as between the legatee and the beneficiaries intended, equity might enforce a trust; yet, the will upon its face showing that the devisee took a legal title only, and not a beneficial interest, and the trust not being sufficiently defined by the will to take effect, the equitable interest went by way of resulting trust to the heirs or next of kin as intestate property, of which equitable interest they could not be deprived by any conduct of the devisee nor by any intention of the deceased, unless signified in those forms which the law makes essential to every testamentary disposition.

The foregoing decision, in marking a difference between cases where a bequest is upon a trust not definitely declared and cases where the bequest is upon its face outright, is usually characterized as being against the weight of authority; and is admitted by the court making it to be at variance with many other decisions which are criticized as overlooking or disregarding a fundamental distinction.

The objection to the validity of constructive trusts arising under the circumstances detailed in the foregoing cases, founded on the statute of frauds and the statute of 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

wills, is discussed in Amherst College v. Ritch, 151 N. Y. 282, 37 L.R.A. 305, 45 N. E. 876, as follows: "The trust does not act directly upon the will by modifying the gift, for the law requires wills to be wholly in writing; but it acts upon the gift itself as it reaches the possession of the legatee, or as soon as he is entitled to receive it. The theory is that the will has full effect by passing an absolute legacy to the legatee, and that then equity, in order to defeat fraud, raises a trust in favor of those intended to be benefited by the testator, and compels the legatee, as a trustee ex maleficio, to turn over the gift to them. The law, not the will, fastens the trust upon the fund by requiring the legatee to act in accordance with the instructions of the testator and his own promise. Neither the statute of frauds nor the statute of wills applies, because the will takes effect as written and proved; but to promote justice and prevent wrong, the courts compel the legatee to dispose of his gift in accordance with equity and good conscience."

The opposing view is stated in Moore v. Campbell, supra, as follows: "The statute requiring wills to be in writing and attested in the manner prescribed was intended to prevent the fraudulent setting up of pretended devises and bequests or agreements, and then sustaining such pretenses by perjury. For this purpose the statute is specific in all the formalities to be observed in the execution of a will, and our decisions require a strict compliance with these requirements. The argument to sustain the rule is, that the statute should not be used as an instrument to make fraud successful, and where the proof clearly shows a fraudulent breach of trust, though resting in parol, to permit the statute to exclude parol proof of the trust would sustain fraud and defeat the purpose of the statute. Does not the argument render entirely nugatory the statute? The statute of wills, § 1966 of the Code, is as follows: 'No will is effectual to pass real or personal property . . . unless the same is in writing, signed by the testa-

Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2, § 1054, is cited as follows: "There are a few cases which seem to hold that a trust will arise under these circumstances from a mere verbal promise of the devisee or legatee to hold the property for the benefit of another person. This position, however, is clearly opposed to settled principle. The only ground upon which such a trust can be rested, and is rested by the overwhelming weight of authority, is actual intentional fraud." In a note to this section in the second edition of that work, it is said: "The majority of the recent decisions do not insist on an actual fraudulent intention on the part of the legatee or devisee as necessary to the creation of a trust of this nature."

It is conceded that in cases of actual intentional fraud, equity will raise a trust, notwithstanding the statute of frauds or the statute of wills. In equity what difference can there be whether the fraudulent intention existed at the time the testator acted, or not until it was time for the devisee to act? In either case the testator acted upon the faith that the devisee would keep his promise. The result of his refusal or failure to do so is the same in either case and equally fraudulent. The earlier cases are cases in which the devisee or legatee had a fraudulent intention at the time the promise was made; but by the weight of authority in this country, if not also in England, it is well settled that it is immaterial when the intention was formed. An examination of a great many cases shows that the law is well stated in the opinion of Vann, J., in the case of Amherst College v. Ritch (1897) 151 N. Y. 282-323, 37 L.R.A. 305, 45 N. E. 876, 887, as follows: "While a testator may make a gift to a legatee solely for the purpose of enabling him, if he sees fit, to dispose of it in a particular way, still, if there is no promise by him, either express or implied, to so dispose of it, and the matter is left wholly to his will and discretion, no secret trust is created, and he may, if he chooses, apply the legacy to his own use. When it clearly appears that no trust was intended, even if it is equally clear that the testator expected that the gift would be applied in accordance with his known wishes, the legatee, if he has made no promise, and none has been made in his behalf, takes an absolute, or some person in his presence and by his direction, and attested by at least two witnesses, who must subscribe their names thereto, in the presence of the testator.' The legitimate conclusion from the argument is that the writings may stand unless the parol proof shows that they do not speak the whole truth. It is further contended in support of the principle, that parol proof in such cases does not vary the will or alter the terms of the writings, but that the property descends according to the terms of the will, and vests as therein directed, and that equity may seize upon it, after it has vested as prescribed in the will, and fasten a parol trust upon it in favor of another not mentioned in the will, in order to carry out the real intent and purpose of the testator. Can any fair judicial mind hold that a bequest or devise absolutely to A may be shown by parol proof to be to him in trust for B, and that the bequest to A was intended for B, that such proof neither varies nor contradicts the writings which gave it absolutely to A? Such an argument and conclusion seem to be a bold circumvention of the statute itself, rather than a mere rule invented of necessity to defeat fraud and to sustain the statute."

Of the English cases involving the enforcement in equity of secret trusts, many of which may be found in the note in 20 L.R.A. 465, already mentioned, only one need be herein reviewed in detail. This is McCormick v. Grogan, L. R. 4 H. L. 82. Ir. Rep. 1 Eq. 313, 17 Week. Rep. 961, which is interesting as explicitly holding that where the circumstances are such as absolutely to exclude the inference of personal fraud in obtaining a bequest, the doctrine of constructive trusts does not apply. There a testator left all his property to a friend, whom he also appointed his executor, and thereafter, when on his deathbed, sent for him and told him that he had left him all his property. On the friend's asking, "Is that right?" testator said he would not have it otherwise; and then told him that he would find the will in a desk, and a letter with it, the contents of which he did not disclose, but which the friend testified that he supposed was connected with the testator's property. It was held that there was nothing in the circumstances of the case to warrant the supposition that any distinct promise to carry out the instructions of the letter had been exacted, the breach of which would constitute a fraud, such conclusion being strengthened by the circumstance that, in the letter itself, the testator left the carrying out of his instructions entirely to his friend's judgment. Lord Westbury, in the course of his opinion, said: "The jurisdiction which is invoked here by the appellant is founded altogether on personal fraud. It is a jurisdiction by which a court of equity, proceeding on the ground of fraud, converts the party who has committed it into a trustee for the party who is injured by that fraud. Now, being a jurisdiction founded on personal fraud, it is incumbent on the court to see that a fraud, a malus animus, is proved by the clearest and most indisputable evidence. It is impossible to supply presumption in the place of proof, nor are you warranted in deriving lute title, and can do what he pleases with the gift. Whatever moral obligation there may be, no legal obligation rests upon him. On the other hand, if the testator is induced either to make a will or not to change one after it is made, by a promise, express or implied, on the part of a legatee, that he will devote his legacy to a certain lawful purpose, a secret trust is created, and equity will compel him to apply property thus obtained in accordance with his promise. O'Hara v. Dudley, 95 N. Y. 403, 47 Am. Rep. 53; Brown v. Lynch, 1 Paige, 147; Dowd v. Tucker, 41 Conn. 197; De Laurencel v. De Boom, 48 Cal. 581; Browne v. Browne, 1 Harr. & J. 430; Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 442; Towles v. Burton Rich. Eq. Cas. 140, 24 Am. Dec. 409; McLellan v. McLean, 2 Head, 684; Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204; Thynn v. Thynn, 1 Vern. 296; Reech v. Kennegal, 1 Ves. Sr. 124, 1 Wils. Ch. 227; Wallgrave v. Tebbs, 2 Kay & J. 321, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S. 241, 2 Jur. N. S. 83; McCormick v. Grogan, L. R. 4 H. L. 82, Ir. Rep. 1 Eq. 313, 17 Week. Rep. 691. The trust springs from the intention of the testator and the promise of the legatee. The same rule applies to heirs and next of kin who induce their ancestor or relative not to make a will by promising, in case his property falls to them through intestacy, to dispose of it, or a part of it, in the manner indicated by him. Williams v. Fitch, 18 N. Y. 546; Grant v. Bradstreet, 87 Me. 583, 33 Atl. 165; Gilpatrick v. Glidden, 81 Me. 137, 2 L.R.A. 662, 10 Am. St. Rep. 245, 16 Atl. 464. The rule is founded on the principle that the legacy would not have been given, or intestacy allowed to ensue, unless the promise had been made; and, hence, the person promising is bound in equity to keep it, as to violate it would be fraud. While a promise is essential, it need not be expressly made, for active co-operation or silent acquiescence may have the same effect as an express promise. If a legatee knows what the testator expects of him, and, having an opportunity to speak, says nothing, it may be equivalent to a promise, provided the testator acts upon it. Whenever it appears that the testator was prevented from action by the action or silence of a legatee, who knew the facts in time to act or speak, he will not be permitted to apply the legacy to his own use when that would defeat the expectations of the testator. As those conclusions in the absence of direct proof, for the purpose of affixing the criminal character of fraud, which you might by possibility derive in a case of simple contract. The court of equity has, from a very early period, decided that even an act of Parliament shall not be used as an instrument of fraud; and if in the machinery of perpetrating a fraud an act of Parliament intervenes, the court of equity, it is true, does not set aside the act of Parliament, but it fastens on the individual who gets a title under that act, and imposes upon him a personal obligation, because he applies the act as an instrument for accomplishing a fraud. In this way the court of equity has dealt with the statute of frauds, and in this manner, also, it deals with the statute of wills. And if an individual on his deathbed, or at any other time, is persuaded by his heir at law, or his next of kin, to abstain from making a will, or if the same individual, having made a will, communicates the disposition to the person on the face of the will benefited by that disposition, but, at the same time, says to that individual that he has a purpose to answer which he has not expressed in the will, but which he depends on the donee to carry into effect, and the donee assents to it, either expressly, or by any mode of action which the donee knows must give to the testator the impression and belief that he fully assents to the request, then, undoubtedly, the heir at law in the one case, and the donee in the other, will be converted into trustees, simply on the principle that an individual shall not be benefited by his own personal fraud. You are obliged, therefore, to shew most clearly and distinctly that the person you wish to convert into a trustee acted malo animo. You must shew distinctly that he knew that the testator or the intestate was beguiled and deceived by his conduct. If you are not in a condition to affirm that without any misgiving, or possibility of mistake, you are not warranted in affixing on the individual the delictum of fraud, which you must do before you convert him into a trustee." And after reviewing the evidence in the case, he further said: "You cannot constitute a fraud in this matter unless you find that there is a distinct and positive promise the nonfulfilment of which brands the party with disgrace as having personally imposed on the testator." And Lord Hatherley said, with reference to the doctrine that equity will interpose where a testamentary intention has been frustrated by the decedent's reliance upon the undertaking of his heir or legatee: "But this doctrine evidently requires to be carefully restricted within proper limits. It is in itself a doctrine which involves a wide departure from the policy which induced the legislature to pass the statute of frauds, and it is only in clear cases of fraud that this doctrine has been applied,—cases in which the court has been persuaded that there has been a fraudulent inducement held out on the part of the apparent beneficiary in order to lead the testator to confide to him the duty which he so undertook to perform." E. S. O.

was said by this court in the O'Hara Case, supra: 'It matters little that McCue did not make in words a formal and express promise. Everything that he said and everything that he did was full of that interpretation. When the testatrix was told that the legal effect of the will was such that the legatees could divert the fund to their own use, which was a statement of their power, she was told, also, that she would only have their honor and conscience on which to rely, and answered that she could trust them, which was an assertion of their duty. Where, in such cases, the legatee even by silent acquiescence encourages the testatrix to make a bequest to him, to be by him applied for the benefit of others, it has all the force and effect of an express promise.' The trust does not act directly upon the will by modifying the gift, for the law requires wills to be wholly in writing; but it acts upon the gift itself as it reaches the possession of the legatee, or as soon as he is entitled to receive it. The theory is that the will has full effect by passing an absolute legacy to the legatee, and that then equity, in order to defeat fraud, raises a trust in favor of those intended to be benefited by the testator, and compels the legatee, as a trustee ex maleficio, to turn over the gift to them. The law, not the will, fastens the trust upon the fund by requiring the legatee to act in accordance with the instructions of the testator and his own promise. Neither the statute of frauds nor the statute of wills applies, because the will takes effect as written and proved; but to promote justice and prevent wrong the courts compel the legatee to dispose of his gift in accordance with equity and good conscience. As was well said in Wallgrave v. Tebbs, supra: 'Where a person, knowing that a testator, in making a disposition in his favor, intends it to be applied for purposes other than his own benefit, either expressly promises or by silence implies that he will carry the testator's intention into effect, and the property is left to him upon the faith of that promise or undertaking, it is in effect a case of trust, and in such a case the court will not allow the devisee to set up the statute of frauds,—or rather the statute of wills, by which the statute of frauds is now in this respect superseded,—and for the reason that the devisee by his conduct has induced the testator to leave him the property; and, as Lord Justice Turner says in Russell v. Jackson, no one can doubt that, if the devisee had stated that he would not carry into effect the intentions of the testator, the disposition in his favor would not have been found in the will. But in this the court does not violate the spirit of the statute, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but for the same end, namely, prevention of fraud, ingrafts the trust on the devise by admitting evidence, which the statute would in terms exclude, in order to prevent a party from applying property to a purpose foreign to that for which he undertook to hold it.'

In the above case, as well as in the earlier case (O'Hara v. Dudley, 95 N. Y. 403, 47 Am. Rep. 53), which in its facts bears a striking resemblance to the instant case, there was no fraud on the part of the devisees or legatees in procuring the will, but it was held that by reason of the act of the testator and the promise of the devisee or legatee the law fastens upon the devisee or legatee a trust which equity, in case of his refusal to perform, will enforce on the ground of fraud. In the latter case the testatrix, by her will, gave the bulk of her estate to three persons, who were her lawyer, her doctor, and her priest, absolutely as tenants in common. It was not intended by her to give to them any beneficial interest, but her design was to devote the property to certain charitable purposes. This she was advised could not be done by an express provision in her will, but only by such an absolute gift to individuals, to whose honor she could confide the execution of her purpose. It was held that the gift could not be sustained as an absolute one to the persons named, as this would be a fraud upon the testatrix. In that case it was expressly found by the trial judge that the devisee practised no fraud. In the opinion by Finch, J., it is said (95 N. Y. 413): 'Equity acts in such case not because of a trust declared by the testator, but because of the fraud of the legatee. For him not to carry out the promise by which alone he procured the devise and bequest is to perpetrate a fraud upon the deviser which equity will not endure.' Cases are cited, and he then continues: 'In the last of these cases [Williams v. Fitch, 18 N. Y. 546] the making of a bequest to the plaintiff was prevented by an agreement of the father, who was next of kin, to hold in trust for the plaintiff, and the English cases were cited with approval and the trust enforced. All along the line of discussion it was steadily claimed that a plain and unambiguous devise in a will could not be modified or cut down by extrinsic matter lying in parol, or unattested papers, and that the statute of frauds and that of wills excluded the evidence; and all along the line it was steadily answered that the devise was untouched, that it was not at all modified, that the property passed under it, but the law dealt with the holder for his fraud, and out of the facts raised a trust ex maleficio, instead of resting upon one as created by the testator. The character of the fraud which justifies the equitable interference is well described in Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 40, 3 Am. Rep. 418. It was said to consist 'in the attempt to take advantage of that which has been done in performance or upon the faith of the agreement while repudiating its obligation under cover of the statute.'" These cases are followed and approved in Ahrens v. Jones (1902) 169 N. Y. 555, 88 Am. St. Rep. 620, 62 N. E. 666, where it is held: "Where a deed is executed for the purpose of effecting a distribution of the grantor's property, upon the express promise of the grantee to pay certain sums to others, though no express trust is created, a court of equity may interpose to prevent a wrong, and declare the grantee a trustee ex maleficio for the protection of the grantor's intended beneficiaries."

In Ransdel v. Moore, 153 Ind. 393, 408, 53 L.R.A. 753, 53 N. E. 767, 772, it is expressly held that an actual fraudulent intention on the part of the grantee or devisee is not necessary to the creation of a trust of this nature. In the opinion in that case the cases are reviewed, and many, if not all, of the cases, both English and American, are cited, and it is said by Monks, Ch. J.: "An actual fraudulent intention on the part of the heir or devisee is not necessary to the creation of a trust of this nature. The great weight of authority in England and in this country, in such a case, is that after the death of the testator or intestate equity will convert the devisee or heir into a trustee, whether when he gave his assent he intended fraud or not; the final refusal of himself, if living, or, if dead, of his heirs or devisees, to execute such trust, having the effect to consummate the fraud." To the same effect is Gilpatrick v. Glidden, 81 Me. 137, 2 L.R.A. 662, 10 Am. St. Rep. 245, 16 Atl. 464, where the cases are also reviewed.

In McCormick v. Grogan (1869) L. R. 4 H. L. 82, 1r. Rep. 1 Eq. 313, 17 Week. Rep. 961, the lord chancellor (Lord Hatherly) and Lord Westbury do seem to rest the jurisdiction of equity upon the ground of personal fraud in procuring the instrument, but later as well as earlier English cases to the contrary are cited in Ransdel v. Moore, supra, as well as many American cases, and what was said by Lord Westbury is here explained, as it is also in Gilpatrick v. Glidden, supra, and by Hall, Vice Chancellor, in Re Fleetwood (1880) L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 594, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 514, 29 Week. Rep. 45 where many cases are reviewed. In Cassels v. Finn, 122 Ga. 33, 68 L.R.A. 80, 106 Am. St. Rep. 91, 49 S. E. 749, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 554, it is held that failure to perform a verbal promise cannot make the promisor a trustee ex maleficio in the absence of actual fraud, but in the note to that case, by the learned editor of the American State Reports, it is said that that case could not have been carefully considered, and that it is opposed to all the cases cited in the note, and in contravention of correct and sound equitable principle.

Next it is contended that Winder and Williams made no promise, and that the court erred in rendering judgment against them. In Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204, where the bequest was to William Jackson and Thomas Aston Jackson, the Vice Chancellor, Turner, said: "But, whether Thomas Aston Jackson was present or not, the evidence is, I think, clear that the gift would not have been made to him but for the promise given by William Jackson that the intentions of the testator should be carried into effect; and I fully agree to the principles laid down in Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. Jr. 289, 9 Revised Rep. 276, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 834, followed in many other cases, that no person can claim an interest under a fraud committed by another. However innocent the party may be, if the original transaction is tainted with fraud, that taint runs through the derivative interest, and prevents any party from claiming under it." In Moss v. Cooper (1861) 1 Johns. & H. 352, Vice Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood said (367): "The only material distinction between a will made on the faith of a previous promise, and a will followed by a promise is this: If, on the faith of a promise by A, a gift is made in favor of A and B, the promise is fastened onto the gift to both, for B cannot profit by A's fraud. But if the will is first made in favor of A and B, and the secret trust is then communicated only to A, the gift will be fixed with a trust with respect to A, but not so as regards B, because in this case the gift to B. is not obtained by the procurement of A, and is not tainted with any fraud in procuring the execution of the will. That is the sole distinction between the case of a will made on the faith of a promise, and that of a will followed by a subsequent promise." In Re Stead [1900] 1 Ch. 237, it is said by Farwell, J. (241): "If A induces B either to make or to leave unrevoked a will leaving property to A and C as tenants in common, by expressly promising, or tacitly consenting, that he and C will carry out the testator's wishes, and C knows nothing of the matter until after A's death, A is bound, but C is not bound (Tee v. Ferris, 2 Kay & J. 357, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S. 437, 2 Jur. N. S. 807); the reason stated being that to hold otherwise would enable one beneficiary to deprive the rest of their benefits by setting up a secret trust. If, however, the gift were to A and C as joint tenants, the authorities have established a distinction between those cases in which the will is made on the faith of an antecedent promise by A and those in which the will is left unrevoked on the faith of a subsequent promise. In the former case the trust binds both A and C (Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204; Jones v. Badley, L. R. 3 Ch. 362, 19 L. T. N. S. 106, 16 Week. Rep. 713), the reason stated being that no person can claim an interest under a fraud committed by another. In the latter case A, and not C, is bound (Burney v. MacDonald, 15 Sim. 6, 9 Jur. 588, and Moss v. Cooper, 1 Johns. & H. 352, 4 L. T. N. S. 790), the reason stated being that the gift is not tainted with any fraud in procuring the execution of the will. Personally I am unable to see any difference between a gift made on the faith of an antecedent promise and a gift left unrevoked on the faith of a subsequent promise to carry out the testator's wishes." There is no joint tenancy in this state, and the distinction made in the English cases cannot be made here. The reason for the distinction would apply here only in cases of separate devises or bequests. In the present case the bequest is a joint bequest of all the testator's property to the three persons named. It was all intended for the lodge, and made to the three upon the promise of one that they would give it to the lodge. The question was considered in the two New York cases already referred to, in one of which there was a joint tenancy and in the other a tenancy in common. In Amherst College v. Ritch, 151 N. Y. 282, 327, 37 L.R.A. 305, 45 N. E. 876, 888, it is said by Vann, J.: "The intention of the testator being thus clear, the secret trust was completed by the promise made by or on behalf of the residuary legatees. As the gift was to them as tenants in common, a promise that bound all was necessary in order to include each of the three shares. That Mr. Ritch and Mr. Vaughan duly promised appears so conclusively from their conduct, letters and statements to the testator that we do not regard any further expression of our views upon the subject as necessary. It is, however, strenuously urged that Mr. Bulkley made no promise, and hence that the secret trust did not extend to his share of the gift. If he were the only residuary legatee, the question would be more serious, but he was not. The trial court found that Messrs. Ritch and Vaughan promised for themselves and for Mr. Bulkley, and the evidence plainly warrants this conclusion. The general term, in its opinion, went farther, and declared that there was an understanding between Mr. Bulkley and the testator to the same effect; but the evidence to sustain this conclusion is meager, although we do not hold it was insufficient. Assuming, however, that Mr. Bulkley made no promise, still we think that he was bound, under the circumstances, by the promise made in his behalf, and that he cannot profit by the action of his cotenants in making the promise for him, as that would be a fraud. He was not a purchaser. He furnished no consideration. There was no contract for his benefit. He was in the attitude of accepting a gift pure and simple, but that gift was made in reliance upon a promise given in his behalf. Can he violate the promise and fairly take that which came to him solely on account of the promise, even if it was not made or authorized by him? We think not, because his title came through the promise, and by accepting the gift he ratified the promise. He must repudiate the gift or accept the responsibility. While the cases are not uniform, the weight of authority sustains this conclusion. Hooker v. Axford, 33 Mich. 453; Moss v. Cooper, 1 Johns. & H. 367, 4 L. T. N. S. 790; Tee v. Ferris, 2 Kay & J. 357, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S. 437, 2 Jur. N. S. 807; Re King, Ir. L. R. 21 Eq. 273; O'Hara v. Dudley, 95 N. Y. 403, 47 Am. Rep. 53. In the case last cited this court said: 'So far, then, as McCue is concerned, he stands in the attitude of having procured and induced the testatrix to make a devise or bequest to himself and his associates by asserting its necessity, and promising faithfully to carry out the charitable purposes for which it was made; and whether his associates knew or promised, or did not, makes no difference where the devise is to them as joint tenants, and all must get their rights through the result accomplished by one.' Although the devise in that case was to joint tenants, the principle that 'all must get their rights through the result accomplished by one' is broad and equitable, and should not be limited to the technicality of a joint tenancy as distinguished from a tenancy in common, where, as in this case, the promise was made by two in behalf of themselves and another, and a devise thus obtained to the three. This rule prevents fraud, which is the primary object of the courts in enforcing secret trusts, while any other would promote fraud. We thus reach the conclusion that there was a secret trust that bound all of the residuary legatees."

It is further contended that the court erred in admitting the separate admissions of the several defendants, made after the death of the testator, and not in the hearing of each other. A trust in an absolute devise may be established by parol evidence of contemporaneous declarations of the testator and subsequent declaration of the devisee in possession that the devise was made for the benefit of a third person upon the devisee's suggestion and promise to hold it in trust. After such evidence of the devisee's active or passive agency in procuring the devise, he will be declared a trustee ex maleficio, and the trust will be enforced against him. See cases cited in the note to Cassels v. Finn, supra, 106 Am. St. Rep. 91-99. In Harvey v. Gardner, 41 Ohio St. 642, it is held that in this state it is competent to prove an express trust in land by parol evidence, and that the contemporaneous declarations of the creator of the trust are admissible in evidence, and, further, that the acceptance of the trust may be presumed from acts of the grantee at or subsequent to the time of the grant. See also Russell v. Bruer, 64 Ohio St. 1, 59 N. E. 740; 1 Jarman, Wills. 390. In Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 432-442, it is said: "Indeed, it is not easy to see how such a trust ever could be made out except by parol evidence, and, if this is not competent, a statute made to prevent frauds would become a most potent instrument whereby to give them success. That this doctrine is applied to cases arising under wills where a person procures a devise to be made in his favor on the distinct declaration or promise that he will hold the land in trust either in whole or in part for another may be seen in the cases. . . . It is not affected by the statutory provisions on the subject of wills. The proof offered is not of any alteration, revocation, or cancellation, which must be evidenced in a particular manner. It gives full effect to the will and every word of it, and to the conclusiveness of the probate, where it is conclusive. It fastens upon the conscience of the party having thus procured a will, and then fraudulently refusing or neglecting to fulfill the promise on the faith of which it was executed, a trust or confidence, which a court of equity will enforce by compelling a conveyance when the proper time for it has arrived."

It is next contended that the action was barred by the six years' statute of limitations. The six years' statute bars an action upon a contract not in writing, either express or implied. This is not an action upon a contract. It is an action for relief on the ground of fraud. Such actions are barred within four years, but it is expressly provided that the cause of action in such case shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery of the fraud, and it is not suggested that the lodge discovered the fraud more than four years before the commencement of the action.

It is next contended that the trial court disregarded the rule laid down in Russell v. Bruer, supra, that "the declaration of such trust must be contemporaneous with the deed, and the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the trust, and must be clear, certain, and conclusive as to its terms and conditions." Without reviewing the evidence, we deem it sufficient to say that it does not leave a reasonable doubt that the testator intended to give his property to the lodge, that he was induced to will it to the defendants by the advice of the lawyer upon the promise of Smart that he and the other legatees would give it to the lodge. The lawyer so testifies, and his testimony was corroborated in many ways, and no reason is apparent why the testator should give his property to the defendants, and they suggest none; and there is evidence that each of them, immediately after the testator's death, and before avarice had found time to suggest that they divide the estate between themselves, admitted that it was intended for the lodge. The terms and conditions are clear, certain, and conclusive. There are none, excepting that it was to be turned over to the lodge. We reaffirm the rule, and also the statement in Collins v. Hope, 20 Ohio, 493, that in such cases courts will act with the extremest caution.

Judgment affirmed.

ERROR to the District Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by its negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. G. McAdams and Everest, Smith, & Campbell, for plaintiffs in error:

The proximate and direct cause of the injury complained of was the failure of the defendant in error to stop its car and permit the deceased to board it as one of its passengers. If it had done this, no injury would have been sustained by him.

Messrs. Shartel, Keaton, & Wells for defendant in error.

Kane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action for personal injuries, commenced by the plaintiffs in error, plaintiffs below, against M. H. Kessler, city of Oklahoma City, and the defendant in error, Oklahoma City Railway Company, defendant below. The petition, in so far as it is necessary to notice its allegations for the purposes of this case, states, in substance: That on the 17th day of September, 1905, the plaintiffs were passengers on one of the cars of the defendant, the street railway company, and as such passengers received transfers and had disembarked from a car at the corner of Main and Broadway streets in said city of Oklahoma City, and were there waiting on the sidewalk, in the place designated by ordinance and fixed by custom for passengers to wait street car company did not stop the car after the plaintiff had given notice of his intention to take passage, in consequence of which, while he was attempting to take passage, he was thrown to the ground and his hand run over, resulting in amputation. The court said: "If a refusal to stop cars on notice would give rise to a cause of action, it would necessarily be for damages resulting from the refusal to stop, which might consist of delay or loss of time, but the refusal to stop and accept him as a passenger would not be the proximate cause of the injury alleged."

In Triebler v. New York & Q. C. R. Co. 134 App. Div. 661, 119 N. Y. Supp. 439, a trolley company ran its cars on a highway so near to the fence that there was only about 4 feet clearance, along which space was a footpath from which the company was accustomed to pick up passengers on signal, and which on the night in question was slippery with snow and ice and inclined toward the track. A pedestrian signaled an approaching car to stop, but the conductor, either from inattention or lack of a headlight, did not see him, and the car passed without slackening speed. The traveler, because of the suction, or his uncertain footing, or both, was drawn under the car and killed. It was held that the company was guilty of negligence in not stopping the car on signal, and was liable for the death of such traveler.

for the north-bound Maywood car of said street railway company, with the intent and purpose of boarding the north-bound Maywood car of said company, and continuing their journey thereon in accordance with the provisions of said transfers; said Maywood car being the only car upon which said transfers, under the rules, regulations, and customs of said company, would be honored. That, while waiting for said north-bound Maywood car, a fire alarm was turned in, and the usual and customary fire alarm signals were given and sounded, which were plainly audible to the employees of said company, who were operating the north-bound Maywood car for which said plaintiffs were waiting. That at said time said Maywood car was at a point on Main street in said city just west of the corner of Main and Broadway streets. That, when said fire alarm was sounded, said employees on said north-bound Maywood car heard the same, but failed and refused to stop said car, but continued eastward on said Main street and turned north into Broadway street. That plaintiffs seeing said north-bound car approaching, and knowing by the sign in front of said car that it was the car for which they were waiting and for which they held transfers entitling them to passage thereon, went, with other passengers, from the sidewalk where they had been waiting to a point near the east side of the track of said defendant company, upon which said north-bound Maywood car was approaching and signaled the motorman to stop said car at said point, which was the usual and customary point for north-bound cars to stop for the purpose of receiving passengers. That said motorman failed and refused to stop said car, but continued northward on Broadway street at a rapid rate of speed, and plaintiffs were thus unable to board said car. By the rules and regulations of said street railway company, said transfers were forfeited and valueless if not used on the said Maywood car then approaching said point. That, after said car had passed plaintiffs, they attempting to return to the sidewalk on the east side of Broadway street, and that while they were so attempting to return, and while plaintiffs were using due and proper care and caution for their own protection and safety, a fire wagon containing fire apparatus, belonging to the fire department of Oklahoma City, came north on Broadway street and on the west side thereof, in response to the fire alarm hereinbefore referred to, which had been sounded two or three minutes previously. That at said time said defendant M. H. Kessler, the chief of said fire department, in a buggy drawn by one horse, was immediately in front of and across the street from said wagon bearing said fire apparatus, and was urging and causing said horse to run at full speed north on the east side of Broadway street. That said fire chief saw said plaintiffs and saw they were in imminent danger of being run down, injured, and killed by him, when he was about 80 feet from them. That said fire department wagon, preceded by said fire chief, came north on Broadway street just at the moment that said plaintiffs attempted to board said Maywood car and were seeking to return to said sidewalk for safety, and that said fire chief saw these plaintiffs in ample time before he reached the point where they were located, and by the exercise of proper care could have stopped said horse and thereby have protected said plaintiffs; but said fire chief, wholly disregarding their rights, and wholly ignoring the danger in which said plaintiffs were placed, did, then and there, in a manner grossly negligent of the rights and grossly unmindful of the lives and safety of plaintiffs, continue to urge his said horse northward at full speed, and did then and there carelessly, negligently, heartlessly, cruelly, and in a cold-blooded and murderous manner, urge said horse and the buggy drawn by it against the persons of said plaintiffs, thereby badly wounding and injuring them, and killing the husband of the plaintiff Daisy J. Stephens and the father of the other plaintiffs, who were members of their party.

It is further alleged, in substance: That, by a valid and subsisting ordinance of said city, said street railway company was on said date required to stop its cars after the sounding of any alarm of fire and upon the approach within 300 feet of said cars of any fire engine or apparatus. That said provisions of said ordinance were unknown to said plaintiffs. That it was the further duty of said company to stop its car on Broadway street at the north line of Main street when properly signaled so to do by persons desiring to enter said cars, and that said company failed and refused to stop said car when said pretended fire alarm was turned in, and failed and refused to stop said car at said north line of Main street on Broadway, although signaled so to do by plaintiffs. That said defendant company failed and refused to comply with the terms of said ordinance, but, on the contrary, negligently and carelessly proceeded on its way with said car after the sounding of said pretended fire alarm as aforesaid, and after said car had approached to within 300 feet of said fire apparatus and a buggy occupied by defendant, which was proceeding north on Broadway street, and that by its negligence in so proceeding upon its way after the sounding of said pretended fire alarm and after said fire apparatus had approached to within 300 feet of said street railway car, in violation of said ordinance as aforesaid, lured said plaintiffs into the said street and caused said plaintiffs to believe that by remaining in said street they would be able to board said street car, and that had said street car stopped at the north line of Main street on Broadway said plaintiffs could and would have boarded said street car, and would have been in a place of safety. That by reason of the negligence and carelessness of said defendant company, as aforesaid, said plaintiffs were injured and killed, as above set out, and that the injury was the direct and proximate result of the combined negligence of defendant herein. That, but for the negligence of said company in proceeding on its way after the sounding of said pretended fire alarm as aforesaid, said plaintiffs would not have been in said street and would not have been exposed to the danger and injury which caused the death of one of said plaintiffs, and that said negligent action of said defendant company, in violation of said ordinance, and in refusing to stop said car as aforesaid, in violation of law and its duty under said ordinance, and as a common carrier of passengers, combined with the negligence of the other defendants herein as above stated, was the direct and proximate cause of the injury to and the death of said plaintiff.

To this petition the street railway company filed a demurrer, upon the grounds: (1) That there is a misjoinder of causes of action; (2) that said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants. This demurrer was by the court sustained, and, the plaintiffs electing to stand upon their petition, the cause was dismissed as to the street railway company. To review the order of the court below dismissing said cause, this proceeding in error was commenced.

The demurrer of the street railway company raises questions of considerable nicety, as the petition presents a state of facts which are not approximated in any of the cases called to our attention, or that we have been able to find. The rule contended for by counsel for plaintiffs in error is that "if the concurrent or successive negligence of two persons, combined together, results in an injury to a third person, he may recover damages of either or both, and neither can interpose the defense that the prior or concurrent negligence of the other contributed to the injury." 1 Thomp. Neg. § 75. This rule is illustrated by the following authorities:

In Byrne v. Wilson, 15 Ir. C. L. Rep. 332, an omnibus overturned, precipitating a passenger into the lock of a canal. A third person, for whose acts the proprietor of the omnibus was not responsible, let the water into the canal, in consequence of which the passenger was drowned. The proprietor of the omnibus was held liable for damages for the death of the passenger. In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sutton, 11 C. C. A. 251, 27 U. S. App. 310, 63 Fed. 394, Fred Sutton, the plaintiff, was performing his duties as a brakeman on one of the trains of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company at a railroad crossing near Reynolds, in the state of Nebraska, when an engine and train of cars of the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company collided with the train of the Burlington Company and injured him. He sued the Rock Island Company for damages for this injury, which he alleged was caused by its negligence. That company denied any negligence on its part, and alleged that the negligence of the Burlington Company caused the injury, and that the defendant in error was guilty of contributory negligence. It was held that "one is liable for an injury caused by the concurring negligence of himself and a third party, to the same extent as for one caused entirely by his own negligence." In Eaton v. Boston & L. R. Co. 11 Allen, 500, 87 Am. Dec. 730, it was held that "it is no defense to an action by a passenger against a carrier to recover damages for an injury sustained through their negligence, that the negligence or trespass of a third party contributed to the injury, although such third party acted entirely independently of the carrier." In Johnson v. Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. 48 Minn. 433, 51 N. W. 225, the defendant, the Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Company, erected poles with cross-arms and strung its telephone wires thereon, in Central avenue, a public street in the business portion of East Minneapolis. One of the poles, bearing about 100 wires, stood at a curve in the street. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that this pole had become rotten, and had not sufficient strength to withstand the weight and stress of these wires. The plaintiff was driving along this street upon a wood cart, when this pole broke near the ground and fell into and across the street, carrying with it the wires strung thereon. The pole struck the rear part of the wood cart, and smashed it, throwing the plaintiff to the ground and injured him. Guys had been fastened to the top of the pole and attached to a brick building belonging to a Mr. Shadwell. About a month before the accident, Shadwell notified the defendant to remove these guys from his building, saying "If you do not take them off I will cut them off; I will cut them off." The defendant replied "Well all right take them off." On the day of the accident Shadwell cut the guys and as he did so the pole fell and the plaintiff was injured. It was held that, "where the negligence of the defendant and the act of a third person concurred to produce the injury complained of, so that it would not have happened in the absence of either, the negligence was a proximate cause of the injury." Mr. Chief Justice Gilfillan, in delivering the opinion for the court, said: "The negligence of each is a proximate cause, where the injury would not have occurred but for that negligence."

The foregoing cases and the case at bar are in a good many respects similar in principle; but we are of the opinion that in the instant case, at least, the rule invoked is subject to the limitation pointed out in Clark v. Chambers, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 327, 47 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 427, 38 L. T. N. S. 454, 26 Week. Rep. 613, 7 Cent. L. J. 11, that the intervening agency must have been one which the first actor was bound to anticipate. The rule seems to be that where the negligent act causes consequences such as in the ordinary course of things were likely to arise, and which might, therefore, reasonably be expected to arise, or which it was contemplated by the parties might arise, liability follows; otherwise not. Ibid. In Sharp v. Powell, 20 Week. Rep. 584, L. R. 7 C. P. 253, 26 L. T. N. S. 436, 41 L. J. C. P. N. S. 253, one of the cases cited by Cockburn, Ch. J., in Clark v. Chambers, it was held that "the action would not lie where the injury, though arising from the unlawful act of the defendant, could not have been reasonably expected to follow from it." In that case Lord Chief Justice Bovill says: "No doubt one who commits a wrongful act is responsible for the ordinary consequences which are likely to result therefrom; but, generally speaking, he is not liable for damage which is not the natural or ordinary consequence of such an act, unless it be shown that he knows, or has reasonable means of knowing, that consequences not usually resulting from the act are, by reason of some existing cause, likely to intervene so as to occasion damage to a third person. Where there is no reason to expect it, and no knowledge in the person doing the wrongful act that such a state of things exists as to render the damage probable, if injury does result to a third person, it is generally considered that the wrongful act is not the proximate cause of the injury so as to render the wrongdoer liable to an action." Mr. Justice Strong, discussing this question in Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256, said: "But it is generally held that, in order to warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances." Even the severe rule of care and diligence which the law imposes upon carriers of passengers does not extend so far as to make one liable for an injury to a passenger from an accident which is not the reasonable, natural, and probable result of the situation, and which could not have been foreseen by the carrier in the exercise of that degree of care which the law demands of him. 3 Thomp. Neg. § 27-78. The reason of the rule is that the law holds a person liable for those consequences only which were the natural and probable result of his negligence, and which therefore ought to have been foreseen and anticipated.

Can it be said that the agent of the street railway company ought to have foreseen and anticipated the probable result of his negligence? This question must be answered in the negative. Personal injury is not one of the consequences that naturally follow missing a street car. Ordinarily no serious consequences flow from such a mishap. Cars usually run within a few minutes of each other, no appreciable time is lost, and the fare is always a matter of small consequence. If it were not for the terrible calamity that overtook the plaintiffs in this case, their actual damages would probably not greatly exceed the value of the unused transfer tickets. As stated in the petition the specific acts that actually caused the injury complained of were of an extraordinary nature and cruel and inhuman, almost beyond belief. The petition alleges, in substance, that, at the moment after plaintiffs attempted to board the said car, when they were seeking to return to said sidewalk for safety, said fire chief saw them before he reached the point where they were located, and by the exercise of proper care could have stopped his horse and avoided the casualty; that, instead of stopping as he could have done, he negligently, heartlessly, cruelly, and in a cold-blooded and murderous manner, urged his horse and the buggy drawn by it, against the said plaintiffs, thereby wounding and injuring all of them, and one of them so badly that within a few hours he died. Would it not have been perfectly natural and reasonable for the agent of the street car company to presume, even if he saw the chief of the fire department bearing down upon the plaintiffs, under the circumstances set out in the petition, that he would stop his horses before reaching them, and avoid the injury? The only negligence the agent of the street railway company is charged with is not stopping his car as required by the ordinance; otherwise he is blameless, and in no way participated in the terrible catastrophe. It is true it was the plain duty of the street car company to stop its car at the place the plaintiffs sought to board it; but we do not believe that under the circumstances of this case it can be said that the unusual results that followed this act of negligence ought to have been foreseen by the agent of the company. It would be a hard, and we think an unjust, rule to hold that the street railway company was bound to anticipate the criminal act of the fire chief.

Watson v. Kentucky & I. Bridge & R. Co. 137 Ky. 619, 126 S. W. 146, 129 S. W. 341, is strongly in point. That was a personal injury case, commenced by Watson against the Kentucky & Indiana Bridge & Railroad Company, the Southern Railway Company, the Southern Railway Company in Kentucky, and the Union Tank Line Company, to recover damages for injuries sustained from an explosion of gas caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the defendants. The facts necessary to notice for the present purpose were that the tank from which the gasoline escaped belonged to the Union Tank Line Company. In reaching its consignee, it passed over several lines of railway, and was delivered by the Baltimore, Ohio, & Southwestern Railroad to the defendant Bridge & Railroad Company, in the city of Louisville, in what is known as the Youngtown yards. The latter company was at the time of the accident hauling the tank car, attached to one of its trains, from its railroad yards, near the Ohio river, to the place of business of the consignee, in the southern part of the city. The derailment of the car occurred about 7:30 o'clock in the evening, between Walnut and Madison street. The gasoline began at once to escape from the tank and continued to do so for several hours until the tank was emptied. By the derailing of the car the discharge pipe beneath the tank, provided for emptying it of its contents, was broken, as were the appliances for opening and closing the valves by which the contents were allowed to leave, or prevented from leaving, the tank. The gasoline, in escaping from the tank, ran down a gutter or drain in the street and along defendant Bridge & Railroad Company's right of way several hundred feet to a sewer into which it flowed. The employees of defendant bridge and railroad company connected with the train in question, and later the wrecking crew called to their assistance, seemed to be unable to stop the escape of gasoline from the tank, or at any rate did not do so. From the gasoline vapor or gas of a highly combustible character arose and permeated the atmosphere a distance of 500 or 600 feet from the place of derailment. About 11:30 o'clock, Charles Duerr, who was standing on Madison street, a square west of the place of the accident, struck a match which he threw to the ground, and this match in its descent came in contact with the gas generated by the flowing gasoline, thereby causing the explosion by which appellant was injured. There was evidence tending to show that Duerr wantonly and maliciously lighted a match for the purpose of causing the explosion. Discussing the case upon this hypothesis, Mr. Justice Settle, who delivered the opinion for the court, said: "If, however, the act of Duerr in lighting the match and throwing it into the vapor or gas arising from the gasoline was malicious, and done for the purpose of causing the explosion, we do not think appellees would be responsible, for while the appellee Bridge & Railroad Company's negligence may have been the efficient cause of the presence of the gas in the street, and it should have been understood enough of the consequences thereof to have foreseen that an explosion was likely to result from the inadvertent or negligent lighting of a match by some person who was ignorant of the presence of the gas or of the effect of lighting or throwing a match in it, it could not have foreseen or deemed it probable that one would maliciously or wantonly do such an act for the evil purpose of producing the explosion. Therefore, if the act of Duerr was malicious, we quite agree with the trial court that it was one which the appellees could not reasonably have anticipated or guarded against, and in such case the act of Duerr, and not the primary negligence of the appellee Bridge & Railroad Company, in any of the particulars charged, was the efficient or proximate cause of appellant's injuries. The mere fact that the concurrent cause or intervening act was unforeseen will not relieve the defendant guilty of the primary negligence, from liability: but, if the intervening agency is something so unexpected or extraordinary as that he could not or ought not to have anticipated it, he will not be liable, and certainly he is not bound to anticipate the criminal acts of others by which damage is inflicted, and hence is not liable therefor. 29 Cyc. The principle we believe to be applicable to the statement of facts set forth in that part of the petition which seeks to charge the street railway company with liability is further illustrated by the following cases: in Scheffer v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. ed. 1070, a passenger injured in a railway collision became in consequence thereof disordered in mind and body, in consequence of which, some eight months thereafter, he committed suicide. His personal representatives brought an action against the company to recover for his death in consequence of the injury. It was held that this act, and not the negligence of the company, was the proximate cause of the injury, and that he could not recover. In Henry v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 76 Mo. 288, 43 Am. Rep. 762, the plaintiff was told to change cars, and got into one which was not ready, and was told to get out of that, and was injured by a passenger train soon after alighting. It was held that his expulsion from the car was not the proximate cause of the injury. In Haley v. St. Louis Transit Co. 179 Mo. 30, 64 L.R.A. 295, 77 S. W. 731, it was admitted the street railway was guilty of negligence in failing to stop the car on which plaintiff was a passenger, at the street where she wished to alight to go to her home, according to her signal twice properly and timely given; but it was held that it was not the proximate cause of the subsequent injuries she received from a fall while walking on the sidewalk between the place she alighted and her home, the sidewalk being covered with ice and snow. In Central R. Co. v. Price, 106 Ga. 176, 43 L.R.A. 402, 71 Am. St. Rep. 246, 32 S. E. 77, it was held that the negligence of a railway conductor in carrying a passenger beyond her destination was not the proximate cause of an injury received by her in consequence of the explosion of a lamp in a room at the hotel at which she was waiting for a return train.

The plain reason of all of those cases is that the injury inflicted could not have been foreseen even by the exercise of that high degree of care and foresight which the law puts upon common carriers of passengers. We think the case at bar falls fully within the reason of the rule.

The judgment of the court below is accordingly, affirmed.

Turner, Ch. J., and Williams and Hayes, JJ., concur.

Dunn, J., dissenting:

From the conclusion reached by my associates in the foregoing case I am constrained to dissent.

An ordinance of Oklahoma City (No. 281) relating to the management of the cars of the street railway company on the sounding of a fire alarm provides: ". . . The cars of such railway company shall be stopped after the sounding of a fire alarm, and upon the approach of fire engines, hose cart, or other fire apparatus, which stoppage shall be made when such apparatus is within a distance of 300 feet of such cars, and shall remain standing until the same have passed."

Had the company observed this ordinance, and had the car stopped on the sounding of the fire alarm, the injuries complained of would not have happened. The violation of a valid ordinance is usually held to be prima facie evidence of negligence. The car did not stop, but, as averred by the petition, continued its course east, along Main street, until it came into Broadway and into the direct line of travel of the fire apparatus. Nor does the petition leave room for conjecture nor for the operation of the rule that one is held to be liable for the result of his negligence only when the same could or should have been foreseen; for the petition specifically avers that, when the said Kessler and the wagon bearing the fire apparatus were approaching the point where this injury occurred and at a place less than 300 feet south of the corner, they "were in plain view of and were seen and heard by the motorman and conductor of said car, but that said motorman and conductor, in violation of their duty and in violation of the said ordinance, No. 281, failed and refused to stop said car at said point." From which it will be seen that the operatives of this car and the company acting by and through them were required to exercise no foresight whatsoever in order to be held chargeable with the liability here sought to be enforced. These rapidly moving engines of destruction, it is averred, were in sight of the motorman and conductor; that they could and did see them, and, independent of any ordinance, failure to stop, under the facts shown, was manifestly negligence. The operatives of the car might not have known with absolute certainty that there would be passengers called into the street by its continued travel, but they knew they were doing the thing which would call them there if any desired passage, and they certainly did know that by their action some accident (if not this, some other) was likely to occur. This is all that the law requires to fix liability upon them for injuries which did occur. Nor is the gross disregard of ordinary care involved in the foregoing acts the only thing with which they are made chargeable herein. The car not only did not stop when the alarm was sounded and when the fire apparatus came into the vision of the employees, but, in addition thereto, it failed to stop after proceeding on its way to a point where the deceased and injured parties stood, which was in the direct line of travel of the fire chief's running horse. At this place, it is alleged in the petition, it was the duty of the said company to stop its cars, and that this was the usual and customary point for the cars to stop; and it is further alleged that these parties were passengers on the said railway, and held transfers, and were at the proper place to take and board the cars to continue their journey. Nor is this all. It is further alleged that this is the only car which they could take under the terms of their transfers. So that the railway company, in addition to deliberately driving its car into a place where it was seen some accident was likely to happen, violated a positive contract which it had made with these people when it received their fare for carriage. It required them under its contract to take this specific car, and none other, and then failed to stop the car at the proper place and time to enable them to secure the benefit of this contract. It is alleged in the petition and manifest that if the car had stopped in response to the requirements of the ordinance, or if it had stopped when the operatives saw the fire apparatus approaching, or if it had stopped in response to the contract into which the company had entered, the injuries here complained of would not have happened.

All the foregoing acts may be termed, so far as the deceased and the plaintiffs herein are concerned, to have been as to them acts in the nature of omission of due care for their welfare, rather than commission; but it is further averred that, by the car proceeding on its way after the alarm or view of the fire wagons was had, the plaintiffs and the deceased were lured into the street, and caused to believe that, by remaining in the street, they would be able to board the car when it reached the point where they stood; that when the car did not stop so that they could board it, they was left standing there exposed to the danger which overwhelmed them. These facts, when taken together, in my judgment render the company liable for the injuries for which relief is here prayed. The petition avers that: "Said Mark H. Kessler saw these plaintiffs and saw said deceased, Daniel L. Stephens, in ample time before he reached the point where plaintiffs and said Daniel L. Stephens were located, and when he was about 80 feet from them, by the exercise of proper care to have checked the rate of speed at which he was driving and to have stopped said horse, and thereby to have protected plaintiffs and said Daniel L. Stephens from the danger which they were in, which said danger was imminent and beyond the power of said plaintiffs and of said Daniel L. Stephens to avoid, but that said Mark H. Kessler, wholly disregarding their rights and wholly ignoring the danger in which these plaintiffs and the said Daniel L. Stephens were placed, did, then and there, in a manner grossly negligent of the rights and grossly unmindful of the lives and safety of plaintiffs and of said Daniel L. Stephens, continue to urge his said horse northward at full speed, and did then and there carelessly, negligently, heartlessly, cruelly, and in a cold-blooded and murderous manner, urge said horse and the buggy drawn by it against the person of said Daniel L. Stephens, thereby wounding and injuring the said Daniel L. Stephens so that within a few hours he died."

The foregoing allegations in my judgment do not bring this case within the rule laid down in the case of Watson v. Kentucky & I. Bridge & R. Co. 137 Ky. 619. 126 S. W. 146, 129 S. W. 341, from the Kentucky court of appeals. The general proposition there stated will, I believe, not be denied. The act there dealt with was one of wanton criminality for the purpose of committing a crime. In the case at bar there is no averment of fact leading us to believe that Kessler intended and willingly killed or injured these people. He had no bludgeon, fireman, or knife, nor other such deadly weapon, nor is it shown that in his mind he was bent upon destroying these people. He was engaged in depicting a scene which occurs every day in the crowded streets of every big city of this nation, and using the ordinary means used in carrying it out. If, instead of the injuries occurring as above set out, some enemy of these people had, with a deadly weapon, assaulted them and inflicted the injuries alleged, then the rule of the case from the Kentucky court of appeals would be applicable. But it is not applicable here, because of this distinction, and also, it seems to me for another reason: There people were passengers on the street car company's line. They were in every particular acting within their contractual rights. It was the affirmative duty of the street car company to use every reasonable precaution that it could to guard them from danger, either of negligence or criminality. The averments show that the company's employees saw Kessler and the fire apparatus approaching to the point where these people should board the car, and if, seeing this, it did not stop, in my judgment it would be liable for the injuries which happened even if Kessler had maliciously and wantonly run them down with his horse; this for the reason that the parties were passengers, and the company saw and could have prevented the injury. But the averments of this petition do not make of Kessler's act a crime. Among the synonyms for "murderous," Webster's New International Dictionary mentions "savage," and "cruel," and "murderous," as defined in the Century Dictionary and Encyclopedia, means "very brutal; cruel or destructive;" and "murderous," "in a murderous or bloody manner." All of these epithets could be applied to Kessler's acts and yet not charge them as criminal.

Section 5655 of the Compiled Laws of Oklahoma, 1909, provides that "in the construction of any pleading, for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties."

Taking the facts as set forth in the pleadings before us, and giving them the construction required by the foregoing statute, in my judgment substantial justice requires that we should overrule the demurrer and send the case to the district court for a trial of the issues of fact by a jury.

Powers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants having refused to furnish the orators with a supply of water for domestic use, these proceedings have been instituted to compel them by mandatory injunction so to do. The Olcott Water Company is a corporation chartered by No. 189, Acts of 1892, and is engaged in the business of selling water to the village of Wilder (formerly Olcott Falls) and its inhabitants, for municipal and domestic uses. The other defendants are its managing officers. The orators live in the village, and occupy rented tenements situate on the south side of Hawthorne street. The company's main passes along the street in front of these premises, and is connected therewith with proper piping, and at all owners, and not with tenants. Kelsey v. Fire & Water Comrs. 113 Mich. 215, 37 L.R.A. 675, 71 N. W. 589.

And the assessment of water rates to tenants in some instances, under an express agreement with the owner of the premises that he would pay if the tenants were delinquent, when this was done by the superintendent without any express authority of the board of water commissioners, does not bind the board to deal with tenants instead of owners of buildings. Ibid.

The occupant of a suite of rooms in a model lodging house, so called, who has separate water fixtures, and does not use nor desire to use the water in common with the occupants of the other suites, is entitled to a mandatory injunction against 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

times here material an abundant supply of water was available. The defendants' refusal is predicated solely upon a previously adopted rule of the company, in force at the time this controversy arose, which reads as follows: "This company will not collect rents from tenants. Such bills must be paid by owner of premises."

1. By § 13 of the company's charter it is provided that "every person" living within the territorial limits of the village of Wilder "shall be entitled to have and use an ample supply of water from the mains of said company, by paying a reasonable compensation therefor." That this corporation, like any other, has power to make and enforce reasonable rules for the conduct of its business, not inconsistent with the terms of its charter or the laws of the state, is not denied. It is insisted on the part of the orators, however, that this rule is not only unreasonable, but repugnant to the charter provision just quoted. We need not stop to consider whether the rule is reasonable or otherwise, for we deem it to be in manifest conflict with this provision of the charter, and it follows that it cannot be enforced. The comprehensive language used plainly indicates an intention on the part of the legislature to require the company to supply all who called for water, provided they paid. This view is strengthened (if need be) by the language of § 11 of the charter: "The occupant of any house, tenement, or building who shall take water of said company shall be liable for the rent or price of the same," etc. It is not to be believed that the legislature was here attempting to create a liability on the part of a tenant for water supplied under contract with his landlord.

2. But the defendants say that the orators have mistaken their remedy, and that they should have applied for a writ of mandamus, if the defendant's refusal was wrongful. It must be admitted that mandamus is a proper and the usual remedy the water board to compel it to furnish water to his particular suite at a specified flat rate, and charge to him personally, instead of charging it to the owners of the entire house, who have charge of the hallways, etc., at a meter rate based on the amount of water flowing through a pipe supplying the entire building, where the city ordinance establishing the rates for model lodging houses, so called, provides that in such houses there shall be charged "for each tenement having water fixtures within the same" a specified flat rate; since the word "tenement" is obviously used to describe such part of the house as is used by a single family, in contradistinction from the whole house. Young v. Boston, 104 Mass. 95.

to compel a corporation to perform a duty imposed upon it by law. But it does not necessarily follow that it is the exclusive remedy. Although it was held in Cox v. Malden & M. Gaslight Co. 199 Mass. 324, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1235, 127 Am. St. Rep. 503, 85 N. E. 180, that mandamus furnishes a complete remedy to one to whom a gas company refuses to furnish gas in violation of its duty to the public, and that equity is without jurisdiction to grant mandatory injunctions in such cases, when there is no contract, and has been no previous deal between the parties, we prefer to regard the adequacy of the remedy by mandamus, which is the test of the question of equity's jurisdiction, as dependent upon the circumstances of the given case. If mandamus affords a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, of course, equity has no jurisdiction. It was so held in Harley v. Lindemann, 129 Wis. 514, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 124, 109 N. W. 570, and it would be so on general principles. But a legal remedy, in order to be adequate in the sense involved in determining the jurisdiction of equity, to use the oft-quoted language of Mr. Justice Johnson in Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210, 7 L. ed. 655, must be "as practical and as efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity." It would logically follow (as was held in Baker v. Briggs, 99 Va. 360, 38 S. E. 277) that, where mandamus would not be sufficiently prompt, equity could proceed by injunction. It seems to be the rule in New Jersey that circumstances may be such that resort may be had in such cases to the court of equity. For, while it was held in Johnson v. Atlantic City Gas & Water Co. 65 N. J. Eq. 129, 56 Atl. 550, that mandamus, and not injunction, is the proper remedy to compel a gas company to perform its corporate duty to supply a consumer with gas, there is a plain intimation in the opinion that in a proper case relief might be had by way of mandatory injunction. And in Washington v. Washington Water Co. 70 N. J. Eq. 254, 62 Atl. 390, an injunction was granted restraining the defendant from shutting off the complainant's water supply. So, in Richmond Natural Gas Co. v. Clawson, 155 Ind. 659, 51 L.R.A. 744, 58 N. E. 1049, an injunction was granted restraining the company from shutting off the supply of gas. And again in Charles Simon Sons Co. v. Maryland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 99 Md. 141, 63 L.R.A. 727, 57 Atl. 193, an injunction was granted to restrain the defendant from charging the complainant a rate higher than that fixed by ordinance. To be sure in these cases the injunction was prohibitive in form, but the result was the same as though the prohibited act had been accomplished and an injunction mandatory in form had issued to restore the complainants to the rights before enjoyed. It is impossible to make the adequacy of the remedy by mandamus depend upon whether the application therefor is made just before or just after the act which results in the irreparable injury.

It is said in 6 Pom. Eq. Jur. 633, that a mandatory injunction is sometimes awarded to compel a carrier to transport freight or to furnish proper facilities, and that relief may be had against a violation of duty by public service corporations, such as gas, water, and telephone companies, when the rights of the individual complainant will be affected thereby. Accordingly, it was held in Union R. Co. v. Canton R. Co. 105 Md. 12, 65 Atl. 409, that a mandatory injunction would be granted compelling a railroad company to allow another to connect therewith and run trains over its tracks according to statutory provisions, on the ground that in the nature of things there was no adequate redress at law for a denial of such right. In Baltimore v. Baltimore County Water & Electric Co. 95 Md. 232, 52 Atl. 670, it was held that, when a city wrongfully refused to grant a permit to a corporation to lay its water mains in the streets, the company need not bring mandamus to compel the issuance of the permit, but that an injunction would be granted to restrain interference with the laying of the mains. In Whiteman v. Fayette Fuel Gas Co. 139 Pa. 492, 20 Atl. 1062, a mandatory injunction was issued to compel the defendant to furnish the complainant a supply of gas which had been wrongfully cut off. In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Pittsburgh & K. Coal Co. 111 Ky. 960, 55 L.R.A. 601, 98 Am. St. Rep. 447, 64 S. W. 969, it was held that a shipper was entitled to a mandatory injunction requiring a railroad company to furnish him cars, when it refused to fulfil its obligations in this respect. With us an application for a writ of mandamus is made to the supreme court. More or less delay is necessarily involved. The application might come at a time when it would be several months before a result could be had. In the meantime, all necessity for the writ may have passed. Cases may easily be supposed in which promptness of relief would be all-important, and the delay incident to an application for mandamus would render that remedy utterly inadequate and useless. Take the case of a railroad company wrongfully refusing to furnish cars to one engaged in the business of shipping Christmas trees. Take the case of an irrigation company wrongfully refusing to supply a customer with water at a time when the whole crop was endangered. Take the case of an aqueduct company, bound by its charter to supply a municipality with water for fire protection, wrongfully cutting off the supply during an extremely dry time. Can it be said in such cases that mandamus affords a remedy as efficient to the prompt administration of justice as that by mandatory injunction? Take this very case. The orators had no other source of water supply. Winter was shutting down upon them. The preliminary injunction was dated November 29th, and the earliest possible relief by mandamus could not be afforded before the following January term of this court. In the meantime the orators and their families were to remain without water. Mandamus afforded no adequate remedy. Equity alone was adequate to their necessities. It does not follow that the orators are not to be required to pay for such water as they might use. Equity does not take the property of one and give it to another; but the rights of the company can all be taken care of in the court below on remand of the case.

Pro forma decree reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the Court of Chancery to render a decree for the orators according to the prayer of the bill. Let the defendants there apply for such orders regarding the payment of water rents, accrued and to accrue, as they deem themselves entitled to, if they be so advised. Let the orators recover costs in this court, and the costs below be there determined.

Note. — Sufficiency of showing that paper offered as a holographic will was intended as such.

No general rule can be laid down as to the sufficiency of the showing in any particular case that a decedent intended as a testamentary disposition of his property a writing offered after his death as a holographic will. As stated in Gaston's Estate, 188 Pa. 374, 68 Am. St. Rep. 874, 41 Atl. 529: "In cases such as this precedents rarely afford much aid. We start with the settled principle controlling the adjudication in all of them; namely, from the language of the paper itself, and the circumstances surrounding its execution and reservation, did the author of it intend the writing to be a disposition of his or her property, to take effect after death? The absence

"Dec. 24, 1900 Every thing is Lous.

"G. T. Smith, 314 South Patrick St. Ax Va."

It appears that G. T. Smith was childless and died in the city of Alexandria in December, 1908, leaving surviving him his widow, Lula G. Smith, his father, Samuel H. Smith, and other relatives. For a short while after the death of G. T. Smith, no will was found, but later his widow and her sister, who conducted a boarding house in Alexandria city, were preparing rooms for boarders, and while emptying decedent's trunk, which contained his clothes and personal effects, and which in his lifetime had been used by him for such purposes, and had been placed and kept in the garret of the house from shortly after decedent's death, came across the book containing the writing above set out and claimed to be the will of said decedent. The decedent had been a railroad freight conductor, and had used like books in the course of his employment. Upon finding said book, the decedent's widow, being in the possession of his real estate, did not offer the writing in the book for probate as the will of her deceased husband, but did so later and of sameness of expression and the wide variations in facts in nearly all cases compel a conclusion from the language and circumstances of the particular case."

So, in that case it was held that a dated and signed paper, wholly in the handwriting of deceased, beginning with the words, "it my wish," followed by a schedule of property to be distributed among a number of beneficiaries who were her collateral relatives, an intimate personal friend, and the latter's children, which paper was found after decedent's death, and two years after its date, in a bureau drawer, sufficiently showed a testamentary intention on the part of the writer.

And a paper within, dated, and signed by the deceased, included in an envelop addressed to one named in the paper as donee of certain property therein given by appropriate testamentary words, and placed in a conspicuous place in a room where deceased took his own life, clearly shows testamentary purpose and intent. Tozer v. Jackson, 164 Pa. 373, 30 Atl. 400.

A document wholly written, dated, and signed by deceased, and in form a perfect and complete testamentary disposition, is, in the absence of any extrinsic evidence throwing light on the writer's intention, entitled to probate as his holographic will, although headed, "Notes of Intended Settlement by" the deceased. Whyte v. Pollok, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 400, 47 L. T. N. S. 356, 47 J. P. 340.

But "it is not conclusive in favor of the paper that it is in the form of a testament, perfect in all its parts, written, signed and found as prescribed in cases of holographic wills. . . . It may nevertheless not be an operative will for the reason that it may be shown by proof not to have been intended to operate as a will." Douglas v. Harkrender, 3 Baxt. 114.

And where a writing propounded as a holographic will has the name of one attesting witness subscribed, and it appears that deceased had made previous wills attested by two witnesses, it is a question for the jury from the proof of facts and circumstances, intrinsic and extrinsic, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

whether deceased wrote and signed the paper and procured one witness, intending to procure no other, but to deposit the paper among his valuables as his will, in which case the fact that there was one witness would raise no presumption that it was an unfinished or incomplete will; or whether deceased intended to procure another witness, and thereby to complete the execution of the paper as a witnessed will, in which case it was incomplete and unfinished, unless deceased further changed his purpose, and determined to make it operate as his holographic will, by keeping it among his valuable papers as such. Ibid.

But an instrument in form a will, entirely written and signed by deceased, and found in his possession, should be admitted to probate as a holographic will, although the word "witness" appears at the bottom of the will, and is not followed by any signatures, where two disinterested witnesses testify that deceased, not long before his death, told them that he had willed his property in the same manner provided by such instrument. Ainsworth v. Briggs, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 344, 108 S. W. 753.

If the deceased kept the paper propounded as his holographic will as he kept his other valuable papers or effects, it is a fact from which an inference may be drawn that he regarded it as his will, and intended it to have effect as such at his death. Tate v. Tate, 11 Humph. 465.

And a signed and dated paper entirely in the handwriting of deceased, as follows: "It is my wish and desire that my good friend and relative, Dr. Joseph B. Outlaw, have all my property of every description."—which paper deceased had put away among his valuable papers, where it was found at his death, sufficiently shows that he intended it to be his will. Outlaw v. Hurdle, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 150.

And this is likewise shown by an instrument entirely written, dated, and signed by the deceased, stating merely that a named person "is my heirress," in which instrument, below these words, more than a year later, he wrote a statement as to the correct spelling of "the legatee's name," and after notice of decedent's father, Samuel H. Smith, and next of kin and heir at law.

Samuel H. Smith contested the probate of the paper as the will of the decedent, whereupon the issue of devisavit vel non was made up and tried by a jury; and, after the proponent of the will had introduced her evidence, the contestant demurred thereto, and the jury rendered the following verdict: . . . That the paper writing offered for probate as the last will and testament of George T. Smith is wholly in the handwriting of the said George T. Smith, signature as well as the body thereof, and that the said paper writing and every part thereof is the true last will and testament of the said George T. Smith, subject to the opinion of the court upon the questions of law arising upon the demurrer to evidence of Samuel H. Smith, the defendant in the issue."

At a later term of the court the judgment here complained of was entered, overruling the demurrer to evidence, and admitting the paper in question to probate "as the true last will and testament of George T. Smith, deceased."

That "Lous" mentioned in the paper in question referred to decedent's wife, Lula G. Smith, there is no room for doubt; and while there was some evidence offered by the proponent of the will tending to show that two different pencils were used in writing the body of the instrument and the signature thereto, the jury were warranted in finding that the whole paper, including the signature, was in the handwriting of the said George T. Smith; in fact, this is to be taken as admitted upon the demurrer to the evidence, as well as the fact that the person writing and signing the paper had sufficient intelligence to make a will. The sole question, therefore, for our determination, is whether or not the said paper writing is a valid holograph will. In other words, was this paper designed to be testamentary in character and purpose?

It is a settled rule in this country and in England that, in determining whether the instrument propounded was intended to be testamentary, reference will be had to the surrounding circumstances, and the language will be construed in the light of those circumstances; and that, if it shall appear under all the circumstances that the instrument was intended to be testamentary, the court will give effect to the intention, if it can be done consistently with the language of the instrument. But, while the courts have gone far in construing almost any form of instrument to be a will, we have been unable to find a case in which a paper with nothing on its face to indicate that it was intended to be testamentary was held to be entitled to probate as a holograph will.

The essence of the various definitions of the word "will" as applied to the dispo-which instrument bears an indorsement in his own handwriting, calling it his "will, to be opened by" a named person, "who will see it executed." Ehrenberg's Succession, 21 La. Ann. 280, 99 Am. Dec. 729.

But in Young v. Wark, 76 Miss. 829, 25 So. 660, it was held that a paper bearing merely the words, "Want Sarah relatives have all property," written and signed by deceased, could not be probated as his will, in the absence of any extraneous evidence that he intended it to have effect as such, although there was ample evidence that he intended and had even expressed the intention that his property should go to the relatives of "Sarah," his wife, from whom he had inherited nearly all of it.

A document written, dated, and signed by deceased, an ignorant and illiterate man, in the form of a letter to his brother and sister, stating that he gives his property to two designated persons, one of whom has been with him twenty-four years and the other of whom he has brought up, and that no law has anything to do with what he gives them, sufficiently shows that the deceased intended it as a testamentary disposition of the property. Morvant's Succession, 45 La. Ann. 207, 12 So. 349.

And an instrument wholly written, dated, and signed by deceased in the form of a letter, addressed to one of his brothers, marked "personal," and from its face intended to be mailed, but by its language testamentary in character, and purporting to be a will, is entitled to probate as such, if the deceased in fact never intended to deliver it to the addressee during the former's lifetime, but kept it, treating and intending it as his will. Prather v. Prather, — Miss. —, 52 So. 449.

But a letter written by deceased to the chief beneficiary in an imperfectly executed will which he had left with his executor, which letter merely informed the addressee of the writer's provision for her, cannot, in the absence of other circumstances to show that it was intended as a holographic will, be admitted to probate as such. Re Noyes, 40 Mont. 231, 106 Pac. 355.

For other cases involving the question of animus testandi in letters offered for probate as wills, see notes to Re Richardson, 15 L.R.A. 635, and Milam v. Stanley, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1126, as to sufficiency of letter as will.

As to the necessity of witnesses to a holographic will, see note to La Rue v. Lee, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 968.

Writing name in body of holographic will as a signature thereto, see note to Meads v. Earle, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 64.

Violation of requirement that holographic will shall be written by testator, see note to Re Noyes, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1145.

sition of one's property after his death, given by lexicographers, text writers, and in the decided cases, is: The legal declaration of a person's mind as to the manner in which he would have his property or estate disposed of after his death; the written instrument, legally executed, by which a man makes disposition of his estate, to take effect after his death. Underhill, Wills, pp. 7, 8; 2 Bl. Com. 499; 4 Kent, Com. 490; Shep. Touch. 399; Schouler, Wills, 3d ed. § 279.

Jarman on Wills, 6th ed. p. 28, says: "But if the instrument is not testamentary either in form or in substance (none of the gifts in it being expressed in testamentary language, or being in terms postponed to the death of the maker), and if no collateral evidence is adduced to show that it was intended as a will, probate will not be granted of it as a testamentary document."

In Schouler on Wills, supra, it is said: "Papers which are not clearly, on their face, of a testamentary character, even though signed and attested, require to have the animus testandi shown to the satisfaction of the court."

The rule, however, uniformly recognized, is that, to prove by declaration that a paper was intended as a will, declarations of a testator tending to show that it was intended as a will must have been made at the time that the paper was written; or, at least, must be shown to relate to the identical paper.

The opinion by Staples, J., in McBride v. McBride, 26 Gratt. 481, says: "It is necessary, however that the instrument whatever it may be, whether a note, settlement, or deed should have been designed to operate, as a disposition of the testator's property. That identical paper must have been intended to take effect in some form. It must have been written animo testandi. In the language of Judge Cabell, 'a paper is not to be established as a man's will merely by proving that he intended to make a disposition of his property similar to or even identically the same with that contained in the paper. It must satisfactorily appear that he intended the very paper to be his will. Unless it does so appear, the paper must be rejected, however correct it may be in its form, how comprehensive in its details, however conformable to the otherwise declared intentions of the party, and although it may have been signed by him with all due solemnity.' . . .

"He must have designated thereby to dispose of his property. He must have looked to that paper as the means by which an object was to be accomplished, and that object the distribution of his estate after his death. Unless he intended this, the paper is not his will, whatever he may have called it."

See also Combs v. Jolly, 3 N. J. Eq. 625; Lyles v. Lyles, 2 Nott. & M'C. 531; Daniel v. Veal, 32 Ga. 589.

The opinion by the same learned judge (Staples), in Burke v. Lee, 76 Va. 386, says: "A party seeking to maintain a devise must show it by the will itself, and no defects in the language used in the instrument can be supplied by parol proof. The true inquiry is not what the testator meant to express, but what the words he has used do express. Evidence, is, however, always admissible for the purpose of showing the situation of the testator, the state of his family and of his property at the time of making his will, with a view of throwing light upon his intention in cases of doubt and difficulty.

"And evidence may generally be received as to any facts known which may be reasonably supposed to have influenced him in the disposition of his property, and as to all the surrounding circumstances at the time of making his will."

The words, "Every thing is Lous," which constitute the entire body of the paper here, are most reasonably to be interpreted as referring to an existing fact, and might, under certain conditions, be considered as having reference to a purpose on the part of the writer of those words to pass everything that he owned in the way of property to the ownership of "Lou," his wife, either by gift or devise; but there are no words or gift to be found in this paper, and nothing from which it could be reasonably determined that the writer intended the paper as a disposition of his property, to take effect after his death.

Looking, then, to the attending circumstances, or rather to the oral testimony, which may be considered in determining the question whether or not George T. Smith intended this paper as a testamentary disposition of his property after his death, we find that while the witnesses testify that the whole paper is in the handwriting of Smith, though written with different pencils and perhaps at different times, there are no facts testified to which throw any light upon his intention when he wrote what is found in the back of the book which contains this paper.

Luther Carter, a real estate agent of Alexandria, who claims to have known and seen right much of Smith, after testifying on cross-examination that the words, "Every thing is Lous," did not look to him as much like Smith's handwriting as the signature, says that he heard Smith state that he had made his will in favor of his wife.

Henry M. Parish, who claims to have been well acquainted with Smith, says that he mentioned to Smith on several occasions the matter of joining the brakeman, or Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, but he always said he had never thought about it; but witness remarked to him on several occasions that he carried insurance with the conductors, and that Smith ought to take out insurance with the brakemen, so that in case he should retire he would have some insurance to leave to his wife; whereupon Smith remarked; "It don't make any difference about that. I have plenty for my wife to live on if I die to-day. I have a good home and have some money, and I don't bother with any insurance in any order at all."

It seems that George T. Smith, who had been a freight conductor and also a passenger conductor on the railroad, had gotten into some trouble, and was then running as a brakeman when he had his talk with Parish, who also was in the employ of the railway company.

There is also evidence that George T. Smith appreciated the efforts his wife had been making for him from the time of his marriage, but we do not think that this testimony throws any light upon the intention of Smith in making the writing found in the book which had been furnished to him by the railroad company for his report of the arrival and departure of trains from time to time. There is not enough in the evidence to identify this paper as the will that he had intended to make, or had made, of which he might have been speaking when talking to Parish, as (quoting from Judge Staples in McBride v. McBride, supra) "a paper is not to be established as a man's will merely by proving that he intended to make a disposition of his property similar to or even identically the same with that contained in the paper. It must satisfactorily appear that he intended the very paper to be his will."

In Smith v. Spiller, 10 Gratt. 318, William H. Spiller executed his bond to Francis Smith for $4,000, payable four years after its date, and on the back of this bond there was found this memorandum, which was shown to have been written thereon by Francis Smith at the time that the bond was executed to him, to wit:

Memorandum.—If I do not collect the money due on the within note of my nephew Hickman Spiller during my life, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

then it is never to be collected; and I give him that sum.

[Signed]

Francis Smith.

Sept. 30, 1823.

This court held this indorsement on the back of this bond not to be of a testamentary character, but a part of the bond, and irrevocable without destroying the bond, and this ruling was made upon full recognition of the rule that whether a paper of a doubtful character was designed to operate as one instrument or as another may be determined by all the circumstances attending the transaction, and the contemporaneous conduct and declarations of the parties evincive of their purposes and motives, as showing what kind of instrument was within their contemplation and design; and in that case there were some declarations made by the parties at the time the paper in question was written and signed; but in the case here, beyond what we have already mentioned as having been proven, there is not a particle of testimony going to identify the paper in question as the will of George T. Smith.

In Cope v. Cope, 45 Ohio St. 464, 15 N. E. 206, the syllabus is: "Where the provisions of a will in each and all of its items are, when considered as an entirety, so obscure that, with the aid of all the light that can be shed on it by the extraneous circumstances, no definite idea can be formed of the intention of the testator in any of the dispositions he has attempted to make, it should be held void for uncertainty, and the property left to descend and be distributed according to law."

In Clarke v. Ransom, 50 Cal. 595, greatly relied on here by the defendant in error, the words:

Dear Old Nance: I wish to give you my watch, two shawls, and also five thousand dollars.

Your old friend,

E. A. Gordon.

—were held to be testamentary in character, and, as there were no words of revocation found in the paper, it was admitted to probate as a codicil to a will which Mrs. Gordon had theretofore made, disposing of an estate of about $170,000, and appointing an executor, who, it seems, was also the devisee and distributee of almost the entire estate. It was made to appear from the testimony that the paper quoted above was written by Mrs. Gordon when ill, and but a few days before her death, and was in accordance with verbal instructions that she had already given Clarke, her executor, as to what the testatrix wanted Miss Ransom, whom she always called 'Old Nance,' to have of her estate, and when she wrote this paper and delivered it to Miss Ransom she was requested not to show it to the executor, Clarke, until after Mrs. Gordon's death, and not then unless Clarke refused to carry out her verbal request. We think this a very different case from the one before us, but even in that case there was a strong dissenting opinion by Wallace, Ch. J.

Upon the whole case, we think that the paper here in question cannot be maintained as the last will and testament of George T. Smith, and therefore the judgment of the corporation court of the city of Alexandria upon the demurrer to the evidence must be reversed and annulled, and this court will enter the judgment the lower court should have entered in favor of plaintiff in error.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

SPOKANE & EASTERN TRUST COMPANY, NY, Appt.,

v.

ANDREW M. I. HUFF, Resp't.

(— Wash. —, 115 Pac. 80.)

Bank — payment of overdraft — out of banking hours — right to recover.

That payment of an overdraft, under the mistaken belief that the drawer had funds, was made by the bank after office hours for the accommodation of the payee, does not change the rule that payment of such draft under such mistake in the ordinary course of business is not such a payment under mistake of fact as will entitle the bank to recover the money from the payee.

Note. — Right of bank to recover back amount paid on check or other paper drawn upon or payable at it, under mistaken belief that there were sufficient funds to meet it.

The earlier cases upon this subject are collected and discussed in the note to Citizen's Bank v. Schwarzschild & S. Co. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1092, and this note is supplementary thereto. As is shown in the earlier note, the general rule is that, in the absence of fraud, the payment of a note or check by a bank upon which it is drawn or at which it is payable, under the mistaken belief that the drawer of the check or maker of the note has sufficient funds to his credit to pay it, cannot be recovered back by the bank. This rule is supported by the decision in National Exch. Bank v. Ginn, 114 Md. 181, ante, 963, 78 Atl. 1020.

And the rule that a recovery will be allowed where the holder knew that there APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County sustaining a demurrer and dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover the amount paid on certain checks under the mistaken belief that the drawers of the checks had funds in the bank. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Warren W. Tolman, for appellant:

Money paid under mistake can be recovered back.

Canadian Bank v. Bingham, 30 Wash. 484, 60 L.R.A. 955, 71 Pac. 43, 46 Wash. 657, 91 Pac. 185; Merchants' Bank v. Superior Candy & Cracker Co. 41 Wash. 653, 84 Pac. 605; North Coast R. Co. v. Hess, 56 Wash. 335, 105 Pac. 853.

Defendant, by reason of the erroneous payment of the checks by the bank, cannot shift a loss which was already his, from his own shoulders to those of the bank, who made the payment at his solicitation and for his personal accommodation after the close of the bank.

were no funds, or where there has been some fraud practised on the drawee bank, and the interests of third persons would not be prejudiced, is adhered to in James River Nat. Bank v. Weber, — N. D. —, 124 N. W. 952, wherein it was held that money paid a depositor in good faith, in reliance upon his statement that he had sufficient funds on deposit to make a payment, when in fact he had previously withdrawn the whole of his deposit, could be recovered back by the drawee bank. The court said: "It seems to be appellant's [drawer and payee] contention, in brief, that because plaintiff's teller, by consulting the books, could have learned the exact status of defendant's account, he had no right to rely upon defendant's statement that the check of October 7th had not been paid, and that he had a balance on December 27th of $319.71. And it is urged that for this reason the payment was a voluntary one, and cannot be recovered back. We are unable to uphold

Messrs. Danson & Williams, for respondent:

Payment, in the ordinary course of business, of a check by a bank upon which it is drawn, under the mistaken belief that the drawer of the check has sufficient funds to his credit to pay the check, is not such a payment under mistake of fact as will permit a recovery by the bank.

Law, 2d ed. p. 1059.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant is a banking corporation, and receives money on deposit subject to check by its depositors. On the morning of October 6, 1909, one Edwin J. Schloss had on deposit in the appellant's bank subject to check the sum of $297, and one Leon J. Schloss had on deposit therein subject to check the sum of $48. During the banking hours of that day the Schlosses severally withdrew their respective deposits. On the such contention. The facts as found by the trial court, and which we must accept as true, clearly present a case of a payment of such last check through mistake on the part of plaintiff's officer. Whether, as found, defendant intentionally and fraudulently misled plaintiff's officer we need not determine. It is enough that the plaintiff bank, in good faith and by mistake of fact, parted with money to which defendant was not entitled either legally or morally. The facts do not present a case of the payment of money to adjust a disputed claim; nor do they present a case of voluntary payment. . . . In the light of the facts found, an implied promise on defendant's part to repay such money arose immediately upon the payment by plaintiff of the last check."

same day, and about one hour after the bank had closed its doors to the general public, the respondent, Andrew M. I. Huff, appeared at the bank with the check of Edwin J. Schloss for the sum of $297, and the check of Leon J. Schloss for the sum of $48, both dated upon that day, and presented the checks to the bank's assistant secretary for payment. The assistant secretary thereupon caused inquiry to be made of the bookkeeper and the paying teller of the bank, to ascertain whether the drawers of the checks had sufficient funds on hand to meet the checks, and, on being informed that they had, paid the checks to the respondent. When the books of the bank were balanced for the day, the overpayment was discovered, and on the next day the checks were tendered the respondent and repayment of the sums demanded. Repayment was refused, whereupon the present action was brought to recover the amount so paid. In the complaint, in addition to the foregoing facts, it was alleged that at the time of the payment the bank had ceased for that day the transaction of business with the public, a fact that the respondent well knew; that it paid the money after business hours as an accommodation to the holder of the checks; that the reason it did not discover that the depositors drawing the checks had withdrawn their funds was owing to the confusion incidental to the closing of the business of the bank for the day; and that the respondent "did not, by reason of said payment, so change his position that he would be prejudiced by repayment of the money so paid to him." To the complaint a demurrer was interposed, which the court sustained. Later on a judgment of dismissal was entered, and the appeal followed.

It is a general rule, sustained by almost universal authority, that a payment, in the ordinary course of business, of a check by a bank upon which it is drawn, under the mistaken belief that the drawer has funds in the bank subject to check, is not such a payment under mistake of fact as will permit the bank to recover the money so paid.

In Hull v. Bank of South Carolina Dud. L. 259, the court, passing upon the question, used this language: "This question is to be decided rather by authority than general reasoning on the subject. No part of a commercial community is more interested in commercial usages than banks, and they cannot complain when they are required to strictly conform to them. They cannot always guard against fraud and imposition, but they may against mistakes depending on an inspection of their own books and accounts. Mistakes may be prevented which cannot be remedied. They accepted and paid the check presented by the defendant for and on account of Hopton, the drawer, whose money they had kept for his convenience and accommodation. The privity of contract was between them and their customer Hopton, and not between them and one who may have happened in the course of dealing to present a check drawn by Hopton. . . . A bank check has all the characteristics of bills of exchange, and cannot be distinguished from them. Indeed, they perform not only all the offices of bills, but are more generally used for the transfer and payment of moneys. They are mercantile agents which should not be crippled in their daily and hourly operations. Before one reaches the bank after it has been drawn, it may have paid and discharged many debts, and, after it has been accepted and paid, all the intervening holders in general are discharged from all liability to the bank; it becomes then a transaction between the bank and the drawer, the bank not unfrequently paying money on checks of the drawer, when in fact he has no deposit."

In First Nat. Bank v. Burkham, 32 Mich. 328, Judge Cooley, writing for the court, used these words: "But we think it would be an exceedingly unsafe doctrine in commercial law that one who has discounted a bill in good faith, and received in its payment the strongest possible assurance that it was drawn with proper authority, should afterwards hold the moneys subject to such a showing as the drawee might be able to make as to the influences operating upon his mind to induce him to make payment. The beauty and value of the rules governing commercial paper consist in their perfect certainty and reliability; they would be worse than useless if the ultimate responsibility for such paper, as between payee and drawee, both acting in good faith, could be made to depend on the motives which influenced the latter to honor the paper."

So, in Oddie v. National City Bank, 45 N. Y. 735, 6 Am. Rep. 160, Church, Ch. J., discussing the question said: "When a check is presented to a bank for deposit, drawn directly upon itself, it is the same as though payment in any other form was demanded. It is the right of the bank to reject it, or refuse to pay it, or to receive it conditionally, as in Pratt v. Foote, 9 N. Y. 463; but if it accepts such a check and pays it, either by delivering the currency, or giving the party credit for it, the transaction is closed between the bank and such party, provided the paper is genuine. In the case of a deposit, the bank becomes at once the debtor of the depositor, and the title of the deposit passes to the bank. The bank always has the means of knowing the state of the account of the drawer, and, if it elects to pay the paper, it voluntarily takes upon itself the risk of securing it out of the drawer's account or otherwise."

In Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Swift, 70 Md. 515, 14 Am. St. Rep. 381, 17 Atl. 336, it was said: "It is the duty of a bank to know the state of its depositor's account, and if it makes a mistake in this respect it must abide the consequences. The presentation of a check is a demand for payment; if it is paid, all the rights of the payee have been satisfied, and he is not entitled to ask any questions. It would forever destroy the character of a bank in all commercial circles, if, when it was ready and willing to pay a check, it permitted the holder to inquire if the drawer had funds there to meet it. It is a matter with which he has no concern. In the absence of fraud on the part of the holder, the payment of a check by a bank is regarded as a finality. And the fact that the drawer had no funds on deposit will not give the bank any remedy against the holder."

In National Bank v. Berrall, 70 N. J. L. 757, 66 L.R.A. 599, 103 Am. St. Rep. 821, 58 Atl. 189, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 630, it was said: "As between the holder of a check and the bank upon which it is drawn, the latter is bound to know the state of the depositor's account. Before paying the check it must take into consideration whether it was drawn against funds, and whether the order for payment, evidenced by the check, has subsequently been revoked. Therefore, where a bank receives, in the ordinary course of business, a check drawn upon it and presented by a bona fide holder, who is without notice of any infirmity therein, and the bank pays the amount of the check to such holder, it finally exercises its option to pay or not to pay, and the transaction is closed as between the parties to the payment."

See also Citizens' Bank v. Schwarzschild & S. Co. 109 Va. 539, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1092, 64 S. E. 954; Boylston Nat. Bank v. Richardson, 101 Mass. 287; Riverside Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 20 C. C. A. 181, 38 U. S. App. 674, 74 Fed. 276; First Nat. Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 686, 25 L. ed. 766; City Nat. Bank v. Burns, 68 Ala. 267, 44 Am. Rep. 138; National Gold Bank & T. Co. v. McDonald, 51 Cal. 64, 21 Am. Rep. 607; Consolidated Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 129 App. Div. 538, 114 N. Y. Supp. 308; Morse, Banks & Bkg. 4th ed. § 455.

But while the courts are uniform in holding that a bank cannot recover under the circumstances cited, they are not agreed upon the principle upon which the rule prohibiting a recovery rests. Some of them, it will be observed, put it on the ground of want of privity between the holder of the check and the bank; others upon the ground that the payment is not a payment by mistake within the meaning of the rule that permits a recovery; others again on the ground that to permit the bank to repudiate the payment would destroy the certainty that must pertain to commercial transactions of this sort, if they are to remain useful to the business public. To our minds the latter reason is the most satisfactory. If, for example, a merchant conducting a retail business must hold the money he receives from the bank in payment of checks and drafts taken in by him from his customers in payment for the purchase of goods until such reasonable time as the bank has to determine whether or not it will call upon him for a return of the money, it is manifest that he must discard the use of checks and drafts in the conduct of his business, and require his customers to bring him cash. The uncertainty, delay, and annoyance such rule would cause him would forbid their use in his business.

Concluding, as we do, that the bank cannot recover if the checks in question were received and paid by it in the ordinary course of business, it remains to inquire whether the special circumstances set out in the complaint relieve it from the rule. It is our opinion that they do not. The matters which are thought to relieve the bank of blame were of its own choosing. The holder of the checks in no way contributed to the mistake, and the fact that the bank officers were more liable to make a mistake at this particular time than some other may prove the officers themselves more culpable but it cannot change the effect of the mistake.

The judgment is affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, Appt.,

L. H. DARWIN, Resp't.

Libel — publication of conditional sales record — injury to seller.

The publication of a copy of a public record of conditional sales made by a retail merchant is privileged, and will not subject the publishers to a prosecution for criminal libel, although it was unwarranted, and alleged to have subjected the seller to the hatred of his customers and injured him in his business.

Note.—While STATE v. DARWIN seems to be a case of first impression in applying the law of libel and slander to a publication concerning the relation of a merchant with his customers, it is clear that, aside from any question of privilege, words concerning merely a legal and proper relation of a merchant with his customers,—merely "charging a person with having done that which he may legally and properly do,"—are not libelous per se, although it might be otherwise with a publication concerning an illegal or improper business relation. Of course, as assumed in STATE v. DARWIN, under statutes defining libel as a publication having a certain effect, a complaint is good which alleges facts, and not merely conclusions, showing that a publication of this kind has produced the result described in the statute; and a false publication concerning a relation of a merchant with his customers may be actionable if special damage is clearly shown to have resulted therefrom.

A civil action for an alleged libel somewhat similar to that involved in STATE v. DARWIN is Ukman v. Daily Record Co. 189 Mo. 378, 88 S. W. 60, in which it appears that defendant published in a daily newspaper devoted to the gleanings and publication, as news, of facts from the current records kept by the recorder of deeds of the city of St. Louis, the following words: "Bills of Sale.—A. G. Ukman, 612 Chestnut, to Miss A. Handschiegel, Cigar Outfit, $1."—"meaning," as alleged by plaintiff, "by said words, to charge plaintiff with having transferred his said business and stock of cigars for the nominal consideration of $1 to the person aforesaid," whereas the consideration should have been printed at $700.

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Superior Court for Whatcom County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, and from an order discharging defendant in a prosecution for criminal libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Neterer, Pemberton, & Sather, for respondent:

The publication of a public record to which everyone has the right of access is privileged, and therefore not libelous.

Crow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this cause is the sufficiency of a criminal complaint to which the trial judge sustained a demurrer. The state elected to stand upon the complaint, and has appealed from an order discharging the defendant.

The complaint originally filed before a justice of the peace, omitting formal parts, reads as follows:

"T. S. Hamilton, being first duly sworn, on his oath deposes and says: That in Whatcom county, Washington, on or about the 12th day of April, 1910, the above-named defendant, L. H. Darwin, did commit the crime of criminal libel as follows: Then and there being the said defendant, L. H. Darwin, being then and there the business manager of the American Printing Company, a corporation, by which the Morning Reveille, a newspaper published at Bellingham, Washington, and having a general circulation in and about Bellingham, Whatcom county, Washington, is and was then and there issued, did then and there unlawfully and maliciously defame and libel the complainant by then and there unlawfully and maliciously making public and publishing in said the Morning Reveille, and by then and there unlawfully and maliciously causing and procuring to be made public and to be published in said the Morning Reveille, the defamation and libel of the said complainant, T. S. Hamilton, by words, printing and writing, tending to expose the said complainant to hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy, and to injure the said complainant in his business and occupation; that the said publication, printing, and writing was an article then and there published in said the Morning Reveille as aforesaid, and more particularly in substance, language, and words, as follows:

"'Conditional Sales.

"T. S. Hamilton (B. B. Furniture Company) to Mrs. Emily Sarlund, go-cart, $10.

"T. S. Hamilton (B. B. Furniture Company) to Mrs. C. R. Halladay, go-cart, $15.

"T. S. Hamilton (B. B. Furniture Company), to Miss Sophia Anderson, oil stove and oven, $12.

"T. S. Hamilton (B. B. Furniture Company), to W. J. Hammons, 25 yards of carpet, $12.50.

"T. S. Hamilton (B. B. Furniture Company), to William Mullin, furniture, $12.60.

"T. S. Hamilton (B. B. Furniture Company), to Mrs. E. Huefner, range, $60.'

"That the complainant herein now is, and for a number of years last past has been, engaged in the sale of furniture at retail in Bellingham, Whatcom county, Washington; and his said business was and is known and designated as the 'B. B. Furniture Company.' That, in connection with his said business, complaint has made, and does now make, conditional sales contracts with his various patrons. That in said contracts the said T. S. Hamilton was and is named as the vendor, and the various pur-which mistake, when called to the attention of the defendant, three weeks later, was at once corrected, and the item published in correct form for two successive days.

In this case it was held that the words published were not libelous per se, and, further, that the plaintiff could not enlarge the meaning of the words as set out in the innuendo, by contending that they imputed insolvency or dishonest trickery in a business way; but even if he might go outside the innuendo in attributing a meaning, proof 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that he was in fact insolvent at the time of the publication was a complete defense to the imputation of insolvency, while the words would not, by fair construction, bear a meaning of a charge of dishonest trickery in a business way; nor would any damages be likely to result to the plaintiff, in his circumstances, even from such a meaning placed on the publication. The question of privilege in publishing a copy of a public record was not raised in this case.

chasers or customers as vendees, and that said conditional sales contracts at all times have been, and now are, filed in the office of the auditor of Whatcom county, Washington, and indexed therein in the name of T. S. Hamilton as vendor and the several purchasers as vendees. That the name 'B. B. Furniture Company' does not appear upon the index in the records in the office of said auditor of Whatcom county, Washington, and that none of said contracts are filed or indexed in the name of said B. B. Furniture Company. That the said defendant, L. H. Darwin, publishes and causes to be published in said the Morning Reveille, and on the 12th day of April, 1910, did publish and cause to be published in said the Morning Reveille, a report and statement of the filings in the office of the said auditor of Whatcom county, Washington, for the day or days immediately preceding the publication of said items, and that the publication of said filings for said day or days is and was made under the heading in said publication entitled 'Court house Record,' and that only items and filings of recent date were and are published in said list. That on said 12th day of April, 1910, the said defendant, L. H. Darwin, did unlawfully and maliciously publish, cause to be published, and procure the publication of, the libel above set forth, and did on said date unlawfully and maliciously publish, cause to be published, and procure the publication of, said libel in a place in said paper separate and apart from the publication of said report of filings in the said auditor's office, and under a heading in bold-faced type entitled 'Conditional Sales,' and inserted therein as a part of said filing record the words 'B. B. Furniture Company.' That no sales other than as made by complainant are set forth in said libel. That all of the items set forth in said libel are and were contracts for sales that had been made and filed in said auditor's office by said T. S. Hamilton approximately two years prior to the publication of said libel, and that in said libel so published neither the dates of said contracts, nor the date of the filing thereof, was set forth, and that in the publication of said 'Courthouse Record,' the said dates are and were given. That said conditional sales contracts so mentioned in said libelous publication had all been fully paid and satisfied long prior to the publication of said libel. That the publication of said libel, as specified, and the publication of the names of the purchasers named in the said conditional sales referred to and mentioned in said libel, tended to expose, and did expose, complainant to the hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy of the per- 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sons named as the vendees or purchasers in the conditional sales designated and mentioned in said libel, and tended to expose, and did expose, complainant to the hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy of the public, and tended to injure complainant in his business and occupation, in that it tended to deter, and did deter, complainant's customers and the public and the persons named as vendees or purchasers in said libel, from further dealing or transacting business with complainant, to his financial loss. That the said defendant, L. H. Darwin, did make said libelous publication, and cause and procure same to be made, thus unlawfully, wilfully, and maliciously, knowing that the same would tend to expose the complainant to hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy, and knowing the same would tend to injure the complainant in his business and occupation, and the said defendant did thereby intend to expose the said T. S. Hamilton to public hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy, and to injure the said T. S. Hamilton in his business and occupation." Respondent was convicted on this complaint before the justice of the peace, and appealed to the superior court, where the demurrer was sustained. Appellant's only assignment is that the trial judge erred in sustaining the demurrer and discharging respondent. The prosecution is based upon § 2424, Rem. & Bal. Code, which reads as follows: "Every malicious publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, sign, or otherwise than by mere speech, which shall tend: (1) To expose any living person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or to deprive him of the benefit of public confidence or social intercourse; or . . . (3) to injure any person, corporation, or association of persons in his or their business or occupation, shall be a libel. . . ."

Appellant contends the publication tended to expose the complainant to hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy; that it was malicious, was made without justification or excuse; that it tended to injure complainant in his business; that criminal libel is charged in the language of the statute; and that the complaint is sufficient. While no reasonable excuse appears for making the publication, and the motive that actuated it may not have been commendable, and although it may have annoyed the complainant, yet from the facts pleaded we do not conclude that it amounted to a criminal libel. Although no dates of sales were mentioned in the publication, it is nevertheless conceded the sales were actually made by Hamilton in the due course of his business. There is no question but that they were conditional sales, and that for his own protection he filed memoranda thereof with the county auditor under the authority of §§ 3670 et seq., Rem. & Bal. Code. Publication at any time thereafter of the fact that he had made such filings would not tend to expose him to hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy, nor are we able to understand how it would tend to injure him in his usual business, which he was conducting in the manner stated. If there was any circumstance such as the nature, value, or quantity of the merchandise sold, which could by any possibility be construed as tending to reflect upon the vendor, and subject him to contempt and ridicule, that fact must have been known to him when he made the conditional sales and filed their memoranda with the county auditor. There is no intimation that his business methods or the making of such sales were not legitimate or honorable. The complaint alleged the publication was made long after the dates of the respective sales, and after payment of the purchase price. Of this fact the vendor, Hamilton, cannot complain. It could in no manner injure him in his credit or business standing. If it could, his methods, which he himself adopted, must have been at fault. The only possible persons, if any, whose credit or financial standing could have been affected by so late a publication were the vendees, who had then made full payment, but the respondent is not charged with having libeled them. Although the complaint follows the language of the statute in making its charges, the statements upon which appellant relies are simply conclusions of the pleader deduced from the facts alleged.

It is for the court to determine whether the facts pleaded sustain such conclusions. Conceding the publication to have been unwarranted, and at the same time irritating and annoying to Hamilton, yet it only states facts taken from public records, the truth of which is not questioned. The alleged publication contains no words libelous per se.

Appellant insists that extrinsic circumstances have been pleaded as inducement innuendo, which, coupled with the language published, are sufficient to show that the publication tended to produce, and did produce, the results which the statute is intended to prohibit. In support of this contention, appellant cites, with others, the following authorities: Denney v. Northwestern Credit Asso. 55 Wash. 331, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1021, 104 Pac. 769; State v. Elliot, 10 Kan. App. 69, 61 Pac. 981; State v. O'Hagan, 73 N. J. L. 209, 63 Atl. 95. An examination of these cases will disclose that, if pertinent at all, they tend to show the insufficiency of this complaint. Denney v. Northwestern Credit Asso. supra, was a civil action for damages predicated on an alleged libel. We there said: "In all charges of this kind, it is the duty of the court to regard the words spoken or written as might a stranger to the parties, and if they be in themselves, and without the aid of the innuendo, otherwise innocent, and if they do not in themselves, and without the aid of the special knowledge possessed by the parties concerned, imply malice, or hold the party out to public contempt or ridicule, or make any charge involving moral turpitude, or touch him in his business, or subject him to an infamous punishment, it is the general rule that they are not libelous per se. If the words do not come within this rule, 'it is necessary that the declaration should set forth precisely in what way the damage resulted from the speaking of the words. It is not sufficient to allege generally that the plaintiff has suffered special damages, or that the party has been put to great costs and expenses. . . . By special damage in such a case is meant pecuniary loss.' Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U. S. 225, 237, 23 L. ed. 308, 314. See also 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 766; 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 455; Dun v. Maier, 27 C. C. A. 100, 52 U. S. App. 381, 82 Fed. 169; Bradstreet Co. v. Oswald, 96 Ga. 396, 23 S. E. 423; Newbold v. J. M. Bradstreet & Son, 57 Md. 38, 40 Am. Rep. 426."

Appellant concedes the publication here involved is not libelous per se. We find no allegations sufficient to show that Hamilton was actually damaged or injured personally or in his business. The complaint only states the pleader's conclusions to that effect. Hamilton first published the matter set forth in the complaint when he filed the memoranda of the conditional sale contracts, and caused them to become public records, the publication of which is privileged. An information will not lie for publishing words charging a person with having done that which he may legally and properly do. It is conceded the conditional sales memoranda were legally and properly filed. The publication was truthful.

The demurrer only admitted facts alleged, and not the pleader's conclusions. The latter must be ignored in passing upon the sufficiency of the complaint. Thus considering the complaint, we conclude it does not state facts sufficient to charge criminal libel.

The judgment is affirmed.

TAYLOR WARD

and

HARVEY W. HARMER, Admr., etc., of Arthur W. Martin, Deceased, Appt.

(66 W. Va. 190, 66 S. E. 234.)

abatement.

1. Equity will not enforce a lien for purchase money reserved on land in a deed of general warranty, when a part of the land had been before sold by the grantor to other persons whose right is superior to that of the grantee in the deed, without abatement from the purchase money of the value of the land so lost to the grantee in such deed.

Same — partial failure of title — abatement — measure.

2. When abatement from purchase money is decreed a grantee of land under a general warranty deed, for loss of part of the land within its bounds by superior adverse title, the measure of abatement or compensation is not the average value of the land lost as compared with the balance of the land, but the relative value; that is, the value of the particular land lost at the date of the deed.

Same — knowledge of vendee — effect.

3. Knowledge by a grantee by general warranty deed, of superior claim to part of the land conveyed to him, will not debar him from compensation for the particular land lost to him from such superior right.

Same — abatement — laches — effect.

4. The statute of limitation or laches will not prevent a purchaser of land under general warranty from abatement of purchase money yet unpaid, for a part of the land lost to him from superior adverse right.

Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 450, 53 Am. Rep. 89.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By deed Arthur W. Martin conveyed to Taylor Ward a tract of land in Barbour county containing 435 acres. The consideration was $20,000, part cash, the balance in deferred instalments. Among these deferred instalments was one of $1,000 payable October 11, 1898, for which Ward made his note to Martin. Martin, by his will, left a legacy to Carrie Shuttlesworth, and in part payment of it Edwin Maxwell, as executor of Martin, assigned the note to Carrie Shuttlesworth. Later Carrie Shuttlesworth Smith, formerly Carrie Shuttlesworth, brought a chancery suit to enforce said note against the land, under the lien reserved for deferred purchase money in said deed from Martin to Ward. Ward filed an answer setting up that the deed by which Martin had conveyed the land to him contained a covenant of general warranty, and that it conveyed the land by specific metes and bounds, and that within those bounds were contained certain lots having houses upon some of them, which Martin had sold to persons before he conveyed the land to Ward, and that such persons were in possession actual of them when Martin conveyed to Ward, and that the value of those lots and houses exceeded the amount of the note sued for by Mrs. Smith. The result of the suit was a decree dismissing the bill of Mrs. Smith and discharging Ward from the $1,000 note. It is not controverted that the owners of the lots lying within the boundary given in the deed from Martin to Ward have right paramount to Ward under said deed, or that Ward never got possession of them, or that their value exceeded the note, or that they lie within said deed's boundary. Under the law the case is plainly for the defendant. Counsel for Mrs. Smith argue law of sale in gross and average value, as if the case involved abatement of purchase money for deficiency of quantity. Those matters are not involved. The case is one of loss of a part of the land within the boundary of the tract, lost to the purchaser by reason of superior rights arising from the vendor's prior sale, breaking the general warranty of his deed guarantying good title. It is not the case where the purchaser gets all his boundary, but loses in quantity; but it is the case where he loses by superior adverse right a part of the lands assured to him. Are we at this day required to cite much authority for the worn proposition that one getting a portion of the land warranted shall not be compelled to pay out purchase money yet in his hands? Heavner v. Morgan, 30 W. Va. 335, 8 Am. St. Rep. 55, 4 S. E. 406; McClagherty v. Craft, 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. 246; Clarke v. Hardgrove, 7 Gratt. 399. Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 452, 53 Am. Rep. 89, states the law thus: "If . . . the vendor has warranted the title, and the portion lost is much or little, the vendee may elect to hold so much of the land as he can, and compel the vendor to abate the purchase money if unpaid, or, if paid, to make compensation for the land so lost by reason of the want of title or right in his vendor. Atty. Gen. v. Day, 1 Ves. Sr. 218; Roffey v. Shallock, 4 Madd. 227, 20 Revised Rep. 293; Beverley v. Lawson, 3 Munf. 317." And cases cited in Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 242, show that it makes no difference whether the purchaser claims under an executory contract or a deed conveying legal title. Equity will enjoin a judgment for purchase money against one claiming under a deed of general warranty even where title is in suit or in threat of suit. Wamsley v. Stalnaker, 24 W. Va. 214. Here the land has been lost.

On what basis shall Ward be compensated for lost land? Counsel for Mrs. Smith say on the basis of average value. That would be so if it were a question of deficiency in quantity; but not so where there is loss of specific land. There the basis is the relative value. Hogg, Equity Principles, 23; Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 447; Clarke v. Hardgrove, 7 Gratt. 399. That part lost may be specially valuable over the balance. It may contain a building, a fine spring, a stream, meadow, or other thing giving it greater or special value. Rawle, Covenants, § 187. So there can be no complaint of the decree on this score.

Another point made against the decree is that, when Ward purchased, he knew of the ownership of the lots by recordation of deeds made by Martin, to their purchasers, by their possession, and otherwise, and that, in fact, he gets all the land which he expected to get. Here we are cited to many authorities (Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 186, and others) holding that a purchaser must examine records, take notice of the rights of those in possession, and will be affected with notice of what inquiry would have disclosed. Why are we called on to investigate these authorities when so plainly they do not apply? They apply between competing purchasers from the same vendor, or to purchasers of land under encumbrances, or to one purchasing when a former purchaser from the same vendor is in possession. But what have they to do as to the rights of a purchaser against his vendor under a warranty? This is not a contest between Ward and those lot owners. The vendor has warranty against such other claims. The warranty has dispensed with inquiry. This court said in Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 450: "It is immaterial that the vendee had knowledge of all the facts in relation to the title, and that he accepted the conveyance or made the purchase, believing that said facts did not impair the title. When a purchaser has notice of a defect or encumbrance, and requires from the vendor a warranty, the presumption of law is that the covenant was expressly taken against such known defects or encumbrances.—Rawle, on Covenants, 566; Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh, 161. If the purchaser had failed to contract for an express warranty, then this doctrine might apply; but to contend, in the face of the positive covenant of Jackson, that Peterson should be denied relief because he had knowledge of facts which in law destroy the title to a part of the land purchased, would be to deprive him of the benefit of his warranty. The covenant of general warranty, unless qualified by the contract, in terms, is a protection against defects of title, whether they result from mistakes of law or mistakes of facts." See Rawle, 123. As to this feature of the case, we are cited to Stafford v. White, 6 Gratt. 93, holding that where the parties did not know that land across a creek was in the bounds, and the purchaser got all the land which he expected to get, or thought he was getting, though that part of the tract over the creek was held by superior right, there could be no abatement of purchase money. The court said that it fully appeared that the parties at the time of sale supposed that the land went only to the creek, and did not know that the lines called for included any land over the creek. It said that for the land sold "supposed by the parties to be situate on the north-east side of the creek, the appellee agreed to pay an aggregate sum." Here was a mutual mistake, and the evidence showed it. Abatement was properly given in that case. Ours is a different case. The evidence does not prove any understanding that the lots were not included, or that there was a mutual mistake. I thought that the above quotation from Judge Allen was ample to establish the proposition that, where a general warranty is made, knowledge of defect of title does not preclude the grantee from the benefit of the warranty; but, some question about it having been suggested, I will cite further authority. "Covenants in a deed protect the grantee against every adverse right, intent, or dominion, whether he had notice of such adverse interest or not." Huyck v. Andrews, 113 N. Y. 81, 3 L.R.A. 789, 20 N. E. 581, 10 Am. St. Rep. 432, citing on page 437 many cases stating that it makes no difference that the grantee had notice. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242, says: "A public highway over the land, a claim of dower, a private right of way, a lien by judgment or by mortgage, . . . or any other outstanding, elder, and better title, is an encumbrance, the existence of which is a breach of this covenant. In these and the like cases it is the existence of the encumbrance which constitutes the right of action, irrespective of any knowledge on the part of the grantee." 11 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1066, is full authority for the proposition. So is Devlin, Deeds, § 897. So is Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh, 161, 196. Warranty binds even if the party knew of bad title. Beach v. Miller, 51 Ill. 207, 2 Am. Rep. 290. Rawle, Covenants, 566, says that such is the rule; but he says that the purchaser cannot withhold the purchase money, but must pay, and then turn round and sue on his covenant. Such is the English law, such, perhaps, in many of our states; but that is not law in the Virginias, because our cases say that the Virginia law differs materially in this respect. Our law is that the purchaser can enjoin a judgment for purchase money for bad title, or, if sued in equity to enforce the lien, equity will relieve him from payment of the purchase money on account of defect of title. The cases expressly say that our law is different. Wamsley v. Stalnaker, 24 W. Va. 214; Heavner v. Morgan, 30 W. Va. 335, 8 Am. St. Rep. 55, 4 S. E. 406; McClaugherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 272, 27 S. E. 246. In those cases are cited old Virginia cases for the same proposition.

Ward set up in his answer the loss of the lots, and erroneously considered his answer as a reply setting up new matter calling for affirmative relief, whereas it was merely an answer in defense of the matter of the bill. The plaintiff demurred to it as a reply, but the court held it such, and then the plaintiff filed an answer to it as a reply, and alleged that Martin did not intend to sell the lots, and they were included in the deed by mistake on the part of the scrivener. This matter should have been put into the case by amended bill with a prayer for reformation of the deed, and, as it relates to a matter of a mere defense answer, it is in law a special replication now obsolete. Cooper says it cannot have any effect on the defendant. 11 Va. & W. Va. Dig. 262. Then it would not put the matter in the case. But whether that answer could avail the plaintiff or not we need not say; for, if we consider it as an amended bill alleging a mistake, there is no evidence of it. On the contrary, Charles F. Teter, the attorney who prepared the deed from Martin to Ward, says that Martin and Ward together came to his office, and he prepared the deed at Martin's request, and Martin presented him the plat of the tract by which to draw the deed, the plat giving boundary, and told him to draw the deed by it. And, after the deed had been drawn, it was read to both Martin and Ward, and Ward was particularly anxious to know whether it carried all the buildings on the land, and he, Teter, told him it would, and that it was not necessary to set them out specifically. Teter says nothing was said about the lots in question. He does not say that they were to be excluded. He proves no mistake in drafting the deed by including them. No one else gives any evidence to prove such mistake. No evidence shows that Ward knew that the lots were included in or out of the deed, or that he got all he expected to get without them. There is no evidence that Ward understood that an inch was to be excluded from the bounds of the tract as Martin had purchased and owned it, not a bit of evidence that Ward, or even that Martin, intended to except an inch from the tract as the plat bounded it. Both agreed on the plat as descriptive of the boundary. The evidence is full that they intended to conform to the plat. Martin might have forgotten to exclude the lot, but that would not bind Ward, it not being mentioned in the contract; but there is no evidence, except guess, that Martin intended to exclude any part of the tract as he had bought it. If there is a mistake, no evidence proves it. If Ward knew the lots were included, he might have thought that they were tenant houses.

It is clearly proven that Ward afterwards, when he discovered superior title in others to the lots, made demand on Martin for abatement on that account, and asked a settlement of the matter, and that Martin admitted liability for the lots, and promised Ward to arrange it. It is further proven that for two lots which had been sold by Martin before his sale to Ward, but not conveyed, Martin paid Ward $110, and then Ward conveyed those two lots to Martin's purchasers. It is not proven that Ward did, as a matter of fact, know that these lots had been conveyed by Martin. He lived miles away, and merely passed by the tract along the public road sometimes, and never inspected the tract or investigated the particular boundary.

It is argued that Ward's claim rests on the theory that Martin perpetrated a fraud, and that Ward should have called for rescission earlier, and, not having done so, is to be treated as acquiescing and ratifying. This cannot be so. Ward's right arises, not from fraud, but from warranty broken.

It is argued that Ward's claim is barred by the statute of limitations. The statute was not pleaded; but Ward is not suing to collect anything. He is only asking to keep money in his hands. It may be that one who has paid, suing at law for breach of warranty, would be barred, but this is not that case. No time runs against right to retain purchase money and defend its collection in such a case. Nor will equity charge laches. Ward was not called on to sue at law or in equity as to this note. He could not sue on the warranty in advance of its payment. As well might it be claimed that one in possession of land might sue an adverse claimant on pain of losing his land by the statute of limitations.

It is assigned as error that the decree does not decree to Mrs. Smith the amount of the note against the estate of Martin, by way of recourse on account of the fact that Martin's executor had assigned the note to Mrs. Smith. That was not involved in the case. We cannot in this case convene creditors of Martin. Ward is not interested in that matter. Relief on that matter is not foreclosed by the decree in this case.

An assignment of error is based on the fact that Ward's answer calls itself an answer calling for affirmative relief. It sets up the defense against the note for loss of land, and asks that Ward be discharged from it. This did not require an answer calling for affirmative relief. As to this feature of the answer, what matters the name? If called a cross-bill answer, could not mere defense be made under it as under an ordinary answer? It is an ordinary answer as to the note. But the answer asked that the balance of the value of the lost land after crediting on the note be decreed to Ward against the estate of Martin. Likely as to this such statutory answer would be proper. I doubt it. But why are we put to the labor of responding to this assignment of error when Ward was denied, or not given, such relief against the estate? The decree is thus favorable to the estate as also to Mrs. Smith, a legatee. How are they harmed by that feature of the answer? No error is, of course, predicated on this feature of the answer.

Decree affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

UNION LABOR HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION, Respt.,
v.
VANCE REDWOOD LUMBER COMPANY
et al., Appts.

(158 Cal. 551, 112 Pac. 886.)

Boycott — hospital — exclusion from patronage by employees.

1. A hospital excluded from the list has no cause of action on the ground of illegal boycott, against several employers who, to serve their own interests, deduct from the wages of their employees a small amount for a hospital fund, in consideration of which the employees are entitled to tickets entitling them to care in case of injury, in any hospital on a list furnished by the employers; and it will be immaterial that the lists were selected with a view to injure the business of the excluded hospitals.

Master — conditions of employment — acquiescence in hospital regulations.

2. It is not illegal for an employer to make continuation in his employment depend upon the employee's acquiescence in provisions established by him for securing hospital service for injured employees through forced contributions from their wages.

Note. — Lawfulness of boycott by other than labor union.

In its scope this note is limited to cases considering the lawfulness of a boycott by a combination of individuals or companies. It is not intended to include cases considering the right of an individual or company to restrict or regulate the sale of his product by refusing to sell to retailers unless they agree not to handle competing articles, or cases involving other regulations of a similar character. So it excludes cases involving the right of a manufacturer to sell his product for retail at less than a stated price, or his right to make other restrictions which he may deem necessary to enforce this rule.

Cases involving the validity of what has been termed the blacklist are also excluded; also cases which pass upon the right of employers of labor to agree not to employ each other's employees unless they shall procure a written discharge stating the reasons therefor, or other similar regulations.

As to the lawfulness of boycott by a labor union, see notes in 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 85; 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 707; 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 748.

As to right of labor union to forbid its members to handle one's product, see note in 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 642; also note in 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 792.

As to the liability of a member of a combination for injury to a boycotted dealer, see note in 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 824.

As to civil liability for maliciously procuring the discharge of an employee or preventing his employment, in the absence of conspiracy or concerted action, see note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 966.

As to the liability of an individual, in the absence of a conspiracy, for driving away another's business, see note in 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1224; and as bearing upon the general question herein raised, see the discussion as to absolute and qualified rights in the note in 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 869. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The cases within the scope of this note apply principles not peculiarly applicable to the questions raised, but which are quite generally applied to cases entirely foreign to the question under consideration. It necessarily follows that no general rule can be deduced from these cases, which are peculiarly applicable to the question under consideration. It is to be noted that even though the same result may be reached in the cases considered, yet that result is very apt to have been reached along entirely different lines of reasoning, and by the application of entirely different principles. On the other hand, entirely different results may be reached upon very similar states of fact, where the principle applied is different, and this without the courts having in their respective decisions considered the doctrine on which the opposing decision is based.

Decisions as to the lawfulness of a boycott by a labor union cannot be regarded as entitled to any considerable weight as authority upon the question of the lawfulness of a boycott by business competitors, since, in many of the cases at least, the facts involved in the two classes of cases require the application of different principles of law. Boycotts by labor organizations are never for the purpose of crushing out business competition in order to build up a monopoly, and hence, at least on this ground, are not apt to be deemed violative of public policy. In many, if not most, instances of boycotts by labor organizations, the purpose sought is to bring to a successful termination an industrial struggle originally instituted for the betterment of the condition of laborers involved therein. On the other hand, the general purpose or object sought by business boycotts is to destroy the business of a competitor for the purpose of establishing a monopoly, stifling competition, etc.

Where act is violative of public policy.

In general, it may be said that the rule of public policy is against unreasonable restrictions on trade, and monopolies which have that tendency are therefore disfavored; hence a boycott by a combination of business competitors against individual rivals,

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Humboldt County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enjoin defendants from discriminating against it in the conduct of its hospital business. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Denver Sevier, C. M. Wheeler, F. A. Cutler, and F. R. Sweasey for appellants.

Messrs. J. F. Quinn and Coonan & Kehoe for respondent.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by plaintiff against for the purpose of crushing out such rivals in order to gain a monopoly in that line of business, is violative of public policy, and constitutes an unlawful conspiracy, which will render the members thereof liable to anyone injured thereby.

Thus, a combination of persons natural or artificial, to restrict a legitimate trade or commerce in any field by hampering or destroying individual liberty, stifling competition, or preventing the exercise of individual freedom to dispose of either labor or capital, is unlawful. And a combination of undertakers and liverymen by which they agree not to do business with any person who does not patronize them exclusively, the effect of which is to prevent members thereof from permitting the use of vehicles at a funeral, because the undertaker in charge comes within the ban of the combination, is violative of public policy, unlawful, and for the injury inflicted by the interruption of the funeral by reason of this combination, the persons guilty are liable. Gatzow v. Buening, 106 Wis. 1, 49 L.R.A. 475, 80 Am. St. Rep. 17, 81 N. W. 1003.

This doctrine is peculiarly applicable where the means used to effectuate the boycott are coercive. See Evenson v. Spaulding, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 904, and note thereto, on the question of the lawfulness of interference by competitors or others with the agents of a dealer or manufacturer.

Thus, a combination of granite manufacturers, under an agreement not to patronize in their business any person not a member of the association, is unlawful, and the members are liable for injuries resulting to a third person whose business is injured by the refusal of the members of this association to deal with him, where such refusal is compelled by by-laws of the association levying upon the members a fine for the breach of their agreement to patronize only members of the association. Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 43 L.R.A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746, 42 Atl. 607. The court said that "the law sees in the membership of an association of this character both the authors of its coercive system and the victims of its unlawful pressure. If this were not so, men the named defendant and six other lumber companies, to obtain an injunction restraining and enjoining them from conspiring and combining together to vex, annoy, hinder, injure, and destroy the hospital business of plaintiff. The scheme of annoyance and destruction consisted in this: The defendants compelled every employee to consent to the deduction of $1 from his monthly wage, 12½ cents of which went into a contingent fund to help needy employees who might be injured, and 87½ cents of which went to a hospital for an employee's ticket. This ticket entitled the employee to medical and surgical care and attendance in case of injury. The hospital could deprive their fellows of established rights, and evade the duty of compensation, simply by working through an association. But it can hardly be supposed that the defendants' organization reached its present proportions without some previous use of the methods disclosed by the evidence above recited; and, as far as its membership was due to coercion, there was a further element of unlawful pressure in the enforcement of united action against the plaintiffs. It would be strange, indeed, if the members of an association organized upon such a basis, and advanced by such means, could meet a claim of this nature by saying that they had made no attempt to secure the co-operation of outside parties. It is clear that if the association had comprised but a small portion of the manufacturers, and had destroyed the plaintiffs' business by compelling other manufacturers to join them in withholding patronage, its members would have been liable. But it is claimed in effect that a business can be destroyed with impunity when the organization has become so extensive that there are no outside patrons to control, or so few that their course is a matter of no moment. Upon this theory, every successful instance of coercion would increase the safety with which another coercion could be attempted, and, when coercion had been pursued until but one contumacious person remained, immunity would be complete. It is clear that the law cannot concede to organizations of this character the powers and immunities claimed for their association by these defendants, and retain its own power to protect the individual citizen in the free enjoyment of his capital or labor."

The same result was reached under a very similar state of facts in Martell v. White, 185 Mass. 255, 64 L.R.A. 260, 102 Am. St. Rep. 341, 69 N. E. 1085. The court said that the facts showed a clear and deliberate interference with the business of a person with the intention of causing damage to him, that the defendants combined and conspired together to ruin the plaintiff in his business, and accomplished this purpose, and added: "It cannot be necessary to enter upon a course of reasoning, or to cite author-could be selected by the employee from a list of three or four presented to him, but the Union Labor Hospital was not mentioned and was not on the list. These facts form the foundation of the charge of malicious and wilful conspiracy, combination, and boycott, designed to vex, annoy, hinder, injure, and destroy the plaintiff's business and coerce and intimidate its patrons and customers, to ruin its credit, and to prevent it from selling its bonds, etc. There was no issue over the question of what these defendants were doing. The court found, generally, in favor of the allegations of the complaint, found that the defendant companies derived a benefit from the existing hospital arrangement and the fund created by the 12½ cents taken out of the monthly hospital dues of each employee since thus they were relieved of the burden of caring for indigent and injured employees. The court also found that the relations existing between the defendants and the agents of plaintiff were of such a nature that the defendants were justified in not entering into an agreement with the Union Labor Hospital, such as existed between the defendants and the other hospitals upon their list. And the court also found that the defendants, in entering into the agreement with the other hospitals, were acting solely for the purpose and with the intent to subserve their own (defendants') interests.

The defendants were all companies engaged in lumbering and milling in Humboldt county. The occupations of their men ities in support of the proposition that, while a person must submit to competition, he has the right to be protected from malicious interference with his business."

This is also the doctrine of Baldwin v. Escanaba Liquor Dealers' Asso. — Mich.—, 130 N. W. 214, which holds that a combination of liquor dealers is liable for coercing advertisers and would-be advertisers in a newspaper, from advertising therein by threatening financial injury through the loss of their custom and patronage, where the object is maliciously to injure the business of such newspaper publisher, rather than to promote any legitimate interest of their own. The court said that this conduct was an unlawful boycott within the meaning of that term, which was defined to be "a combination of several persons to cause a loss to a third person by causing others, against their will, to withdraw from him their beneficial business intercourse, through threats that, unless a compliance with their demands be made, the persons forming the combination will cause loss or injury to him; or an organization formed to exclude a person from business relations with others by persuasion, intimidation, and other acts which tend to violence, and thereby cause him, through fear of resulting injury, to submit to dictation in the management of his affairs."

It is unlawful for an individual or a combination of individuals to obstruct, harass, and annoy the employees of another when engaged in the discharge of their duties, even though such other person is a competitor in business. So, it is unlawful to threaten the customers of such person if they continue to deal with him, to cause and procure false and injurious reports concerning him and his business to be circulated in the vicinity thereof, and for such unlawful conduct the members of the combination are liable to the injured party. Standard Oil Co. v. Doyle, 118 Ky. 662, 111 Am. St. Rep. 331, 82 S. W. 271.

Jackson v. Stanfield, 137 Ind. 592, 23 L.R.A. 588, 36 N. E. 345, 37 N. E. 14, holds that for injury inflicted upon a retail lumber dealer by a combination of dealers coercing wholesalers not to sell him any lumber, the injured person may recover from the members of the combination. The court said that since the policy pursued against the business of the injured person was of a menacing character, calculated to destroy or injure it, it was unlawful, and the persons inflicting the wrong were amenable to the injured party in a civil action for damages. In this connection it was pointed out that the action complained of was not a mere passive, let-alone policy, and withdrawal of all business relations, intercourse, and friendship, but it consisted of actions, threats, and intimidations.

And see also Funck v. Farmers' Elevator Co. 142 Iowa, 621, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 108, 121 N. W. 53, which holds unlawful a combination among retail dealers to coerce wholesalers into refusing to sell goods to certain persons, by threatening to discontinue all business relations with such wholesalers.

And a combination among wholesalers and some retailers in the coal business, by which they refused to sell a retail dealer not a member of the combine in question, was held unlawful in Hawarden v. Youghiogheny & L. Coal Co. 111 Wis. 545, 55 L.R.A. 828, 87 N. W. 472.

In the foregoing case the result was reached on the theory that while persons have a right to combine for the purpose of promoting their individual welfare in any legitimate way, yet such combination was unlawful if the purpose was to inflict injury on another, and injury actually resulted therefrom.

As affected by nature of object.

In other cases the same result has been reached, but rather on the theory that the boycott complained of was malicious, and hence actionable, since the primary purpose was to destroy the business of another, rather than to promote the legitimate ends of the conspirators.

Thus, where a combination has no legitwere dangerous. That provision should be made for the medical and surgical care of the men injured was most proper. No objection is made to this, nor to the means adopted to effectuate it, saving that plaintiff contends that because its hospital was not upon the list, and because the employees were compelled to take out hospital tickets in one or another of the enumerated hospitals, a species of unlawful discrimination by the defendants against the plaintiff was thus established, a discrimination which it is urged and which the court found was an illegal boycott, against the continuance of which defendants were enjoined.

It is important to understand exactly what these defendants were doing. Essentially it was this: By agreement amongst themselves they selected a list of hospitals, of which plaintiff's was not one. By agreement amongst themselves, for their own protection and for the betterment of the condition of their men, they required of the men, as a condition of obtaining employment, or as a condition of remaining in employment, that they should assent to a deduction from their monthly wages of 87½ cents, which should be given to a hospital of the employee's own selection, taken from the list presented. These defendants did not go so far as to discharge, or even to threaten to discharge, an employee who might buy a ticket entitling him to service of the plaintiff's hospital. They insisted merely that he buy a ticket in one of their designated hospitals. An employee was at imate end to promote, but it is carried into execution for the sole purpose of injuring another's business by agreeing not to sell or buy from such person, and by inducing third persons also to abstain from business intercourse with such person, it constitutes an unlawful conspiracy. Ertz v. Produce Exch. 79 Minn. 140, 48 L.R.A. 90, 79 Am. St. Rep. 433, 81 N. W. 737.

So, where the purpose is maliciously to injure a person running a retail mercantile business, rather than to promote any legitimate interest of his own, an employer of labor commits an actionable wrong by coercing his employees not to patronize such retail establishment, by threatening to discharge them if they do so. Wesley v. Native Lumber Co. — Miss. —, 53 So. 346.

As to validity of agreement at common law, by which employer seeks to direct trade of employees to the other party, see note in 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 649.

A combination of business men formed for the purpose of injuring another in his hotel business by refusing to purchase goods of any traveling salesman who might patronize this hotel, and by inducing other business men also to refuse to patronize such salesman, constitutes an unlawful conspiracy, where the members thereof have no legitimate end of their own to promote by such interference with the business of another. Webb v. Drake, 52 La. Ann. 290, 26 So. 791.

In recognition of this doctrine, combinations to boycott another have sometimes been sustained where it appeared that the primary purpose of the combination was to promote some legitimate object of the members of the combination.

Thus, an agreement among a number of newspaper publishers not to sell newspapers to a dealer therein, unless he discontinued distributing with such newspapers advertising circulars, is not unlawful where the reason for the agreement was that the circulation of such advertising matter in this manner interfered with and injured newspaper advertising. Collins v. American News Co. 34 Misc. 260, 69 N. Y. Supp. 638, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

affirmed in 68 App. Div. 639, 74 N. Y. Supp. 1123.

So, a combination of retail lumber dealers, by mutually agreeing not to deal with any wholesale dealer who sells lumber to persons not dealers at any place where a member of the association is carrying on business, is not unlawful, since the object is to protect such retail dealers against sales by wholesale dealers to contractors and consumers. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis (Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Northwestern Lumbermen's Assn.) 54 Minn. 223, 21 L.R.A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, 55 N. W. 1119. To the same effect is Montgomery Ward & Co. v. South Dakota Retail Merchants' & H. Dealers' Assn. 150 Fed. 413. But compare with Jackson v. Stanfield, Funck v. Farmers Elevator Co. and Hawarden v. Youghiogheny & L. Coal Co. supra.

And an employer of a large number of men in a milling business who, in connection therewith, for the benefit of such men as well as for his own profit, operates a mercantile business, may lawfully coerce his employees into trading at his place of business to the exclusion of other mercantile concerns, by threatening to discharge them if they do not do so; and he may also lawfully coerce wholesale dealers into refusing to sell their goods to competing mercantile houses, by refusing to deal with any wholesalers who sold to his competitors. Lewis v. Huie-Hodge Lumber Co. 121 La. 658, 46 So. 685.

So, where an employer of labor who also in connection therewith, conducted a mercantile business, in order to retain the trade of his employees, threatened to discharge them if they traded with a rival, such conduct did not constitute an actionable wrong, although injury resulted therefrom, since the object was to promote the interest of the defendant. Robison v. Texas Pine Land Assn. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 40 S. W. 43.

An agreement among insurance companies, the effect of which is to cause the companies to decline to pay for services brought them by a person not a party to the agreement, and to refuse to accept such services where liberty to buy an additional ticket in plaintiff's hospital, but, in the nature of things, an employee having purchased a ticket in another hospital would not be likely to lay out any more money for such a purpose.

There being no contractual relations between plaintiff and defendants, the defendants, individually or in combination, were under a duty only to refrain from inflicting a legal wrong upon plaintiff. The finding of the court is that defendants in making their agreements with the Sequoia, St. Francis, Marine View, and Trinity Hospitals were acting solely for the purpose and with the intent to subserve their own interests. But if this were not so, and their purpose were to injure the business of plaintiff, nevertheless, unless they adopted illegal means to that end, their conduct did not render them amendable to the law, for an evil motive which may inspire the doing of an act not unlawful will not of itself make the act unlawful. J. F. Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 550, 98 Pac. 1027, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1165; Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 Pac. 324. Unquestionably there was nothing illegal in the measures employed to accomplish this result. The suasion or intimidation or coercion was purely moral, and went no further upon the part of the defendants than a refusal to employ or to retain in their employ anyone unwilling to comply with their hospital regulation. This was strictly a matter between employer and em-tendered, does not entitle the person whose services are declined to an injunction enjoining the carrying out of the agreement. Tanenbaum v. New York F. Ins. Exch. 33 Misc. 134, 68 N. Y. Supp. 342.

Where motive is malicious.

In other jurisdictions, such boycotts have been held to be violative of public policy because the means used to make effective the boycott were coercive and unlawful and the motive malicious.

Thus, Doremus v. Hennessy, 176 Ill. 608, 43 L.R.A. 797, 68 Am. St. Rep. 203, 52 N. E. 924, 54 N. E. 524, holds that a combination of persons engaged in the laundry business, to attempt to destroy the business of a competitor by inducing and coercing her employees to leave her, and to prevent her securing her work done by other laundries by the same means, constitutes an unlawful conspiracy, and for the injury resulting thereby the conspirators are liable. The doctrine is here asserted that "damage inflicted by fraud or misrepresentation, or by the use of intimidation, obstruction, or molestation, with malicious motives, is without excuse, and actionable. Competition in trade, business, or occupation, though resulting in loss, will not be restricted or discouraged, whether concerning property or personal service. Lawful competition that may injure the business of another, even though successfully directed to driving that other out of business, is not actionable. Nor would competition of one set of men against another set, carried on for the purpose of gain, even to the extent of intending to drive from business that other set, and actually accomplishing that result, be actionable unless there was actual malice. Malice, as here used, does not merely mean an intent to harm, but means an intent to do a wrongful harm and injury. An intent to do a wrongful harm and injury is unlawful, and if a wrongful act is done to the detriment of the right of another, it is malicious, and an act maliciously done with the intent and purpose of injuring another is not lawful competition. In this case it is clear the evidence sustained the allegations of the plaintiff's declaration, and there is here no contention on the facts. The principles herein announced are sustained by the weight of authority in England and in this country."

And see, to the same effect, Purington v. Hinchliff, 219 Ill. 159, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 824, 109 Am. St. Rep. 322, 76 N. E. 47, wherein this doctrine was applied to a masons' and builders' association to prevent the sale by a competitor of his product within the district covered by the combination, and the product being of the character that could only successfully be manufactured and sold in that district.

A distinction between such interference with the business of another, when in the line of competition, and when the primary purpose is maliciously to injure another, is made in West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co. 50 W. Va. 611, 56 L.R.A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895, 40 S. E. 591. In this case a count containing an allegation that the defendant and competitor by their monopoly and control over the oil business refused to ship or permit others to ship oils, or buy the oils shipped through the plaintiffs' line, and, being the only refiners of oil at a certain place, refused to buy oil shipped through the pipe line of the plaintiff, was held not to set up an unlawful act in the sense that it constituted an actionable wrong, since it was an attempt by one competitor in a business to better himself by injuring his rival, and hence the count was held not to state a cause of action. However, another count which did not allege that the defendants' were competitors with the plaintiff, but alleged substantially the same acts, and charged that they were committed for the malicious purpose of injuring the plaintiff in his business, was held to set forth an actionable wrong, and hence to be good on demurrer.

—Doctrine that malicious motive does not affect otherwise lawful act.

The doctrine as to the effect of malice is denied in some jurisdictions, and hence ployee, and where no contract between them stands in the way, it is the unquestioned right of the employee to leave the employment at his pleasure, and it is equally the right of the employer to discharge at his pleasure, or to impose conditions upon the retention of the employee in his employment. If imposed conditions are regarded as unjust, unfair, or onerous, the employee need not comply with them, but may resign, and, as has been said in the cases above cited, he may do this as an individual, or he may do so by concerted action as a member of an organized body or trades union. Precisely as may the employee cease labor at his whim or pleasure, and, whatever be his reason, good, bad, or indifferent, leave no one a legal right to complain; so, upon the other hand, may the employer discharge, and, whatever be his reason, good, bad, or indifferent, no one has suffered a legal wrong. A man may have a profitable general merchandise business in the neighborhood of a mill or factory, depending for its patronage upon the mill or factory hands. For reasons sufficient to them, they may cease dealing at this store by concert of action, and so long as their methods (not their motives), are legal, they may perfect a boycott which will destroy the storekeeper's business. Upon the other hand, the mill owner, being under no contractual obligation to the storekeeper, may indisputably shut down his mill at any time, and thus work a destruction of the storekeeper's business. It is conceivable.

combinations to boycott another for a malicious purpose have been sustained on the theory that the act by any member of the combination was lawful, and would not be rendered unlawful because a number joined therein. The cases applying this doctrine confuse or fail to distinguish between the exercise by individuals of an absolute right as distinguished from a qualified right. They also fail to note limitations on the doctrine of Allen v. Flood, as made in later decisions which in effect reaffirm the doctrine of Stevenson v. Newnham (1853) 13 C. B. 297, 22 L. J. C. P. N. S. 110, wherein the doctrine is asserted that an act which does not amount to a legal injury is not rendered actionable because it is done with a malicious purpose. This is a considerable limitation upon the loosely stated rule that an otherwise lawful act does not become unlawful by reason of the motive actuating it, since the former simply amounts to a mere truism. In other words, if the person does not suffer a legal injury, he has no right of action. It does not from this follow, however, that an injury flowing from an otherwise lawful act does not amount to a legal injury where it is inflicted maliciously, and hence does not constitute an actionable wrong. But to the contrary, by the great weight of authority a malicious motive will render unlawful an act which otherwise would be lawful.

On the theory criticized, it has been held lawful for a school teacher to advise or persuade his pupils not to patronize a certain store, and to be immaterial that he acts maliciously in so doing. Guethler v. Altman, 26 Ind. App. 587, 84 Am. St. Rep. 313, 60 N. E. 355.

And it is lawful for the governor of a state, having authority in that regard, to prohibit the inmates of a soldiers' home from patronizing a certain restaurant in which it was suspected intoxicating liquors were unlawfully sold, and the act does not become unlawful by reason of other persons joining or aiding therein. Rowan v. Butler, 171 Ind. 28, 85 N. E. 714.

In Brewster v. C. Miller & Sons Co. 101 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ky. 368, 38 L.R.A. 505, 41 S. W. 301, the court sustained, as against one injured thereby, the validity of an organization among undertakers, by which they agreed not to serve anyone indebted, or claimed to be indebted, to any member of the association. A person injured by the refusal of any member of this organization to serve him, on the claim of one of them that he was indebted for prior services rendered his father, which was disputed by the injured person, was held to have no cause of action against the members of the combination. The court reasoned that since one person has a right to decline to enter into a business undertaking with another, any number of persons can enter into an agreement by which they can decline to assume business relations with or enter into any contract with one or more persons, and that, as the members of an association for a good reason, or for no reason, had the right to decline to render services or furnish burial material to the plaintiff, if they saw proper to decline to render services because another member of the association asserted a claim against the plaintiff, their refusal created no legal liability against them; that it was immaterial so far as concerned the plaintiff as to what reasons may have influenced them to decline employment or to refuse to furnish the burial material which he desired.

Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225, 46 Am. Rep. 373, holds a refusal by an employer to employ or retain in his service any person renting property of another is not an actionable wrong, even though such employer is doing a large business and has in his employ many employees. The court reasoned that the interference complained of was not with the general rights of the plaintiff, that the threat was not general, but was confined to his employees, and added: "The plaintiff may rent to all the rest of humanity. The defendant owes no duty to the plaintiff. He has done him no wrong by declining to employ his tenants, unless he was under some legal obligation to employ them, and was guilty of some wrong in not employing them. This very action is that his motive may be so venomous that he shuts down his works merely to destroy the storekeeper's business, and yet the storekeeper has no right of action, nor indeed has he right of inquiry into the motive which prompted the act. Since the mill owner may do this, he may do less than this, and exact of his employees, as a condition of their continued employment, that they do not deal at that store, and for this, also, however grave the injury, the storekeeper will have no legal cause of complaint. These views touching the arbitrary right of the employee to labor or to refuse to labor, and the reciprocal arbitrary right of the employer to employ or discharge labor, without regard in either case to the actuating motives, are propositions settled beyond peradventure. It is well settled, observes Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 133, 38 Am. Dec. 346, "that every man, whether skilled laborer, mechanic, farmer, or domestic servant, may work or not work, or work or refuse to work, with any company or individual at his own option, except so far as he is bound by contract." In Payne v. Western & A. R. Co. 13 Lea, 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666, it is said: "Railroad corporations have in this matter the same right enjoyed by manufacturers, merchants, lawyers, and farmers. All may dismiss their employees at will, be they many or few, for good cause, for no cause, or even for cause morally wrong, without being thereby guilty of legal wrong. A fortiori they may 'threaten' to discharge them without thereby doing an illegal act."

The question will be found very elaborately discussed in Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225, 46 Am. Rep. 373, and in the more recent case of Banks v. Eastern R. & Lumber Co. 46 Wash. 610, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 485, 90 Pac. 1048, a case very similar to the one at bar. Banks charged that he was conducting a public hospital, that the defendant was a corporation engaged in the manufacture of lumber and shingles, employing a large number of men; that 50 cents a month were retained from the wages of each man, to be disbursed for hospital and medical services; that 56 employees of the defendant selected plaintiff's hospital, and served upon defendant a written demand that their hospital dues be thereafter paid to the plaintiff; that plaintiff, in consideration, issued to each of the employees a certificate entitling him to medical and surgical treatment in the hospital, and that defendant refused to pay the fees to plaintiff so demanded by the written request of its employees; but, to the contrary, notified its employees that all hospital dues would be paid to the Dumon Hospital, and that any employee not consenting to such demand would be discharged. It was alleged that all the acts of the defendant were wanton, wilful, and malicious, and done with intent to harass plaintiff and injure his business. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained. In upholding the ruling of the trial court the supreme court of Washington said: "The respondent was entitled to employ its servants upon the conditions alleged. It had a perfect right to contract for the retention of reasonable hospital fees, and reserve to itself the privilege of selecting the physician to whom such fees should be paid. The contract, which did not profit the respondent, was made for the direct benefit of his employees. Appellant made brought upon the assumption that the defendant was in some way under an obligation to employ the plaintiff's tenants; that he was guilty of a dereliction of duty, of a violation of the plaintiff's right, in not employing his tenants, or in threatening not to employ such as should become or were his tenants. . . . The defendant had an absolute right to employ, or not to employ, a tenant of the plaintiff, and no action would be maintained against him if he chose not to do it. . . . The act legal, he cannot be sued for mere ill-will or personal animosity, especially when he has cause."

Compare with International G. N. R. Co. v. Greenwood, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 76, 21 S. W. 559, wherein employers were held liable to a hotel and saloon keeper, for threatening to discharge any of their employees who in any way patronized the plaintiff, either by eating at his house or drinking at his bar, the purpose being maliciously to injure the plaintiff. It is, however, said that such employer was not liable for posting a notice that he would not take into his service anyone who might patronize the plaintiff, since the employer had the right to determine for himself who he might thereafter employ, and the reasons upon which he might act concerned no one but himself; distinction being made between the exercise of the right of entering into contract relations with another, and the exercise of the right to discharge another where the discharge could only lawfully be made for a reasonable cause.

—Where complaining person is member of combination.

A person cannot complain of a wrongful action of a combination of local insurance agents, to fix the rates of insurance and to compel all insurance companies to withdraw their agencies from persons not joining, where he himself is a member of the combination. Beechley v. Mulville, 102 Iowa, 662, 63 Am. St. Rep. 479, 70 N. W. 107, 71 N. W. 428.

no agreement with the respondent. There was no privity of contract between him and respondent. The contract between the respondent and the employees was not made for the benefit of appellant, and he had no right of action thereon. If appellant made any contract which has been violated, it was with the 56 employees to whom he issued hospital certificates. He cannot dictate the manner in which the respondent shall conduct its business, nor can he, by any agreement with respondent's employees to which respondent is not a party, compel it to change the terms of its contracts of employment. Appellant places much reliance on the allegations of malice, but if the respondent is conducting its business in a lawful manner, making and performing valid contracts with its employees, the mere incident of a malicious motive toward the appellant does not of itself warrant a recovery.

"Appellant contends this is an action in tort, based on the malicious and wanton acts of the respondent, and seems to predicate his right to recovery upon respondent's wrongful motive. Judge Cooley, at page 1505 (832) of vol. 2, 3d ed. of his work on Torts, says: 'Bad motive, by itself, then, is no tort. Malicious motives make a bad act worse, but they cannot make that a wrong which in its own essence is lawful. An act which does not amount to a legal injury cannot be actionable because it is done with a bad intent. Where one exercises a legal right only, the motive which actuates him is immaterial. When in legal pleadings the defendant is charged with having wrongfully and unlawfully done the act complained of, the words are only words of vituperation, and amount to nothing unless a cause of action is otherwise alleged.' In substance, the act of respondent of which appellant complains is that it has maliciously caused its employees to violate their contract with him; but the acts herein alleged give the appellant no cause of action as against respondent. Boyson v. Thorn, 98 Cal. 578, 21 L.R.A. 233, 33 Pac. 492."

We are unable to perceive where any element of monopoly enters into this consideration, as respondent contends. Defendants had the undoubted right to deal with any hospital which they might select. In fact they are dealing with four, and they are not even prohibiting their men from engaging the services of plaintiff. We repeat that since the acts of defendants are within their legal rights, the motive for those acts is not a subject of inquiry. "To entitle a plaintiff to recover, there must be a wrong done. 'No one is a wrongdoer but he who does what the law does not allow.' 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

He who does what the law allows cannot be a wrongdoer, whatever his motive. So, no one is guilty of a fraud because he exerts his rights. The motive which may induce such exertion is immaterial." Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 237, 46 Am. Rep. 373.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: Lorigan, J.; Melvin, J.

A petition for rehearing in banc having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down December 20, 1910: Rehearing denied.

Beatty, Ch. J., concurring:

In response to the petition for a rehearing of this cause I desire to say that, while concurring in the judgment of reversal, I find some expressions in the opinion of Justice Henshaw which I deem unnecessary to the conclusion of the court, and which, if not absolutely inconsistent with my views, as expressed in the case of J. F. Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 550, 98 Pac. 1027, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1165, are yet in apparent conflict with what I deem to be the true doctrine applicable in cases of this character. I take no exception to the proposition that an act in its essence lawful does not become actionable because inspired by a bad motive. But I am convinced that the weight of reason and authority is in favor of the view that the motive of a harmful act is material, where the act is not absolutely and unqualifiedly lawful in itself. This is illustrated by cases of malicious prosecution, unlawful imprisonment, and libel, in which the pleas of probable cause and privilege are defeated by proof of actual malice, and the doctrine of those cases rests upon a principle which makes it fully applicable to a case wherein it is made to appear that the ruin or injury of a legitimate business (by which I mean any useful vocation open to every citizen as of common right) is the direct result of a combination formed for the primary purpose of injuring that business, and this notwithstanding such injury may involve some incidental advantages to those who have caused it. This, which appears to be the necessary complement or counterpart of the proposition that injury incidentally resulting to a business from a combination entered into for the benefit, by lawful means, of those who engage in it, is not actionable, is supported, not only by reason, but by authority.

Besides the case of Quinn v. Leatham [1901] A. C. 495, referred to and commented upon in the Parkinson Case, I would call attention to the opinion of the circuit court of appeals in National Fireproofing Co. v. Mason Builders' Asso. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 148, 94 C. C. A. 535, 169 Fed. 259, from which I quote the following statement of the doctrine for which I am contending: "The direct object or purpose of a combination furnishes the primary test of its legality. It is not every injury inflicted upon third persons in its operation that renders a combination unlawful. It is not enough to establish illegality in an agreement between certain persons to show that it works harm to others. An agreement entered into for the primary purpose of promoting the interest of the parties is not rendered illegal by the fact that it may incidentally injure third persons. Conversely, an agreement entered into for the primary purpose of injuring another is not rendered legal by the fact that it may incidentally benefit the parties. As a general rule it may be stated that, when the chief object of a combination is to injure or oppress third persons, it is a conspiracy, but that, when such injury or oppression is merely incidental to the carrying out of a lawful purpose, it is not a conspiracy. Stated in another way: A combination entered into for the real malicious purpose of injuring a third person in his business or property may amount to a conspiracy, and furnish a ground of action for the damages sustained, or call for an injunction, even though formed for the ostensible purpose of benefiting its members and actually operating to some extent to their advantage; but a combination without such ulterior oppressive object, entered into merely for the purpose of promoting by lawful means the common interests of its members, is not a conspiracy."

This doctrine, however, cannot avail the respondent here as the case is presented by the record; for, although it is found by the trial judge that the defendants, without any interests of their own to subserve, or any lawful object to promote, did conspire and confederate together for the purpose of unlawfully injuring the plaintiff in the manner alleged in the complaint, it is also found, as shown in the opinion of the court, that the agreement with the four favored hospitals was entered into by the defendants, solely for the purpose and with the intent to subserve their own interests. These two findings appear to me to stand in absolute and irreconcilable opposition to each other, and the result is no finding at all upon a point essential to the validity of the judgment, which must therefore be reversed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

EMIL MARRI

v.

STAMFORD STREET RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(— Conn. —, 78 Atl. 582.)

Husband — injury to wife — loss of consortium — right to recover.

A man cannot recover for loss of the society or those personal services of his wife formerly embraced by the term 'consortium,' through injuries negligently inflicted upon her by another, where the statutes have conferred upon her a legal entity of her own, and relieved her of the obligation to perform services which she formerly owed him.

(January 6, 1911.)

Note. — Right of husband to recover for loss of consortium through personal injury to wife.

As to right of wife to recover for loss of consortium resulting from negligent injury to husband, see note to Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024.

As to the right of a husband or wife at common law to recover for loss of services or consortium against a person negligently causing death of spouse, see the note to Sherlag v. Kelley, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 633.

As to right of wife, under modern married women's acts, to sue for alienation of the affections of her husband, see note to Nolin v. Pearson, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 643.

For cases considering the question whether the husband's action for damages sustained by him on account of personal injury to wife abates by his own death or that of the wrongdoer, see note to Hey v. Prime, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 570.

Right at common law.

The wife owes a duty to her husband, of which physical labor may or may not be a part, depending upon circumstances, which is called in the common-law writs, consortium, and means conjugal society and assistance. So the common law recognized the right of the husband to maintain an action against one who tortiously impaired the ability of a wife to perform her duty, and thus deprived the owner of his right thereto. Such action, when based on personal injury to the wife, was in trespass on the case, per quod consortium amissit.

Even before the days of Blackstone, down to the present time, the authorities, Eng-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Prentice, J.:

This action was brought to recover damages claimed to have been sustained by the plaintiff as the result of a collision between a trolley car negligently operated by the defendant's servant in the streets of Stamford and a carriage drawn by horses, in which the plaintiff and his wife were being driven. Recovery was sought for personal injuries to the plaintiff, harm done to the horses and carriage owned by the plaintiff, and injuries to the plaintiff in his relative rights through the expenditure which he was required to make in the care and cure of his wife, who was personally injured at the same time, and through his loss of her services and companionship resulting from her injuries. The court found that the collision and resulting injuries were caused by the defendant's negligence, and without contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff or Mrs. Marri, and rendered judgment in the plaintiff's favor. Included in the amount for which recovery was thus had was a sum for money expended for doctors, medicine, care, and nursing, and the sum of $300 "for loss of consortium." The appeal assigns a number of errors, but all the assignments are waived except one lish and American, are, apparently without well-considered exceptions, in accordance with the reason above stated,—to the effect that the husband's recovery is for the loss or impairment of his right to conjugal society and assistance. *Hyde v. It has long been the rule that, in actions to recover for personal injuries to the wife, the husband may recover for the loss 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the society of his wife in addition to, and as distinguished from, loss of services. Jones v. Utica & B. River R. Co. 40 Hun, 349.

In Denver Consol. Tramway Co. v. Riley, 14 Colo. App. 132, 59 Pac. 476, holding that a husband could recover for the loss of the consortium of his wife, the meaning of the term and the husband's right are thus expressed: "The companionship and society of a wife are not articles of commerce. They cannot be weighed or measured; they are not bought and sold, and no expert is competent to testify to their value. The consideration upon which they are bestowed is not pecuniary. Yet the husband is entitled to compensation in money for their loss, and the amount of that compensation is to be determined by the jury, not from evidence of value, but from their own observation, experience, and knowledge, conscientiously applied to the facts and circumstances of the case. So also in relation to the services of the wife. The wife does not occupy the position of a servant, and her services to her husband are not those of a servant. She makes his home cheerful and inviting, and ministers to his happiness in a multitude of ways outside of the druggery of household labor. All the work of the house may be done by hired employees, and her services still give character to the home. They are not rendered in accordance with set rules; they are not repeated in regular order from day to day; they have their source in the thoughtfulness of the wife, and her regard for her husband, and no witness is qualified to define them, or reduce them to a list, or say what they are worth, so that their value must also be estimated by the jury."

In Berger v. Jacobs, 21 Mich. 215, where the wife sued for personal injuries to herself, the court merely said that "for any damages accruing to the husband from the assault and battery upon the wife, as for loss of her assistance and society, and the expenses to which he may have been put in nursing and curing her, he alone could sue."

Hawkins v. Front Street Cable R. Co.

3 Wash. 592, 16 L.R.A. 808, 28 Am. St. Rep. 72, 28 Pac. 1021, seems to be opposed to the right of the husband to recover for a loss of the consortium of his wife. Here it was held that the loss of the society, companionship, and solace of one's wife is not an element of the damages which he can recover in case of her injury through another's negligence. Mr. Justice Stiles said: "At common law, when a wife was injured through the tort of a third person, the injury and the right of action were hers; but she could not sue unless her husband, if living, joined her as plaintiff. The recovery in that case was the pecuniary measure of her own injury and suffering in body and mind. But there was another element of damages which could be recovered only by her husband suing alone in a separate action viz., his loss of her services, and his outlay in restoring her to health. In this case the complaint seems to have been based upon the idea that he could also recover for the society, companionship, and solace of his wife; but we do not understand these to be recoverable injuries. As matter of fact, unless death ensues, the husband is not deprived of either, although his enjoyment of them may be lessened by the knowledge of his wife's suffering. They are of those sentimental, intangible injuries which the law cannot measure. Even in cases of death, they are not elements of damage."

Character of injury sustaining right.

While the great majority of the cases discussed in this note, as will be inferred from its title, embrace those where the husband has lost the consortium of his wife through some personal injury to her, it is not to be implied in any way that his right to recover for a loss of her consortium is restricted to the extent of depriving him of the right where he loses her companionship and society through other means.

Thus, Ainley v. Manhattan R. Co. 47 Hun, 206, discloses that an endeavor was made to show that the doctrine that a husband is entitled to recover damages for the loss of society of his wife is applicable only to actions for seduction, "where the defendant has run away with the wife, and actually deprived the plaintiff of her company." The court, in deciding otherwise, used the following language: "We are not aware that the rule is thus restricted. The rule is that, if the husband is entitled to the assistance and society of his wife, he is entitled to recover damages against a party who unjustly deprives him of such assistance and society; and there does not seem to be any reason, if the fact exists that he has been deprived of such assistance and society by the act of another, why he should not recover as well where such deprivation has been the result of the negligence of the defendant, as where such deprivations have been caused by the enticing away of the wife."

In Lyons v. New York City R. Co. 49 Misc. 517, 97 N. Y. Supp. 1033, it was held that the "loss of society" mentioned in an act giving jurisdiction to a municipal court of an action "to recover damages for a personal injury or for loss of services . . . excepting . . . loss of society of husband or wife" refers only to actions founded upon an intentional injury to the consortium, and not to an unintentional act, as negligence, which may result in a loss both of services and society, and did not deprive that court of jurisdiction in the case at bar.

A husband has been permitted to recover damages for the loss of his wife's society and services due to the selling of laudanum to her despite his protests and warnings. Holleman v. Harward, 119 N. C. 150, 34 L.R.A. 803, 56 Am. St. Rep. 672, 25 S. E. 972, wherein Montgomery, J., said: "A married woman still owes to her husband, notwithstanding her greatly improved legal status, the duty of companionship and of rendering all such services in his home as her relations of wife and mother require of her."

Likewise has he been permitted to recover where the defendant secretly sold the wife laudanum, to the destruction of her in-

Prentice J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court included in its judgment in telleet and the impairment of her health, when he knew she was using it as a beverage. Hoard v. Peck, 56 Barb. 202.

And for an injury caused his wife by the malpractice of a physician and surgeon he has been allowed to recover. Melwhirter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, 20 Am. Rep. 618.

Extent of right.

The husband's right of recovery is limited to a pecuniary compensation for the loss of consortium with his wife, and the expenses he was put to by reason of her injuries. Chicago & M. Electric R. Co. v. Krempel, 116 Ill. App. 253.

And he is entitled to recover for his future loss of consortium as well. Union P. R. Co. v. Jones, 21 Colo. 340, 40 Pac. 891; Hopkins v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 36 N. H. 14, 72 Am. Dec. 287; London v. Cunningham, 1 Misc. 408, 20 N. Y. Supp. 882; Kimberly v. Howland, 143 N. C. 398, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 545, 55 S. E. 778.

But where there was no evidence that the loss of the wife's service and society would continue beyond the trial and into the future, and no data whatever was afforded by the evidence upon which the jury could assess the extent or quantum of future damages to plaintiff from the future loss of such service and society, it was held that the husband could not recover anything for future loss. Birmingham Southern R. Co. v. Lintner, 141 Ala. 420, 109 Am. St. Rep. 40, 38 So. 363, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 461.

So, the wife's contributory fault may constitute a defense to an action by a husband for the loss of her society and her aid, etc., although the statutes have emancipated her from many common-law disabilities, and relieved the husband from responsibility for civil injuries committed by her. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Honey, 26 L.R.A. 42, 12 C. C. A. 190, 27 U. S. App. 196, 63 Fed. 39, reversing 59 Fed. 423.

As a factor in mitigation of the damages which a husband may be entitled to, the jury may consider any evidence which favor of the plaintiff husband a sum for his loss of consortium. The right of consortium has had modern definition which limits it to a right growing out of the marriage relation, which the husband and wife have, respectively, to the society, companionship, and affection of each other in their life together. By this definition it is clearly intended to distinguish the right to consortium from that to services. Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 89 N. E. 436. Such was not the common-law use of the term. In its original application it was used to designate a right which the law recognized in a husband, growing out of the marital union, to have performance by the wife of all those duties and obligations in respect to him tends to show that the husband did not avail himself of the companionship and society of his wife. Sullivan v. Lowell & D. Street R. Co. 162 Mass. 530, 39 N. E. 185.

"The husband . . . has a legal right to the society of the wife," said McClellan, Ch. J., in Birmingham Southern R. Co. v. Lintner, "involving all the amenities and conjugal incidents of the relation. This right of society may be invaded by an act which, while leaving to the husband the presence of the wife, yet incapacitates her for the marital companionship and fellowship; and such incapacity may be deprivation of her society, differing in degree only from total deprivation by her death. For such impairment, so to say, of the wife's society, of his right of consortium,—such deprivation of the aid and comfort which the wife's society, as a thing different from mere services, is supposed to involve,—he is entitled to recover."

In Furnish v. Missouri P. R. Co. 102 Mo. 669, 22 Am. St. Rep. 800, 15 S. W. 315, the defendant claimed that the trial court erred by instructing the jury "to allow the plaintiff such sum as the evidence showed would compensate him for the 'loss of society and companionship of his wife.'" The objection was placed upon two grounds: It was first asserted that there was no loss to the plaintiff of the society or companionship of his wife, because, though injured, she was yet with him, and he therefore had the benefit of her society. But here is what the court said: "But the answer to that first contention is that, as her husband, he was entitled to her society as she was when the negligence of defendant impaired her strength, her health, and her usefulness as a helpmate. Though he may still be with her, and her companionship may be even more dear to him since her injury, because of her very helplessness and need of his attention, yet that does not diminish the legal wrong he has suffered from the acts which produced that condition. He is entitled to be compensated for such loss of her society as resulted from the negligence alleged. By the term 'so-which she took upon herself when she entered into it. The meaning of the term as thus employed has remained its common-law meaning. As thus employed it includes the right to society, companionship, and conjugal affection, and the law has from early days recognized the right of a husband to have recovery in damages for the loss of these incidents of the marital relation when he was deprived of them by certain acts regarded as necessarily destructive of them. Wilton v. Webster, 7 Car. & P. 198, 201; Weedon v. Timbrell, 5 T. R. 357, 360. Acts, on the other hand, whose natural consequence was the diminution or impairment of these incidents, and whose necessary consequence was not their loss, were not regarded as furnishing a right of action. Lellis v. Lambert, 24 Ont. App. Rep. 653, 654; Houghton v. Rice, 174 Mass. 366, 368, 47 L.R.A. 310, 75 Am. St. Rep. 351, 54 N. E. 843.

But the right of consortium was by no means fully expressed in the terms of society, companionship, and conjugal affection. The right to service was a prominent factor in it, and in respect to certain kinds of injuries, without doubt, the predominant factor. If we go back to the times when it took on its meaning, the conditions were that the wife was socially and legally regarded as the husband's inferior, as having her existence merged into that of her husband, and as owing to him the duty, which he was entitled to command, of serving and administering to him in all the reciety' in this connection, is meant such capacities for usefulness, aid, and comfort as a wife, which she possessed at the time of the injury. Any diminution of those capacities by the acts or negligent omissions of defendant constituted a just basis for an award of compensatory damages therefor. . . . Next it is urged that, as no evidence was offered of the value of the wife's society, the instruction should not have been given. To this it may be said that the nature of the subject does not admit of direct proof of value, and that, when the fact of loss of society is established by testimony, the assessment of reasonable compensation therefor must necessarily be committed to the sound discretion and judgment of the triers of fact."

The fact that the wife in her own right brings an action and recovers for a personal injury sustained by her is no bar to an action by the husband for expenses for her care and cure, and loss of her services and consortium. Duffee v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 191 Mass. 563, 77 N. E. 1036; Smith v. St. Joseph, 55 Mo. 456, 17 Am. Rep. 660; Selleck v. Janesville, 104 Wis. 570, 47 L.R.A. 691, 76 Am. St. Rep. 892, 80 N. W. 944.

In Blair v. Bloomington & N. R. Electric & Heating Co. infra, where the wife had recovered damages for her injuries in a prior action, and the defendant attempted to set that up as a bar to the husband's action, as well as sought refuge in the statute, supra, the court said that it was unable to see how the statute affected the determination of the question, and continued: "The judgment against appellee in the suit of Lillian Blair is conclusive as to all of the elements of damages recoverable by her; but if appellant also suffered damage resulting from the injury to her, which was personal to himself, and such as could not have been recovered by her in her suit, the judgment in her suit is not conclusive as to such damages recoverable by him. The mere fact that a wife pursues an independent calling does not absolve her from the performance of marital duties of service and consortium owing to her husband. If the pursuit by a wife of an independent calling wholly prevents her from performing any service for her husband, or affording him any companionship, then he can have suffered no substantial damage in those respects by her injury; but to the extent, much or little, that her injury has in fact deprived him of her services and consortium, he is entitled to be compensated in damages."

Nor is a recovery by the plaintiff for the injury to his person a bar to an action by him to recover for the loss of the society and services of his wife, and for expenses in effecting her cure, caused by the injury to her in the same accident. Skoglund v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 45 Minn. 330, 11 L.R.A. 222, 22 Am. St. Rep. 733, 47 N. W. 1071.

Right as affected by statute.

Modern legislation which has so greatly affected the status of married women by recognizing their right to a separate existence, entitling them to the ownership of their property, giving them ability to contract, power to control their earnings, and endowing them with the capacity to sue or be sued, has not, according to the great weight of authority, although MARRI V. STAMFORD STREET R. Co. is to the contrary, abridged in anywise the common-law right of a husband to the companionship, love, and service of his wife which is comprehended by the term "consortium," and his attendant right to sue therefor in the event of its loss through some personal injury to her.

Indeed it has been said that positive and explicit legislation is necessary in order to deprive the husband of his right to sue for the loss of the society of his wife. Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Chollette, 41 Neb. 578, 59 N. W. 921; Mewhirter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, 20 Am. Rep. 618.

In Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Chollette, supra, where the husband brought an action to recover for the loss, among other items, of his wife's society, etc., through a personal injury to her, the trial judge relations of domestic life. Her emancipation of recent years was centuries in the future. She was looked upon as the servant of and ministrant to her liege lord, to whom and to whose interests she was, by virtue of her marriage vow, devoted. He was entitled to her services, and these she was expected to render in the care of his home, in the rearing of his children, and in attending upon his wants. The solace and comfort which she was expected to bestow were in part, at least, that which would naturally flow from her rendition of this service, and her society, companionship, and affection as a faithful and loving wife would naturally have their fruition in a faithful performance of it. The services which the law had in contemplation were not so much those which resulted in wages earned, or from the mere performance of labor, as those which found their expression at the domestic fireside, and in all manner of aid, assistance, and helpfulness in all the relations of domestic life. "The word 'service' has come to us in this connection from the times in which the action originated, and it implies whatever of aid, assistance, comfort, and society the wife would be expected to render to or bestow upon her husband under the circumstances and in the condition in which they may be placed, whatever those may be." 1 Cooley, Torts 471.

The law's conception of the claim which the husband had upon the wife, and of his right growing out of the marital relation, stricted the jury to a consideration of the extent to which her injuries had incapacitated her from "performing all the duties of a wife that reasonably devolved upon her in the marriage relation," and it was held that to this extent the husband could recover, notwithstanding the married women's act.

As said in Mewhirter v. Hatten, supra, on a precisely similar question: "We feel very clear that the legislature did not intend by this section of the statute to release and discharge the wife from her common-law and scriptural obligation and duty to be a 'helpmeet' to her husband. If such a construction were to be placed upon the statute, then the wife would have a right of action against the husband for any domestic service or assistance rendered by her as wife. For her assistance in the care, nurture, and training of his children, she could bring her action for compensation. She would be under no obligation to superintend or look after any of the affairs of the household unless her husband paid her wages for so doing. Certainly, such consequences were not intended by the legislature, and we cannot so hold, in the absence of positive and explicit legislation."

Likewise in Birmingham Southern R. Co. v. Lintner, 141 Ala. 420, 109 Am. St. Rep. 40, 38 So. 303, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 461, where the statute provided that "the earnings of the wife are her separate property; but she is not entitled to compensation for services rendered to or for the husband, or to or for the family," it was said: "The whole scope and purpose of this enactment manifestly is to vest in the wife her earnings in services rendered to third persons, strangers to the household. It in no degree emancipates her from her household duties, nor authorizes her to enter upon such alien service as would conflict with and prevent the performance of her duties incident to the domestic establishment,—the care, comfort, and convenience of the family,—the duties, in short, which, before the statute, she owed to the husband as the husband and head of the family. These duties she owes now just as she did at the common law; and while the husband may allow her to premit them and engage wholly or to any less extent in outside service the earnings of which belong to her, without such emancipation by the husband, she owes these services to him now as before, and for any wrongful act of a stranger which deprives him of them, he is entitled to recover for the consequent loss and injury."

Thus it has been specifically held that the husband's right at common law to recover for loss of his right to the society of his wife is not affected by statutory provisions to the effect:

—that a married woman may receive, use, and possess her own earnings, and sue for the same in her own name, free from the interference of her husband or creditors. Blair v. Bloomington & N. R. Electric & Heating Co. 130 Ill. App. 400; Chicago & M. Electric R. Co. v. Krempel, 116 Ill. App. 253.

—that the "earnings of the wife are her own separate property; but she is not entitled to compensation for services rendered to or for her husband, or to or for the family." Birmingham Southern R. Co. v. Lintner, supra; Southern R. Co. v. Crowder, 135 Ala. 417, 33 So. 335.

—that "the earnings of any married woman from her trade, business, labor, or services shall be her sole and separate property, and may be used and invested by her in her own name." Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Chollette, 41 Neb. 578, 59 N. W. 921; Riley v. Lidtke, 49 Neb. 139, 68 N. W. 356; London v. Cunningham, 1 Misc. 408, 20 N. Y. Supp. 882.

—that the "wife may receive the wages of her personal labor, and maintain an action therefor in her own name, and hold the same in her own right." Mewhirter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, 20 Am. Rep. 618; McKinney v. Western Stage Co. 4 Iowa, 420.

—that the wife is given the right to her earnings from future "separate labor." Kirkpatrick v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 129 Mo. App. 524, 107 S. W. 1025; Par- which entered into the meaning of the word "consortium" to express that right as the subject of invasion by wrongdoing was thus one which embraced the right to service as a distinct factor; and there was no attempt to disassociate the right to society, companionship, and affection from it. All these rights were bound together in social and legal contemplation, and they were bound together in the law's expression of them. In some cases, as where the wrong was criminal conversation, the loss of conjugal society and affection might stand out and be emphasized as the pre-eminent and perhaps sole basis of recovery. In others, as in actions growing out of personal injuries, the loss of service would present itself as the predominant factor. The law has, however, never been solicitous to distinguish between these different elements of damage or to separate them, and there will be found few cases indeed, and we think no one of the earlier ones, in which the husband's loss was regarded as one into which the element of service did not enter. The pleadings in the early cases, and the language of the opinions in them, clearly show that loss of services as well as society and affection were included in the legal meaning of the loss of "consortium." 1 Chitty, Pl. 49; 3

Chitty, Pl. 417; Guy v. Lusy, 2 Rolle. Rep. 51; Russell v. Corne, 2 Ld. Raym. 1031, 1 Salk. 119, 6 Mod. 127, Holt, K. B. 699; Guy v. Livesey, Cro. Jac. 501; Hyde v. Scyssor, Cro. Jac. 538. The older and more recent text writers unite in stating that in an action per quod consortium amisit recovery might properly be had for the husband's loss, whether it partook of the one character or the other. 1 Bacon, Abr. 502; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 63; Tiffany, Persons & Dom. Rel. 77; Kinkead, Torts, § 499.

It does not clearly appear whether the trial court in the present case used the term in defining the basis upon which recovery was allowed in the narrow sense of the definition first stated, or in the more correct and comprehensive sense. That is, however, a matter of small present importance. But it is important in an examination of the development of the law relating to the general subject under consideration to bear in mind that within the legal meaning of consortium are embraced as well those incidents of the marital relation which center about service, and thus possess a practical and material value to a husband, as those which are associated with what, for want of a better term, we say designate as its tello v. Missouri, P. R. Co. 141 Mo. App. 162, 107 S. W. 473.

—that "every married woman shall have the same rights and remedies, and shall be subject to the same liabilities, in relation to property held by her in her own right, as if she were unmarried; and may make contracts, and sue and be sued, in all matters in law and equity, and upon any contract by her made, or for any wrong by her done, as if she were unmarried." Booth v. Manchester Street R. Co. 73 N. H. 529, 63 Atl. 578.

—that "neither husband nor wife has any interest in the property of the other 'except' dower in real estate." Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn, 66 Ohio St. 395, 64 N. E. 438.

The established law in Pennsylvania, notwithstanding any statutory provisions entitling the wife to her earnings, or giving her control over her property, is to the effect that the husband is still entitled to compensation for the loss of her aid, assistance, comfort, and society, caused by the negligence of others. Reagan v. Harlan, 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 27, citing Platz v. McKean Twp. 178 Pa. 301, 36 Atl. 136; Kelley v. Mayberry Twp. 154 Pa. 440, 26 Atl. 595; Henry v. Klopfer, 147 Pa. 178, 23 Atl. 337, 338, in which latter cases no reference was made to any statutes. And in Hewitt v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 228 Pa. 397, 77 Atl. 623, and McMeekin v. Pittsburgh R. Co. 229 Pa. 572, 79 Atl. 133, this right of the husband is held to be established without any mention of any statute. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

So, in Massachusetts, although the husband's control over the person or property of his wife has been reduced to a minimum, if it has not entirely disappeared (Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 77 N. E. 890, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 658), he still retains the unmodified right to her conjugal society, and may recover damages for injuries to her person through the wrongs of others. Duffee v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 191 Mass. 563, 77 N. E. 1035; Sullivan v. Lowell & D. Street R. Co. 162 Mass. 538, 39 N. E. 185; Kelley v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 168 Mass. 308, 38 L.R.A. 631, 60 Am. St. Rep. 397, 43 N. E. 1063, wherein it was said: "Notwithstanding the progress of legislation in giving to married women the control of their time and actions, this right of the husband is not destroyed. The unity and identity of interest which, by the common law, existed between husband and wife, have been impaired. . . . They are not, however, entirely done away with. The husband's right to compel his wife to work for him is abridged, but he still has a right to her society and assistance, which is different in character and degree from that which other people have, or which she is at liberty to give to them. By marriage, both husband and wife take upon themselves certain duties and obligation towards each other, in sickness and health, which it cannot be supposed that the legislature has intended wholly to uproot. A married woman may now perform any labor or services on her sole and separate sentimental side, and are expressed in the terms of affection, solace, comfort, companionship, and society wholly unrelated to service.

The common law has long recognized the right of a husband to recover damages for his loss of consortium in the comprehensive sense of that word, as for an injury to him in respect to his relative rights, when that loss was the consequence of certain wrongful acts done to or in relation to his wife. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 139, states the law as it had been established by the courts at the time when he wrote, as follows: "Injuries that may be offered to a person, considered as a husband, are principally three: Abduction, or taking away a man's wife; adultery, or criminal conversation with her; and beating or otherwise abusing her. . . . The third injury is that of beating a man's wife, or otherwise ill-using her; for which, if it be a common assault, battery, or imprisonment, the law gives the usual remedy to recover damages, by action of trespass vi et armis, which must be brought in the names of the husband and wife jointly; but if the beating or other maltreatment be very enormous, so that thereby the husband is deprived for any time of the company and assistance of his wife, the law gives him a separate remedy by an action of trespass, in the nature of an action on the case, for this ill usage, per quod consortium amisit, in which he shall recover a satisfaction in damages." Similar statements of the law are made by later writers. 1 Bacon, Abr. 502; 1 Chitty, Pl. 49.

The first two of the grounds of action enumerated by Blackstone present the same general aspects, in that the wrong is one which is done directly and primarily to the husband, and one which strikes at the very foundation of the conjugal relation, and is necessarily destructive of all of its benefits. The reason of the rule, from the standpoint of the common law, that these wrongs, having this consequence, should give to the husband a right of action against the offender for a recovery measured by the loss to him of all those benefits, including service and society, is apparent. An action, however, could not, until recent years, be maintained in the wife's favor under reversed conditions. The common-law reasons for this are found in the unity of persons created by a marriage, the superior position of the husband in the eye of the law, the status of married women under the law, and the fact that recovery account, as her husband may; nevertheless, each owes certain duties to the other which are not annulled by the statutes. Mewharter v. Hatten, 42 Iowa, 288, 20 Am. Rep. 618. These duties are included in the word 'consortium.'"

Now, however, since the decision in Bolger v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 205 Mass. 420, 91 N. E. 389, it may be seriously questioned whether the law upon this point in the commonwealth of Massachusetts remains as stated in the preceding cases. The case of Bolger v. Boston Elev. R. Co. supra, is not directly within the scope of the present note, since the action was brought by the husband to recover for the loss of his wife's consortium, etc., where death ensued, and belongs to the note to Sherlag v. Kelley, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 633. However, the court decided in that case that the husband could recover only for the expenses he was put to in his endeavor to cure the wife, and straightway followed Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, wherein it was held that a wife cannot recover for loss of consortium, against a stranger, for negligently injuring her husband physically and mentally, so that his companionship is less satisfactory and valuable than before the injury, where he has a right to recover full compensation in his own name. Nor did the court stop there. It went further, and said: "We do not see why the case of Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra, is not decisive of this case. No valid distinction can be drawn between the husband's right to recover for the loss of his wife's consortium, in cases growing out of the negligence of a third party, and the wife's right to recover for loss of the husband's consortium in like cases. Neither can it make any difference that, in the case of the wife, the loss of consortium is or may be the sole ground of recovery, and in the case of the husband it is or may be one of several grounds of recovery."

That the husband has a separate right of action to recover damages for the loss of services and consortium of his wife occasioned by her injury is the settled law of this and other jurisdictions. Blair v. Bloomington & N. R. Electric & Heating Co. 130 Ill. App. 400.

Where the husband and wife join in an action to recover for personal injuries to the latter it has been held that, under the Iowa statute (Rev. Stat. 1860, § 2771), the husband may join a claim in his own name and recover for the loss of his wife's society. McDonald v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Iowa, 124, 96 Am. Dec. 114. This holding, it will be observed, is contrary to the rule as established under the common law.

So, in Casewell v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 69 N. J. L. 226, 54 Atl. 565, it was held that the husband and wife may sue together for personal injuries received by the latter, and in the action he may recover, among other items, compensation for the deprivation of the society of his wife.

in such an action would inure to the benefit of the husband, a partner in the wrong, as a chose in action reduced to possession. "By marriage, the husband and wife are one person in the law; that is, the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated and consolidated into that of the husband, under whose wing, protection, and cover she performs everything."

1 Bl. Com. 442. "We may observe that in these relative injuries notice is only taken of the wrong done to the superior of the parties related, by the breach and dissolution of either the relation itself, or at least the advantages accruing therefrom; while the loss of the inferior by such injuries is totally unregarded. One reason for which may be this: that the inferior has no kind of property in the company, care, or assistance of the superior, as the superior is held to have in those of the inferior, and therefore the inferior can suffer no loss or injury." 3 Bl. Com. 143.

In most of the states of this country alienation of affections, although unaccompanied with criminal conversation or enticing or harboring, has come to be recognized as a wrong to the husband belonging to the same class as the two just considered, both as to its necessary consequences in the destruction of the conjugal relation, and also for that reason in its legal consequence as furnishing the husband a ground for an action to recover for the loss of consortium, whether that loss be that of services or society, or both. Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 6 L.R.A. 829, 18 Am. St. Rep. 258, 18 Atl. 1027; Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 643, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 77 N. E. 890, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 658; Fratini v. Caslini, 66 Vt. 273, 44 Am. St. Rep. 843, 29 Atl. 252; Cross v. Grant, 62 N. H. 675, 13 Am. St. Rep. 607. The courts which recognize the alienation of a wife's affections as a wrong to the husband, justifying an action, view it in the same light as did the common-law abduction and adultery, and treat it in the same way. The logic of this is apparent.

Blackstone's third class includes only cases in which personal injuries actionable in trespass are inflicted upon the wife. The situation presented in such cases, as bearing upon an injury to the relative rights of a husband, is very different from that which results from a wrong falling within one of the other two classes. The former are not only not destructive of the marital relation, but they have no tendency to even impair it. They are not calculated to change the feelings of the parties toward each other, to diminish their love and affection, to lessen the sweetness of their companionship, or to weaken the desire to do all that is incumbent upon the parties to a marital union. Their result is to impair physical capacity, and, in so far as the husband is concerned, to diminish the ability of the wife to render to and bestow upon him that aid and help, and those ministrations which, in health, she would be able to render and bestow. The disposition of mind remains unchanged, but the injuries received set limitations upon the ability to perform. The consequences to the husband are only those which flow from an impairment of physical capacity in the wife, and in no manner from a change of the mental and moral attitude, which means a destruction of the marital relation in all respects save form.

Since Blackstone's day there has been an extension of the common-law right of a husband to recover for loss of consortium to cases in which the personal injury sustained by the wife was the result of negligence, so that it is generally held that it makes no difference whether the injury is intentionally or negligently inflicted. 1 Cooley, Torts, 469, and cases cited in note. It is not difficult to understand how this latter extension came about. From a modern point of view the classification, early made, of batteries with abduction and criminal conversation as wrongs furnishing a husband a right of action against the wrongdoer for loss of consortium, is less apparent, since there is no clear connection between the two classes of wrongs, and since in the latter class the loss of society, companionship, and affection does not appear to be present as a natural consequence of the wrong. Loss or impairment of conjugal affection is certainly not a natural result of physical injuries suffered by one of the parties to a marital union. Neither is there to be expected an impairment in other ways of the conjugal relation viewed from its sentimental, as distinguished from its practical, side. It is scarcely to be imagined that the law, in the early stages of its development, had any notion of assuming that a physical injury to a wife would be attended with such consequences as these, or of justifying an inquiry whether, in the given case, such consequences had actually arisen, or of attempting to measure the pecuniary value of such consequences, and awarding that measure to the husband.

There is, however, a real connection between the natural results of the two classes of wrongs, in that they alike involve a loss of certain of the benefits which attach to the marital relation. It may not be the same benefit, or the same degree of that benefit, in one case as in the other. But that benefit is one which is embraced within the comprehensive term "consortium." It may in one case be a benefit whose essence is service, and in another, one which flows, chiefly or entirely, from the purely personal relation, and is founded in affection and mutual regard. But in either event it is a loss which lies in the same general field.

There is another common ground in that, as we have seen, service, in the early common-law conception, was a pre-eminent feature of a husband's marital rights, and one around which centered others which impress the modern mind as being limited to the sentimental rather than extended to embrace the useful and practical aspects of marriage. There can be little doubt that it was these useful and practical incidents, embodied in the idea of service, and the capacity to render in a useful and helpful way aid, assistance, and co-operation, which the law originally regarded, and has continued to regard, as pre-eminently the foundation of recovery in personal-injury cases where there was loss or impairment thereof. It was these which had their natural origin in physical impairment, and it was therefore necessarily these which the law must have had in contemplation when the right to recover in personal-injury cases as for an injury to the husband was recognized. But that fact furnishes no reason why the loss should not have been treated as that of consortium. The confusion which has apparently grown up has arisen not from the use of this term, but from the repetition of familiar defining phrases without proper discrimination between their different phases as appropriate to differing conditions.

An examination of the multitude of cases in which recovery by the husband for loss of consortium resulting from personal injuries has been approved, and especially the earlier and better considered of them, discloses that the loss of service and the capacity for service resulting from diminished or destroyed ability to serve in useful ways has been the real basis of recovery. Search for a case of that character in which it has been held, either directly or by reasonable implication, that a husband could recover for the simple reason that conjugal affection, society, or companionship had been rendered less agreeable or satisfactory to the husband by reason of an injury to his wife, will, we think, bear small fruit. There are, indeed personal-injury cases in which the familiar general language descriptive of consortium, and including all its varied elements pertinent to one situation or another, is repeated. Color is, doubtless, thus given to the proposition that the basis of recovery in the one class of cases is in its practical application the same as in the other. But these will be found to be hasty expressions borrowed from one set of conditions for use in another, without thought as to whether all the enumerated elements had direct pertinence to the situation under consideration.

It is quite inconceivable that the law which has set its face steadfastly against a recovery by a husband where the conjugal relation had been disturbed by the intrusion of an admirer upon the society, attentions, and regard of the wife, so that the companionship and marital relations of the married pair had been rendered less pleasant and agreeable to the husband, and the law which has been reluctant to recognize a right of action where the affections of the wife had been alienated, should early concede the right of recovery where there had been only such impairment of conjugal relations, pure and simple, as would result from a diminution of physical powers due to personal disability. Lellis v. Lambert, 24 Ont. App. Rep. 653, 654; Houghton v. Rice, 174 Mass. 366, 368, 47 L.R.A. 310, 75 Am. St. Rep. 351, 54 N. E. 843.

Such has been the history of the development of the common law in relation to the matter in question, and such the state of the law prior to the comparatively recent statutes regulating the status and rights of married women. Counsel for the defendant contends that the changes thus accomplished in this jurisdiction remove all foundation for the common-law principle, in so far as it justifies a recovery for the loss of consortium, in any sense of that term, resulting from personal injuries inflicted upon a wife. As incidental to his argument he asserts that these changes have placed the two parties to a marriage in equal positions in respect to the right of recovery for a loss of service, society, or companionship as a result of personal injuries to the other, so that, if one of them is entitled to recover, the other, under reversed conditions, must be.

In Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 6 L.R.A. 829, 18 Am. St. Rep. 258, 18 Atl. 1027, a case which grew out of a marriage contracted before the statute (Pub. Acts. 1877, chap. 114, p. 211) was enacted, we said that, as the parties to a marriage stood upon an equality in so far as their right to its incidents of conjugal society and affection were concerned, we were unable to discover why the right of a wife to sue for the loss of those incidents as the result of an alienation of affections should not be the same as that of the husband under like conditions. We now have a somewhat different question presented, and it is presented under conditions which have been materially affected by the legislation of 1877. We are not now dealing with the sentimental side of the conjugal relation. If we were, the decision in Foot v. Card, supra, would furnish authority for the preliminary proposition that a husband now stands before the law in the same position as to a right of action growing out of a loss within that field. We are, however, concerned with the more material side of the marital union,—with the side which represents practical results expressed in the terms of service. In Mathewson v. Mathewson, 79 Conn. 23, 32, 35, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 611, 63 Atl. 285, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1027, we had occasion to review at length the changes which had been wrought in the legal status of married women by comparatively recent legislation in this state, culminating in the act of 1877, and to note the marked character of the results which must attend them. In this connection we observed that this legislation had removed the foundation of the formed legal status, namely, the unity in the husband of his own and his wife's legal identity and capacity to own property, and laid a new foundation; namely, the equality of husband and wife in legal identity and capacity of owning property. We said that this was in the nature of fundamental legislation, involving all the results necessarily owing from the principle established; that in enacting it the state adopted a fundamental change of public policy; and that the new legal status must be administered in accordance with that policy. That case immediately concerned contractual rights. But its language is equally appropriate to all the rights of married women who come under its application. Her identity is no longer merged in that of her husband. She is recognized as having a complete legal entity of her own, with rights of her own, and enforceable as her own. She is no longer looked upon as the servant of a master to whom she owes the duties of a servant. Her place before the law is one of equal dignity with that of her husband. She owes duties to her husband; he in like manner owes similar ones to her. These duties include those of both helpfulness and love. He has no monopoly of rights, and she has come into a position in which her rights are recognized, and will be enforced. Under such conditions the conclusion is irresistible that whatever right the one party to a marriage relation should have to recover for the loss of whatever incidents of that relation fall within the field of either service or society and companionship should likewise be recognized in the other.

The question then remains whether the law shall say that both husband and wife are entitled to maintain an action for loss of consortium when the other sustains at the hands of a third person personal injuries, not accidental, resulting in physical impairment, or that neither can do so. As the result of the legal status created for those who come under the operation of the act of 1877 it seems clear that in an action to recover for personal injuries to a wife, compensation can be obtained for the resultant physical impairment and disability as fully and to the same extent as in an action by a husband, where he is the person personally injured. This impairment and disability necessarily includes diminution or destruction of the capacity to serve or help in all practical ways. This being so, and the foundation of the husband's former recovery being essentially grounded, as we have seen it was, in the impairment of the wife's capacity for service and usefulness, it follows quite inevitably that the wife's recovery must be regarded as exclusive, except, of course, as to expenses which the husband may have been called upon to incur by reason of the wife's injury. The right to recover these rests upon a different basis.

Some courts, in their efforts to justify the ancient rule as applied to modern conditions, have attempted to draw a distinction between a wife's capacity for productive service in employment or business and capacity for service within the domain of domestic helpfulness and assistance; permitting recovery by the wife for the former and by the husband for the latter. This distinction carries legal refinement too far into the region of the impractical in an attempt to save a principle which does not belong to conditions which now exist in this state, at least, and rests upon grounds by no means satisfactory.

If it be said that this reasoning ignores the fact that a husband may, as the result of the disability of his wife, be injured in that her society and companionship are thereby rendered less agreeable and satisfactory and his married life less pleasant, and that the court ought at least to discover if such is not the case, and award him compensation for whatever he may have suffered in that way, the answer is that the law has never undertaken any such investigations, has never countenanced any attempt to measure pecuniarily such a loss, and, as we have seen, has never recognized in the mere impairment of conjugal relations, pure and simple, the foundation of a right of action. Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 89 N. E. 436.

We are of the opinion that the reason for the former rule no longer exists, and that it should cease to have recognition. "Where the reason of the law fails, the law ceases to operate." Mathewson v. Mathewson, 79 Conn. 23, 26, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 611, 63 Atl. 285, 286, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1027. The court was therefore in error in allowing the plaintiff the sum of $300 or any sum for loss of consortium, and it would not matter whether the allowance was for loss of what is termed service or society, or both.

There is error in part, the judgment is set aside, and the cause remanded, with direction to the Superior Court to render a judgment for the amount of $1,418 damages.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

HUGH H. CARROLL, Appt.,
v.
VILLAGE OF ELMWOOD et al.
(88 Neb. 352, 129 N. W. 537.)

Dedication — fee — products of soil.

Where land is platted for and dedicated to city or village purposes in accordance with the provision of article 1 of chapter 14 of the Compiled Statutes of 1909, the city or village acquires the ownership of the streets, alleys, and public grounds in fee simple, and an abutting lot owner cannot maintain an action against the city or village to recover the value of the natural products of the soil, grown upon the surface of an adjacent street which has been converted to the use of the municipality.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action by a lot owner in the village of Elmwood to recover the value of the grass or hay grown on a street of the village adjacent to his lots, and appropriated by the village trustees to the use of the corporation.

It appears that in the month of July, 1886, the owners of the land on which the village of Elmwood is situated duly caused the same to be surveyed and platted, and the plat acknowledged in the manner provided by §§ 8980, 8981, Cobbe's Anno. Stat. 1909. After such acknowledgment, they duly filed the plat, for record as therein provided, and thus dedicated the streets, alleys, and public grounds, as shown in said plat, to the public use as and for the village of Elmwood; that thereupon said village was organized, and has existed and exercised the powers and duties of a municipal corporation from thence to the present time; that the plaintiff had purchased, and at the time of the commencement of this action owned, certain lots in the said village abutting upon one of the public streets so dedicated as aforesaid; that in

The owner of cattle, therefore, who is not an abutting owner, cannot justify turning them on the highway for the purpose of grazing. Woodruff v. Neal, 28 Conn. 165; Stackpole v. Healy, 16 Mass. 33, 8 Am. Dec. 121; Jewett v. Gage, 55 Me. 538, 92 Am. Dec. 615; Campau v. Konan, 39 Mich. 362; Bertwhistle v. Goodrich, 53 Mich. 457, 19 N. W. 143; *Robinson v. Flint & P. M. If he does so, he is liable to the abutting owner in an action of trespass. Stackpole v. Healy, 16 Mass. 33, 8 Am. Dec. 121; Harrison v. Brown, 5 Wis. 27.

In 22 Edw. IV., 8, pl. 24, it was said by one of the court that "if one drive a herd of cattle along the highway, where trees, or wheat, or any other kind of corn is growing, if one of the beasts take a parcel of the corn, if it be against the will of the driver, he may well justify, for the law will intend that a man cannot govern them at all times as he would; but if he permitted them, or continued them, etc., then it is otherwise."

In Caulkins v. Mathews, 5 Kan. 191, though it was not necessary to pass on the right to grass growing on the highway, the court said: "How a public road on the defendant's land would give the plaintiff any right to pasture his horse outside of the road we cannot see. It is questionable even whether the plaintiff would have any right to pasture his horse in the road itself. It is hardly to be supposed that the legislature, by authorizing the laying out and establishing of roads and highways, or even by passing laws regulating the running at large of stock, intended thereby to 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

make public pasture fields of the public highways; and it is very questionable whether they have the right to do so, even if they should so desire. Such an act would at least be a very novel exercise of the right of eminent domain. Men may pass and repass with their stock upon the public highways, but we think that that is the extent of their right."

No private person but the owner of the fee has the right to carry away herbage growing on the road. Gamble v. Pettijohn, 116 Mo. 375, 22 S. W. 783 (dictum); Cole v. Drew, 44 Vt. 49, 8 Am. Rep. 363.

Neither has a town the right to cut and carry away herbage from the side of the highway. Adams v. Emerson, 6 Pick. 57; Curtis v. Kesteven County Council, L. R. 45 Ch. Div. 504, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 103, 63 L. T. N. S. 543, 39 Week. Rep. 199.

And it is liable in trespass if it does so. Adams v. Emerson, supra.

The owner of land adjoining a highway, and who owns to the center thereof, has a right to depasture his land in the highway. Parker v. Jones, 1 Allen, 270; Robinson v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 79 Mich. 323, 19 Am. St. Rep. 174, 44 N. W. 779; Avery v. Maxwell, 4 N. H. 36; Holden v. Shattuck, 34 Vt. 336, 80 Am. Dec. 684.

A strip of grass left to grow in a rural or country road on the side of the beaten track belongs to the owner of the fee, and he has the right to harvest it. People v. Foss, 80 Mich. 559, 8 L.R.A. 472, 20 Am. St. Rep. 532, 45 N. W. 480.

A person has no right from mere caprice or express malice to drive upon and destroy a strip of grass growing between the two ditches on the sides of a highway, in the space usually known as the wrought or traveled part of the road, but outside the beaten or traveled path, on the portion of which another person owns the fee. Ibid.

The owner of that part of the highway on which grass is growing is not guilty of the month of August, 1907, the plaintiff cut the grass growing upon the street on which his lots abutted; that immediately thereafter the trustees of the village caused the same to be removed without the consent of the plaintiff, and converted it to the use of the corporation. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action in the justice court of Cass county to recover the value of the grass or hay thus appropriated, the defendants had judgment, and the plaintiff appealed to the district court. On the trial, and after the introduction of the evidence, that court directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendants, which was accordingly done. Plaintiff took the proper exceptions, and has brought the case here by appeal, so that the sole question presented by this record is whether, as an abutting owner, the plaintiff can maintain an action to recover the value of the grass or hay which grew naturally upon the surface of the village street.

The plaintiff invokes the common-law rule in support of his contention that he was entitled to recover the value of the grass or hay growing in the village street (the natural production of the soil), appropriated by the defendants, and cites authorities from many of the states where that rule prevails. In § 663 of Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, it is said: "Where the public acquires only the use, and the fee remains in the original proprietor or abutter, the latter is considered to be the owner of the soil for all purposes not inconsistent with the public rights, and may maintain actions accordingly." In this state, however, a different rule prevails. § 8982, Cobbe's Anno. Stat., provides that "the acknowledgment and recording of such plat is equivalent to a deed in fee simple of such portion of the premises platted as assault and battery merely because he pushes away the horses of another who wantonly drives over the grass to destroy it, and defends himself from the latter's subsequent attack. Ibid.

In People v. Foss, supra, the court said: "It may not be desirable that grass should grow and be harvested in the wrought portion of the highway, but when, upon a rural or country road, the travel has been in a uniform beaten track, leaving grass to grow and ripen undisturbed upon the sides of such track, no one but the abutting landowner, who owns the fee, has the right to harvest it; and he can not only maintain trespass or trover against any person cutting and taking it away against his will, but he has the right to protect it against wanton or malicious damage or destruction, whether it is attempted to be done under the guise of travel upon the highway or in some other way. In this case the complaining witness could not have destroyed this grass by turning his cattle upon it to pasture it. Neither, in my opinion, could he drive his horses and wagon upon it to trample it under foot, when it was not at all necessary to do so, and while he knew Foss and his son were at work gathering it. The law does not permit or encourage any 'dog in the manger' business of this kind."

A hedge growing in the public road in such a place as not to inconvenience public travel is not such a nuisance as will justify any person in abating it, and one who cuts it down is liable to the abutting owner in damages. Phifer v. Cox, 21 Ohio St. 248, 8 Am. Rep. 58.

In Shawnee County v. Beckwith, 10 Kan. 603, the court held that when a highway is laid out, nothing passes to the public except what is actually necessary to make the road a good and sufficient thoroughfare for the public; and hence, that a hedge growing within the limits of a newly laid out highway belonged to the owner, which he could remove at pleasure; and that where the cost of removal of the hedge was less than the cost of a new fence, he could only recover the difference. The court said: "The fee in the land never passes to the public, but always continues to belong to the original owner. He continues to own the trees, the grass, the hedges, the fences, the buildings, the mines, quarries, springs, water courses, in fact everything connected with the land over which the road is laid out which is not necessary for the public use as a highway. Angell, Highways, chap. 7, §§ 301 to 312, and cases there cited. He may remove all these things from the road, or use and enjoy them in any other manner he may choose, so long as he does not interfere with the use of the road as a public highway. No other person has any such rights. In fact, the original owner has as complete and absolute dominion over his land, and over everything connected therewith after the road is laid out upon it, as he had before, except only the easement of the public therein. In the present case there is no claim or even pretense that the said hedge was needed for the road."

Constitutionality of statute allowing cattle to graze on highway.

Statutes authorizing the appropriation to the use of anyone having cattle which he may choose to have run at large, of the grass and herbage growing in the highway the fee to which, subject to the public easement of a right of way, is in a private person, without any provision for compensation, would on principle seem to be unconstitutional, since at common law such vegetation is the property of the owner of the fee. Woodruff v. Neal, 28 Conn. 165.

The constitutionality of such statutes has been doubted or denied in cases in which it was not necessary to decide the matter. Campau v. Konan, 39 Mich. 362; Robinson v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 79 Mich. 323, 19 Am. St. Rep. 174, 44 N. W. 779; Tona- is on such plat set apart for streets or other public use, or as is thereon dedicated to charitable, religious, or educational purposes." The law of Iowa on this subject is identical with the section of our statutes above quoted, and in that state it was held that laying off and recording a town plat or an addition thereto, under chapter 41 of the Code of 1851, had the effect to vest in the corporation the fee simple title to an exclusive right of dominion over the streets and alleys thus dedicated to public use, and that in such case neither the original proprietor nor his grantees have the right to the subterraneous deposits of coal within the limits of such street, and the corporation was allowed to maintain an action against the abutting lot owner for coal mined and taken by him from beneath the same. Des Moines v. Hall, 24 Iowa, 234.

In § 664, Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, it is said: "Where, however, the fee or legal title passes from the original proprietor, as in some of the states it is declared it shall, in statutory dedications, and in cases where land is acquired for streets and public purposes by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, such proprietor or the adjoining owner cannot maintain an action for injuries to the soil, or ejectment, but he nevertheless has a remedy for any special injury to his rights by the unauthorized acts of others." In Wahoo v. Nethaway, 73 Neb. 54, 102 N. W. 86, in speaking of the statute above quoted, this court said: "It would seem that there is in this state much reason for holding that incorporated cities should, in actions relating to their streets, be subject to the operation of the statute of limitations. They own in fee simple the streets, alleys, and other public places within their corporate limits. Comp. Stat. 1899, chap. 14, art. 1, §§ 104, 106. They may maintain ejectment to recover possession of them. They may, speaking generally, vacate them either in whole or in part. The right is even given to sell and dispose of them, and apply the money derived from the sale to any legitimate municipal purpose. See Comp. Stat. 1899, chap. 14, art. 1, § 77. In other words, municipal corporations are invested with a sort of proprietary interest in this class of property, and may be required, therefore, to guard it with the wanda R. R. Co. v. Munger, 5 Denio, 255, 49 Am. Dec. 239; Holladay v. Marsh, 3 Wend. 142, 20 Am. Dec. 678.

In Tonawanda R. R. Co. v. Munger, 5 Denio, 255, 49 Am. Dec. 239, the court, speaking of the constitutionality of statutes allowing cattle to run at large, said: "Cattle at large in the highway will not only trample down, but also crop and eat the grass and herbage there growing; and if the legislature have power to authorize their running at large, the grazing cannot be wrongful. What would this be but taking the private property of the owner of the land used as a highway, and transferring it to the owner of the cattle? In my judgment, the legislature have no such power, whether compensation be made or not, but certainly in no case unless compensation is made. On this short ground, I think the town regulation assuming to authorize cattle to 'run at large' was wholly void."

Such statutes have, however, been held constitutional on the ground that any injury from the exercise of the right of public pasturage will be considered and compensated in the assessment of damages for the taking of the land for a highway. Griffin v. Martin, 7 Barb. 297, Hand, J., dissenting.

This reason, however, even if valid, would not apply where the highway was laid out before the passage of the statute allowing cattle to run at large.

In Griffin v. Martin, supra, the following additional reason is given for upholding such a statute: "It cannot with truth be said that a by-law like the one in question takes the property of one man and gives it to another, or even to the public without compensation. The owner of the soil is not deprived of the pasturage, any more than he is of the way. He can enjoy both in common with his neighbors."

But surely this is very fallacious reasoning, for if the owner of land is deprived of the exclusive use of the vegetation growing on it, and compelled to enjoy it only in common with others, he is deprived of a valuable right. It may as well be said that he is entitled to no compensation when part of his land is taken for a highway, because he can enjoy the way in common with others.

In Hardenburgh v. Lockwood, 25 Barb. 9, the court concurred in the decision in Griffin v. Martin, supra, saying: "I regard the right to allow cattle, horses, or sheep to go at large on highways as one of the easements or servitudes pertaining to the land occupied as a highway. The right is supported by usage as old as the history of our country. The land is to be presumed to have been taken with reference to this usage, and the exercise of this right by the proper authorities."

The right of the public to pasture cattle on the highway is not a legitimate public use as a highway, and although long-continued usage might make it such, so that damages for such use would be presumed to be compensated for at the time of laying out the road, no good reason appears why there should be such a presumption in the absence of such special usage.

same degree of vigilance as that which is exacted of private owners. It is believed that the authorities are all agreed upon the proposition that as to property which is held in private ownership, and not upon public trusts, municipal corporations are on the same footing with private individuals, and equally affected by the limitation laws." And it was held prior to the passage of the act of 1899 that the statute of limitations would run against the lands of a municipal corporation the same as against the lands of a private individual. It follows, therefore, that the village of Elmwood being the owner in fee of the streets upon which the plaintiff's lots abutted, it was entitled to use and appropriate the grass or other natural products of the soil growing upon the surface thereof, and the plaintiff, having no legal title to the streets, could not maintain an action against the city for the conversion to its own use of any of such products.

We wish it to be thoroughly understood, however, that by this holding the plaintiff is not to be deprived of any of his rights to the use and occupation of the streets, or any of the equitable or incidental rights that accrue to him by reason of his abutting ownership. Neither do we follow the rule announced in Des Moines v. Hall, supra, to the extent of holding that the city would be entitled to minerals, if any should be found, underlying the surface of its streets. It is sufficient for the disposition of this case to declare that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action to recover the value of the hay growing upon the street adjacent to his lots. It is contended by counsel for the plaintiff that, by the language of the dedication of the plat, the original owners retained the title to the streets, and only dedicated the same to the public use. The acknowledgment of the plat seems to be in the ordinary and usual form. It reads as follows: "We, the undersigned owners and proprietors of the land included in the accompanying plat of Elmwood, Cass county, Nebraska, do hereby approve of the division of the grounds into lots, and ratify the said plat; and do hereby dedicate to the public use the streets and alleys as thereon shown, and in accordance with the survey thereof." This dedication did not have the effect contended for by plaintiff, and did not restrict the rights of the village or the public to a mere use and occupation of its streets, but was a sufficient compliance with the statute, and, when taken together with the survey, the filing, and recording of the plat, operated as a conveyance of the streets designated thereon in fee simple to the corporation. Indeed, if the plat had been filed and recorded without any acknowledgment, the acceptance of the grant and a continuous occupancy of the streets since 1886, with the consent of the plaintiff and his grantors, would be sufficient to estop him from now claiming that the village has not the fee-simple title thereto declared by the statutes.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment of the District Court was right; and for the foregoing reasons it is affirmed.

v.

R. SCHEER, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(— Neb. —, 130 N. W. 962.)

Corporation — insurance — insolvency — action against stockholders.

1. A single suit in equity cannot be maintained by the receiver of an insolvent mutual hail insurance company, organized under chapter 43, Comp. Stat. 1909, against all the policy holders of such insolvent company, for the separate liability of each

Headnotes by FAWCETT, J.

Note.—Right to maintain single suit in equity to enforce separate liability of members of an insolvent insurance association.

It is to be noted that the foregoing subject includes only the question of equity jurisdiction to enforce an independent liability of a member of an insolvent association, as distinguished from its jurisdiction to enforce the liability of such a member where the liability is joint instead of independent. This specific question seems to have been passed upon in no other case. For somewhat analogous cases, see note to Rogers v. Boston Club, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 743, which discusses the question of the jurisdiction of equity on the ground of preventing a multiplicity of suits to enforce liability of members of a club or corporation.

As to equity jurisdiction to adjust losses between concurrent insurance policies on the same property, to avoid a multiplicity of suits, see note in 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 941.

For cases involving the jurisdiction of equity, upon the ground of avoidance of a multiplicity of suits, to entertain suits for possession of separate parcels of land held adversely by different defendants, claiming under a common source, see note in 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 239.

As to the power of equity to take jurisdiction because of a multiplicity of actions at law for personal injuries growing out of a single tort, see note in 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 848.

policy holder for unpaid assessments, whether levied by the directors of the company before insolvency, or by the court thereafter, on the ground that such single suit would prevent a multiplicity of actions at law; nor can such a suit be maintained on the ground that it is ancillary or auxiliary to the main insolvency proceeding; nor upon the ground that the money, when collected, would become part of a fund that would be distributed under the direction of the court; since no question is involved in which the defendants have a common interest, and the suit is merely an aggregation of separate actions at law, each involving separate issues and having no relation to each other, except that there is a common plaintiff, and in each of which the remedy at law is adequate, and is the remedy pointed out by the statutes governing such companies.

Same — action for assessments — non-residents.

2. Nor can the receiver join in one action all policy holders or members of such company who are severally liable for individual unpaid assessments,—those who reside in counties other than the county where the suit is brought, as well as those who reside within such county,—and issue summons to such other counties to obtain service upon such nonresidents.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lancaster County sustaining a demurrer to the answer in a suit to recover unpaid assessments upon members of a mutual hail insurance company. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hainer & Smith, for appellant:

The liability of a member in one of these societies is a several, and not a joint, liability, and the statute expressly provides for the enforcement of such several liability by a suit instituted against the individual member.

Fawcett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Mutual Hail Insurance Society, a corporation organized under the provisions of "An Act to Authorize the Organization of Mutual Hail Insurance Companies" (Comp. Stat. 1909, chap. 43), which, for the sake of brevity, will be designated the company, was, on February 19, 1908, by the district court of Lancaster county, adjudged insolvent, and plaintiff was appointed receiver. The court found the liabilities of the company to be $13,277.95. There being no funds in the hands of the receiver with which to pay these liabilities, the court made an assessment upon the policy holders of the company, 254 in number, and residing in many different counties, of $1.25 per acre for the number of acres covered by their several policies. The receiver was then instructed to bring suit against all of the policy holders. Only three of the policy holders were residents of Lancaster county. The receiver brought this suit in the district court of Lancaster county against all of the 254 policy holders, and had summons directed to the sheriff of each of the outside counties where any of the policy holders resided. The defendant George Spurl, for a separate answer, alleged that, at the time of the commencement of this action, and for a long time prior thereto, and ever since, he was and has been a resident of Nance county; that the only defendants in this suit residing within the county of Lancaster at the time of the commencement thereof were Charles Newman, J. W. Jacoby, and G. M. Coffman; that the summons for the answering defendant was issued by the clerk of the district court of Lancaster county, directed to the sheriff of Nance county, and by said sheriff served upon said defendant in said Nance county; that no other service was made upon him, and that he has made no voluntary appearance in said cause; that the petition does not set forth any joint liability against the answering defendant, or the said defendants, or either of them, residing in Lancaster county, and that the answering defendant is not and was not jointly liable with the defendants residing in Lancaster county, or any of the defendants mentioned in the petition, for any sum of money whatever. Wherefore said defendant "challenges the jurisdiction of the court over his person, and alleges the fact to be that said action is not rightly brought against him in said Lancaster county."

A general demurrer to the answer was sustained, and defendant electing to stand upon his answer, judgment was entered against him for $146.25, from which judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

The main grounds assigned by plaintiff as a basis for his right to join these 254 actions at law in one suit in equity, and to send process for 251 of the defendants to the numerous outside counties in the state, are: That the company issued to each of the defendants, on or about the day mentioned in their respective applications, a policy of insurance, insuring him against loss or damage to his crops, "which several policy each one of the defendants received and now holds, and each of the defendants, by virtue thereof, is a member of the said Mutual Hail Insurance Society of Nebraska; that each of the defendants duly signed and delivered to the said corporation, . . . an application in writing, and became thereby bound and holden, as is provided by law, for his ratable share of all the losses and expenses of said society incurred while he was a member, and each of the defendants is indebted to the said corporation and its creditors in the specific sum so assessed against him;" that the aggregate sum of all the individual assessments of the defendants, if realized, would be more than sufficient to pay the costs and the principal and interest due the creditors; but that certain of the defendants have removed from the state, and others are insolvent; that in order to make a just, ratable, and equitable distribution among the members of the burden of said corporate debts, a court of equity should take into account the losses in collections that will result from such removals and insolvency, "and, upon rendition of judgments for the full amounts of said assessments, plaintiff will submit to the court whether execution should immediately issue for the full liability, or whether, in the first instance, an execution for a part only thereof would be considered adequate for the collection of a sum sufficient to discharge all of the said liabilities and costs;" that this suit is ancillary only to the main receivership suit; that the funds to be derived from the proceedings are trust funds for equal and ratable distribution among the creditors, and the application and distribution thereof should be ordered and directed by a court of equity; that separate and independent actions at law against each of the defendants would require a multiplicity of lawsuits, "and would lead to excessive and interminable complications, and inflame and excessively aggregate the costs of administering the affairs of said corporation, so as to become burdensome upon said trust, in that costs of separate suits and costs of reputable counsel or attorneys would necessarily equal or exceed in most cases the entire avails of individual actions commenced in justice court, with right of successive appeals to the supreme court; that attempts to enforce said liabilities by such separate suits would leave open to controversy an issue in each separate suit as to the necessity of enforcing said assessment in full, and as to whether the amount of all the unpaid debts sufficiently justified the enforcement of said full assessment against each individual member;" that in all of the aforesaid respects plaintiff is without an adequate remedy at law, and that the collection of sums necessary to discharge said debts can only be made in equity, and the affairs of the company can only be administered by and through the aid of a court of equity. The prayer of the petition is that the court may inquire and determine that the defendants are members of the company, ascertain the particular time for which they carried insurance, the particular debts accruing against the company during the term of membership of each of the defendants, and fix and decree the amount of the liability of each one of the defendants; "that a several judgment be entered in favor of plaintiff and against each one of the defendants found liable as a contributory upon said assessment to the payment of the corporate debts of the said Mutual Hail Insurance Society of Nebraska and the costs of this proceeding, and that execution be awarded against each defendant for the amount so found due from him, or, if the sums apparently collectible upon said judgment should appear to the court to be in excess of that required for the payment of said debts and costs, then the amount for which execution shall issue in the first instance against each defendant may be ascertained and determined by the court."

It will be observed that the petition expressly alleges that the company "issued to each one of the defendants" a "several policy" upon his individual application, and that "each of the defendants" is indebted to the said corporation and its creditors "in the specific sum" so assessed against "him," and that in the prayer the court is asked to ascertain "the particular term" for which each policy holder carried insurance; that the court decree the amount of the liability of "each one of the defendants," and that "a several judgment" be entered in favor of plaintiff and "against each one of the defendants." It is apparent, therefore, that plaintiff is seeking in this suit in equity to obtain 254 judgments at law. Section 121, chap. 43, Comp. Stat. 1907, governing companies of this character, provides: "Such companies may issue policies only on growing crops, insuring against damage or loss by hail, and for any time not beyond the life of its charter.

. . . All persons insured shall make application in writing, obliging [obligating] themselves to the company for the payment of losses and expenses as required by the by-laws of the company. The liability of the members may be limited by the by-laws, provided that if the total amount collected in any year shall be insufficient to pay all losses and expenses for that year, then the persons sustaining losses shall receive their proportion of the funds realized from the assessment, in full satisfaction of their loss; and no member shall be required to pay more than the amount of his obligation." No by-laws are shown to have ever been adopted, and it is argued by plaintiff that, because the liability of the members has not been limited by the by-laws, therefore their liability is unlimited, and that each member or policy holder is personally liable for all of the debts of the company. The trouble with this contention is that the statute quoted fixes a maximum liability, viz., "and no member shall be required to pay more than the amount of his obligation." No limitation less than that fixed by the statute having been fixed by the by-laws of the company, it may be conceded that each policy holder would be liable for the company's debts to the full amount of his obligation, but that does not render him liable for the entire debts of the company. It would be hard to conceive how any such company could induce substantial and conservative farmers to insure their growing crops when by so doing they would incur such a liability.

Section 124 of the act under which the company was operating provides: "Suits at law may be brought against any member of such company who shall neglect or refuse to pay any obligation given by him or her according to the provisions of this act, and the directors or officers of any company so formed who shall wilfully refuse or neglect to perform the duties imposed upon them by the provisions of this act shall be liable in their individual capacity to the person sustaining such loss." The legislature has therefore prescribed both the maximum of a member's liability and the form of action by which the payment of that liability may be enforced; and we do not think the fact that the company has become insolvent can in any manner enlarge such liability, or change the form of action which may be resorted to for its enforcement. The claim that the present suit will avoid a multiplicity of suits is without merit. Except as it may operate as a "big stick" in preventing policy holders from defending the suit at long range, it would not materially lessen the litigation, as each defendant would have a perfect right to employ counsel, set up his separate and independent defenses, and demand a separate jury trial. Hale v. Allinson (C. C.) 102 Fed. 790, affirmed in 188 U. S. 56, 47 L. ed. 380, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244; High, Receivers, 4th ed. § 316; Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 135 Ill. 150, 12 L.R.A. 328, 25 N. E. 680; Winters v. Armstrong (C. C.) 37 Fed. 508; Smith v. Johnson, 57 Ohio St. 486, 49 N. E. 693; Smith, Receiverships, § 231.

The cases cited by plaintiff, from this and other courts, to the effect that a creditor of an insolvent corporation cannot bring a separate action against an individual stockholder of such corporation for the unpaid portion of his stock subscription, but that a receiver should be appointed to bring suit for the benefit of all the creditors, are not in point here. Nor can any of those cases be held to apply to a case like this, where the statute itself has fixed the kind of action that may be resorted to. The reason for those holdings is apparent. If each of the 55 creditors in this case were permitted to commence a separate action against each of the 254 policy holders, and each of the 254 policy holders, in order to avoid paying more than his ratable proportion of the indebtedness, should be compelled to bring an action for contribution against each of his 253 co-policyholders, the courts of this state would be kept busy for a number of years to come in disposing of this litigation. The court in this case did right in instructing the receiver to collect from the policy holders, by suit if necessary, the amounts due from them under their contracts with the company; but it would not be warranted in ordering, nor do we understand from the allegations of the petition that it did in fact order, the receiver to proceed against all of the defendants by a suit in equity. It is the duty of the receiver to obey the order of the court; but in so doing the constitutional rights of each defendant must be recognized, and he will have to proceed by separate actions at law in which each defendant may have the right to defend his own suit free from the embarrassing presence of other defendants with whom he has no joint liability. The fact that this may be expensive, and may result in the creditors failing to receive payment of their demands in full, is a circumstance which cannot be considered. There is ample authority to sustain our holding, in addition to the cases above cited, but we do not deem it necessary to take the time or to enlarge this opinion by a reference to them.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to overrule plaintiff's demurrer.

Reversed and remanded.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

WEAVER MERCANTILE COMPANY

v.

W. D. THURMOND, Plff. in Err.

(68 W. Va. 530, 70 S. E. 126.)

Nuisance — use of property — injury to neighbor.

1. A man is bound to use his premises so as not to injure his neighbor's property. Same — storage of water.

2. A landowner who brings water upon his premises by artificial means, and stores it in tanks or reservoirs for his use, is liable if the water escapes and injures the property of an adjoining owner.

Same — liability of landlord.

3. If a landlord has on his premises a water tank which supplies water to several houses, occupied by several tenants, he is bound at his peril to prevent the water from escaping and injuring the property of an adjoining proprietor.

Evidence — presumption of negligence.

4. If the tank bursts and the escaping water does injury to the property of an adjoining proprietor, negligence will be presumed. In such case the rule of res ipsa loquitur applies.

Bankruptcy — failure of trustee to intervene in suit.

5. A trustee in bankruptcy may obtain permission from the bankrupt court to intervene and prosecute a suit brought in the state court by the bankrupt before his adjudication. But his failure to intervene will not abate the suit.

Appeal — intervention of bankruptcy trustee.

6. If the trustee fail to intervene in such suit in the lower court, he cannot do so by petition in this court, after the case has been brought here on writ of error or appeal. Such petition presents original matter which does not belong to the jurisdiction of this court.

Note. — Liability for escape of water stored on premises.

This note supplements the note to Brennan Constr. Co. v. Cumberland, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 541. It excludes cases in which the damage arises from the bursting of water pipes and the like, and confines itself to cases where the damage results from the escape of water actually stored, as from reservoirs, irrigation ditches, etc.

An irrigating company is liable for negligently permitting water from its ditch to escape to plaintiff's land because of faulty construction of the ditch, or for allowing the water to become obstructed so as to injure plaintiff's land by seepage or percolation, the injury in such a case not being ERROR to the Circuit Court for Fayette County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's goods by the bursting of a water tank, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dillon & Nuckolls for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Osenton, McPeak, & Horan, for defendant in error:

Defendant was bound to keep the water tank in repair, and to answer in damages for any injury resulting from his negligent failure so to do.

damnum absque injuria. Paolini v. Fresno Canal & Irrig. Co. 9 Cal. App. 1, 97 Pac. 1130.

In City Water Power Co. v. Fergus Falls, 113 Minn. 33, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 59, 128 N. W. 817 (an action by a lower riparian owner for damages caused by the destruction of his milldam by the breaking of the dam of an upper owner), it was held that the erection and maintenance of a dam across a natural water course, for the purpose of utilizing the water power, is not a nuisance, nor is the owner thereof an insurer of its safety; but he is bound to exercise in the premises a degree of care proportionate to the injuries likely to result to others if it proves insufficient; and the dam must be sufficient to resist not merely ordinary freshets, but such extraordinary floods as may reasonably be anticipated.

So, the owner of a dam is liable for damages to property by a flood occasioned by a combination of negligence on his part and by an unprecedented flood, constituting an act of God, provided his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. Frederick v. Hale, 42 Mont. 153, 112 Pac. 70.

But in Bridgeport v. Bridgeport Hydraulic Co. 81 Conn. 84, 70 Atl. 650, it is held that the owner of a dam is not liable for injuries caused by extraordinary, unprecedented floods, these being classed with inevitable accidents as the result of vis major or act of God, against which one cannot reasonably be required to provide.

In Canon City & C. C. R. Co. v. Oxtoby, 45 Colo. 214, 100 Pac. 1127, holding a railroad company liable for damages to adjoining property by seepage water which escaped from a barrow pit maintained on the railroad right of way, and which collected surface water from rains and melting snow, the court seems to have assumed that the liability was not dependent upon the lack of reasonable care to prevent seepage. It referred to the statement in Sylvester v. Jerome, 19 Colo. 128, 34 Pac. 780, that the provision of § 2272 of Mills's Anno. Stat., imposing liability upon the owners of reservoirs for irrigation purposes, was simply an affirmation of a common-law principle.

In Garnet Ditch & Reservoir Co. v. Sampson, 48 Colo. 285, 110 Pac. 79, 1136, it is held that an absolute liability, not dependent upon the failure to exercise ordinary care, is imposed upon the owner of the reservoirs by § 2272, Mills's Anno. Stat. (Colo.), providing that the "owners of the reservoirs shall be liable for all damages arising from leakage or overflow of the waters therefrom, or by floods caused by breaking of the embankments of such reservoirs." In a per curiam opinion on a rehearing in this case, the court said that it had held that the statute imposes an absolute liability, but had not held that a reservoir owner may or may not, under the law of the land, and notwithstanding the statute, be excused from liability upon showing that the injury was caused by the act of God or the public enemy.

It was also held in this case that the provisions of the section were not affected by a later statute requiring reservoirs of certain capacity, or dams of certain dimensions, to be constructed under safeguards and under the supervision of the state engineer, to the end that they may not overflow, and that breakage or seepage may not occur.

This case also holds that natural barriers like mesa or hillside, used by the builder of the reservoir for impounding the water, are equally with artificial embankments within the provision of the statute rendering the owner absolutely liable.

Where a rat gnawed a hole in a box placed in a building to catch water from the roof, the landlord was held not liable to the tenant for damages to goods stored below, by water escaping through the hole, where the landlord had used reasonable care in looking after the security of the box, which was of a kind ordinarily constructed for the purpose. Carstairs v. Taylor, 40 L. J. Exch. N. S. 129, L. R. 6 Exch. 217, 19 Week. Rep. 723.

Mustang Reservoir Canal & Land Co. v. Hissman, — Colo. —, 112 Pac. 800, merely deals with the measure of damages for flooding land,—a question not within the scope of this note.

J. D. C.

The fact that the tank burst and allowed the water to escape and injure the plaintiff's goods was of itself sufficient to create a presumption of negligence, and throw the burden of disproving it upon the defendant.

Williams, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action of trespass in circuit court of Fayette county for injury to personal property, judgment for plaintiff for $650, and defendant brings error.

Defendant was the owner of an hotel situate at the base of a hill in the town of Thurmond, Fayette county. It was supplied with water by means of a large wooden tank erected on the side of the hill some distance above the hotel. The plaintiff company did a mercantile business, and occupied, as a storeroom, a building under lease from J. W. Mankin, situate below the water tank. The tank burst and the water flowed down the hill into the storeroom, and damaged plaintiff's goods.

A number of defenses are made to the action. The first is that the tank was constructed of apparently good material, and in a workmanlike manner; and that, if there was in fact any defect in the material, or fault in construction, such defect was latent, and defendant was ignorant of it, and therefore not liable, because not negligent. But, as we understand the law to be, the liability of defendant does not depend on negligence in construction, but upon negligence in not keeping the water confined. No matter in what the negligence consisted, it is proved by the bursting of the tank. The rule res ipsa loquitur applies. If the person whose duty it was to keep the tank in good repair had not been negligent in some respect, the tank would not have burst. The negligent act may have been the failure to keep it properly painted, but it is not material what it was. Liability in cases like the present rests upon the principle that a man who erects a structure upon his premises which, because of neglect to take care of it, becomes a nuisance, either to the public or to the property of an adjoining owner, is liable. He is bound, at his peril to prevent it from injuring the property of his neighbor. In 1 Wood, Nuisances, § 111, the rule is thus 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

stated: "Every person who, for his own profit or advantage, brings upon his premises, and collects and keeps there, anything which, if it escapes, will do damage to another, subject to some exceptions rendered necessary for the protection of industrial interests, is liable for all the consequences of his acts, and is bound at his peril to confine it and keep it in upon his own premises. If he does not, he is answerable for all the damages that result therefrom, without any reference to the degree of care or skill exercised by him in reference thereto. Therefore, if a man brings water upon his premises by artificial means, and collects and keeps it there, either in reservoirs or in pipes, he is bound at his peril to see that the water does not escape, to the damage of an adjoining owner." This principle has few exceptions, and has been applied in a large number of cases, both in England and in this country. A few of such cases will serve to illustrate the correctness of applying the principle in this case. A cooking range, erected so near a partition wall of two adjoining houses as, by its ordinary use to injure the goods of the adjoining proprietor and render his house uncomfortable and disagreeable, has been held to constitute a nuisance. Grady v. Wolsner, 46 Ala. 381, 7 Am. Rep. 593. Where the walls of a building, after the building has been partially destroyed by fire, were permitted to stand, and afterwards fell upon a person passing along the street, it was held that the corporation owning the building was liable. Church of Ascension v. Buckhart, 3 Hill, 193. A building adjoining the street fell, and injured a person passing. The owner of the building was held liable. Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530. The court also held that, in the absence of explanatory circumstances, negligence of the owner was presumed, and that the burden is upon him to prove that he used ordinary care.

Kearney v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 5 Q. B. 411, is a leading English case decided in 1870. In that case plaintiff was injured by a brick falling on him from the top of one of the pilasters of a railroad bridge as he was passing along a highway underneath. Defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that no negligence was shown; but the court of Queen's bench, by a divided vote, held that it was a case in which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied. This case was appealed to the exchequer chamber and was there unanimously affirmed; that court holding that the defendant was bound to use due care in keeping the bridge in proper repair, so as not to injure persons passing along the highway, and that there was evidence from which the jury might infer negligence. Negligence may be, and often is, inferable from the nature of the accident causing the injury; as, for instance, from the falling of a barrel into the highway from the window of a shop (Byrne v. Boadle, 2 Hurlst. & C. 722, 33 L. J. Exch. N. S. 13, 9 L. T. N. S. 450, 12 Week. Rep. 279); the falling of bags of sugar on plaintiff as he was passing by a warehouse (Scott v. London & St. H. Docks Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 596, 34 L. J. Exch. N. S. 220, 11 Jur. N. S. 204, 13 L. T. N. S. 148, 13 Week. Rep. 410). In the case of Gee v. Metropolitan R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 161, 42 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 105, 28 L. T. N. S. 282, 21 Week. Rep. 584, plaintiff was injured by falling out of the door of a railroad coach. He had placed his hand on a brass rod across the door, for the purpose of steadying himself in order to look out of the window. He supposed the door was closed and fastened, but, as soon as he placed his hand on the rod, the door swung open, and he fell out, and was injured. Upon this state of facts the court unanimously held that plaintiff had a right to assume that the door was closed and fastened, that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that the negligence of defendant in not having closed and fastened the door of the coach when plaintiff boarded the train, which seems to be a rule of the railroads in England, could be properly inferred. In Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 235, which is a leading English case, the facts were: "The defendants constructed a reservoir on land separated from the plaintiff's colliery by intervening land. Mines under the site of the reservoir and under part of the intervening land had been formerly worked, and the plaintiff had, by workings lawfully made in his own colliery and in the intervening land, opened an underground communication between his own colliery and the old workings under the reservoir. It was not known to the defendants, nor to any person employed by them in the construction of the reservoir, that such communication existed, or that there were any old workings under the site of the reservoir, and the defendants were not personally guilty of any negligence; but, in fact, the reservoir was constructed over five old shafts leading down to the workings. On the reservoir being filled, the water burst down these shafts and flowed by the underground communication into the plaintiff's mines." Upon this state of facts, the court of exchequer chamber held that the defendants were liable for the damage caused. The court in its opinion says: "We think that the true rule of law is that the person, who, for his own purposes, brings on his lands and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril; and, if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. He can excuse himself by showing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default, or perhaps that the escape was the consequence of vis major, or the act of God; but, as nothing of this sort exists here, it is unnecessary to inquire what excuse would be sufficient. The general rule, as above stated, seems on principle just. The person whose grass or corn is eaten down by the escaping cattle of his neighbour, or whose mine is flooded by the water from his neighbour's reservoir, or whose cellar is invaded by the filth of his neighbour's privy, or whose habitation is made unhealthy by the fumes and noisome vapours of his neighbour's alkali works, is dammed without any fault of his own; and it seems reasonable and just that the neighbor, who has brought something on his own property which was not naturally there, harmless to others so long as it is confined to his own property, but which he knows to be mischievous if it gets on his neighbor's, should be obliged to make good the damage which ensues if he does not succeed in confining it to his own property. But for his act in bringing it there no mischief could have accrued; and it seems but just that he should at his peril keep it there, so that no mischief may accrue, or answer for the natural and anticipated consequences." And upon authority this, we think, is established to be the law, whether the things so brought be beasts, or water, or filth, or stench." This case was appealed to the House of Lords, and there affirmed. L. R. 3 H. L. 330, 6 Mor. Min. Rep. 129.

The same rule was applied by the supreme court of Minnesota upon a similar state of facts. Defendant had excavated a tunnel upon his own land, extending under the bed of a stream. The pressure of the water caused the roof of the tunnel to break, and the water, rushing through the tunnel, undermined plaintiff's land. The court held that "the defendant was liable for the damage occasioned, without proof of negligence or unskillfulness on his part." Cahill v. Eastman, 18 Minn. 324, Gil. 292, 10 Am. Rep. 184. The court cites a number of cases in support of its decision, among them the case of Fletcher v. Rylands, supra. To suffer filthy water to percolate through the soil and to injure the cellar and well of an adjoining proprietor, the supreme court of Massachusetts in Ball v. Nye, 99 Mass. 582, 97 Am. Dec. 56, held to be an act for which the defendant was liable; and further held that no other negligence need be shown than such as was necessarily inferred from the nature of the injury. That court also cites with approval the case of Fletcher v. Rylands, supra. In Shipley v. Fifty Associates, 106 Mass. 199, 8 Am. Rep. 318, a proprietor who built the roof of his house so that quantities of ice and snow collected thereon, and fell upon a traveler in the highway, was held liable. It was also held that no further proof of negligence than that inferred from the manner of the accident was necessary. See also Wilson v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 261, 11 Am. Rep. 352; Gilmore v. Driscoll, 122 Mass. 202, 23 Am. Rep. 312, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 37; Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 232, 28 Am. Rep. 224, applying the same principle.

Defendant in the present case had leased the hotel to his son, J. S. Thurmond, who was in possession at the time of the injury complained of, and it is contended that, as there was no agreement by the lessor to make repairs, he is not liable. But the undisputed evidence is that the tank supplied water, not only to the leased premises, but also to other houses in the vicinity of the hotel, owned by defendant, and that the servant who was engaged in running the engine that pumped water from the river in to the tank was employed by defendant. This engineer testified that he went to see the tank whenever he wanted water in it; that he saw it at 7:30 o'clock on the morning that it burst; that he was on top of the tank; that he saw it also on the evening previous. Here it is shown that defendant's agent filled the tank with water, which caused it to burst. The rule of law is that the principal is liable for the acts of his agent, done within the scope of his authority and in the line of his employment. The effect, therefore, upon defendant's liability, is the same as if he himself had been running the engine. Independent of this fact, however, there is a positive rule of law which under the circumstances proven to exist in this case makes defendant liable. The general rule of law is that, in the absence of express agreement, it is the duty of the tenant to make repairs of the leased premises. This rule is based on the principle that during the continuance of the lease the landlord has no right of entry. But the present case falls under a well-recognized exception to this general rule. It is this: Where premises are leased in part to two or more tenants, with the right of each to use a certain part in common, the law obliges the landlord to keep such part in repair. This rule applies between landlord and tenant, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) and, a fortiori, to the public, or to an adjoining proprietor. Readman v. Conway, 126 Mass. 374; Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295; Milford v. Holbrook, 9 Allen, 17, 85 Am. Dec. 735; Elliott v. Pray, 10 Allen, 378, 87 Am. Dec. 653; Sawyer v. McGillicuddy, 81 Me. 318, 3 L.R.A. 458, 10 Am. St. Rep. 260, 17 Atl. 124; Canandaigua v. Foster, 156 N. Y. 354, 41 L.R.A. 554, 66 Am. St. Rep. 575, 50 N. E. 971; 2 McAdam, Land & T. p. 1732. In the present case the tank was not used exclusively for the hotel, but was used to supply other buildings with water on lands of defendant. So that, according to the principle decided in the foregoing cases, the tank being, at the time of the injury, used in common by the lessee of the hotel, and by the landlord, or by his other tenants, and it matters not which, the landlord was bound to keep it in such repair as to prevent the escape of the water in such manner as to injure the property of an adjoining owner.

The theory is advanced in brief of counsel for defendant that the bursting of the tank was caused by a clandestine explosion of dynamite. But this is only a theory, and there is no evidence to support it, except the testimony of J. S. Thurmond, who says that he was on the street when it burst; that he heard a loud report, like an explosion, and immediately looked toward the tank, and saw the body of water, which looked white at first. His opinion, formed from what he heard and saw there, and from the appearance of the broken staves of the tank, which he afterwards saw scattered over the ground, was that it had been blown up with dynamite. But the sudden bursting of the large iron bands, or hoops, would very likely make a loud report, and the bursting of the hoops at the bottom would also likely cause the staves to break, if the hoops near the top of the tank did not give way at the same time. The pressure of 30,000 gallons of water against the bottom ends of the staves, with the hoops holding the upper ends together, would be sufficient to break the staves. There is evidence that the tank had been painted only once after it was put up; that the hoops were almost eaten in two with rust. There is also evidence by a competent expert witness that it is necessary to paint such tanks, at least once a year, to prevent the rust from destroying the iron hoops. It burst between 9 and 10 o'clock in the morning of March 28, 1906. There is no evidence that it was caused by an act of God, such as a severe and unusual windstorm; and the dynamite theory is so highly improbable that we are compelled to say that, as a question of law, proof of the bursting of the hoops was also proof of defendant's negligence.

It is assigned as error that defendant's special plea No. 3 was improperly rejected. It alleges that, after the institution of the suit, plaintiff had been adjudged a bankrupt. Section 11c of the bankruptcy act (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 549, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3426) is: "A trustee may, with the approval of the court, be permitted to prosecute as trustee any suit commenced by the bankrupt prior to the adjudication with like force and effect as though it had been commenced by him." Pursuant to this provision, the trustee could have obtained permission of the bankrupt court to prosecute this suit; but there is no evidence that he had such permission, or that he applied for it before the time the plea was tendered. It does not follow that his failure to intervene in the suit would abate the action. The bankrupt may still prosecute an action to final judgment, provided the trustee does not intervene, just as if no trustee had been appointed. Hubbard v. Gould, 74 N. H. 25, 64 Atl. 668. "An action by or against the bankrupt in the state court does not abate upon the adjudication in bankruptcy or appointment of a trustee, and, in the absence of an application by the trustee for substitution, it may be prosecuted or defended by the bankrupt." Hahlo v. Cole, 112 App. Div. 636, 98 N. Y. Supp. 1049. "A trustee in bankruptcy may, but need not, intervene as plaintiff in a suit brought by the bankrupt before the adjudication in bankruptcy." Griffin v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 119 Ga. 664, 46 S. E. 870. It was further held in that case that, if no trustee is appointed, or if the bankrupt court does not consider it of interest to the estate of the bankrupt to permit the trustee to prosecute such suit, the action is not thereby abated. See also 3 Current Law, 468. The fact that plaintiff was adjudged a bankrupt after this action had been brought could not affect defendant's interest in the result of the suit. It has no bearing on the question of his liability, and is not a matter of defense to him. Plea No. 3 was therefore properly rejected.

It is assigned as error that the court improperly refused to permit witness for plaintiff, M. E. Callahan, to answer a certain question on cross-examination relating to the amount of plaintiff's loss. Shortly after the bursting of the tank, witness Callahan, who was vice president of the plaintiff company, assisted in taking an inventory of the goods, for the purpose of estimating the amount of the damages, which he stated to be over $1,700. After the bursting of the tank, plaintiff rented another room, and moved its goods to it; and, after the goods were moved, a fire occurred which destroyed the entire stock, including the portion of the goods damaged by the water from the tank, which had not then been sold. On cross-examination he was asked: "Q. What became of these goods? A. We removed, afterwards, a part of them. A part of them were sold, and the rest was removed to the store on the hill. Q. Do you know what you got for the ones which you sold?" To this last question the court sustained an objection, and the defendant excepted. This witness, notwithstanding he was interested as an officer and stockholder in plaintiff company, was not personally employed in selling the goods. It is not shown that he knew what the goods brought, which had been sold. Witness had assisted in estimating the damage to the goods by the water, and was examined in chief to prove the amount estimated. The question objected to did not pertain to matters concerning which he had testified in his direct examination. Weaver, Graves, Buster, and this witness were all engaged in estimating the damage to the goods. Weaver knew the cost price, and would call it out, and Graves and Buster would estimate the damage, and the figures were put down by witness Callahan. He was examined to prove that he had correctly taken down the figures as they were called out to him. It does not appear that there was a separate account kept of the damaged goods that were sold; so that there was no way of estimating by the accounts that were kept what had been received for the portion of the damaged goods sold previous to the destruction by fire of what were not sold. It was, therefore, not error for the court to sustain plaintiff's objection to the question. But, even if it were a proper question to be answered, it does not appear from the record what answer the witness was expected to make. Consequently we are unable to see that defendant was prejudiced by the court's ruling.

Witness Graves, who assisted in making an estimate of the damages, was asked the following question: "Q. Tell the jury, Mr. Graves, how much the damages footed up? How much it amounted to in dollars and cents?" The court overruled defendant's objection to this question. He excepted, and assigns this action of the court as error. But the answer itself shows that he was not prejudiced by it. His answer was: "Thirteen hundred dollars and some cents. I do not know what it was. I did not make the figures." The jury were certainly capable of judging that this answer furnished no proof of the amount of damages. Witness says he did not know because he did not make the figures; and witness Callahan, who did take down the figures, was examined to supply the proof as to the amount of damage.

It was not error to refuse defendant's instruction No. 4. It is framed upon the theory that the defendant's liability rests alone upon the unsound condition of the tank, and the defendant's knowledge of such condition, at the time of the lease. This is not the law. He was bound to know its condition, and to keep it from doing injury to adjoining property owners.

Defendant's No. 6 was also properly refused. It would tell the jury that if they believed it was the duty of J. S. Thurmond, the lessee, to keep the tank in repair, they must find for the defendant, unless it appear by a preponderance of the evidence that the tank was in unsound, unsafe, and dangerous condition at the time of the lease, and that this fact was known to defendant, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary diligence; and, furthermore, that the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show that it was in this unsound condition at the date of the lease. This is not the law of this case. The tank was a structure which, from its very nature, was likely to become dangerous by reason of neglect, and defendant was liable, notwithstanding his lessee may also have been liable.

Defendant's instructions Nos. 1, 3, and 5 are as favorable to him as we think the law warrants. No. 7 is that the bursting of the tank does not of itself show negligence nor create liability on defendant. The cases which we have cited in the first part of this opinion are authority for holding that this is a case where the happening of the accident of itself is sufficient to establish negligence, there being no evidence that it was caused by an act of God, or that it was clandestinely destroyed by an enemy. It is a case in which the familiar rule of evidence, res ipsa loquitur, applies.

J. W. Crider, plaintiff's trustee in bankruptcy, presents a petition to this court, praying that this cause be proceeded with in this court for his benefit. The trustee was not made a party to the action below, and he cannot be made a party by order of this court on petition. The petition presents matter for original jurisdiction, and cannot be considered by this court.

We find no error in the record prejudicial to the defendant, and the judgment will be affirmed.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

RE CHRIS PETERSON.

(19 Idaho, 433, 113 Pac. 729.)

Criminal law — suspension of sentence — right of convict.

1. Where, on a plea of guilty, the defendant is sentenced to imprisonment for a term of six months and a fine of $300 and costs of suit, and it is provided in the judgment that, in case said fine and costs are not paid, defendant be imprisoned in the county jail until said fine and costs are paid, at the rate of one day imprisonment for each $2 of the fine and costs, not exceeding 172 days in all, and it is further ordered that, upon payment of said fine and costs, the judgment for six months' imprisonment be suspended until further order of the court or the judge thereof, and the defendant pays said fine and costs, and is released without bail, the court has no authority to have the defendant rearrested and imprisoned, to serve out said term of imprisonment.

Habeas corpus — unauthorized sentence — relief.

2. The final sentence and judgment against the defendant cannot be made a mere matter of discretion with the judge or court, to depend upon the subsequent conduct of the convicted person. Such sentence is wholly unauthorized by law, and a defendant imprisoned thereunder will be discharged on habeas corpus.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from the custody of the sheriff of Bonner County, to which he had been committed to serve out a suspended term of imprisonment. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Herman H. Taylor, for petitioner:

The rendering of judgment and the final sentencing of the defendant cannot be made a mere matter of discretion with the judge or the public prosecutor, nor to depend upon the subsequent conduct of the convicted person.

Messrs. D. C. McDougall, Attorney General, and O. M. Van Duyn for the State.

Sullivan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the release of Chris Peterson from the custody of the sheriff of Bonner county. The cause of the imprisonment is as follows: On the 9th of December, 1910, in the district court of Bonner county, the defendant pleaded guilty to the charge of selling intoxicating liquors in violation of what is commonly known as the "local option law." Sess. Laws 1909, p. 9. The defendant appeared for sentence, and the following sentence and judgment was entered in the minutes of the court on December 10, 1910: "At this day, the state was represented by Mr. Peter Johnson, prosecuting attorney, and John A. Steinlein; the defendant was represented by his counsel, Mr. E. W. Wheelan, the said defendant, through his said counsel, having heretofore entered a plea of guilty in said action, and the court having fixed this date as the time to pronounce judgment, and the court, being fully advised, rendered its judgment as follows: It is the judgment of the law and the sentence of the court that you, the said Chris Peterson, be imprisoned in the county jail situated at Sandpoint, Bonner county, state of Idaho, and be therein confined for a period of six months, and that the date of your confinement will commence when you reach the jail, and that you pay a fine in the sum of $300, and the costs taxed at $44.30, and that, in case said fine and costs are not paid, you be imprisoned in the county jail of said county until said fine and costs are paid, at the rate of one day imprisonment for each $2 of said fine and costs, not exceeding 172 days in all, for such nonpayment of fine and costs. It is further ordered that, upon payment of said fine and costs, the foregoing judgment of six months' imprisonment be suspended until the further order of this court or the judge thereof."

On the 9th day of December, 1910, the defendant also entered a plea of guilty to another charge of the same kind, and a judgment was entered against him, sentencing him to imprisonment for six months in the county jail, and a fine of $200 and costs of suit, which fine and costs amounted to $219.80, and the defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail at the rate of one day for each $2 of said fine and costs, amounting to 109 days. It was also provided by said judgment that, upon payment of said fine and costs, the sentence of imprisonment should be suspended until the further order of the court or judge. The defendant thereupon paid the fine and costs in both cases, and was released from custody without bail, and was permitted to go at liberty without any requirement to further appear under said judgments or either of them, except that the sentence of six months' imprisonment was suspended until the further order of the court or judge. Thereafter, without any notice to the defendant or his attorney, and without any modification of said judgment, the clerk of said court delivered to the sheriff of said county a commitment in said first action, which is in words and figures as follows: "At this day the defendant appeared in open court with his counsel, E. W. Wheelan, Esq., the state being represented by Peter Johnson, prosecuting attorney, and John A. Steinlein, Esq. Thereupon the defendant was informed by the court that an information had been filed against him charging him with selling intoxicating liquor contrary to law, namely, whisky, and of his plea of guilty as charged; and was then asked by the court if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him, and, no sufficient cause appearing or being alleged, the court rendered the following judgment: It is the judgment of the law and the sentence of this court that you, Chris Peterson, be imprisoned in the county jail of Bonner county, state of Idaho, for six months, and that said term of imprisonment begin on the date of your admission into said jail, and that you pay a fine of $300, and that you pay the costs of this prosecution amounting to $44.30, and that, in case said fine and costs are not paid, you be imprisoned in the county jail of said county until said fine and costs are paid, at the rate of one day of imprisonment for each $2 of said fine and costs, not exceeding _____ days in all, for such nonpayment of fine and costs.

Done in open court this 10th day of December, A. D. 1910.

R. N. Dunn, District Judge."

A similar commitment was issued in the second action above referred to. The defendant avers in his petition that he had not attempted to escape from the jurisdiction of said court, but, at all times after the payment of said fines and costs on the 10th day of December, 1910, and until the 23d day of December, 1910, when the alleged illegal detention began, he was permitted by the court to be and remain at large, without any bond or any recognizance for his future appearance, and without any requirement for his appearance; that on the said 23d day of December, said sheriff, without any further or other order of the court whatever, and without any modification or amendment of the judgments above recited, and without any appearance of defendant or counsel being had or required in said court, and without any notice whatever to the defendant, took the defendant into custody and restrained and confined him in the jail in the said county under said commitments.

It appears from the petition that the judgments attached to the commitments are like the copy of the judgment above set forth, except the following provision is not contained in the judgment signed by the court and attached to the commitments, to wit: "It was further ordered that, upon payment of said fine and costs, the foregoing judgment of six months be suspended until the further order of this court or the judge thereof."

It is first contended by counsel for the defendant that his payment of said fines and costs ended the court's jurisdiction over the defendant, and that, as the defendant was then released from being required to give any bail or sureties for his reappearance, the court had no jurisdiction or authority thereafter to commit him to serve out the term of imprisonment imposed by said sentence. In support of that contention, counsel cites People ex rel. Boenert v. Barrett, 202 Ill. 287, 63 L.R.A. 82, 95 Am. St. Rep. 230, 67 N. E. 23; Weaver v. People, 33 Mich. 296, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 552; Re Strickler, 51 Kan. 700, 33 Pac. 620. In the Barrett Case, above cited, the court held that the rendering of judgment and the final sentencing of defendant cannot be made a mere matter of discretion of the judge or public prosecutor, nor to depend upon the subsequent conduct of the convicted person. In the Weaver Case, it was held that the release of a defendant on his own recognizance and without sureties usually signified that the offender is to go without punishment. In the Strickler Case, the court said: "In this case it was attempted to hang a sentence of ninety days' imprisonment over the head of the defendant, to be executed at such time as the prosecuting attorney of Ford county, or the judge of the court might see fit,"—and held that such a sentence was wholly unauthorized by law, and that the commitment issued was illegal, and directed the discharge of the prisoner. We know of no authority in our statutes for such judgments as the ones entered in said cases. The district court has no authority after sentencing a prisoner to a term of imprisonment, to direct his release, with or without bond, making such release subject to recall by the judge or court, and thereafter require the defendant to serve out the suspended term of imprisonment.

The order suspending the six months' imprisonment no doubt was an inducement to the defendant to immediately pay the fine and costs, which he did, and he was not required to give any bail for his further appearance in said matter, and was released from custody. It evidently was the intention to hang the sentence of six months' imprisonment over the head of the defendant, to be executed at such time as the court or judge might require. As was stated in the Strickler Case, supra: "This would leave the defendant in a very uncertain situation. He would be unable to tell for an indefinite period whether he was a free man or a convict, and while the sentence, in terms, might be for but ninety days' imprisonment, it would be, in effect, far more severe, because of the uncertainty as to the time of its execution." If said sentences were suspended on certain conditions, and the law authorized the district court to suspend them, in case the defendant was charged with violating the conditions of suspension, common justice would require that he be given a hearing, which was not done in this case. But that makes no difference in this case, as the court had no authority to suspend the sentence.

Other questions are raised that are not necessary to be determined on this hearing. The defendant having been released upon the payment of said fines and costs, under the facts of this case the court had no authority to commit the defendant to the county jail, to serve out said imprisonment sentence, as was done. For that reason the prayer of the petition must be granted, and the prisoner discharged.

Ailshie, P. J., and Budge, District Judge, concur.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

JEROME SEIGEL, Appt.,

v.

THOMAS LONG.

(— Ala. —, 53 So. 753.)

Assault — physical interference with person.

1. Placing one's hand on another's head and pushing his hat back for the purpose of seeing his face, in order to identify him, is an assault and battery.

Same — mistaken identity.

2. Mistake in identity of the person assaulted is no justification for assault and battery.

Same — offer of apology.

3. Offering to apologize to one upon whom a battery has been committed is no defense to an action to recover damages for the battery.

Trial — affirmative charge — conflicting evidence.

4. A general affirmative charge cannot be given where the evidence is in dispute.

(December 8, 1910.)

Note. — Assault or homicide as affected by mistake in identity of person assaulted.

This note is limited to cases of mistake in the identity of the person assaulted, and includes homicides committed under such mistake. Cases of aiming at one and hitting another are excluded.

On homicide by unlawful act aimed at another than the one killed, see the note to White v. State, 63 L.R.A. 660.

The decision in SEIGEL v. LONG is supported by principle and authority.

It is a general rule that the crime or wrong is to be judged as if there had been no mistake in identity. Such a mistake will, therefore, neither mitigate nor aggravate the offense, save that the defendant must have exercised reasonable care in ascertaining the identity of the person assaulted, in order to avail himself of any justification or excuse that might have existed had the assault been upon the person intended.

The rule obtains in assaults generally including murder in the first degree, but in Texas and possibly in Tennessee there is an exception in murder in the first degree.

Assaults.

Where one intends to assault or kill a

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Perry County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for an assault and battery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Arthur M. Pitts for appellant.

Mr. W. F. Hogue for appellee.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant sued appellee for an assault and battery. The first count of the complaint was in Code form. The plaintiff's evidence made out a case of inexcusable and rude assault. The defendant's evidence likewise made a case of assault, though one of less insolence and rudeness than that which plaintiff's evidence tended to prove; nevertheless it proved the first count of the complaint, and failed to prove the pleas which were the general issue. The plaintiff was therefore clearly entitled to the general affirmative charge as to the first count, as was requested by him, for nominal damages.

The defendant's account of the re-encounter, so far as pertains to the assault and battery vel non, was as follows: "I did place my left hand on his forehead, and pushed his hat back on his head. I did this for the purpose of seeing his face and identifying him. I said to him, 'Some scoundrel came along here yesterday, or the other day, and scared my horses, and certain person, and by mistake in identity assaults the wrong person, the intent is transferred from the person intended to the person assaulted. People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 138, 78 Pac. 470.

In Carter v. State, 87 Ala. 113, 6 So. 356, where the defendant, being drunk, committed an assault, but not a battery, upon a woman whom he mistook for a prostitute, the appellate court said in affirming a conviction: "It is unquestionably the law that if the defendant intended to inflict personal violence on another person than the one assaulted, a mere mistake in the identity of the person would not excuse him. It was no justification of the assault charged in this case that the defendant was drunk, or that he erroneously believed the person assaulted to be a common prostitute."

In Morris Hotel Co. v. Henley, 145 Ala. 678, 40 So. 52, it was held that it was no defense to an assault by the manager of a hotel that the person assaulted was unknown to the manager to be a guest in the hotel. The court said that an assault would not be justified whether the person was or was not a guest in the hotel.

Assaults with particular intents.

Where the prisoner, supposing T. to be M., and, wishing to murder M., shot at and caused them to run away and break my rake,' and I am looking for him. I did tell him that some of you all scoundrels think you own the world, but I stated that we need some of it. There were two young ladies and another gentleman in the automobile. I was provoked when I walked from my wagon down to the automobile. I was provoked at the time I placed my hand on Mr. Seigel. I was angry at the person who frightened my team. I was hunting the person who frightened my team, and no one else. I did call the negro, and ask him if this was the person who came along a few days before and frightened my team."

It is true that defendant's testimony tended to show that defendant made a mistake as to the identity of the party whom he assaulted, and he told plaintiff that, if he was not the person who frightened his team, he owed him an apology; but this did not prevent what he did from being an assault and battery. It was an assault and battery, with or without mistaken identity. Carter v. State, 87 Ala. 113, 6 So. 356.

It was likewise no defense that defendant offered to apologize after the assault, if he made a mistake as to the identity of the person assaulted. It may likewise be true that defendant did not intend to injure or hurt the plaintiff, unless he proved to be the one who had frightened the team the day before; but this, if true, did not prevent what he says he did from being an assault and battery. An intent to injure is not a necessary element of assault and wounded T., he was held guilty of wounding T. with intent to murder him. Parke, B., said: "There is no doubt but the prisoner intended to hit Taylor, but he mistook the particular person." Reg. v. Smith, 33 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 567.

In People v. Torres, 38 Cal. 141, where the facts are not reported, the court said: "As an abstract proposition, however, the fourth instruction is not erroneous. If A, intending to murder B, shoots C, supposing C to be B, and wounds C, he is guilty of an assault with the intent to murder C. Notwithstanding A's mistake, C is the person whom he assaulted, and whom he intended to kill. (Reg. v. Smith, supra.)" But the instruction referred to is, it seems, applicable not only to a case of mistaken identity, but perhaps more particularly to the case of aiming at one and hitting another.

Where the defendant, to avenge an injury to his brother, followed a man that he mistakenly supposed to be his brother's assailant, along the road, at night, and wounded him with a knife, the court, in affirming a conviction of assault with intent to kill and murder the person wounded, said: "Thompson was the only person in reach of appellant at the time he committed the offense with which he is charged. He intended to assault that person with a weapon which the jury found to be a deadly weapon. His blows did not miss the object at which they were aimed. He may not have intended to kill Thompson, but he was properly convicted if he intended to kill the man at whom the knife was directed. The evil and specific intent to strike the form before him at the time is manifest, and that form proved to be Thompson. That there was a mistake as to the identity of the person intended to be injured constitutes no defense. If appellant did to Thompson what he intended to do to Morrison, he is as guilty under the statute as if no mistake had been made." McGehee v. State, 62 Miss. 772, 52 Am. Rep. 209.

Upon the trial for an indictment for cutting and wounding W. with intent to do him some grievous bodily harm, where it appeared that the prisoner mistook W. for another man with whom he had been quarreling, Alderson, B., said that he should direct the jury that, if they think the prisoner did to the prosecutor what he intended to do to another man, they should find him guilty, and that if Rex v. Holt, 7 Car. & P. 518, held otherwise, he should overrule it. Reg. v. Lynch, 1 Cox, C. C. 361.

So, in Reg. v. Stopford, 11 Cox. C. C. 643, where the prisoner was charged with wounding H. with intent to do him grievous bodily harm, the fact that he mistakenly supposed H. to be one of a body of men who had assaulted him shortly before was held to be immaterial.

In Rex v. Holt, supra (referred to in the Lynch Case, supra), upon an indictment for shooting at H. with intent to murder him, containing also counts with intent to maim, to disfigure, to disable, and to do him some grievous bodily harm, the jury found that the prisoner shot at H., taking him for L., but hit no one, and had no intent against H., and the court directed an acquittal.

Homicides.

In Brown's Case, 1 East, P. C. 245, 274, where a soldier killed a person whom he supposed to have been one of those who had assaulted him and his comrades, he was held guilty of manslaughter, as that would have been his crime under the circumstances had the deceased been one of those supposed; it appeared that the prisoner had reasonable grounds for the mistake in identity.

Where a person aims at a man and kills the man he aims at, it is immaterial that he supposed the man he aimed at to be another person, or rather it is of no consequence that he would have acted differently had he known that the man that he shot at was not the person that he supposed he was. Jackson v. State, 106 Ala. 12, 17 So. 333. A similar conclusion was reached in Murphy v. State, 108 Ala. 10, 18 So. 557.

If the killing of A would have been murder, the killing of B, taking B for A, is a crime not below the grade of murder. Brown v. State, 147 Ind. 28, 46 N. E. 34.

battery in a civil action. Carlton v. Henry, 129 Ala. 479, 29 So. 924; Thomason v. Gray, 82 Ala. 291, 3 So. 38; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 85.

It has likewise been held by this court, repeatedly, that "any touching by one person of the person of another in rudeness or in anger is an assault and battery, and that every assault and battery includes an assault." Jacobi v. State, 133 Ala. 17, 32 So. 163. Therefore, under all the testimony, the plaintiff was entitled to recover at least nominal damages; and hence charge 2, which was limited to the first count, should have been given.

The evidence was in dispute as to the other count. It attempted to set out the facts as to which there was dispute, and hence the general affirmative charge as to it was properly refused.

Plea 3 was in effect the general issue. While it contained immaterial matter, it was surplusage or inducement merely. In legal effect it was the general issue, and certainly not subject to the grounds of demurrer assigned.

For the error in refusing charge 2, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

Dowdell, Ch. J., and Simpson and McClellan, JJ., concur.

In State v. Dennis, 119 Iowa, 688, 94 N. W. 235, the court, in affirming a conviction of murder in the second degree, said: "That the intended victim was a person other than the deceased is, of course, immaterial. If the purpose and plan was to injure or kill someone, it matters not that a mistake was made in the identity of the person actually assaulted. This is elementary." It may be noticed that it was also held by the court that there was no error in leaving to the jury the question of murder in the first degree.

When a man murders another man, supposing the latter to be a third person, it is none the less murder. Thompkins v. Com. 28 Ky. L. Rep. 642, 90 S. W. 221; mistaken identity will not excuse a killing, nor reduce it from murder to manslaughter. Burchet v. Com. 8 Ky. L. Rep. 258, 1 S. W. 423; and killing from ambush is none the less murder because the person killed was killed in the belief that he was another man. Jennings v. Com. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 79, 16 S. W. 348.

In State v. Clifford, 59 W. Va. 1, 52 S. E. 981, where the judgment was reversed as not sustained by the evidence, and there was some question whether there was not a mistake in the identity of the person at whom the shot was fired, it was held that "in cases where the blow intended for one person, by accident falls upon and kills another, the thing done follows the nature of the thing intended to be done, and the guilt or innocence of the slayer depends upon the same considerations that would have governed had the blow killed the person against whom it was directed. Hence the homicide is murder or manslaughter or excusable homicide, for precisely the same reasons that would have determined its character had the event conformed to the intent, and the principle is the same whether the misadventure proceeded from the misdirection of the blow or from a mistake in the identity of the victim."

For Texas homicide cases, see infra, "Murder in the first degree—exceptions to rule."

Murder in the first degree—same rule.

The same rule applies in murder in the first degree. In People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 75 Pac. 1093, it was held that where a man intending to kill A, by mistake in identity, shoots B and kills B, supposing B to be A, and the crime would have been murder in the first degree had A been the person killed, it is just as much murder in the first degree under the circumstances.

A mistake in identity will not alter a crime from being murder in the first degree. Com. v. Klose, 4 Kulp, 111. See also State v. Dennis, supra.

A crime is no less murder in the first degree because the murderer mistook the identity of the person that he shot and killed. Com. v. Eisenhower, 181 Pa. 470, 59 Am. St. Rep. 670, 37 Atl. 521.

In Clarke v. State, 78 Ala. 474, 56 Am. Rep. 45, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 525, the court in reversing on other grounds a conviction of murder in the first degree, said: "The theory of the state is that the accused shot the deceased, mistaking him for Allen, whom he intended to kill. If this theory be found true by the jury, the defendant is guilty or innocent of the offense charged, the same as if the fatal shot had killed the person for whom it was designed."

In State v. McGonigle, 14 Wash. 594, 45 Pac. 20, where, however, it seems that the case was no more than aiming at one and hitting another, the court in affirming a conviction of murder in the first degree said: "Inasmuch as the undisputed testimony was to the effect that the appellant left the yard after having had some trouble with Eaves, went to the barn, several hundred feet away, armed himself, returned to the house, and deliberately fired upon Eaves, or upon the man whom he supposed to be Eaves, we are unable to say there was not sufficient evidence of deliberation and premeditation to go to the jury."

—exceptions to rule.

In Texas, and possibly in Tennessee, there is an exception to the rule. In Texas the courts hold that, where there is a mistake in identity, the express malice of the first degree of murder is wanting.

In Musick v. State, 21 Tex. App. 69, 18 S. W. 95, where it is impossible to say from the report whether the person killed was the person aimed at or not, but it is clear that the person killed was not the person intended to be killed, the court, in affirming a conviction of murder in the second degree, said: "It would seem to be clear, from the evidence in this case, that the parties (one of whom was this appellant) implicated in the murder of Ownes, the deceased, intended to kill one McElroy, and not Owens. The law applicable to this phase of the case was fully expounded by the trial judge in his able charge to the jury. The rule of common law was that if A shoots at B, with express malice, and by accident or mistake kills C, the offense would be what we call murder in the first degree. Under our Code, to constitute murder of the first degree, or rather a murder upon express malice, it must and can only be a malice directed towards the particular individual, and if another than the one against whom this malice is conceived and entertained be the mistaken victim of such malice, the crime is murder in the second degree."

So, in Leggett v. State, 21 Tex. App. 382, 17 S. W. 159, where there was a mistake in the identity of the person fired at and killed, the court said: "We have heretofore seen that intent is the essence of the crime, and if appellant killed the deceased, believing him to be Frazier, then he would be guilty of the identical crime of which he would have been guilty had he killed Frazier, unless the killing of Frazier would have been murder in the first degree, and then this killing would have been murder in the second degree."

So, in Ferrell v. State, 43 Tex. 503, which it seems probable was not a case of aiming at one and hitting another, but a mistake in the identity of the person at whom the shot was fired and upon whom it took effect, the court reversed a conviction of murder in the first degree, on the ground that under the Texas statute murder in that degree is not committed where there had been a mistake in the identity of the person killed.

And in Wright v. State, 44 Tex. 645, where the defendant killed a person whom he mistakenly supposed to be an escaped convict, and was convicted of murder in the second degree, the court, in affirming the judgment, points out that the trial court excluded the first degree from the consideration of the jury.

The following Texas cases illustrate the doctrine that except as to murder in the first degree, the usual rule applies:

In Angell v. State, 36 Tex. 542, 14 Am. Rep. 380, where in a scuffle in which there were several people, the defendant, meaning to shoot the constable, shot and killed a friend, his conviction of murder in the second degree was affirmed on appeal.

So, in Carter v. State, 30 Tex. App. 551, 2 Am. St. Rep. 944, 17 S. W. 1102, where there was a mistake in the identity of the person killed, and the indictment was for murder in the second degree, the act was considered the same as if there had been no mistake in identity.

So, in Peter v. State, 23 Tex. App. 684, 5 S. W. 228, the court, in affirming the conviction for manslaughter of a constable who committed the homicide in attempting to arrest the brother of the person he was after, he having made a mistake in identity, considered the case for the purposes of the opinion as if there had been no mistake in identity. (It may be said that, while the constable's papers were not regular, the evidence in the case was such that a conviction of manslaughter might have been had, it seems, even if the papers had been regular.)

In White v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 346, 63 L.R.A. 660, 72 S. W. 173, where it appeared that the defendant, after a quarrel with K., left the house, and, turning, shot through the door, killing a woman, and the court instructed the jury that however great his passion, if he knew when he shot that he was shooting at a woman, he was guilty of murder in the second degree, but that if he thought that the person that he was shooting at was K., then his crime was reduced to manslaughter, on appeal a conviction of murder in the second degree was affirmed.

In Tennessee the matter seems left in doubt by Bratton v. State, 10 Humph. 103, where it was held that a person aiming at one man and hitting another could not be convicted of murder in the first degree, and it is, perhaps, possible that the reasoning of the opinion is intended to include the case of mistaken identity, as the decision is placed upon the ground that there must be "a specific intention to take the life of the particular person slain."

The question of care.

The care which is necessary in order to justify or excuse a mistake in identity, where the assailant has cause to assail the person supposed, cannot be more than reasonable care under the circumstances. The circumstances under which such mistakes arise do not generally permit of much delay, and if the case of Crabtree v. Dawson, infra, is intended to exact a greater amount of precaution than reasonable care under the circumstances, it does not seem to be supported by authority.

Where a person is beaten, and retaliates at once upon an innocent bystander, under circumstances, however, which would have led a reasonable man to believe that the blows of the retaliator were necessary for the latter's self-defense, and were given without malice, he is not liable in a civil action for an assault and battery. Paxton v. Boyer, 67 Ill. 132, 16 Am. Rep. 615.

In Isham v. State, 38 Ala. 213, where a slave killed a disguised white man under the belief that he was a runaway slave, it was held that the crime was no greater than if the deceased had been a runaway slave, although the punishment would have been greater, ordinarily, in the case of a slave killing a white man.

In Courvoisier v. Raymond, 23 Colo. 113, 47 Pac. 284, where at a time of riot in the night the defendant shot a policeman, claiming that he thought the policeman was one of the rioters who was advancing upon him in such a manner as to make him think that his life was in danger, the court held, in a civil action for the assault, that the question to be considered was: "If the jury believed, from the evidence, that the defendant would have been justified in shooting one of the rioters had such person advanced towards him as did the plaintiff, then it became important to determine whether the defendant mistook plaintiff for one of the rioters, and if such a mistake was in fact made, was it excusable in the light of all the circumstances leading up to and surrounding the commission of the act?" —the court holding further that if these issues had been resolved by the jury, in favor of the defendant, he would have been entitled to a judgment.

In State v. Spaulding, 34 Minn. 361, 25 N. W. 793, where a conviction of murder in the first degree for the killing of one Washburn was reversed, the defendant offered to prove by his wife that one Andrews had grossly insulted and abused her in his absence, and had made threats to kill defendant, which had that day been communicated to him; and that in the afternoon of that day Andrews had attempted to carry these threats into execution; that he was a hard character; and that defendant had good reason to believe, at the time of the shooting, that this man, who turned out to be Washburn, was Andrews. The court said as to this offer: "This was offered as one entire proposition, and as such was properly rejected. In view of another trial, however, it is proper to say that so much of the offer as proposed to prove that the threats of Andrews were communicated to defendant, and the alleged attempt to kill him on the same day, might be considered material, in connection with the fact of the existence of hostile feelings or a quarrel between them, as tending to support defendant's theory of the case, and to explain the fact of his being armed in expectation of an attack, and as bearing on the question of premeditation. So, also, any legitimate evidence tending to show that defendant mistook Washburn for Andrews would be proper."

In Cook's Case, Cro. Car. 538, reference is made to the case of William Levin, wherein it appeared that Levin's maid servant aroused him in the night for fear of burglars, and that the servant, having a friend in the house, hid her down stairs, and Levin coming down, being informed by his wife that there was someone in the room where this woman had been hid, entered there in the dark, and thrusting with his rapier before him, killed the woman, and it was 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

held that he was not guilty of manslaughter, as he did it ignorantly, without intent to injure her.

See also Brown's Case, supra.

In Crabtree v. Dawson, 119 Ky. 148, 67 L.R.A. 565, 115 Am. St. Rep. 243, 83 S. W. 557, the appellate court said: "If the defendant, at the time he struck the plaintiff, believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that he was Ollie Noble, and that he further believed that it was necessary, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to strike Noble, in order to defend himself from threatened attack about to be made upon him by Noble, and that he used no more force than was necessary, for this purpose, then he is excused on the ground of self-defense and apparent necessity. But it was the duty of the defendant to have exercised the highest degree of care practicable under the circumstances to have ascertained whether the person whom he was about to strike was in fact the one whom he believed him to be, and from whom he apprehended danger to himself." And it was also held that it was error to charge the jurors that only ordinary care and diligence was required from the defendant under the circumstances, as that which was required was "the highest or utmost care practicable under the circumstances by which he was surrounded." ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

HUGH McCONNELL, Appt.

ERPHIE McCONNELL.

(— Ark. —, 136 S. W. 931.)

Husband and wife — separation agreement — unfairness — setting aside.

1. A separation agreement by which a man worth from $15,000 to $60,000 pays his wife, who has nothing, is in distress, and with no one to look to for advice, $500 in lieu of all interest in his estate, will be set aside as unfair.

Appeal — interference — alimony.

2. The allowance of $50 per month as alimony to a wife having no property, against a man worth from $15,000 to Note. — Validity of agreement to pay attorney a percentage of amount obtained as alimony.

The authorities support the holding in McCONNELL v. McCONNELL, that an agreement to pay an attorney for his services in procuring a divorce a percentage of the amount obtained is invalid. Brindley v. Brindley, 121 Ala. 429, 25 So. 751; Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 50 L.R.A. 548, 61 Pac. 907; Jordan v. Westerman, 62 Mich. 170, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836, 28 N. W. 826; McCurdy v. Dillon, 135 Mich. 678, 98 N. W. 746; Lynde v. Lynde, 64 N. J. Eq. 736, 53 $60,000, who causes the wife to leave the home because of his siding with his sister in her attempt to control the affairs of the house, will not be interfered with on appeal.

Attorney — divorce proceeding — contract for share of alimony.

3. An agreement by a woman to pay her attorney a percentage of the alimony recovered in a suit for divorce against her husband is void as against public policy.

Appeal — divorce — counsel fees — agreement for compensation.

4. No presumption that a woman will perform her invalid contract to give her attorney a share of the allowance secured in a divorce proceeding as alimony will prevent the appellate court from affirming a special allowance for counsel fees made by the trial court.

(March 13, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Greene County Chancery Court, dismissing the complaint and allowing plaintiff alimony in an action for divorce. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. D. Block and Huddleston & Taylor, for appellant:

There is no attempt in the original complaint to set out any of the several statutory causes for divorce, and any other than a legal cause is no cause, and the demurrer should have been sustained.

Rosewater v. Schwab Clothing Co. 58 Ark. 446, 25 S. W. 73; Phillips v. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 72 Ark. 478, 81 S. W. 605; Martin v. Royster, 8 Ark. 74; Chapline v. Robertson, 44 Ark. 202; Fordyce v. Merrill, 49 Ark. 277, 5 S. W. 329.

If a wife needs money to enable her to secure legal advice and assistance, she should have a suitable allowance; but if she has secured attorneys by an agreement for a contingent fee, then no allowance should be made.

The invalidity has been placed on the ground of champerty. Brindley v. Brindley, 121 Ala. 429, 25 So. 751.

In Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 50 L.R.A. 548, 61 Pac. 907, the court said: "Contracts for contingent fees paid attorneys were not tolerated at all at common law, but in this, and perhaps most of the states, such contracts are allowed, if not favored. This is on the ground that otherwise a party without the means to employ an attorney and pay his fee certain, and having a meritorious cause of action or defense, would find himself powerless to protect his rights. In divorce cases, however, the law has taken care that the wife shall not be without assistance in proper cases, either to prosecute or defend such actions. The court in its discretion may require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife not only to support herself, but also to prosecute or defend the action, and is given ample power to enforce such order. The reason or necessity therefor does not exist in such cases as in the others for allowing contingent attorneys' fees, and where the reason ceases the rule or law also ceases."

The invalidity of such an agreement has also been placed on the ground that the contract is, in its nature, against the policy of the law and contrary to good morals, as facilitating divorce and preventing reconciliation. Newman v. Freitas, supra; Jordan v. Westerman, 62 Mich. 170, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836, 28 N. W. 826; McCurdy v. Dillon, 135 Mich. 678, 98 N. W. 746; Lynde v. Lynde, 64 N. J. Eq. 736, 58 L.R.A. 471, 97 Am. St. Rep. 692, 52 Atl. 694.

In Jordan v. Westerman, supra, the agreement was held void notwithstanding the existence of a statutory provision "that all existing laws, rules, and provisions of law restricting or controlling the right of a party to agree with an attorney, solicitor, or counsel for his compensation, are repealed, and hereafter the measure of such compensation shall be left to the agreement, express or implied, of the parties."

An agreement to give an attorney a percentage of the alimony as compensation for his services has been declared invalid on the ground that the subject-matter is not capable of being assigned, since the purpose of alimony is the support of the wife, and since the statutes provide for compensation of the attorney. Jordan v. Westerman, 62 Mich. 170, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836, 28 N. W. 826; Lynde v. Lynde, 64 N. J. Eq. 736, 58 L.R.A. 471, 97 Am. St. Rep. 692, 52 Atl. 694.

Where the contract of an attorney with a wife suing for divorce is invalid because she contracts to give him a percentage of alimony recovered, he may recover what his services are reasonably worth. McCurdy v. Dillon, 135 Mich. 678, 98 N. W. 746.

Where an order of the court to pay alimony and suit money is reversed because the court had considered an invalid contract of the wife to give her attorney as his fee a portion of the amount allowed to her, the reversing order will be without out sufficient cause and against his will, he is not liable for her maintenance elsewhere, and she cannot bind him.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for divorce and alimony instituted by Erphie McConnell against Hugh McConnell. Plaintiff and defendant were married in Missouri on August 12, 1906, and soon afterwards came to defendant's home, at Paragould, Arkansas, and lived there until their separation on April 9, 1908. At the time of their marriage plaintiff was twenty-three and defendant was fifty years old. Defendant was a man of considerable property, and plaintiff had nothing. When they separated, they executed a written agreement, whereby plaintiff was to receive $500 in lieu of all her claims or interest of any kind whatever in her husband's property. When they separated, plaintiff went to her mother, and has not lived in the state of Arkansas since that time. She alleged in her complaint that her husband drove her from his home and refused to live with her for more than one year before she instituted the action. She also alleged matters which, if true, amounted to such in-prejudice to a new application for alimony and counsel fees. Van Vleck v. Van Vleck, 21 App. Div. 272, 47 N. Y. Supp. 470, s. c. 21 App. Div. 631, 47 N. Y. Supp. 472.

If the court discovers during the progress of a divorce action that it is being prosecuted on a contingent fee no attorney fee will be allowed. Brindley v. Brindley, 121 Ala. 429, 25 So. 751; Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. 345; White v. White, 86 Cal. 212, 24 Pac. 1030.

And when the agreement is that the attorney is to get a percentage of what the wife obtains, and this fact is not known when an attorney fee is allowed, but is discovered after final judgment in favor of the husband, but before the attorney fee is paid, the allowance of the fee will be rescinded. Brindley v. Brindley, 121 Ala. 429, 25 So. 751.

In Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. 345, it was held that pending an action for divorce the wife has no necessity entitling her to an allowance for counsel fees, when 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

her attorneys are faithfully and satisfactorily acting for her, in pursuance of an agreement whereby they are to have, as compensation for their services, a contingent interest in the result of the litigation.

But if more than one counsel is necessary, the fact that one attorney had an agreement with the wife to prosecute the action for a contingent fee will not prevent an allowance to the other attorney, who performed services in ignorance of such agreement. White v. White, 86 Cal. 212, 24 Pac. 1030, s. c. 86 Cal. 216, 24 Pac. 1031.

W. 19, holding that an agreement by a client to transfer certain property and pay his attorneys a lump sum to get him a divorce and settle his wife's claim for alimony in an action against him for the annulment of the marriage is champertous as speculating on the terms of settlement, and is against public policy as facilitating divorce. R. A. E.

dignities as to render her condition in life intolerable. The suit was commenced in the fall of 1909.

The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint. During the pendency of the suit, the court allowed plaintiff temporary alimony and also an attorneys' fee in the sum of $100. On final hearing the chancellor found that plaintiff was not entitled to a divorce; but that she was entitled to alimony. A decree was entered, dismissing her complaint for divorce, for want of equity, and allowing her permanent alimony in the sum of $50 per month, and setting aside the agreement of the parties in regard to the rights and interest of the wife in her husband's property, made at the time of their separation. The court also refused to allow any additional attorneys' fee. The case is here on appeal.

On the whole case we think the decision of the chancellor was correct. In cases of this sort we do not think any useful purpose can be served by setting out in detail the evidence, or making extended comments on it. We deem it sufficient to say that a careful consideration of the testimony leads us to the conclusion that there is no sufficient reason why the parties to this suit should not keep the vows made by them at the marriage altar, and live together as husband and wife. No charge of immoral conduct is made by either. Neither appears to have any settled hatred or antipathy for the other. It appears that they had no marital troubles until in October, 1907, when a sister of the defendant came to live with them. She had an equal share in her brother's residence, and they owned other property in common. She seems to have had a desire to take charge of the household, and the plaintiff naturally resented her actions in this regard. The defendant became involved in the trouble and jealousy thus engendered, and participated in the quarrels. The quarrels between plaintiff and defendant grew more frequent and more violent, and finally culminated in their separation, which, as above stated, occurred on April 9, 1908. Shortly after their separation plaintiff brought suit against Mollie McConnell, the sister of defendant, alleging that she had alienated her husband's affections from her. Plaintiff dismissed this suit, and subsequently the sister of defendant died.

It appears that the parties to the suit, during its pendency, have at different times sought a reconciliation; but it seems that they have never been of that mind at the same time, and it is difficult for us to determine whether such efforts have been made in good faith, or for the purpose of obtaining some benefit in the trial of this case. We are inclined to the latter opinion. However, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff failed to establish her grounds for divorce, and that the decision of the chancellor in dismissing her complaint for divorce was correct. But it does not follow, as contended by counsel for defendant, that he erred, either in setting aside their separation agreement, or in allowing her permanent alimony, payable in monthly instalments. The facts in this case are not like those in either the case of Pryor v. Proyor, 88 Ark. 302, 129 Am. St. Rep. 102, 114 S. W. 700, or that of Shirey v. Shirey, 87 Ark. 184, 112 S. W. 369. In the Pryor Case, the agreement was made during the pendency of the suit for divorce and by consent of parties was made part of the decree, and was found to be fair and reasonable. The contract in the Shirey Case was an antenuptial one, and the court held that it was not characterized by fairness and good faith.

Contracts like the one in question are controlled by the principles announced in the case of Bowers v. Hutchinson, 67 Ark. 15, 53 S. W. 399. The court said: "In this country the courts, as a general rule, have enforced covenants and promises in deeds of separation relating to the maintenance of the wife and property, provided they are based upon a sufficient consideration, are fair and equal, are reasonable in their terms, and are not the result of fraud or coercion, and the separation has actually taken place when the agreement is entered into, or immediately follows."

In the case at bar the contract was made when the separation took place. The record does not definitely show what defendant is worth, but his property is variously estimated from $15,000 to $60,000. It is conceded that plaintiff has nothing. At the time of their separation, when the agreement under consideration was made, plaintiff was in great distress and far away from anyone whom she could look to for advice, and it seems that she trusted entirely to her husband's sense of fairness in the matter. The agreement was made at his request, and, when all these matters are considered in connection with the amount and value of the defendant's estate, we do not think that the provisions made for the plaintiff in the contract were fair and just. Therefore the chancellor was right in setting it aside. While, as above stated, the evidence was not sufficient to justify the chancellor in entering a decree of divorce for the plaintiff, we think it does show that the defendant was more to blame for the separation than the plaintiff. It was his duty to cleave to his wife in preference to his sister.

It is also the duty of the husband to support his wife, and, under the facts and circumstances of this case, we hold that the allowance of alimony made by the chancellor in the final decree should not now be disturbed. Shirey v. Shirey, 87 Ark. 175, 112 S. W. 369.

The allowance of alimony is always subject to modification by the chancellor, to meet the changed situation and condition of the parties in interest.

We have already expressed the view that there are no insurmountable obstacles to prevent these parties from again living together happily; and if in the future either party manifests a bona fide intention to return to the other, and if after a reasonable time, his or her efforts at reconciliation are refused, such refusal will amount to wilful abandonment, and the chancellor will be justified in so treating it.

We now come to the question of attorney's fees. It is shown that the plaintiff made an agreement with her attorney that he should receive a portion of whatever property, real or personal, that should be awarded her out of her husband's estate. An agreement by a wife to pay her attorney, in a suit for divorce and alimony against her husband, a certain per cent of such sums as the court should award her for alimony, is void as against public policy. 2 Nelson, Div. & Sep. § 88; 14 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 763; Van Vleck v. Van Vleck, 21 App. Div. 272, 47 N. Y. Supp. 470; Jordan v. Westerman, 62 Mich. 170, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836, 28 N. W. 826. In the last case the court said (quoting from syllabus): "Public policy is interested in maintaining the family relation, the interests of society requiring that such relation be not lightly severed, and that families shall not be broken up for inadequate causes or from unworthy motives; and where differences have arisen, which threaten disruption, public welfare and the good of society demand a reconciliation, if practicable or possible; and for these reasons a contract which tends to prevent such a reconciliation is void."

Now it is contended by counsel for defendant that, although such contract is void, there is no presumption that the wife will not fulfil it, and that, where her attorney has faithfully and satisfactorily acted for her in pursuance of an agreement for a contingent interest in the result of the litigation, there is no necessity entitling her to an allowance for attorneys' fees, and they contend that the court erred in allowing the sum of $100 for her counsel fees. They rely upon the cases of White v. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

White, 6 Cal. 212, 24 Pac. 1030, and Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. 345. We do not agree with their contention. It appears that the attorney made the agreement for a contingent fee in this case in good faith, and doubtless when he made it he believed it was a valid contract.

The allowance of alimony is within the sound discretion of the court, and the chancellor is entitled to know all the facts which would influence him in fixing the amount.

The chancellor made no special findings of fact in this case. We will not assume that he made an allowance of alimony and also of counsel fees to be paid by the husband, knowing that the wife had contracted to pay a percentage of the alimony awarded her to her solicitor. On the contrary, we will presume that, before the allowance was made, the parties to the contract had ascertained that the contract for a contingent fee was void as against public policy, and that it was treated by them and by the court as having no binding force whatever when the application for alimony and counsel fees was heard and granted.

The decree will be affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

SEATON MOUNTAIN ELECTRIC LIGHT, HEAT, & POWER COMPANY et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

IDAHO SPRINGS INVESTMENT COMPANY et al.

(49 Colo. 122, 111 Pac. 834.)

Corporation — public service — steam heat — regulations — validity.

1. A rule adopted by a corporation organized to supply electric light and steam heat to the inhabitants of a municipal corporation, and which, under a franchise from the municipality, has placed conduits for that purpose in the public streets, to the effect

Note. — Right of public-service corporation performing two distinct kinds of service to refuse to furnish one without the other.

In the absence of some qualification made at the time a public-service corporation which undertakes to perform two distinct kinds of service is granted its charter, reserving to it the right to furnish one kind of service only when the other is also furnished, it seems clear that no such right exists. The unreasonableness of upholding such a right would seem to be well illustrated by the case of a corporation formed, that steam for heat will be supplied only to persons taking electricity from the company, is unreasonable, and cannot be enforced to deprive persons who do not take electricity, of the right to steam.

Same — by-product — right to control.

2. That a corporation undertaking to furnish electricity and steam heat to inhabitants of a municipal corporation, and securing from the municipality a franchise for that purpose, intends to use only the exhaust steam from the plant which manufactures the electricity, to supply the heat, does not, on the ground that such heat is merely a by-product, and that it could not furnish steam alone without loss, entitle it to deny the right to it to others than users of electricity.

Injunction — pleadings — absence of evidence.

3. An injunction will be granted on a complaint which is not supported by testimony, if it alleges facts stating a cause of action, and defendant fails to establish the affirmative defense, which is necessary to defeat recovery, and which is controverted by plaintiff's reply.

as is usual and common, to supply both gas and electricity for lighting purposes. Such a result clearly could not have been intended from the mere granting of the charter to such a corporation since it would deprive a large majority of citizens not able to utilize it of the use of either mode of lighting, or at least place them at the mercy of a corporation to which had been granted the valuable right of the use of the public streets.

As would be expected, few cases have passed upon the question here considered.

In State ex rel. Deeney v. Butte Electric & Power Co. — Mont. —, 115 Pac. 44, where it only appeared that the defendant was empowered by its franchise to furnish electricity, it was held that a rule that it would not serve electricity to anyone who stole its gas, until all reasonable charges for gas and electricity were paid, was unreasonable.

The court said: "It is not alleged that the defendant possesses a franchise to supply gas to the inhabitants of Butte. So far as it appears, its engagement in the manufacture and distribution of gas may be wholly without a franchise. If this is so, this part of its business stands upon the same footing as would dealing by it in electrical fixtures and other merchandise of the same character. No one would contend for a moment that a rule declaring that the defendant could cease to furnish electricity to any person who should be in default of payment of a bill for merchandise of the description mentioned would be within the purview of the powers granted by the franchise. It may be that the defendant has a gas franchise. That it has, however, is at best not a just inference from anything stated in the answer, but rather an inference from facts the existence of which rests altogether

Same — issue undisposed of — effect.

4. That an issue of fact is undisposed of will not prevent the entry of judgment on the pleadings, if the same judgment must be entered regardless of what the findings might have been upon such issue.

Same — discontinuance of service by public-service corporation.

5. Injunction will lie to prevent a public-service corporation from wrongfully ceasing to furnish steam to a consumer for heating purposes, after the proper connections have once been made and the service has begun.

Same — defense — maintenance.

6. A corporation which has undertaken to furnish steam to the public for heating purposes cannot defeat an action to enjoin it from discontinuing service to a consumer, on the ground that the expenses of the suit would be paid by a rival corporation for the purpose of inducing the consumer to start litigation in order to harass and annoy the defendant.

(November 14, 1910.)

in surmise. The allegation on this subject is a mere conclusion. It is a crime to steal gas. Rev. Codes, § 8659. But the defendant has no more right to use its franchise to protect its private gas business, than it would have to protect its private merchandise business. Upon the facts as presented in this case, the relator was entitled to have the defendant furnish to him electricity upon the same footing with every other citizen. The defendant might prosecute him in the courts for a violation of the law, but could not assume to itself the power to punish him for the violation of a rule which it had no power to adopt."

In Snell v. Clinton Electric Light Heat & P. Co. 196 Ill. 626, 58 L.R.A. 284, 89 Am. St. Rep. 341, 63 N. E. 1082, it was held that an electric light company could not make payment for a transformer a condition of furnishing electricity to one whose building was wired by a third person, where it furnished transformers free of charge for buildings wired by itself, although it considered that the profits from the wiring justified furnishing transformers without extra charge.

The court said: "The transformer is just as much a necessary appliance in lighting houses as the pole on which it is fastened, or the wire that carries the electricity, or the boilers, and dynamo used in generating it. It is entirely immaterial who does the wiring of the house,—the electric light company or some other party; the transformer is necessary in either case. If the company does the wiring, that is a business distinct from that of furnishing electricity for lighting purposes, just as the putting in of gas and water pipes into a house is a distinct business from furnishing the gas or water to flow through them."

ERROR to the District Court for Clear Creek County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to enjoin defendants from shutting off plaintiffs' steam heat. Affirmed.

Statement by Gabbert, J.:

The material facts necessary to consider in determining the questions presented are, substantially, as follows: The Seaton Mountain Electric Light, Heat, & Power Company is a corporation organized for the purpose of manufacturing and selling electric light, heat, and power to the residents and inhabitants of the city of Idaho Springs, and has secured from the latter franchises authorizing it to carry on that business within the limits of the municipality. Pursuant to the authority thus obtained, the company installed pipes and other appliances in, through, and under the streets, avenues, and alleys of the city, for the purpose of supplying heat by means of steam. The parties named as defendants in error, at their own cost and expense, installed, or caused to be installed, in buildings which they owned or occupied, pipes, radiators, and other steam-heating fixtures and appliances, and by and with the consent of the Seaton Company connected such appliances with the pipe lines of the Seaton Company, and the latter, for several years, has been supplying steam to the defendants in error for heating purposes, which was utilized through these appliances. During this period these parties were obtaining electric current to light their respective buildings from another electric light company and its successor. The Gem Leasing Company was carrying on the business of supplying steam which the Seaton Company had contracted to furnish under some arrangement with the latter company. In August, 1907, the Gem Company caused to be served upon the defendants in error a notice to the effect that steam would not be supplied for heating purposes to any party or parties whomsoever unless they should at the same time use electric current supplied by the Seaton Company for lighting the premises in which steam obtained from that Company was used for heating, and that, on and after October 1st following, steam would not be supplied for heating purposes, except under such conditions. Shortly after the service of this notice, the defendants in error, as plaintiffs, brought suit, the purpose of which was to enjoin the plaintiffs in error, as defendants, from enforcing the condition stated in their notice; the averments of fact in their complaint being substantially as above stated.

The answer of the defendants, so far as

material, and which we shall designate their "first defense," was as follows: It admitted that notice had been given, to the effect that steam for heating purposes would not be supplied the plaintiffs after the 1st of October, 1907, unless they used electric current supplied or furnished by the Seaton Company to light their buildings heated by such steam, and averred that it was their purpose to shut off from plaintiffs and refuse to supply them with steam on and after that date, unless the conditions of such notice were complied with. For further and separate answer, which we shall call the "second defense," they alleged that the principal product of the Seaton Company was electric current for light; that in manufacturing such current during certain portions of the year steam was employed; that the exhaust steam was used in supplying heat; that this exhaust was limited in its amount; that the heat supplied from this source was not more than sufficient to supply patrons of the company who purchased from it current for lighting purposes; and that, if they (the defendants) were required to furnish heat to others than its patrons taking light, it would be compelled to generate live steam, which would increase the expense of operating its plant. For further and separate answer, and as their last defense, they alleged that the suit was not being prosecuted by plaintiffs in good faith, for the reason that they had entered into an agreement with the United Hydro Electric Company, a competitor of the Seaton Company, whereby the Hydro Company had agreed to pay all expenses incurred by plaintiffs in the prosecution of their action, and that the Hydro Company had entered into the above arrangement with the plaintiffs to start litigation in order to harass and annoy the defendants, and for the purpose of gaining an unfair advantage over its competitor, the Seaton Company.

Thereafter the cause came on for hearing on the application of plaintiffs for a preliminary injunction, which was granted, restraining and enjoining the defendants from shutting off from plaintiffs steam heat, and directing that they continue to supply such heat to plaintiffs until the further order of the court. Afterwards the plaintiffs demurred to the last defense and the one preceding, which we have designated the "second." The demurrer as to the latter was overruled, and sustained as to the former. Plaintiffs then filed a replication, the purpose of which was to put in issue averments and allegations of the second defense. In this state of the pleadings, the case came on for final hearing before the court. Plaintiffs stated that they did not desire to offer any evidence, but rested their case on the pleadings. Thereupon the defendants moved to dissolve the preliminary injunction and dismiss the case, which motion was overruled, when the defendants informed the court that they did not desire to offer any evidence, whereupon judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs, to the effect that the preliminary injunction be made permanent. The defendants have brought the case here for review on error.

Mr. E. M. Sabin for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. A. D. Bullis and F. L. Collom, for defendants in error:

Defendant is legally bound to furnish steam heat to all persons living along the line of the streets through which the mains have been laid, and who have installed the necessary fixtures and appliances for receiving said heat.

Gabbert, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Quasi public corporations are required to serve the inhabitants of the territory in which they operate in the capacity for which they are organized, and in which they have secured a franchise; but have the right to prescribe for their convenience and security and the protection of the public such rules and regulations, with which their patrons must comply, as are reasonable and just. The reason for this rule is that, although quasi public corporations operating in cities under a franchise obtained from municipal authorities are organized for private gain, the consideration for permitting them to occupy the streets of towns and cities to carry on their business is that thereby the inhabitants of such municipalities may be furnished with conveniences and necessities; hence it follows that, in return for the right to install appliances in the public streets, they assume the duty to furnish the commodities conducted through such appliances, to the inhabitants of the city granting such right, without discrimination and without denial except for good and sufficient cause. The Seaton Company is a corporation organized for the purpose of manufacturing and selling electric light and steam or water heat, has a franchise from the city of Idaho Springs to carry on that business within its corporate limits, has installed pipes and other appliances in and under the streets, through which to conduct the steam or water intended for heating purposes, and must, therefore, supply such of the inhabitants of that municipality with its products as comply with such rules and regulations of the company as it may lawfully impose; but such regulations must be reasonable, just, and lawful, not capricious, arbitrary, oppressive, or unreasonable; neither can they be discriminatory. Watauga Water Co. v. Wolfe, 99 Tenn. 429, 63 Am. St. Rep. 841, 41 S. W. 1060; Shiras v. Ewing, 48 Kan. 170, 29 Pac. 320; Shepard v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 6 Wis. 539, 70 Am. Dec. 479; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1160-1163; 2 Beach, Corp. § 835; Portland Natural Gas & Oil Co. v. State, 135 Ind. 54, 21 L.R.A. 639, 34 N. E. 818; Haugen v. Albina Light & Water Co. 21 Or. 411, 14 L.R.A. 424, 28 Pac. 244; Owensboro Gaslight Co. v. Hildebrand, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 993, 42 S. W. 351.

The first important question, then, to determine is whether or not the condition imposed by the notice which the defendants served upon plaintiffs is reasonable. It is clear from its own reading that it is not. Plaintiffs are required to take electric current for lighting purposes as a condition precedent to being furnished with steam for heat. This is simply coercion, and an attempt on the part of the defendants to compel the plaintiffs to purchase electric current which they may not want or need. If they can be permitted to do this, then they can also say to plaintiffs. "We will not furnish you with electric current unless you also take steam." It is their privilege to determine whether they desire one or both of the commodities which the Seaton Company manufactures and sells, and a condition which imposes an obligation to take both or neither is not only unreasonable, but capricious, arbitrary, oppressive, and discriminatory.

Counsel for defendants contend that generating electricity for light and power purposes, as stated in the answer, is the principal business of the Seaton Company, and that the exhaust steam which is used for supplying heat is a by-product produced by the generation of electric current for light and power; that, if the steam-heating proposition were to be run independently, it could not be operated at a profit; that these circumstances and conditions must be considered in determining the reasonableness of the condition imposed by the notice; and that the defendants should not be compelled to furnish a by-product of the electric light plant, unless it is furnished in conjunction with the principal product, namely, electricity. While it is true that the Seaton Company is engaged in manufacturing and selling electric current, and utilizes the exhaust steam from the plant used in manufacturing the electric current for the purpose of furnishing heat, the business of the Seaton Company, so far as these two products are concerned, is separate and distinct. It did not secure a franchise from the city merely to furnish heat from a by-product or exhaust steam, but obtained the right to place and maintain underground lines of pipe under and through the streets, "for the purpose of conducting, transmitting, and distributing heat, either hot water or steam, for the purchase and use by said city and the residents and citizens thereof." It cannot excuse its proposed action on the ground that furnishing steam alone will entail a loss which can be avoided if electric current is also taken by the consumer for lighting purposes; neither will it be permitted to impose the condition that a consumer must purchase both of its products in order that its profits may be increased or loss prevented. The fallacy of the argument of counsel is at once apparent when we come to consider the conditions to which it would lead if upheld. If the Seaton Company, in manufacturing electric current, generated an excess of steam, it could require patrons, or those who proposed to become patrons, to purchase steam as a condition precedent to being supplied with electric current, although they might not require or have any use for steam heat whatever, should the contention of counsel for defendants be upheld. The results which would follow if defendants were permitted to enforce the condition of their notice at once stamp it as unreasonable and unjust. The consumer has the right to determine for himself which commodity he will take. It must be borne in mind that what has been said, in passing upon the condition which the defendants sought to impose by the notice under consideration, is limited to that condition, under the facts of this case, relative to that subject.

It is next urged that the court erred in making the injunction permanent without testimony. A plaintiff need not prove what is alleged in his complaint and admitted by the answer. Cowan v. Cowan, 16 Colo. 335, 26 Pac. 934; Michael v. Mills, 22 Colo. 439, 45 Pac. 429. The answer admitted the notice set up in the complaint, and in addition alleged that it was the intention of the defendants to enforce its terms. The sole question presented to the court under the pleadings was whether the condition which the defendants sought to impose by the notice was reasonable. On its face it is not, and it was incumbent upon the defense to plead facts which would justify the condition which they sought to impose upon the plaintiffs. If the defendants pleaded any such facts, they should have introduced evidence to establish them, for the reason that the burden of proving a fact rests upon the one who asserts the affirmative of an issue. Little Pittsburg Consol. Min. Co. v. Little Chief Consol. Min. Co. 11 Colo. 223, 7 Am. St. Rep. 226, 17 Pac. 760, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 655; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 774. They sought to present this issue by pleading facts to the effect that the exhaust steam from the plant was but a by-product, and utilized for furnishing heat, and that they could not afford to furnish the latter to a patron unless he also purchased electric current for lighting purposes from them. If this was a good defense, it was affirmative in its nature, was controverted by plaintiffs, and the burden rested with defendants to establish it, and as they declined to offer any testimony, there was nothing for the court to consider on the subject of the reasonableness of the condition imposed by defendants imposing it. We have determined, however, that this defense was not good, and this brings us to a consideration of the next proposition urged by counsel for the defendants, to the effect that a judgment on the pleadings should not have prevailed when an issue of fact tendered by the answer was undisposed of.

A motion for judgment upon the pleadings should be sustained when, under the admitted facts, the moving party would be entitled to judgment on the merits, without regard to what the findings might be upon the facts upon which issue is joined. Mills v. Hart, 24 Colo. 505, 65 Am. St. Rep. 241, 52 Pac. 680; Harris v. Harris, 9 Colo. App. 211, 47 Pac. 841. This proposition rules the case at bar. From what we have already said, any finding of fact which the court might have made after hearing testimony on the issues tendered by the portion of the answer under consideration would not have affected the rights of the parties to the action, or authorized any judgment different from that pronounced on the facts conclusively established by the pleadings of the respective parties. This is not a case where the defense interposed was defective, either in form or substance, but one where the facts therein stated could not affect the rights of the parties, whatever the finding of the court thereon might have been had testimony been introduced and considered. Aside from this, as already stated, the court properly disregarded this defense, when the defendants declined to introduce testimony to establish it; its averments being controverted by plaintiffs.

It is next urged that mandamus was the proper remedy, and that injunction is not. The Seaton Company was already furnishing steam for heating to the plaintiffs, but had notified them that after a certain date steam would be cut off, unless a condition, which we have determined could not be enforced, was complied with. Mandamus is a common-law remedy to compel action; injunction an equitable remedy to prevent action and maintain the parties in statu quo; so that a person desiring a commodity manufactured and sold by a quasi public corporation may resort to mandamus to compel a supply when the supply has not yet been commenced; and in equity, when the supply is being furnished, to enjoin its stoppage. 13 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 500; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1164; Golden Canal Co. v. Bright, 8 Colo. 144, 6 Pac. 142; Sickles v. Manhattan Gaslight Co. 66 How. Pr. 314.

The final question urged upon our attention is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the last defense. The weight of authority supports the rule that a champertous contract for the prosecution of a cause of action cannot be interposed as a defense, but can only be set up between the parties when the champertous agreement itself is sought to be enforced. 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 881; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 830 et seq.; Hammon Contr. p. 429 §§ 239 et seq., Pennsylvania Co. v. Lombardo, 49 Ohio St. 1, 14 L.R.A. 785, 29 N. E. 573; Burnes v. Scott, 117 U. S. 582, 29 L. ed. 991, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865; Forbes v. Mohr, 69 Kan. 342, 76 Pac. 827; Gage v. Downey, 79 Cal. 140, 21 Pac. 527, 855; Currency Min. Co. v. Bentley, 10 Colo. App. 271, 50 Pac. 920. There are, perhaps, some exceptions to this rule, but the case at bar does not fall within any of them.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

OKLAHOMA CITY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

GEORGE REED.

(17 Okla. 518, 87 Pac. 645.)

Municipal corporation — defective street — injury — presumption of negligence.

In an action against a municipal corporation for personal injuries, there is no presumption that the plaintiff or defendant is guilty of negligence, and in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, it is sufficient for him to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence, with nothing in the circumstances establishing contributory negligence, on his part; and when such facts are proven, it devolves upon the defendant to prove affirmatively that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

(Burford, Ch. J., dissents.)

(September 7, 1906.)

ERROR to the District Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Mr. G. A. Paul, for plaintiff in error:

If plaintiff could, by the exercise of reasonable prudence, have avoided the injuries, he cannot recover.

Guthrie v. Thistle, 5 Okla. 517, 49 Pac. 1003; Pitman v. El Reno, 2 Okla. 414, 37 Pac. 851, 4 Okla. 638, 46 Pac. 495; Guthrie v. Swan, 6 Okla. 423, 41 Pac. 84; Oklahoma City v. Reed, 87 Pac. 645.

Hainer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by George Reed against the city of Oklahoma City, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him on account of the negligence of the city in maintaining a dangerous obstruction on the sidewalk of one of its public streets. The cause was tried to a jury, and the plaintiff recovered a verdict for $500, and judgment was entered in accordance therewith. From this judgment the city appeals.

It is assigned as error that the plaintiff's amended petition fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and therefore the court erred in not sustaining the defendant's objection to the introduction of evidence. Plaintiff in error contends that the amended petition did not sufficiently aver that the plaintiff was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of ordinary care, and free from fault or negligence on his part. And it is further contended that it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege and prove that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. And in support of this contention the plaintiff in error has cited the case of Pittman v. El Reno, 4 Okla. 638, 46 Pac. 495, where the court laid down the rule that in a case where a municipal corporation is charged with negligence, "it was the duty of the plaintiff to establish in his case in chief the fact that he was not guilty of contributing in any manner to the injury received." We do not think the amended petition is subject to this objection.

The material averments of the amended petition were that the city had maintained, for a period of more than one year, a water hydrant about 22 inches high, and extending in the sidewalk about 40 inches from the outer edge thereof. That on the night of December 24, 1902, while the plaintiff was exercising due and proper care, and without fault on his part, he stumbled on and over said hydrant, and then and there fell on said sidewalk, whereby he sustained great and permanent injuries, having his right arm broken, etc. It will thus be seen that the plaintiff's amended petition not only charges the municipality with negligence, but also alleges that at the time the plaintiff received the injuries he was exercising due and proper care and that such injuries occurred without fault on his part. It is true, as stated by counsel for plaintiff in error, that a municipal corporation has the power to construct and maintain fire hydrants for the use and protection of the city. But while it has the right to construct and maintain such hydrants, they should not be placed in such a position as to obstruct and be an object highly dangerous to pedestrians who are traveling upon the sidewalks in accordance with the usual modes of travel. A municipal corporation is bound by law to use ordinary care to keep its sidewalks, as well as its streets, in reasonably safe condition for public use, in the ordinary modes of travel, by night as well as by day. And if it fails to do so, it is liable for injuries sustained by reason of such negligence. Norman v. Teel, 12 Okla. 69, 69 Pac. 791.

The law is well settled that a person traveling upon a sidewalk of a municipal corporation, which is in constant use by the public, has a right, when using the same with reasonable care, to presume and act upon the presumption that it is reasonably safe for ordinary travel, and free from dangerous obstructions or other defects. Dillon, in his excellent treatise on Municipal Corporations, 2d ed. vol. 2, § 1024, states this doctrine as follows: "Where streets have been rendered unsafe by the direct act, order or authority of the municipal corporation (not acting through independent contractors, the effect of which will be considered presently), no question has been made, or can reasonably exist, as to the liability of the corporation for injuries thus produced, where the person suffering them is without contributory fault, or was using due care." The adjudicated cases are in conflict on the question whether the burden of proving contributory negligence, or its absence, is on the plaintiff or defendant. In Indiana and some other jurisdictions it has been held that the plaintiff cannot recover unless he alleges and proves that the injury occurred without negligence on his part; in other words, that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. And this was the rule adopted by our court in the case of Pittman v. El Reno, supra; but this decision, as we understand it, was placed upon that ground for the reason that the Indiana Code was then in force in Oklahoma, and that the decisions of the courts of that state were binding on our court while that statute remained in force here. But, on the other hand, the great weight of the American authorities, and the text writers, as well as of the English authorities, supports the doctrine that it devolves on the defendant to plead and prove contributory negligence; while all the courts seem to hold to the doctrine that, if the plaintiff's evidence establishes that he was guilty of contributory negligence on his part, that it precludes his recovery, no matter where the burden of proof rests.

In our opinion, the true and sound rule, and one which is in consonance with justice, is that there is no presumption that the plaintiff or defendant is guilty of negligence; and that in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, it is sufficient for him to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence, with nothing in the circumstances establishing contributory negligence on his part. And when such facts are proven, it devolves upon the defendant to prove affirmatively that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. In Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. vol. 7, p. 455, this doctrine is clearly stated as follows: "Perhaps the true doctrine is that there is no presumption of either negligence or care which is applicable as a general rule in all cases, but that the question of the burden of proof should be determined on the facts of each case according to whether they show a duty of care on the plaintiff or the defendant. On principle, it would seem sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover, for him to show a negligent injury by the defendant, with nothing in the circumstances establishing contributory negligence on his part; and this done, it would devolve upon the defendant to show the plaintiff's contributory negligence affirmatively."

In Lincoln v. Walker, 18 Neb. 244, 20 N. W. 113, the supreme court of Nebraska, in passing upon this question, said: "In view of the conflict in the authorities, we are compelled to adopt such rule as may seem most consonant with justice. This being so, there certainly is no presumption that the plaintiff was negligent. We therefore hold the rule to be, that if the plaintiff can prove his case without showing contributory negligence, it is a matter of defense, to be proved by the defendant." In Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 213-225, 25 L. ed. 612-616, the Supreme Court of the United States has laid down the rule that in a case of this kind the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show contributory negligence. And to the same effect are the following authorities: Washington & G. R. Co. v. Gladmon, 15 Wall. 401, 21 L. ed. 114; Wharton, Neg. § 423, and authorities there cited in note 1; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 23 L. ed. 898.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver, 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176, 11 Pac. 408-414, the supreme court of Kansas holds that the burden of proving contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff rests upon the defendant. In the course of the opinion, Mr. Justice Valentine, speaking for the court, says: "It is claimed, however, that the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, and not upon the defendant to show that he was. The rule, however, in this state, is otherwise. Kansas P. R. Co. v. Pointer, 14 Kan. 38, 50; Kansas City, L. & S. R. Co. v. Phillibert, 25 Kan. 583. See also Beach, Contrib. Neg. 430, § 167. The law presumes that every person performs his duty, and this presumption continues until it is shown affirmatively that he does not, or has not. Hence, wherever there is no evidence upon the subject, or where the evidence is equally balanced, this presumption in favor of the person in question requires that the findings of the court and jury should be that such person has performed his duty, and is not guilty of any culpable negligence, contributory or otherwise. Hence, while it may be said, in a general sense, that the burden of proving his case devolves upon the plaintiff, yet, if he has shown that the defendant was guilty of the negligence causing the injury complained of, and the evidence tending to show that he has performed his duty is at least equal to that which tends to show otherwise, he has made out his case. This is virtually throwing the burden of proof to show that the plaintiff has been guilty of culpable contributory negligence upon the defendant, and this has been the uniform holding of this court." The doctrine announced in Pittman v. El Reno, 4 Okla. 638, 46 Pac. 495, so far as it is in conflict with the rule herein announced, is overruled. It follows that the amended petition stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, and therefore the court properly overruled the objection of the defendant to the introduction of evidence in support thereof. It seems to us that the evidence in this case clearly establishes that the plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care and caution at the time he received the injury, and that it was negligence on the part of the city in maintaining an obstruction that endangered the life and limb of the public who were traveling upon the sidewalk in question, and that the jury were fully warranted in finding the issues in favor of the plaintiff. And, moreover, the damages that were allowed by the jury seem to be reasonable under the circumstances.

Finding no error in the record which would justify a reversal of the cause, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Burwell, J., who presided in the court below, not sitting. All the other Justices concur, except Burford, Ch. J., who dissents.

I. Introduction.

The question whether, in an action to recover damages for injuries to the person or to property caused by negligence, the burden of proving the fault or care of the person injured or damaged should be on the plaintiff or defendant, seems to be ever present before the courts, although in most jurisdictions the rule has been settled for many years. The importance of the subject is indicated by the very multitude of the decisions in which the question has been raised.

In a few of the older states, the rule was early adopted that the plaintiff shall not be deemed to have made out his case until he has alleged and proved not only the defendant's wrong, but his own proper conduct. The plaintiff must show as part of his own case that he was free from contributory negligence. This doctrine has been followed, however, in only a few jurisdictions. By far the greater number of states have adopted the opposite rule, sometimes referred to as the rule of the Federal courts,—that contributory negligence is a matter of defense, and that therefore the burden of proving it by a preponderance of evidence is on the defendant. Among those jurisdictions adopting the rule that the burden is on the plaintiff are: Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, and Vermont; and among those following the Federal courts are: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Dakota, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Indian territory, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, North Carolina, North Dakota, Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Washington. The rule that the burden is on the defendant also prevails in England and in Canada.

It is therefore apparent that the great weight of authority is on the side of the plaintiff on this question. It should also be noted that of the jurisdictions mentioned, in which the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence was held to be on the plaintiff, the rule in Indiana has been changed by statute, so that at the present time in only comparatively a few jurisdictions is the plaintiff put to the disadvantage of proving the injured person's careful conduct.

In many of the cases involving negligence and contributory negligence, the question of who ought to have the burden of proving the injured person's conduct at the time of the accident is not of much practical importance, since, generally, evidence necessary to prove the defendant's negligence also shows the negligence or caution of the plaintiff.¹ If it was the plaintiff himself who was hurt, it is easy enough to get all the facts relating to his conduct leading up to the accident before the court or the jury; or if the injured person does not survive, but there are witnesses of the accident whose testimony can be obtained, and who are able to describe the injured person's conduct, and the evidence makes a case for the jury, then the mere technical rule as to the burden of proof, in jurisdictions where it is held that the plaintiff must carry it, can be of very little help to the defendant. The jury may be told that the plaintiff, in order to recover, must establish that the injured person at the time of the accident was without fault, and that he must establish this by a preponderance of the evidence; that, if the evidence showing due care and the evidence showing contributory negligence balance, the verdict must be for the defendant; but practical experience has demonstrated that it is not to be expected that a jury in a negligence case will apply to the consideration of such a question the fine discrimination that a court might be looked upon to use. Therefore, where it is possible to obtain complete evidence as to just what happened at the time of the accident, very little hardship may be said to result to the plaintiff by the rule imposing upon him the burden of showing that he was without fault.²

There is a class of cases, however, in which this question as to the burden of proof of contributory negligence is of vital importance to the parties. These are the cases in which it is impossible to obtain any evidence of the injured person's conduct immediately preceding the accident. For example, a party of raftsmen is ordered up a river at night, to perform some special duty with reference to their regular employment. They are furnished with an unsafe, leaky boat, but, owing to the darkness, do not discover its condition. They set out on their trip and are never seen alive again, but the boat and their bodies are afterwards found at various points along the river. Assuming that evidence may be produced sufficient to establish the negligence of the master in furnishing an unsafe boat, it is manifest that here there can be no evidence whatever bearing upon the question of contributory negligence. The boat might have sunk because of its defective condition, or it might have been overturned by the carelessness of those who were in Practically, this question often becomes rather one of the weight or preponderance of evidence, than technically one of burden of proof. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Cowser, 57 Tex. 293. Here the court is apparently using the term "burden of proof" in what will be termed in this note its secondary sense. See infra, II.

² In Schumacher v. Tuttle Press Co. 142 Wis. 631, 126 N. W. 46, however, it is said that where a question of fact is close and doubtful, the question of which side has the burden of proof is always of great importance. Anyone who has tried a question of fact himself, upon evidence nearly balanced, has experienced the importance of the rule, and has frequently been compelled to decide such questions on the consideration alone that he upon whom lay the burden of proof had not been able to lift it. To have this burden wrongfully placed on the crucial point of a close case seems unquestionably to be the deprivation of a substantial, not of a mere technical, right.

it. If, then, no evidence can be produced bearing upon the care of the persons in the boat at the time of the accident, and no presumption is to be indulged in the absence of such evidence, that they were in the exercise of due care, it is manifest that the plaintiff cannot recover, no matter how culpable the fault of the defendant may have been. This question is often presented in railway crossing accidents where the negligence of the company may be proved, but where there is nothing pointing to the conduct of the person killed.³ It may happen in any case in which the accident is not seen. Under such circumstances, it may be conceived that the extremely practical question whether the plaintiff may recover or not may depend upon whether he must proceed in a state court or whether he may resort to a Federal tribunal.

It would seem that the question forming the subject of this note is as plain and as clear-cut as it is possible for any legal question to be. Nevertheless, in addition to the sharp conflict on the main question there is an astonishing amount of confusion in the cases as to subsidiary questions, induced by a careless use of terminology. It is often said, for instance, that the burden of proving contributory negligence is a shifting thing. It may start with the plaintiff, and then suddenly be thrown upon the defendant, and perhaps fall back again upon the plaintiff as the scenes of the trial change.⁴ On the other hand, there are many cases in which it is said that the burden of proof never shifts. If the plaintiff has it in the first place, he has it to the last; and if it rests upon the defendant at any stage of the trial, he must bear it to the end.⁵ Such decisions, while apparently in conflict, may not be so in reality. When one court declares that the burden of proof as to contributory negligence shifts, as if tossed back and forth from one party to the other, and another court says that it remains fixed where the rules of procedure have placed it at the opening of the litigation, they are usually using the term "burden of proof" in different senses, as will be pointed out in the next subdivision of the note; and it is only by keeping this constantly in mind that these apparently conflicting decisions may be harmonized or even understood.

There is another question relating to this subject which does not seem to have been examined, and about which there appears to be considerable misunderstanding,—also due in some degree to a careless use of terminology. This question has to do with the bearing that certain presumptions as to negligence or absence of negligence have upon the burden of proof as to contributory negligence. Quite frequently the statement is made in the decisions that the rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant is founded on the presumption that men ordinarily exercise proper care to insure their own safety. Sometimes, when the subject is approached from another direction, the courts declare that, the rule being that the burden is on the defendant, it must necessarily follow that, in the absence of eyewitnesses to an accident, there is a presumption that the person killed was in the exercise of due care for his own safety. So, in jurisdictions where the burden of proving careful conduct is on the plaintiff, it follows it is said as a matter of course, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that there is a presumption that the person injured was guilty of contributory negligence. An effort will be made to demonstrate, in the proper place in this note, the fallacy of this position; and to show the true relationship between such presumptions and the burden of proof. It is a matter of considerable importance that this should be understood, especially in jurisdictions where deceased was not guilty of negligence concurring to produce the death. If it must be proved in order to enable the plaintiff to recover, he is utterly remediless."

³ In Robinson v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 65 Barb. 146, it is said: "Let us suppose, in order to test the justice and wisdom of requiring the injured party to prove affirmatively that he was free from negligence contributing to the injury, as a part of his case, that a person is seen near the track of a railroad company in health, and not under the influence of liquor, and immediately after the passage of a train of cars he is found mangled and dead upon the track, and it is shown that the train was moving at great speed, and the whistle was not sounded nor bell rung, nor other notice given of the approach of the train. In the case supposed, no one witnesses the stroke that kills. Now, how is the administrator of the deceased to recover against the company? He cannot prove that the

⁵ The burden of proof is always upon him who assumes the affirmative of an issue, and never shifts from his shoulders to his adversary, and though the weight of evidence may shift from side to side according to the nature and respect of the proof, he must carry it all the way through to the end of the trial. Beaty v. El Paso Electric R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 91 S. W. 365.

the rule of the cases has been changed by statute.

II. What is meant by burden of proof.

In considering the question as to the burden of proof of contributory negligence, it is important at the outset, as already intimated, clearly to distinguish between the two senses in which the term "burden of proof" is or may be used. In running through the decisions, a strong impression will be left upon the reader that the courts do not always have this distinction in mind when speaking of the burden of proof with reference to contributory negligence. Many of the cases, however, which would otherwise be confusing, will be readily understood when it is remembered that the term is used in a double sense. This point has been made very clear by Mr. Elliott, who says: "The truth is that the same term is used to express two different things, and this accounts in the main for the apparent conflict among the authorities, although there are some cases in which the courts were led into error by the failure to discriminate. In one sense, the 'burden of proof' marks or expresses the burden or duty of the actor or party who has the risk or affirmative of the issue, and will lose the case if he does not in the end establish such issue, to ultimately prove or establish it. In another sense, the term means or expresses the burden or duty of a party, in order to succeed, of going forward at any particular stage with the evidence, as, for instance, where the other party has made a prima facie case by the evidence he has introduced, or by some presumption arising in his favor."⁶ The first sense mentioned by Mr. Elliott in which the term "burden of proof" is used is called by Professor Wigmore the risk of nonpersuation of the jury.⁷ The second sense mentioned by Mr. Elliott in which the term is used is said by Professor Wigmore to relate to the duty of producing evidence to the judge.⁸ When it is said, therefore, that, as the trial proceeds, the burden of proof may be shifted from the party on whom it rested at first, by the proving of facts which raise a presumption in his favor,⁹ and that the test for determining the burden of proof is to consider which party would be successful if no evidence were given,¹⁰ it is evident that the term "burden of proof" is used in its secondary sense; that is, as implying a duty to introduce evidence for or against the issue, or, as Professor Wigmore would say, of introducing evidence to get the case past the judge, and into the hands of the jury. To take a concrete illustration. A person is killed at a railroad crossing, and the evidence procurable is sufficient to establish the negligence of the defendant. There is no evidence, however, of the conduct of the plaintiff just before the accident. The rule in the jurisdiction where the action must be tried is that the burden of establishing freedom from contributory negligence is on the plaintiff. There is also another rule, let it be assumed, in this jurisdiction, that in the absence of eyewitnesses to an accident, the presumption will be entertained that the injured person was in the exercise of due care for his own safety. If the plaintiff is successful in this jurisdiction, he must establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, two propositions: first, the negligence of the defendant, and, second, freedom of the deceased from contributory fault. This burden is assigned to the plaintiff at the very outset. It remains with him to the end, and no exigencies of the trial can shift it. Once the case is in the hands of the jury, the jurors must be instructed to find for

⁸ 4 Wigmore, Ev. § 2487.

¹⁰ Whenever litigation exists, somebody must go on with it; the plaintiff is the first to begin; if he does nothing, he fails. If he makes a prima facie case, and nothing is done to answer it, the defendant fails. The test, therefore, as to the burden or onus of proof, is simply to consider which party would be successful if no evidence were given, or if no more evidence were given than has been given at a particular point of the case; for it is obvious that during the controversy in the litigation there are points at which the onus of proof shifts, and at which the tribunal must say, if the case stop there, that it must be decided in a particular manner. Such being the test, the burden cannot rest forever upon the one on whom it is first cast; but as soon as he in his turn brings evidence which prima facie rebuts the evidence against which he is contending, the burden shifts again, until there is evidence which once more turns the scale. That being so, the question as to the onus of proof is only a rule for deciding on whom the obligation rests of going further if he wishes to win. Jones, Ev. § 176.

the defendant unless the plaintiff has, by a preponderance of the evidence, established both propositions. This he must do to maintain his burden of proof as to the issue, that is, the burden of proof in the primary sense. At the close of the plaintiff's case, however, it is found that he has established a prima facie case as to the defendant's negligence, and has offered no testimony whatever on the question of the injured person's conduct at the time of the accident. The burden of proof as to the defendant's negligence in the second sense, that is, the duty of introducing evidence to controvert testimony offered on behalf of the plaintiff, now rests upon the defendant, because, on the issue of contributory negligence, a prima facie case is made for the plaintiff by the presumption alone that the person injured was in the exercise of due care. The burden of proof in the second sense, that is, the burden of introducing evidence to rebut this presumption, is then on the defendant; but, being unable to produce evidence on this point, the issue is, of course, with the plaintiff, and there is no question of contributory negligence for the jury. Whether the plaintiff wins or loses then depends upon whether he has established the defendant's negligence by a preponderance of evidence.

It is not accurate, however, to state that the burden of proof in the first sense has to do simply with the risk of nonpersuasion of the jury. In the illustration just taken, the issue is not for the jury, because the law presumes freedom from contributory negligence, and the defendant has been able to offer no evidence in rebuttal. The plaintiff wins nevertheless on this issue, by proving his freedom from contributory negligence by a preponderance of evidence, as much as he does on the issue of the defendant's negligence, if the jury should decide he has established that by a preponderance of the evidence. The burden was on the plaintiff at the beginning of the trial, to establish his freedom from contributory negligence. The presumption that he was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident is the evidence which he offers on that issue. Since there is no evidence on the other side on that question, the plaintiff has, of course, sustained his burden as a matter of law. It would therefore seem more accurate to say that burden of proof in the first sense means the burden which the plaintiff has of establishing the issue by the preponderance of evidence, and that whether the intervention of a jury is necessary or not to determine whether he has done so is immaterial.

If, instead of having to rely on the presumption that the injured person was in the exercise of due care at the time he was killed, a different situation be imagined, and it be assumed that the plaintiff survived his injuries, and brought the action for his own benefit, making out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant, and a prima facie case of absence of contributory negligence, it will be seen that the burden of proving contributory negligence in the second sense is then on the defendant. At the beginning of the trial, this burden was on the plaintiff, but, having made a case for himself, it passes to the defendant. This does not mean that the evidence the defendant offers on that question must preponderate. The burden is simply shifted to the defendant to introduce evidence. The plaintiff does not win unless the evidence as to freedom from negligence preponderates the evidence of the defendant as to contributory negligence; and the burden of proof in the first sense is not shifted, although the burden of introducing testimony on the issue has.

If an illustration is taken to represent a jurisdiction in which the burden of proving contributory negligence is held to be on the defendant, the same thing will be seen to be true. All that it is necessary to do in such jurisdictions is for the plaintiff to make out a prima facie case of the defendant's negligence. It often happens, however, that in so doing he discloses facts which open him to the suspicion of having been guilty of contributory negligence. His evidence, we may say, raises the presumption of contributory negligence. This does not relieve the defendant of establishing the issue of contributory negligence, if he relies upon that as a defense. It is often said that under such circumstances the burden of proof is shifted to the plaintiff; but this is so only when "burden of proof" is used in its secondary sense. It simply means that, the plaintiff's evidence being such as to raise a presumption of contributory negligence, he must come forth with sufficient evidence to overcome that presumption. In case no further evidence is introduced, the defendant wins his case, not because the burden of proof has been shifted to the plaintiff, but because the defendant, by means of the plaintiff's testimony, has established the issue of contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence. The burden of proving the issue in the primary sense has not shifted. It is simply the order of introducing the testimony that has shifted, the plaintiff furnishing the defendant with the evidence to sustain the defendant's burden on the issue.¹¹

¹¹ The first burden above described—the risk of nonpersuasion of the jury—never shifts, since no fixed rule of law can be said to shift. The law of pleading, or, within the stage of a given pleading, some further rule of practice, fixes beforehand the issuable facts, respectively apportioned to the case of each party; each party may know beforehand, from these rules, what facts will be a part of his case so far as concerns the ultimate risk of nonpersuasion. He will know from these rules that such facts, whenever the time comes, will be his to prove, and not the other party's, and that they will not be sometimes his and sometimes the other's, or possibly his and possibly the other's. The other party and himself will, of course, have their turns in proving their respective facta probanda (though under a strict system of pleading these terms of proof will be more clearly fixed before trial, and may occur at different stages, and not the same stage of the cause); and the putting in of evidence may therefore "shift" in the sense that each will take his turn in proving the respective propositions apportioned to him. But the burden does not "shift" in any real sense; for each may once for all ascertain beforehand from the rules of law the facta probanda apportioned to him, and this apportionment will always remain as thus fixed to whatever stage the cause may progress.

It has been said that the burden of proof and the weight of evidence should not be confounded: ¹² that burden of proof is a question of law for the court, and that weight of evidence is a question of fact for the jury. But, as has already been stated, it is the burden of proof only in the secondary sense that is for the court. The question whether a party has sustained the burden of an issue is sometimes decided by the court, and sometimes by the jury. The weight of evidence is, of course, for the jury.

The second kind of burden, however,—the duty of producing evidence to satisfy the judge,—does have this characteristic referred to as a "shifting." It is the same kind of duty for both parties, but it may rest (within the same stage of pleading and upon the same issue and during one burden of the first sort) at one time upon one party, and at another time upon the other. Moreover, neither party can ascertain absolutely beforehand at what time it will come upon him, or cease to be upon him, or by what evidence it will be removed or created,—except so far as a presumption has by a rule of law been laid down as determining the effect attached to certain facts. Moreover, in a distinctive sense, this kind of burden "shifts," and the other does not, in that during the unchanged prevalence of the first kind of burden for one party, the second kind may be shared in turn by one and the other, though the first—the risk of nonpersuasion of the jury, should the case be left to their hands—has not come to an end. 4 Wigmore, Ev. § 2489.

III. Foundation of rules.

The reason given for the rule that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff is that, freedom from fault being necessary before he can recover, proof of such conduct is part of his case;¹³ that absence of negligence is a proposition necessarily involved in the one upon which the action is founded,¹⁴ that is, the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show that the negligence was solely that of the defendant.¹⁵ The plain-reference to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, see note to Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hadley, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 527, on "Relation of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to the burden of proof."

¹² In New Castle Bridge Co. v. Doty, 168 Ind. 259, 79 N. E. 485, it is said: "There is nothing mysterious or peculiar about the term 'burden of proof.' It stands simply for what is ordinarily meant by the use of the words. In pleadings, the party who assumes the affirmative of the issue or proposition has thereby, under a rule of law, laid upon him the necessity of maintaining the issue or proposition to the end, by being able, at the conclusion of the evidence, to point to a greater weight of evidence in support of the issue or proposition than appears against it; and this is all that the term 'burden of proof' implies. Furthermore, when applied to the question of contributory negligence, the rule operates in precisely the same way as in the determination of any fact or issue by the evidence, whether the affirmative is held by the plaintiff or by the defendant. But the burden of proof and weight of evidence should not be confounded. They have radically different meanings. The former is a question of law for the court, and the latter a question of fact for the jury."

¹⁴ The burden is held to be upon the plaintiff for the reason that it is a subordinate proposition necessarily involved in the more general one upon which the action is founded, to wit, that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence or wrongful conduct of the defendant. Mayo v. Boston & M. R. Co. 104 Mass. 137.

¹⁵ Evidence on the part of the plaintiff must be such as would authorize the jury to find that the injury was occasioned solely by the negligence of the defendant. Burke v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 34 How. Pr. 239.

In an action for damages due to an injury received through a collision between two carriages, it was held that the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence was on the plaintiff. Park v. O'Brien, 23 Conn. 339. The court said that the reason of this rule is that the plaintiff tiff does not recover if he is negligent, because it cannot then be said that the accident was caused by the defendant's negligence, which would not have happened but for the plaintiff's own want of ordinary care.¹⁶ Upon this point, Judge Cooley has said: "When one sues to recover damages for a negligent injury, the gravamen of his complaint is that he has been damaged by the wrongful and negligent action of the defendant, without having contributed thereto by negligent conduct of his own. The absence of contributory negligence is therefore a part of his case, and it is quite must prove all the facts which are necessary to entitle him to recover, and this is one of those facts. It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove, first, negligence on the part of the defendant in respect to the collision alleged, and, secondly, that the injury to the plaintiff occurred in consequence of that negligence. But, in order to prove this latter part, the plaintiff must show that such injury was not caused in whole or in part by his own negligence, for, although the defendant was guilty of negligence, if the plaintiff's negligence contributed essentially to the injury, it is obvious that it did not occur by reason of the defendant's negligence. Therefore, the plaintiff would not prove enough to entitle him to recover by merely showing negligence on the part of the defendant, but he must go further, and also prove the injury to have been caused by such negligence by showing a want of concurring negligence on his own part contributing materially to the injury. Hence, to say that the plaintiff must show the latter is saying only that he must show that the injury was owing to the negligence of the defendant.

Referring to the language of the court in the last-mentioned case, as to the reason for the rule, the court in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shieder, 88 Tex. 152, 28 L.R.A. 538, 30 S. W. 902, affirming — Tex. Civ. App., 26 S. W. 509, said: "We think this reasoning fallacious. It assumes that plaintiff cannot recover unless it appears that the injury was caused solely by the negligence of the defendant, when the law is that he may recover when defendant's negligence is only one of several contributing causes, the defendant being able to defend where one of such causes is plaintiff's negligence, not on the ground that his own negligence was not the sole cause of the injury, but upon the ground that the law will not permit plaintiff to recover where it is shown that his own wrongful or negligent act contributed to the injury."

It has been held in Massachusetts and several other states that in actions of this kind the plaintiff must prove that he was free from contributory fault, or fail in his action. These decisions go upon the ground that there can be no recovery unless two conditions concur, to wit, negligence of the defendant and freedom of the plaintiff from contributory fault; and that it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show the existence of both conditions. The same proposition may be stated in another form: the defendant is liable to respond in damages only for an injury caused by his negligence. But if the negligence of the plaintiff concurred with that of the defendant to produce the injury, it cannot correctly be said that the same was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The meaning of the rule is that, to render the defendant liable, the injury must be the result of his negligence alone. Hence, to establish a cause of action, the plaintiff must show that the negligence of the defendant was the sole, proximate cause of the injury; and to do this, he must necessarily prove himself free from contributory fault. Hoyt v. Hudson, 41 Wis. 105, 22 Am. Rep. 714. ¹⁶ Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99.

The plaintiff is bound in all cases to show that the defendant is entirely responsible for the grievance complained of. It must appear from this showing that all the material negligence that led to the accident was on the part of the defendant, and that the plaintiff did not contribute towards it. The plaintiff must establish completely whose fault it was, and explain the whole transaction. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Coleman, 28 Mich. 440.

In Owens v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 88 N. C. 502, it is said that the class of cases which devolve this duty on the plaintiff assume the cause of action to consist in an act or omission involving not only negligence in the defendant, but the exercise of proper care by the injured party, both of which must coexist and co-operate as essential ingredients, to entitle the latter to compensatory damages. The cause of action is complex, consisting in the union of both these constituent elements, contributing to the same injurious result.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274, the court said: "Though there is some conflict between the cases upon this question, we think the great weight of authority fully sustains the point raised by the plaintiff in error, that the burden of proof is equally upon the plaintiff to show that he acted with due care, or that his own negligence did not contribute to the injury, as that the defendant was guilty of such negligence; and we think this should be so held upon principle as well as upon authority; for, until the plaintiff has shown that he acted with due care, the mere proof of defendant's negligence and of the injury does not show that the injury was, in a legal sense, produced by this negligence of the defendant. . . . The absence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is therefore just as essential an element in the cause of action as the negligence of the defendants, and just as clearly constitutes a necessary part of the plaintiff's case; and until he has shown it, or proper to say that he should show that he acted with due care."¹⁷ The accident not being the consequence solely of the wrong of either party, neither can show wrong against the other.¹⁸ A distinction, however, is pointed out in respect to this question of the burden of proof, between negligence actions and actions in tort not based on negligence, there being no reason; it is said, for such a rule in actions of the latter sort.¹⁹

On the other hand, in jurisdictions where the opposite rule prevails, it is said that the rule placing the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence on the plaintiff violates all the analogies of the until it in some way appears from the evidence, he does not make a prima facie case."

¹⁷ Teipel v. Hilsendegen, 44 Mich. 461, 7 N. W. 82.

If the accident was caused partly by the plaintiff's own negligence, then it was not, in a legal sense, caused by the negligence of the defendant. Lesan v. Maine C. R. Co. 77 Me. 85.

In Adams v. Carlisle, 21 Pick. 146, the court, in holding that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff suing for personal injuries received by reason of a defective highway, to show freedom from contributory negligence, said: "Otherwise, although the way be out of repair, it would not follow that plaintiff's loss was occasioned by it."

In an action to recover for injuries received by reason of a defect in the highway, where the question was whether evidence of due care could be introduced by the plaintiff without an allegation of due care in the declaration, the court, in holding such testimony admissible, said: "When a traveler on the highway has broken down, it is obvious that this may be attributed to either one of two causes; viz., his own negligence or the defect in the highway. Proof which negatives the one tends to establish the other, as the true and sole cause. This is the ground of the decisions cited in the argument to prove, as they do most fully, that the plaintiff must show that he was driving with due care. It is to negative carelessness, and prove that the accident was occasioned exclusively by the defect in the highway. The plaintiff, therefore, may give affirmative proof that he was driving with due care, because it establishes his main averment, and the one on which his right of action must rest, namely, that his loss was occasioned by reason of the defect in the highway." May v. Princeton, 11 Met. 442.

¹⁸ In Button v. Hudson River R. Co. 18 N. Y. 248, the court said: "In regard to all the circumstances essential to the cause of action, the plaintiff held, and was required to sustain, the affirmative. Among those circumstances were that the defendants were negligent, and that the injury resulted from that negligence. If the intestate was negligent, and his negligence concurred with that of the defendants in producing the injury, the plaintiff had no cause of action. The reason why no right of action will exist is that, both the intestate and the defendants being guilty of negligence, they were the common authors of what immediately flowed from it, and it was not a consequence of the negligence of either. The court cannot accurately, and will not undertake to, discriminate between them as to the extent of the negligence of each, and the share of the result produced by each; neither, therefore, could allege against the other any wrong, and without a wrong there can do no legal injury. In this view, the exercise of due care by the intestate was an element of the cause of action. Without proof of it, it would not appear that the negligence of the defendants caused the injury."

¹⁹ In Hussey v. King, 83 Me. 568, 22 Atl. 476, it is said: "There is, however, another class of actions in tort not based on negligence, in which the defendant's care, or want of care, is not in issue; in which some direct, positive act of the defendant makes the cause of action. In this class of actions there is no reason nor place for such a rule. The plaintiff makes a prima facie case by proving the defendant's act and the consequent injury. He has no occasion to prove the defendant's negligence, and hence has no occasion to prove his own due care in the first instance. In actions for assault upon the person, the plaintiff proves in the first instance only the defendant's blow. Son assault demesne must be shown by the defendant. We think actions for injuries caused by dogs or other dangerous animals are of this latter class. By the common law, the keepers of wild animals were unqualifiedly liable for all injuries done by such animals. No matter how carefully the keeper restrained and guarded his animals, his care did not exempt him if they did damage. The owners or custodians of animals not wild were liable for injuries done by them, if they knew of the injurious propensity of the animal. The most scrupulous care would not excuse them. One kept a wild animal at his peril, and also kept at his peril any animal which he knew to have an injurious disposition. He was practically an insurer against injury by them. His care or negligence was immaterial. In actions for injuries caused by such animals, the plaintiff had only to prove the keeping and the scienter. After much research, we do not find it directly held in any English case, ancient or modern, that in such actions the plaintiff must allege and prove the defendant's negligence and his own due care."

law,³⁰ and disregards a well-settled elementary rule of pleading.³¹ In these jurisdictions, contributory negligence being considered a mere matter of defense, it must be proved by the defendant like any other defense.³²

Among the reasons frequently given for the rule that the burden is on the defendant is this: that there is a presumption that everyone is careful to avoid danger, and that therefore the rule should be such as it is declared to be in these jurisdictions.³³ It is declared that to hold that the plaintiff is bound to prove affirmatively

³⁰ In Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 6 Sawy. 275, 5 Fed. 523, in holding that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, the court said that any other rule than this violates all the analogies of the law, and is practically illogical and unjust.

If this broad rule is adopted, even if we distinguish between such defenses as payment, release, satisfaction, etc., as relating to facts subsequent to the act complained of, we cannot see upon what ground the plaintiff is to be excused from proving that he is not an alien enemy if war exists, or that he was not in a state prison, or that the defendant was not acting under the authority of any statute in what he did, or, in cases where the defendant would not be responsible if he was a mere agent, that he was not acting as an agent. And at any rate, what possible ground of distinction can there be between the rule forbidding a plaintiff to recover when his negligence has contributed to the injury, and that which prevents a recovery for a fraud or trespass when the parties are in pari delicto? Yet we are not aware of any case in which it has been held that plaintiff in such actions must assume the burden of proving himself free from fault. Hoyt v. Hudson, 41 Wis. 105, 22 Am. Rep. 714; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 33, 34.

In Bevis v. Vanceburg Teleph. Co. 132 Ky. 385, 113 S. W. 811, it is said that it is true that before one can recover for another's negligence, the former must have been without such negligence as to have caused his own injury. But the question we are considering is not one of right to recover, but of the correct practice in the enforcement of the right.

³¹ In Hocum v. Weitherick, 22 Minn. 152, it is said that when the negligent act of the defendant, and the injury, the sufficiency of the former to produce the latter, and their relation to each other as proximate cause and effect, are the sole facts averred and admitted by the pleadings, or proved on the trial, a prima facie case is established. To require the plaintiff in addition to negative a possible defense by an averment in the complaint of his freedom from negligence would be to disregard a well-settled, elementary rule of pleading.

In Paducah & M. R. Co. v. Hoehl, 12 Bush, 41, the court said that the authorities are somewhat conflicting, but it seemed to the court that it was reversing a well-recognized rule of pleading to require the plaintiff to allege and prove the nonexistence of facts that, when established, would constitute a defense to his own action.

³² The question was first passed upon by the supreme court of Missouri in Thompson v. North Missouri R. Co. 51 Mo. 190, 11 Am. Rep. 443, an action to recover for injuries to a passenger hurt while alighting from the cars, in which case it was held that negligence on the part of the plaintiff is a mere defense to be set up by the answer, and shown like any other defense, though, of course, to be inferred from the circumstances proved by the plaintiff upon the trial. The court said: "It seems to be illogical, and not required by the rules of good pleading, to compel a plaintiff to aver and prove negative matters in cases of this kind. In an ordinary complaint upon negligence, it is not necessary to aver that the plaintiff has taken due care. It is true the action may be defeated by showing that the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as would preclude a recovery, but that is a question for the jury to be determined upon the evidence, and not a matter of pleading. I cannot see what possible ground of distinction there can be between the rule forbidding a plaintiff to recover when his negligence has contributed to the injury, and that which prevents a recovery for a fraud or trespass when the parties are in pari delicto. Yet it would be difficult to find a case in which it has been held that the plaintiff in such actions must assume the burden of showing himself free from fault." (Opinion by Wagner, J.)

The rule is founded on the presumption that a person is careful until the contrary appears. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cavenesse, 48 Ark. 106, 2 S. W. 505.

The rule rests upon the principle that no person is presumed to have done wrong, or to have been in fault. He must be that he was in the exercise of due care would be equivalent to saying that the law presumes that the person injured was guilty of contributory negligence.²⁴ This shown to have been so. The same principle which requires proof against the defendant requires proof against the plaintiff, and negligence on the part of the plaintiff is purely a defensive proposition, and a part of the defendant's case. If evidence tending to establish that proposition comes out in the plaintiff's proof of the circumstances of the injury, it is, of course, available to the defendant, but it is treated in that case precisely as it would be treated if the evidence had been produced by him. It may be said to be weighed by the jury as his evidence, and the burden is on him that there shall be a preponderance of evidence against the plaintiff on the question of contributory negligence. The question is not whether the plaintiff has acquitted himself of negligence, but whether the defendant, by adopting what comes from the plaintiff's witnesses, and by what he produced himself, has a preponderance of evidence to the effect that the plaintiff had contributed to his injury by his own negligence. Harmon v. Washington & G. R. Co. 7 Mackey, 255.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver, 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176, 11 Pac. 408, it was said: "The law presumes that every person performs his duty; and this presumption continues until it is shown affirmatively that he does not or has not. Hence, whenever there is no evidence upon the subject, or where the evidence is equally balanced, this presumption in favor of the person in question requires that the findings of the court and jury should be that such person has performed his duty, and is not guilty of any culpable negligence, contributory or otherwise. Hence, while it may be said in a general sense that the burden of proving his case devolves upon the plaintiff, yet, if he has shown that the defendant was guilty of the negligence causing the injury complained of, and the evidence tending to show that he has performed his duty is at least equal to that which tends to show otherwise, he has made out his case. This is virtually throwing the burden of proof to show that the plaintiff has been guilty of culpable contributory negligence upon the defendant; this has been the uniform holding of this court."

If, from the whole evidence, contributory negligence such as would defeat a recovery be not shown by a preponderance of the evidence, and the negligence of the defendant be so shown, the action may be maintained. Each party starts in the trial with the presumption that he is free from negligence, and each, therefore, primarily assumes the burden of proving the negligence of the other. Schweinfurth v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 60 Ohio St. 215, 54 N. E. 89.

²⁴ In Durant v. Palmer, 29 N. J. L. 544, an action to recover damages for a nuisance consisting in the maintenance of an open area way into which the plaintiff fell and was injured, it is said that the plaintiff is not bound to prove affirmatively that there was no want of ordinary care on his part, for that would be equivalent to saying that the law presumes that the person injured contributed by his negligence to the accident, and that such presumption, unless overcome by positive proof, is, of itself, sufficient to defeat recovery. Want of ordinary care is negligence, culpable negligence, not to be presumed, but to be proved by the party who avers it.

In Stewart v. Nashville, 96 Tenn. 50, 33 S. W. 613, it is said that when, to other considerations, is added the force of the presumption which is in accord with common experience, that any man of sound mind will ordinarily avoid personal injuries, it seems to us that the rule which imposes upon the plaintiff the burden of showing care, when there is nothing to suggest the want of it, is unsound, and not in harmony with the general rules of evidence.

In Hill v. New Haven, 37 Vt. 501, 88 Am. Dec. 613, it is said that the principle contended for, that a plaintiff should be compelled in advance to furnish evidence of the propriety of his own course of conduct, before any offer or attempt has been made to impeach it, seems quite contrary to the general rule of legal presumption which is always applied in other cases to human conduct, that it will be presumed rightful and proper until the contrary is made to appear.

In Milwaukee & C. R. Co. v. Hunter, 11 Wis. 167, 78 Am. Dec. 699, Paine, J., in criticizing the rule that the burden is on the plaintiff of showing absence of contributory negligence, said: "But my own opinion is, the doctrine as stated . . . is not sound upon principle. It seems to me directly in conflict with another well-settled and salutary rule, that negligence is not to be presumed. . . . Such a rule can only rest upon a presumption of negligence, for if the plaintiff's evidence has no tendency to prove any negligence, if he is required to disprove it, it can only be upon the ground that it is presumed."

Referring to the reason given for the rule by some of the courts, that the plaintiff, having taken the affirmative, in order to recover, must prove all the essential facts, including the fact that he was not guilty of concurring negligence, the court in Stewart v. Nashville, supra, said: "That he must prove the essential facts is admitted, and that he has proved them when he shows the injury and that the defendant's neglect is the proximate cause of it, seems to us clear, and that, nothing more appearing, he would be entitled to a recovery, unless it be assumed that proof of the accident raises ipso facto a presumption of plaintiff's negligence."

was the position taken by Judge Duer in an early New York case,²⁵ before the opposite rule was established in that state.

And in a jurisdiction in which it is held that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, it has been asserted that this is a reasonable rule, because there is no presumption that the accident was not caused by the negligence of the injured person.²⁶ So, it has been suggested that there is no justice in the rule placing the burden upon the plaintiff because experience has shown that in a large number of accidents the injured persons were guilty of carelessness.²⁷

Judge Brewer, however, while he was on the bench in Kansas, pointed out the injustice of the rule placing the burden on the plaintiff, giving this as a reason why the opposite rule should prevail.²⁸ Such are the various reasons given by the courts in support of the two rules adopted. They will be further considered in connection with the discussion of the subject of the next subdivision of this note.

²⁵ In Johnson v. Hudson River R. Co., 5 Duer, 21, it was said by Duer, J., that it is manifest, upon a slight consideration, that the proposition that the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, if admitted to be true, is equivalent to saying that in all cases the law presumes that the negligence of the person accidentally injured contributed to the accident, and that this presumption, unless overthrown by positive evidence, is alone sufficient to defeat a recovery. The presumption would be just as reasonable, if not more so, that accidental injuries in all cases where a compensation in damages is sought were in reality occasioned solely by the negligence of the defendant or his servants, so as to entitle the plaintiff to recover merely by proving that the accident happened and the injury followed, and in all cases casting upon the defendant the burden of repelling the presumption by demonstrative proof of its falsity.

²⁷ To the reason suggested by Mr. Beach in his work on Contributory Negligence, for the rule, that, in a very large proportion of suits for personal injuries, common observation is that the negligence of the injured party has concurred to bring about the result complained of, and that, this being so, there would be no wrong done in any particular or individual case in requiring the plaintiff to show as a part of his case that he was not guilty of negligence, the court in Stewart v. Nashville, 96 Tenn. 50, 33 S. W. 613, replied that it may as well be answered, while it is no doubt true that many accidents are attributable to the heedlessness and recklessness of the parties injured, yet it is certainly so that many occur without such concurring negligence, and if the proportion between these two classes of cases is to be determined by the result of litigation involving claims for damages for personal injuries, it would possibly be found that a very large majority of these cases were of this latter, rather than of the former, class. With the imperfect data, however, which we have, we think it would be impossible to state the proportion of these respective classes with anything like mathematical accuracy, and unsafe to rest a rule of evidence upon them.

²⁸ In Kansas P. R. Co. v. Pointer, 14 Kan. 37, in holding that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, Brewer, Judge, said: "We are aware of contrary decisions and that in some states it is held that the burden is on the plaintiff to show affirmatively that he exercised due care and was without fault. But if it is shown that a party has done wrong and caused injury thereby, is not a prima facie case for compensation made? Logically, the wrongdoer should always compensate, and the wrong and the injury always entitled to relief. When the wrong of both parties contributes to the injury, the law declines to apportion the damages, and so leaves the injured party without any compensation. This is not strictly justice. The wrongdoer causing injury ought not to be released from making any compensation simply because the injured party is also a wrongdoer, and helped to produce the injury. But many considerations, especially the difficulty of correctly apportioning the damages and determining to what extent the wrong of the respective parties was instrumental in causing the injury, uphold the rule so universally recognized, that where the wrong, the negligence, of both parties, contributes to the injury, the law will not afford any relief. But if the wrongdoer ought always to compensate for the injury he has wrought, and is relieved from the obligation to compensate only by the fact that the wrong of the injured party helped to cause the injury, it is incumbent on him to show such wrong. It is a matter of defense to avoid the consequences of his own wrong."

IV. Presumptions of care and negligence.

a. Relation to burden of proof.

Since freedom from contributory negligence may in some jurisdictions be shown by the presumption that an injured person was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of proper care,²⁹ many judges in jurisdictions where the rule prevails that the burden of establishing the issue of contributory negligence is on the defendant, have fallen into the error of asserting that the rule is founded on the presumption. No particular harm could come from such a view if it went merely to the explanation of the origin or foundation of the rule. But when the question before the court is whether a presumption of due care exists under certain circumstances, it is quite important to know if the question whether there shall or shall not be a presumption that the injured person was in the exercise of due care for his own safety depends upon the rule that the burden of proving due care is on the plaintiff or not. If the rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence rests upon the defendant is founded upon the presumption that the injured person was in the exercise of due care, then, as a matter of course, it follows, when the question arises whether the injured person shall be presumed to have been free from contributory negligence, that it must be answered in the affirmative in every case where the rule prevails, that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant. And following out this line of reasoning, ²⁹ Contributory negligence may be shown by presumptions arising from circumstances already proved in the case. Donaldson v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 18 Iowa, 280, 87 Am. Dec. 391.

³⁰ Lawson, Presumptive Ev. 133.

³¹ Meehan v. Great Northern R. Co. — Mont. —, 114 Pac. 781.

In those jurisdictions where the burden is on the plaintiff of proving affirmatively that he was not contributorily negligent, the presumption necessarily is that the plaintiff was contributorily negligent; but in other jurisdictions where the burden is not on the plaintiff of proving affirmatively that he was not contributorily negligent, the presumption is that he was not contributorily negligent. Lawson, Presumptive Ev. 2d ed. 133; Nichols v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 33 Ind. App. 229, 70 N. E. 183, 71 N. E. 170.

Where the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, the law indulges the presumption that the injured person was in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence at all times in the discharge it might and has, indeed, been said in jurisdictions where the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, that it must necessarily follow that there is a presumption that the injured person was, at the time of the accident, guilty of contributory negligence. It is therefore of great importance to parties to litigations of this sort that the proposition that the rule as to the burden of proof depends upon the presumption, or that the presumption follows as a matter of course from the rule, should be carefully examined.

The idea that these presumptions relating to the conduct of the injured person and the burden of proof of contributory negligence are interdependent has been entertained by both text-book writers and the courts. Mr. Lawson, for example, says: "In those jurisdictions where the burden is on the plaintiff of proving affirmatively that he was not contributorily negligent, the presumption necessarily is that the plaintiff was contributorily negligent; but in other jurisdictions where the burden is not on the plaintiff of proving affirmatively that he was not contributorily negligent, the presumption is that he was not contributorily negligent."³² So the courts will say that where the burden of proving contributory negligence rests upon the defendant, the law presumes that a person exercises ordinary care for his own safety.³¹ Since in Oregon, says one court, the burden is on the defendant to show as a defense that the plaintiff, in a personal-injury case, has been guilty of contributory negligence, it must be assumed until otherwise shown, that a of his duties, until the contrary appears. Parsons v. Missouri P. R. Co. 94 Mo. 286, 6 S. W. 464.

Where the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, the presumption is, in an action to recover for the death of a person killed through the alleged negligence of the defendant, that the deceased was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of due care and diligence. Crumpley v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 111 Mo. 152, 19 S. W. 820.

The burden being on the plaintiff to establish freedom from contributory negligence, an instruction that the law presumes that a passenger, while being conveyed by a carrier, acts with ordinary care, and that presumption will prevail unless the evidence in the case shows to the contrary; and therefore it will be presumed that the plaintiff was acting with ordinary care and prudence at the time of the alleged injury unless the contrary has been proved, was held properly refused. Bonce v. Dubuque Street R. Co. 53 Iowa, 278, 36 Am. Rep. 221, 5 N. W. 177.

minor has exercised the care and circumspection to be expected of one of his years of discretion.³² So, it is said that the rule requiring the plaintiff to establish his own freedom from negligence of necessity operates to prevent the application of the presumption in his favor.³³

It requires but a moment's reflection, however, to show that there is no such relation between the presumptions as to the plaintiff's actions at the time of the accident and the burden of proof as to contributory negligence as is asserted by these authorities. Of course, the term "burden of proof" is here used in its primary sense; that is, as meaning the burden of proving the issue by a preponderance of evidence. It will be shown by cases cited in this subdivision of the note that in jurisdictions where it is held that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, a presumption is nevertheless entertained, under certain circumstances, that the injured person was in the exercise of due care. Here, then we have the burden of proof as to the injured person's conduct on the plaintiff, and also a presumption in his favor that the injured person was in the exercise of proper care. In such jurisdictions the presumption is often entertained that a passenger killed in a railroad accident was in the exercise

³² Dubiver v. City & Suburban R. Co. 44 Or. 227, 74 Pac. 915, 75 Pac. 693, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 889.

In actions for injuries caused by negligence, contributory fault is, in the Federal courts, a matter of defense of which the burden of proof is upon the defendant; and consequently reasonable presumptions and inferences in respect to matters not proven or left in doubt should be in favor of the injured party. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Central Trust Co. 23 Fed. 738.

In Bromley v. Birmingham Mineral R. Co. 95 Ala. 397, 11 So. 341, it is said: "In this state the rule is firmly established that contributory negligence is matter of defense; that it is incumbent on the defendant to plead it, and the burden rests on the defense to sustain the plea by proof, unless the evidence offered by the plaintiff in support of his case establishes contributory negligence on his part, in which event it cannot be held that he has made out his own case. Contributory negligence being matter purely defensive under our decisions, it must follow that there are no presumptions against a plaintiff of a want of due care and diligence on his part, and that there is no burden on him to prove affirmatively that he exercised due care and diligence. The burden of proving contributory negligence resting on the defendant, it follows that where the proof shows injury, caused by the culpable negligence of the defendant, and the proof is wholly silent as to contributory negligence, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. In this respect the rule is different in this state from that which prevails in Massachusetts and some other states." To the same effect, McDonald v. Montgomery Street R. Co. 110 Ala. 161, 20 So. 317.

³³ Nichols v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 33 Ind. App. 229, 70 N. E. 183, 71 N. E. 170.

The presumption of contributory negligence arose from the rule placing the burden of proving due care on the plaintiff. Ibid.

In Indiana the presumption is that one who is hurt at a railway crossing by a train was guilty of negligence. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Neubacher, 16 Ind. App. 21, 43 N. E. 576, 44 N. E. 669.

In Galena & C. Union R. Co. v. Yarwood, 15 Ill. 468, where a passenger frightened by the fact that the car in which he was riding had left the track, jumped from the front platform and was hurt, it was said that proof that the plaintiff was a passenger, the accident, and the injury, made a prima facie case of negligence, and threw the burden of explaining upon the company.

And in a case involving the same facts it was held that before the plaintiff could recover, he must show not only that the injury to him was the result of the carelessness or negligence of the defendants, but also that he himself was without fault in producing the injury. Galena & C. Union R. Co. v. Fay, 16 Ill. 558, 63 Am. Dec. 323.

But on a second appeal of the former case (Galena & C. Union R. Co. v. Yarwood, 17 Ill. 509, 65 Am. Dec. 683), the point was made that there is a sensible distinction between persons receiving an injury while sustaining the relation of passenger to the defendant and those who do not, with respect to the burden of proof, and it was held, referring to the first case, that where the injured person was a passenger, a prima facie case was made by proof of the accident and the injury. The court said that where the plaintiff in the action does not sustain that relation to the defendant, he must, in addition to the accident and his own injury, affirmatively show his own freedom from carelessness or negligence in causing or contributing to produce it: and it was held that a proposed modification to an instruction that unless the plaintiff had proved to the satisfaction of the jury that his own carelessness or negligence did not contribute or assist to produce the injury complained of, then the jury should find for the defendant, was properly refused.

of due care.³⁴ There are also many cases in which it is held that the law does not indulge the presumption either of negligence or of the exercise of due care. It is manifest that these decisions must be erroneous if the burden of proof as to contributory negligence is dependent upon presumptions as to the injured person's conduct, or if the presumptions follow as a matter of course from the rule as to the burden of proof. The very harshness of the rule imposing the burden upon the plaintiff has led courts in jurisdictions where such a rule prevails to indulge, under certain circumstances (that is, where there are no eyewitnesses to the accident), a presumption in favor of the plaintiff that the deceased was free from contributory fault. This, of course, is inconsistent with the position that the rule as to the burden of proof is founded on the presumption, or that the presumption follows from the rule as to the burden of proof.

Again, if a statute should be passed in any jurisdiction abolishing all presumptions with reference to the conduct of the injured person at the time of the accident, and requiring that his negligence or freedom from fault be proved either by direct or circumstantial evidence, it will be seen that the question of who should bear the burden of proof of this issue would still remain. The rule, then, as to the burden of proof, is not founded or dependent upon any presumption of law as to negligence or absence of negligence on the part of the injured person.

It would seem that the true reason for the rule as to the burden of proof springs solely from public policy. It is this that fixes the rule that the plaintiff cannot recover if he has been guilty of contributory negligence, and it is this that assigns to the parties the burden of proving the various issues, including the injured person's conduct. It is, as pointed out by Judge Brewer in the case cited in the last subdivision, a question of justice. The question is: Who ought to carry this burden? In reaching a conclusion, the fact, based upon experience, that men are ordinarily careful or careless at the time they are hurt, might have some influence. But this fact, sometimes referred to as a presumption, is not a presumption in its true sense,—that is, a presumption of evidence in favor of the one party or the other. Other considerations may enter into the policy of fixing the burden of proof. It may be influenced, for instance, by the consideration that one party or the other has more ready access to the evidence. The analogies of the law referred to in some of the cases with reference to the burden of proof as to certain defenses in other kinds of actions, and references to rules of pleading in actions not involving negligence, while helpful, should have no binding force upon the judgment as to where the burden of proof should lie as to contributory negligence. It is a mere question of fairness, of justice, as between the parties.

It is quite natural to think that rules as to the burden of proving the issue must have been established from the very first, but that rules as to presumption of conduct of the parties arose afterwards, as the exigencies of the trial demanded, owing to the failure of the parties to produce evidence as to certain points necessary to success. The rule might be established that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, and no serious inconvenience to the plaintiff arises from it until a case appeared in which it was impossible for him to offer any evidence on the subject of the injured person's conduct. In such a situation, the question would naturally arise whether a presumption of law ought to be entertained in his favor, to take the place of other evidence that the person hurt was not negligent. Whether this should be done or not is also a mere matter of policy, and entirely independent of the policy dictating the rule with reference to the burden of proof. If the law in any jurisdiction is that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, and

In Lesan v. Maine C. R. Co. 77 Me. 85, the court said: "By the negligence of a railroad company, a train of cars runs off the track, whereby passengers are injured. In such a case, the passenger ordinarily situated in the car, who sues for damages for his injury, would not be required to show any facts further than the occurrence itself. Proof of the accident tells all that can be told,—is prima facie, at least, the whole story. Res ipsa loquitur. . . . The injured party is passive in such a case. In the case, however, of a collision between a railroad train and the 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) wagon of a traveler, the traveler plays usually an active part if connected with, or independent of, the acts of others, and the acts of the two parties conjunctively produce a collision. In such case, not much can be based upon inference and presumption. The prosecuting party must make it distinctly appear that his own remissness did not contribute in causing the injury."

in the same jurisdiction a presumption of law is indulged that the injured person was guilty of contributory negligence, and then a statute is passed changing the rule as to the burden of proof, and requiring the defendant to establish contributory negligence, it does not follow, as a matter of course, that the presumption as to the injured person's conduct must be changed; that, instead of indulging the presumption of contributory negligence, a presumption of the exercise of due care must be entertained. It is not necessary, in fact, that there should be any presumption, one way or the other, as to the injured person's conduct. The question whether or not there should be a presumption in favor of or against the plaintiff should be decided in its own merits, without reference to where the burden of proof lies.

Cases, therefore, in the same jurisdiction, holding that the burden of proving freedom from contributory fault is on the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff, under certain circumstances, is entitled to the presumption that the injured party was in the exercise of due care, are not inconsistent. Nor would the fact that the courts of any jurisdiction hold that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant preclude them from also establishing the rule that no presumption as to the injured person's conduct will be entertained, or even from deciding that a presumption will be indulged that the injured person was guilty of contributory negligence. The cases collected in this subdivision of note fully sustain the views here set forth as to the relation between these presumptions and the burden of proof as to contributory negligence.

b. Negative statements of the rule.

1. The law does not presume negligence.

It is sometimes said that the law will not presume negligence either on the part of the defendant or on the part of the person suffering the injury.³⁵ This, it will be observed, is a holding merely that there is no affirmative presumption of negligence. It would not necessarily follow that there is a presumption as to the exercise of due care. Such a holding, as already pointed out, is no guide to the rule as to the burden of proof, since the absence of presumption only requires proof of the issue by a different kind of evidence; that is, by direct or circumstantial evidence.

2. The law does not presume contributory negligence.

It is said that the rule that negligence is never presumed applies to contributory negligence.³⁶ The statement that contributory negligence is not presumed will be found in many cases in jurisdictions where the burden of proving the injured person's conduct at the time of the accident is on the defendant.³⁷ The courts

Negligence, whether of plaintiff or defendant, is not presumed, and the burden of proving it is on the party by whom it is alleged. Anderson v. Wilmington, — Del. —, 70 Atl. 204; Stidham v. Delaware City, — Del. —, 67 Atl. 175.

In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bennett, 9 Ind. App. 92, 35 N. E. 1033, the court said that the law never presumes guilt or fault, and always casts upon the party asserting it, the burden of proving the same. But while this is true, and while, therefore, the plaintiff cannot recover unless he establishes the negligence of the defendant, it does not follow that the latter, in order to defeat a recovery, must show affirmatively that the plaintiff was himself at fault. The plaintiff is required to prove not only negligence, but unmixed negligence on the part of the defendant; and in order to make out a case of unmixed negligence, as a subordinate proposition, and necessarily involved in the same, the plaintiff must make it appear also that he, or the one in whose stead he sues, was himself in the exercise of proper care.

mony produced by the plaintiff. Bowring v. Wilmington Malleable Iron Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 594, 66 Atl. 369.

³⁷ Aluminum Co. v. Ramsey, 89 Ark. 522, 117 S. W. 508; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Leverett, 48 Ark. 334, 3 Am. St. Rep. 230, 3 S. W. 50; Sanders v. Reister, 1 Dak. 151, 46 N. W. 680; Farris v. Southern R. Co. 151 N. C. 483, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 66 S. E. 457; Boney v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. — N. C. —, 71 S. E. 87; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Pollock, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 115 S. W. 843; Jacksonville Ice & Electric Co. v. Moses, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 379.

It has been definitely settled in Kentucky that it is not to be presumed, in the absence of evidence as to the care exercised by a person killed at a railroad crossing where he had a right to be, that he recklessly or carelessly imperiled his own life. Cahill v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 92 Ky. 345, 18 S. W. 2; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lucas, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 359, 98 S. W. 308.

In Clark v. Lancaster, 229 Pa. 161, 73 Atl. 80, the court said that contributory negligence on the part of a plaintiff is no more to be presumed than the negligence of a defendant. The rule that a plaintiff must present a case clear of contributory negligence does not mean that, after prov-often indicate their adherence to the erroneous view that the presumption and the burden of proof are interdependent by stating that the law will not presume the negligence of the plaintiff, "which must be established by the defendant,"³⁸ or by adding, "but the burden of establishing it rests upon the defendant."³⁹

ing affirmatively that the defendant's negligence caused the injury, he must prove negatively that he himself was not guilty of negligence that contributed to the result.

In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Noel, 77 Ind. 110, an action to recover damages for the negligent burning of wood, the court said that the averment that the injury occurred without the fault of the injured party must be made and proved by the party making it; but at the same time it is a negative averment, and if the plaintiff is able to show the loss charged in his complaint, and that it was caused by the negligence of the defendant, as charged, without showing any contributory negligence or ground for inferring or reasonably suspecting such negligence, he will be entitled to recover without making direct and affirmative proof on that subject. In the absence of circumstances to show or suggest it, there is no presumption of contributory negligence.

In the absence of all proof on that subject, carelessness on the part of the plaintiff is not to be presumed. Beatty v. Gilmore, 16 Pa. 463, 55 Am. Dec. 514. The court said that the principle that carelessness in such a case would prima facie be presumed would involve intolerable hardship by protecting the culpable party in those instances where the chance of disaster is multiplied by the obscurity of night. To say that the very fact which increases the danger shall protect him who was the author of it by rendering the necessary proof difficult, or cutting it off altogether, seems too unreasonable to attract the deliberate sanction of tribunals created to watch over the interests of the community.

Similarly, in Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 59 Mich. 257, 26 N. W. 514, an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, it was held that a requested instruction that negligence is not to be presumed, but must be affirmatively proven by the party alleging it, and in the manner alleged in the declaration in the case; and in this case the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the defendant is entirely responsible for the injury complained of by reason of, and in consequence of, the neglect charged in the declaration, and that the plaintiff's intestate did not contribute towards it,—should have been given.

3. The law does not presume freedom from contributory negligence.

In jurisdictions in which the burden of proving due care on the part of the person injured is held to be on the plaintiff, it is often asserted that there is no presumption that the plaintiff was free from fault.⁴⁰ This has often been held in New

The burden on the issue of contributory negligence rests upon the defendant; the burden of duty resting upon the person for whose death the action is brought. The law does not presume contributory negligence, but it must be alleged and proved; that is, the defendant must show such facts from which only one inference, that is, the plaintiff's negligence, can be drawn by men of ordinary reason and intelligence. Farris v. Southern R. Co. 151 N. C. 483, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 66 S. E. 457.

It is the law of Minnesota that the burden is on the defendant to establish contributory negligence on the part of a plaintiff. It is not presumed under any circumstances. Lammers v. Great Northern R. Co. 82 Minn. 120, 84 N. W. 728.

An instruction that when a person receives an injury by falling through an open trestle of a railway company, from which he dies, and neither the railway company nor its agents were the immediate cause of the fall, then the law presumes that his own negligence was the cause of his death, and before there can be a recovery it devolves upon the plaintiff to show by a preponderance of evidence that the deceased was free from fault, was held wrongfully to shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff. Texas & St. L. R. Co. v. Orr, 46 Ark. 182.

⁴⁰ Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Welch, 12 Ind. App. 433, 40 N. E. 650.

There is no presumption that a person killed at a railroad crossing was in the exercise of due care. Day v. Boston & M. R. Co. 96 Me. 207, 90 Am. St. Rep. 335, 52 Atl. 771.

That persons approaching railroad crossings were in the exercise of due care and prudence will not be presumed, and unless the evidence tends so to show, the plaintiff failed in one essential element of his case. Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 72 Vt. 89, 47 Atl. 409.

In McLane v. Perkins, 92 Me. 39, 43 L.R.A. 487, 42 Atl. 255, it was urged that the rule in Maine was really this: "If the circumstances disclosed and left unexplained indicate any contributory negligence, then the burden is on the plaintiff to explain the circumstances, and to show that after all he was free from fault; but that if the circumstances disclosed do not indicate any contributory negligence, there can be no presumption of any such negligence, and there is nothing for the plaintiff to rebut or explain." But the court said that although the plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence can sometimes be reasonably inferred from the circumstances, York,⁴¹ as where, in the absence of eye-witnesses, a freight hand was killed in an without direct evidence of what he did or left undone, yet in all cases plaintiff's freedom from fault must affirmatively appear in evidence, or, at least, by some legitimate inference from the evidence.

A person killed at a railroad crossing under circumstances as to which there was no witness cannot be presumed to have been in the exercise of due care, in an action to hold the railroad company liable for his death, where the burden of showing due care is on the plaintiff. Shumm v. Rutland R. Co. 81 Vt. 186, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973, 69 Atl. 945.

But conceding without deciding the point, that a presumption does not exist in the case and remain throughout, that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, or that he exercised due care, an error in so charging is harmless where no inference can be drawn from the charge that the jury was required to do something more by reason of the suggested presumption than to find negligence by preponderance of the evidence. Toledo R. & Light Co. v. Rippon, 8 Ohio C. C. N. S. 334, 28 Ohio C. C. 561.

It cannot be presumed that one who was killed at a railroad crossing was in the exercise of due care because nothing appears to the contrary. Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Greene, 106 Ind. 279, 55 Am. Rep. 736, 6 N. E. 603.

In Indianapolis v. Keeley, 167 Ind. 516, 79 N. E. 499, the court said that before the enactment of the statute of 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 58, § 359a, Burns's 1901), the burden was on the party prosecuting an action for negligence, as a necessary part of his case, to establish affirmatively that the person so injured or killed did not, by his own want of ordinary care, contribute to produce the accident. In the application of the principle it was just as fatal to the cause of the plaintiff if he failed to show his freedom from fault as if it affirmatively appeared that his own carelessness proximately contributed toward producing his injuries. A plaintiff under the former rule was not clothed as a matter of law with any presumption of care or freedom from negligence, but, upon the trial, the inquiry was whether, from the evidence, it appeared affirmatively, either directly or by inference, that he did not by his own fault contribute to the accident.

No inference arises in favor of a woman who falls on a slippery sidewalk and is hurt, that because the facts found do not show that she was guilty of negligence contributing to the injury, she was free from contributory negligence. McQueen v. Elkhart, 14 Ind. App. 671, 43 N. E. 460. The court said that to hold that such an inference arises when there are no facts found tending to show either that she was or was not guilty of contributory negligence would be to supply by mere "presumption that which an unending rule requires should be established by proof." 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

There are no presumptions in favor of the plaintiff, the law imposing upon him the burden of proving by a fair preponderance of evidence not alone that the defendant has been guilty of negligence resulting in the injury, but that the plaintiff has been free from negligence contributing to the accident; and where there is no evidence of the exercise of any degree of care on the part of the plaintiff, and when there are no circumstances from which an inference may be fairly drawn, there is clearly no question for the jury. Johnson v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 34 App. Div. 271, 54 N. Y. Supp. 547.

An inference cannot be drawn from a presumption that the deceased would exercise care and prudence in regard to his own life and safety. Axelrod v. New York City R. Co. 109 App. Div. 87, 95 N. Y. Supp. 1072.

The jury cannot assume that the person for whose death the action is brought had not omitted to use ordinary precautions which a prudent man would take in the presence of danger. Riordan v. Ocean S. S. Co. 32 N. Y. S. R. 328, 11 N. Y. Supp. 56.

While looking at the evidence in the most favorable aspect for the plaintiff, if it points as much to contributory negligence as to absence of it, the plaintiff cannot recover, since he is not entitled to any presumption of lack of negligence under such circumstances. Fowler v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 74 Hun, 141, 56 N. Y. S. R. 307, 26 N. Y. Supp. 218; Neddo v. Ticonderoga, 77 Hun, 524, 28 N. Y. Supp. 887.

So it was held erroneous to instruct the jury that plaintiff in a crossing accident would be presumed to be free from fault if nothing else appeared in the case, on the ground that it could not be supposed that a man would bring an injury upon himself. Warner v. New York C. R. Co. 44 N. Y. 465. The court said there is no presumption of negligence against either party. It is the duty of the plaintiff to prove, and the right of the defendant who is charged with negligence causing an injury, that he should prove, by satisfactory evidence, that he did not contribute to the injury by any negligence on his own part. This proof in some form constitutes a part of the plaintiff's case. It must appear either from the circumstances of the case or from evidence directly establishing the fact to the satisfaction of the court and jury, that the plaintiff is free from any fault contributing to the injury. It may be assumed that the plaintiff or the party injured is anxious for his own safety; but it cannot be presumed that the plaintiff is free from fault if nothing else appears in the case, for the reason that elevator accident,⁴³ or where a person leaving a railroad company's yards by a way not provided by the company was run over and killed,⁴³ or where a person was found dead at a railroad crossing.⁴⁴ The fact that one conjecture as to the injured person's conduct is more probable than another is declared by an Illinois court to be no ground for indulging the presumption as to the exercise of due care.⁴⁵ The mere fact of the happening of an accident is not sufficient to raise the presumption of the injured person's freedom from contributory negligence.⁴⁶ The law, in fact, raises no some evidence is required to overcome such presumption, and the plaintiff would be thereby relieved from proving, either by direct evidence or the surrounding circumstances, that he is not in any fault.

⁴³ Where a freight hand was caught between an ascending elevator and the combing of the hatch of a vessel, and killed, a charge that if the deceased was rightfully on the elevator at the time of the injury, in the absence of testimony of an eyewitness of the accident, the jury might assume that he received his injury in the performance of his duty, and had not omitted the precautions which a prudent man would take in the presence of a known danger,—was held erroneous, because permitting the plaintiff in an action to recover for the death, to establish the cause of action without evidence as to contributory negligence. Riordan v. Ocean S. S. Co. 124 N. Y. 655, 26 N. E. 1027.

⁴³ It is not to be presumed that a person leaving a railroad company's yards by a way not provided by the company was free from negligence, when run over and killed by one of the company's engines, but the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove it, either by direct or circumstantial evidence. Parsons v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 85 Hun, 23, 66 N. Y. S. R. 166, 32 N. Y. Supp. 598.

⁴⁴ If a person should be found killed at a railroad crossing, no human eye having witnessed the accident, and an action should be brought for his death, the plaintiff could not recover, since there would be no evidence from which the jury could infer that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was in the exercise of that care which the law requires of him. Cordeil v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 75 N. Y. 330.

of evidence of the conduct and acts of the deceased at the time of the accident or injury, the fact that he acted with due care cannot be regarded as proven because one conjecture is more probable than another. When the evidence is as consistent with carelessness as with the exercise of due care on the part of the person injured, there is neither proof nor inference to justify a recovery.

⁴⁶ No presumption of freedom from negligence arises from the happening of an accident. Whalen v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. 151 N. Y. 70, 45 N. E. 363.

No presumption arises from the happening of the injury, and the proof of the defendant's negligence, that the deceased was free from blame. Jencks v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 33 App. Div. 635, 53 N. Y. Supp. 625.

No inference arises from the fact that locomotive crossing signals were inadequate, that a person killed at a crossing was free from contributory negligence, and to support an action for his death, the plaintiff has the affirmative of that question, and the burden of showing that the negligence of the deceased did not contribute to the calamity. Miller v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 81 Hun, 152, 62 N. Y. S. R. 734, 30 N. Y. Supp. 751.

The mere happening of an accident does not give rise to the presumption of absence of contributory negligence, but such negligence must be proved affirmatively. Skapura v. National Sugar Ref. Co. 83 App. Div. 21, 81 N. Y. Supp. 1085.

The mere happening of an accident by stepping upon a bridge of ice on a sidewalk, when it was covered with a light snow, does not make the question of contributory negligence one for the jury. Weston v. Troy, 139 N. Y. 281, 34 N. E. 780.

Contributory negligence on the part of a passenger cannot be presumed from the mere fact of injury, but must be proved; and, on the other hand, the proof of an injury to a passenger on the car of a common carrier casts upon it the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent, or by contributory negligence of the plaintiff, unless the proof on the part of the plaintiff tends to show that the injury was occasioned by either of those causes. Boone v. Oakland Transit Co. 139 Cal. 490, 73 Pac. 243.

presumption of negligence against either the plaintiff or the defendant from the fact of the injury.⁴⁷

c. Positive statements of the rule.

1. Presumption that injured person was guilty of negligence.

In several jurisdictions the positive rule that the injured person is presumed to have been guilty of contributory negligence is laid down. This was quite frequently held in the early Indiana cases, before the adoption of the statute later referred to in this note.⁴⁸ Where a person was run over at a railroad crossing, the fault was held to be prima facie his own,⁴⁹ and the rule applied to injuries both to person and property.⁵⁰ But since the passage of the statute putting the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant, it was held that the presumption of such negligence does not attach to the plaintiff

⁴⁷ Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shieder, 88 Tex. 152, 28 L.R.A. 538, 30 S. W. 902, affirming — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 509.

Negligence is not to be attributed to a person killed at a railroad crossing from the fact that he was on the track at the time of the accident. Chicago, R. I. & G. R. Co. v. Clay, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 119 S. W. 730.

From the fact of injury at a railroad crossing no presumption arises as to the guilt or innocence of either party. Gahagan v. Boston & M. R. Co. 70 N. H. 441, 55 L.R.A. 426, 50 Atl. 146.

But where the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, it was held that a person having been killed while attempting to cross a railroad track at a regular crossing, the presumption of negligence would not arise from the mere fact that the deceased was killed on the track at that place. Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Goetz, 79 Ky. 442, 42 Am. Rep. 221. In this case it appeared that the deceased was a careful, thrifty farmer, familiar with the territory at and near the intersection of the road as well as the time when the trains usually pass at the point at which he was killed. The train was running at a speed of 30 miles an hour, and the evidence made it doubtful whether the deceased could have avoided the injury by the exercise of the utmost vigilance on his part unless he had kept off the track until the train passed. It was held, under the circumstances, that the question of contributory negligence was properly left to the jury.

⁴⁹ Oleson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 143 Ind. 405, 32 L.R.A. 149, 42 N. E. 736.

He must affirmatively show that he did not contribute to the injury before he is entitled to recover for such injury. Smith v. Wabash R. Co. 141 Ind. 92, 40 N. E. 270; Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Howard, 124 Ind. 280, 8 L.R.A. 593, 19 Am. St. Rep. 96, 24 N. E. 892; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Fraze, 150 Ind. 576, 65 Am. St. Rep. 377, 50 N. E. 576; Hancock v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 21 Ind. App. 10, 51 N. E. 369.

A presumption attaches in all cases that the fault was prima facie that of the plaintiff, and hence, before there can be a recovery, this presumption must be overcome by some affirmative evidence tending to prove the exercise of due care by the plaintiff when he was injured by the negligent conduct of the defendant. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bennett, 9 Ind. App. 92, 35 N. E. 1033.

In Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Butler, 103 Ind. 31, 2 N. E. 138, an instruction proceeding upon the theory that the presumption of law is that the injury occurred without the fault of the plaintiff, and that the burden was on the railroad company to show by a fair preponderance of evidence that he was heedless or careless, was held erroneous in an action to recover damages for injuries received at a public crossing. The court said that the idea conveyed by it was that certain facts inculcating the defendant being proved to the satisfaction of the jury, they should find for the plaintiff unless it was proved by a fair preponderance of evidence that the injury resulted from his own carelessness; thus, in effect, directing them to find for the plaintiff in event they were unable to determine from the evidence whether the plaintiff had or had not been guilty of concurring negligence; that the jury were authorized by the instruction to infer that upon establishing the defendant's negligence and the plaintiff's injury, the plaintiff had a right to their verdict, and that right continued until it was shown by a fair preponderance of evidence that the injury was the result of his own carelessness. This was an exact reversal of the rule.

In Hathaway v. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. 46 Ind. 25, an instruction that when a person crossing a railroad track is injured by collision with a train, the fault is prima facie his own, and he must show affirmatively that his fault or negligence did not contribute to the injury, before he is entitled to recover for such injury, was approved.

For discussion of the question as to the presumption of care exercised by a person approaching a railroad crossing, see note to Hanna v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 344.

in a crossing case from the mere fact that he was injured.⁵¹ After a verdict, even where the presumption of carelessness prevails, this presumption gives way to the contrary presumption that everything has been done to prove the plaintiff entitled to the verdict.⁵²

It has also been held in Maine that a person injured at a railroad crossing is presumed to have been at fault.⁵³

2. Presumption that the injured person was in the exercise of due care.

Usually in jurisdictions where the burden of proving contributory negligence is held to be on the defendant, the courts do not stop with saying that there is no presumption that the injured party was guilty of contributory negligence, but hold that a positive presumption exists that he was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of due care. Ordinarily the presumption is that a person with the love of life common to all exercises such due care as the circumstances permit to protect himself from injury.⁵⁴ This rule has been laid down in a number of jurisdictions.⁵⁵ It has been applied in the case of an injury

⁵¹ Nichols v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 33 Ind. App. 229, 70 N. E. 183, 71 N. E. 170.

⁵² Hence, if the defendant asserts that the verdict is wrong because of a variance between the complaint and the proof, or because the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, the burden is upon such defendant to establish the assertion. This may be done by the answers of the jury to interrogatories; but these must disclose such a state of facts in relation to the variance or contributory negligence of the plaintiff as will clearly antagonize the general verdict, and overcome the presumption attending it. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Neubacher, 16 Ind. App. 21, 43 N. E. 576, 44 N. E. 669.

⁵³ A collision between a traveler in the highway and a railroad train at a highway crossing is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the traveler. Hooper v. Boston & M. R. Co. 81 Me. 260, 17 Atl. 64.

To the contention that contributory negligence should not be presumed, and that if plaintiff's evidence did not indicate its existence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover unless the defendants adduced evidence that it did exist, the court replied that the law in Maine was unmistakably and inexorably the other way. McLane v. Perkins, 92 Me. 39, 43 L.R.A. 487, 42 Atl. 255.

⁵⁴ Eidson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. — Kan. —, 116 Pac. 485.

The law does not presume negligence, but it presumes, until the contrary is shown, that everyone in a given situation will act and has acted prudently and with a due regard for his own safety. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Chisholm, 27 C. C. A. 663, 49 U. S. App. 700, 83 Fed. 652.

The burden is not on the plaintiff to show affirmatively that the accident causing his intestate's death was not the result of contributory negligence or want of reasonable care and caution on the part of the decedent. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Ryan, 17 Colo. 98, 28 Pac. 79. The court said that, in the absence of evidence, direct or circumstantial, the law never presumes any party to have been guilty of negligence. On the contrary, it presumes everyone to have been diligent, or free from negligence, unless L.R.A. (N.S.)

til negligence is affirmatively shown. This presumption of diligence, or of freedom from negligence, attends both plaintiff and defendant. Hence, to warrant a verdict against the defendant on the ground of his negligence, the law requires that his negligence shall be affirmatively shown by a preponderance of the evidence; and in like manner, to warrant a verdict against the plaintiff on the ground of his contributory negligence, the law requires that his contributory negligence shall be affirmatively shown by a preponderance of the evidence. On the one side, the negligence of the defendant is relied on as the gist of the action; on the other side, the contributory negligence of the plaintiff is relied on as the gist of the defense.

But in Central R. Co. v. Smith, 74 Md. 212, 21 Atl. 708, it was held that where the burden is on the defendant to prove contributory negligence, an instruction that the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that persons ordinarily take care of themselves, and the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the principle that, in exceptional cases, persons are heedless, should have been omitted; but the court held that the error was unprejudicial, as the whole question as to the contributory negligence can be fairly left to the jury.

⁵⁵ The law presumes that a person injured through the negligence of a defendant was in the exercise of due care. Fairgrieve v. Moberly, 29 Mo. App. 142; Collins v. Star Paper Mill Co. 143 Mo. App. 333, 127 S. W. 641; Heine v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 144 Mo. App. 443, 129 S. W. 421. See note to Hendrickson v. Great Northern R. Co. 16 L.R.A. 261.

Where the evidence discloses negligence of the defendant as a proximate cause of the injury, the presumption is that the injured person was in the exercise of reasonable care. Newton v. Wabash R. Co. 152 Mo. App. 167, 132 S. W. 1195.

The burden is on the defendant to remove the presumption that the person for whose death the action was brought was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident. Stewart v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. 141 N. C. 253, 53 S. E. 877.

In Cassidy v. Angell, 12 R. I. 447, 34 Am. Rep. 690, it is said that there is ordinarily a certain degree of presumption to a passenger, resulting in death;⁵⁶ and in case of an injury to a servant.⁵⁷ Where, for example, an employee, killed in coupling cars, is shown to have been in the line of his duty at the time of the accident, the law, it is said, will presume that he was in the exercise of ordinary care.⁵⁸ In the absence of evidence as to the acts of the deceased immediately prior to a collision at a crossing, it has been held that the plaintiff is entitled to the presumption that the deceased used due care to avoid injury.⁵⁹ This has been held even where the burden of proving absence of conthat a person of ordinary intelligence will not purposely expose himself to danger.

In the absence of satisfactory proof to establish the defense of contributory negligence, the plaintiff must be presumed to have been without fault. Gordon v. Richmond, 83 Va. 436, 2 S. E. 727.

The plaintiff need not prove the freedom of the intestate from fault or negligence, since contributory negligence is a defense, to be affirmatively proved; and it will be presumed that the injured party was in the exercise of due care until the contrary is made to appear. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Eubanks, 48 Ark. 400, 3 Am. St. Rep. 245, 3 S. W. 808.

In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that, at the time of the accident resulting in the death of a person, the deceased did his duty and exercised reasonable care and caution. Cox v. Wilmington City R. Co. 4 Penn. (Del.) 102, 53 Atl. 569; Reed v. Queen Anne's R. Co. 4 Penn. (Del.) 413, 57 Atl. 529.

In the absence of any evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was chargeable with negligence contributing to the injury of which he complains, the presumption of law is that he was free from such negligence, and the burden is upon the defendant to prove such contributory fault, if the same is relied upon as a defense. Hoyt v. Hudson, 41 Wis. 105, 22 Am. Rep. 714.

In the absence, therefore, of an eyewitness to the accident, it is the duty of the court to assume, unless it is shown to the contrary, that at the time of the accident, the person injured was in the exercise of due care. The plaintiff being entitled to invoke this presumption, the defendant has the burden of overthrowing it by evidence sufficient to do so. This burden is not sustained by the production of evidence which leaves the question of contributory negligence in doubt. If, under the evidence, reasonable men may honestly differ, the ultimate question is one of fact for the jury. Cameron v. Great Northern R. Co. 8 N. D. 124, 77 N. W. 1016.

In a negligence case where there is no eyewitness to the accident, it will be presumed, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the deceased used ordinary care and caution; which presumption is sufficient to permit recovery if negligence is shown on the part of the defendant. Gilbert v. Ann Arbor R. Co. 101 Mich. 73, 125 N. W. 745.

Where no one saw an accident which was the occasion of a person's death, and there was no circumstantial evidence indicating precisely where or how it occurred, save that the deceased was drowned in the defendant's canal, it was held that contributory negligence would not be presumed. Platte & D. Canal & Mill. Co. v. Dowell, 17 Colo. 376, 30 Pac. 68. The court said that contributory negligence is a defense, to be established as are other defenses.

⁵⁶ When the injury to a passenger results in his death, and therefore he can give no testimony as to his conduct on the occasion of the injury, the law presumes, in the absence of direct testimony or rebutting circumstances, that he exercised reasonable and ordinary care; and if negligence in fact existed on his part, it must be shown by positive evidence or from the attending circumstances of the accident. Wood v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. — Del. —, 76 Atl. 613.

⁵⁹ Rollins v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 71 C. C. A. 615, 139 Fed. 639.

In the absence of all evidence relating to due care on the part of a person injured at a railroad crossing, there is a presumption that he was free from contributory negligence; and the burden of proving such negligence rests upon the defendant throughout the case. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Steele, 29 C. C. A. 81, 54 U. S. App. 550, 84 Fed. 93.

In Blauvelt v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 206 Pa. 141, 55 Atl. 857, it was conceded that, in the absence of evidence showing the contrary, the presumption is that a person who was killed at a railroad crossing did his duty as he approached the scene of the accident, by stopping, looking, and listening.

One killed at a railroad crossing who seemed to have used due care in looking for trains as he approached the crossing, until he passed beyond the sight of witnesses, is presumed to have done his duty, and not to have been guilty of contributory negligence at the point of crossing. Hanna v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 213 Pa. 167, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 344, 62 Atl. 643.

Where a traveler is killed at a railroad crossing, and the negligence of the railroad company is established, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption is, though perhaps slight, that the traveler did his duty in approaching the crossing. Southern R. Co. v. Bryant, 35 Va. 212, 28 S. E. 183.

tributory negligence is deemed to be on the plaintiff;⁶⁰ showing that it does not follow, as before pointed out, that where this burden is on the plaintiff, the injured person must be presumed to have been guilty of negligence. In jurisdictions in which the plaintiff does not have to show that the injured person was in the exercise of due care, it has been held that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, there is a presumption that a pedestrian, before attempting to cross railroad tracks, stopped, looked, and listened.⁶¹ The same presumption attaches to a person injured

56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 229, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 41, 55 L. T. N. S. 709, 35 Week. Rep. 141, 51 J. P. 404, a crossing accident case, Lord Watson said: "The difficulty of dealing with the question of onus in cases like the present arises from the fact that in most cases it is well-nigh impossible for the plaintiff to lay his evidence before a jury or the court without disclosing circumstances which either point to, or tend to rebut, the conclusion that the injured party was guilty of contributory negligence. If the plaintiff's evidence were sufficient to show that the negligence of the defendants did materially contribute to the injury, and threw no light upon the question of the injured party's negligence, then I should be of opinion that, in the absence of any counter evidence from the defendants, it ought to be presumed that, in point of fact, there was no such contributory negligence. Even if the plaintiff's evidence did disclose facts and circumstances bearing upon that question, which were neither sufficient per se to prove such contributory negligence, nor to cast the onus of disproving it on the plaintiff, I should remain of the same opinion."

⁶⁰ Where there is no eyewitness of the accident, while the rule is not relaxed that the plaintiff must show that his intestate was without fault, yet the presumption, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, obtains that the deceased used ordinary care and caution in attempting the crossing, and such presumption is sufficient, under the rule, to permit the plaintiff to recover upon showing negligence in the defendant. Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 271, 18 Am. St. Rep. 441, 44 N. W. 270.

In the absence of proof tending to show the contrary, where a person is injured by an accident to which there were no eyewitnesses, the presumption is that he was in the exercise of due care. Van Doorn v. Heap, 160 Mich. 199, 125 N. W. 11.

So, the court may refuse to take the case from the jury although it does not definitely appear that a person killed at a railroad crossing used any precautions to avoid the collision. Lyman v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 N. H. 200, 11 L.R.A. 364, 20 Atl. 076.

For other cases discussing the question as to presumption of due care, see supra, IV., note 34.

Where there is no direct evidence that a traveler did not stop, look, and listen 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

before he entered upon a railroad crossing, the presumption of law is that he did his full duty, and observed the precautions which it prescribed. McBride v. Northern P. R. Co. 19 Or. 64, 23 Pac. 814.

It is not incumbent on plaintiff, suing to recover damages for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, affirmatively to show that, before attempting to cross the track, the deceased stopped and looked and listened. The common-law presumption is that everyone does his duty until the contrary is proved; and in the absence of all evidence on the subject, the presumption is that the decedent observed the precaution which the law prescribes before he attempted to cross defendant's road. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Weber, 76 Pa. 157, 18 Am. Rep. 407.

In Weiss v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 79 Pa. 387, a crossing-accident case, it was held that where the plaintiff had made out a case of negligence against the defendant, and no contributory negligence appeared, the presumption of law was that deceased had done all that a prudent man would do, under the circumstances, to preserve his own life, and that he had stopped and looked and listened. The onus of proving contributory negligence was thus clearly cast upon the defendant.

In Schum v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 107 Pa. 8, 52 Am. Rep. 468, a crossing-accident case, where no one saw the occurrence, and there was no evidence whatever whether in fact the person killed, for whose death the action was brought, stopped and looked and listened, it was held that the presumption was that he did, and that proof of such fact was no part of the plaintiff's case. The court said the presumption is one of fact merely, and may be rebutted.

In a crossing-accident case, where the facts developed by the plaintiff do not indicate contributory negligence, the plaintiff affirmatively to prove that he stopped, looked, and listened, the presumption being that he did so, and the burden of proving that he did not being on the defendant. Steele v. Northern P. R. Co. 21 Wash. 287, 57 Pac. 820.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill, 57 Kan. 139, 45 Pac. 581, it was held that where a person killed at a railroad crossing which was obscure and dangerous approached the tracks at night, no one seeing the accident, the presumption was that he exercised ordinary care, and, as the court could not say that this was overcome by the evidence, the case was declared to be a proper one for the jury.

Where there is a failure of the evidence proving or tending to prove that the person while in the street;⁶² and to minors under a certain age.⁶³ It has been held that the presumption will be entertained that a decedent, who met his death by falling through an unguarded hatchway, was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of due care;⁶⁴ and that a person who was killed by catching his foot in a switch frog, and being run over, was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident, and that it devolves upon the railroad company to prove that he was not, in order to relieve itself of the liability fixed upon it by its negligent act causing the death.⁶⁵ injured did not stop, look, and listen before crossing railroad tracks, the jury is required to presume that the person injured did exercise ordinary care, and was not guilty of contributory negligence. Whaley v. Vidal, — S. D. —, 132 N. W. 248.

The law presumes that a person killed by a car while walking on a street car track was in the exercise of due care, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Goff v. St. Louis Transit Co. 199 Mo. 694, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 244, 98 S. W. 49.

The presumption that a person killed while crossing a street railroad track was in the exercise of due care, and looked and saw the car, was held not overcome by testimony of the motorman that the deceased "did not seem to look or notice anything," and of the conductor, that he "did not see or look back at all." Powers v. St. Louis Transit Co. 202 Mo. 267, 100 S. W. 655.

In an action to recover for the death of the driver of a wagon, struck by a car while the deceased was endeavoring to turn out of the track, it was held, in the absence of any evidence on the question, that the deceased was in the exercise of due care in endeavoring to discover the approach of cars, and in looking out for his own safety. McKenzie v. United R. Co. 216 Mo. 11, 115 S. W. 13.

Where there was no evidence to show that a person injured while attempting to cross street car tracks failed to look or listen for the car, it was held that the case would not be taken from the jury, since the presumption obtained that the plaintiff did what common prudence and ordinary care demanded of her. Priesmeyer v. St. Louis Transit Co. 102 Mo. App. 518, 77 S. W. 313.

⁶³ The defendant has the burden of overcoming the presumption that a child under fourteen years of age is incapable of contributory negligence. Hazlerigg v. Dobbins, 145 Iowa, 495, 123 N. W. 196.

The burden is on the defendant to rebut the presumption that a person killed at a railroad crossing, who was under the age of fourteen years, was incapable of contributory negligence. Virginia-Carolina R. Co. v. Clawson, 111 Va. 313, 68 S. E. 1003.

⁶⁴ Ward v. Dampskibsselskabet Kjoeben-haven, 136 Fed. 502.

Where there was a stair landing between two stories of a building, and in the wall next to the landing, and in line with a bannister extending down the stairs, there was an unguarded window, and a boy was seen to start down the stairs, and when next seen was in the air outside of the building, having fallen through the window, whence he dropped to the ground and was killed, one of the theories of the defendant as to the cause of the accident was that the boy was sliding down the bannister, and in some manner slipped off and went through the window; but there was no sufficient evidence to support such a presumption, and the court held that until there was evidence which bore on the question, the presumption obtained that the deceased was careful instead of negligent, and it was for the defendant to overcome that presumption by positive or circumstantial evidence proving him to have been careless. Rogers v. Meyerson Printing Co. 103 Mo. App. 683, 78 S. W. 79.

The presumption is that a person injured by falling down a dark stairway was in the exercise of due care, until there is evidence introduced tending to establish that fact. Strickland v. F. W. Woolworth & Co. 143 Mo. App. 528, 127 S. W. 628.

Likewise where an express messenger is injured by a collision between the train in which he was riding and another, he is presumed to have exercised due and proper care at the time of the accident. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71.

Where the evidence of the death of a servant is circumstantial, the law presumes that he was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident, and the burden is upon the defendant to prove contributory negligence, unless the same appears from plaintiff's testimony. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Rowsey, 108 Va. 632, 62 S. E. 363.

If a person killed by negligent management on the part of a railroad company of its cars met his death while walking on a sidewalk where he had a right to be, the company, in order to escape liability to answer in damages for his death, must show that he was guilty of some want of ordinary care in placing himself in the position where he was killed. If there is no evidence upon the subject, the presumption is that he was not lacking in ordinary care. Phillips v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 77 Wis. 349, 9 L.R.A. 521, 46 N. W. 543.

In Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Sloan, 52 Fla. 257, 42 So. 516, an instruction that a person killed by an electric shock, or from any other cause resulting from the negligence of another, is presumed in law to

This presumption, of course, like other presumptions, may be overcome by evidence rebutting it.⁶⁶ This was declared in Rhode Island,⁶⁷ a jurisdiction in which it is held that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff. There was no eyewitness to the accident, and the presumption was invoked on behalf of the plaintiff. The court recognized the presumption, but held that it was overcome by other circumstances. It will therefore be seen that in Rhode Island, it is not held that the injured person must be presumed to have been guilty of contributory negligence because of the rule that the burden of proving freedom from negligence is on the plaintiff.

In railroad-crossing cases, it is often held that the presumption that the person injured was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident may be overcome by evidence that he could have seen the danger had he looked.⁶⁸ And the presumption may be met by a presumption of

have been in the exercise of reasonable care for himself, unless it is shown by a preponderance of evidence that he knew of the danger, and carelessly and negligently risked his life or person by some act of omission or commission on his part,—was held not to be misleading, but that it stated the law correctly, since the burden of proving plaintiff's negligence is on the defendant.

See note to Hendrickson v. Great Northern R. Co. 16 L.R.A. 261, on "Presumption as to exercise of due care by person who is found to have been killed by the alleged negligence of another." Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Landrigan, 191 U. S. 461, 48 L. ed. 262, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 137.

⁶⁶ The presumption is available in cases where there is an absence of evidence showing the actual occurrence, but like other presumptions, it ceases in the light of actual facts. Rich v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 78 C. C. A. 663, 140 Fed. 79.

The presumption that, in the absence of evidence upon the subject, the deceased was in the exercise of due care, cannot stand against positive and uncontradicted proof that, had he taken proper precautions which the law required of him, he could have avoided the danger. Tomlinson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 67 C. C. A. 218, 134 Fed. 233.

The presumption indulged in favor of the plaintiff, that he was free from negligence contributing to the injuries sued for, will be overcome by specific averments of facts which show that he knew, or had opportunity to know, of the danger, and, knowing of the danger, did not use care commensurate therewith. Lafayette v. Fitch, 12 Ind. App. 134, 69 N. E. 414.

⁶⁷ In Judge v. Narragansett Electric Lighting Co. 21 R. I. 128, 42 Atl. 507, the court said that all that was intended by the court in its decision in the Cassidy Case (Cassidy v. Angell, 12 R. I. 447, 34 Am. Rep. 690) was that, in a case presenting the same facts, the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of a presumption that the deceased was in the exercise of the care of a person of ordinary prudence, nothing appearing to the contrary. The court did not intend to change, nor consider that it was changing, the rule which had always been considered a settled rule in Rhode Island, that the burden of proving the exercise of due care rests on the plaintiff. Though the court held the plaintiff entitled to the benefit L.R.A. (N.S.)

fit of the presumption stated in such case, yet if evidence is adduced by the defendant, tending to rebut this presumption, the burden still rests on the plaintiff to satisfy the jury by a preponderance of the evidence that deceased was in the exercise of due care.

In a concurring opinion, Rogers, J., in alluding to this point, said: "The doctrine referred to, when couched in plain and unmistakable terms, it seems to me, amounts to this: that in negligence cases there is a presumption in favor of the plaintiff that the deceased was in the exercise of due care; and that, resting on such presumption, the plaintiff is not required to offer any evidence, either direct or circumstantial, showing freedom from contributory negligence, until such presumption has first been rebutted. That must mean that the burden of rebutting the so-called presumption rests upon the defendant; for if the plaintiff, in putting in his case, himself presented evidence, either direct or circumstantial, rebutting such presumption, he would throw himself out of court; and if he presented evidence supporting such presumption, it would necessarily be evidence tending to show due care, and then he would not be relying on the presumption so-called, but upon evidence; and the evidence, in my opinion, is what he must solely rely on, there being no presumption about it."

For other cases discussing presumptions as to due care, see supra, IV., note 34.

⁶⁸ Where the undisputed evidence shows that if the deceased, who was killed at a railroad crossing, had used his senses of hearing and seeing, as the law required him to do, he could have seen and heard the train in time to avoid injury, the presumption that he was in the exercise of due care is overcome. Rollins v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 71 C. C. A. 615, 139 Fed. 639.

The court having told the jury that, as a matter of law, every person is presumed to be in the exercise of due care for his own safety, an instruction in a crossing-accident case, that the presumption that the deceased used due care in approaching the crossing in order to avoid injury is entirely destroyed where it appears from the evidence that if he had looked and listened before driving upon the crossing, he must have seen or heard the train approaching, does not invade the province of equal force of like care on the part of those in charge of the train; or it may be entirely overcome if the facts and circumstances clearly established admit of no other conclusion than that, if the deceased had stopped, looked, and listened, he would have seen the train. Whether the presumption has been rebutted is for the jury, unless the evidence to the contrary is clear, positive, and credible, and either uncontradicted or so indisputable in weight and amount as to justify the court in holding that a verdict against it must be set aside as a matter of law.⁶⁹

d. Instinct of self-preservation.

1. Introductory statement.

The conclusion that a presumption must be indulged that a person injured by the the jury. Rogers v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. 32 Utah, 367, 125 Am. St. Rep. 876, 90 Pac. 1075. The court said that it was proper to tell the jury that a person approaching a railroad crossing will be presumed to be in the exercise of due care. It was equally proper to tell them in what way, and when, this presumption might cease to be operative. The presumption is by no means a conclusive one, but is, at most, evidentiary, and its legal effect in one sense amounts only to a statement in another form that negligence is never presumed as a matter of law. Nor did the court in any way invade the province of the jury in the instruction, but it left it for them to say whether the presumption was overcome or not.

In an action for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, where the evidence tended to prove that the deceased had a clear view of the railroad track for a considerable distance, it was held erroneous to charge in substance, that if the jury believed the defendant guilty of negligence, and there was no evidence to the contrary, then the presumption is, though slight, that plaintiff's intestate did his duty and what the law required of him in approaching the crossing, since this authorized the jury to rest the verdict upon a presumption in favor of the plaintiff, instead of upon the facts proven and the inferences reasonably to be drawn therefrom. Southern R. Co. v. Hansbrough, 107 Va. 733, 60 S. E. 58.

In an action to recover for injuries received by a collision between a street car and a vehicle, it is error to charge that, in the absence of evidence showing that the injured person stopped, looked, and listened before crossing the track, it would be presumed that he did, where it is shown that the horse of the deceased came out of the darkness on a gallop, that the motorman did everything in his power to stop the car, that the deceased almost got across the track before he was struck, that the horse negligence of another was, at the time, in the exercise of due care, may be reached on the erroneous supposition that such a presumption must be entertained wherever the burden of proving contributory negligence is held to be upon the defendant. And the opposite presumption—that is, that the injured person was guilty of contributory negligence—may be erroneously held to exist because the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff.

Irrespective, however, of the question of where the burden of proving contributory negligence lies, the presumption as to the injured person's conduct may be based solely on the fact that the instinct of self-preservation is so strong that men will ordinarily exercise due care to prevent injury to themselves. The presumption of contributory negligence may be based on was sweaty, indicating that it had been driven rapidly, that he was so gentle as to stand after the crash, quietly, with two of his feet in the curbing of the sidewalk, and that the cart was in such a position when struck as to indicate that the deceased saw the approaching car, and took a diagonal course across the tracks ahead of it. Los Angeles Traction Co. v. Conneally, 63 C. C. A. 92, 136 Fed. 104.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Chapman, 71 C. C. A. 523, 140 Fed. 129, a crossing-accident case, where the movements of the deceased had been traced almost up to the moment of the accident, and he had been shown to have gone upon a crossing in the nighttime, known to him to be dangerous, it was held palpably misleading, under such a state of facts, to tell the jury that there was no eyewitness to the accident, and that because there was no one to tell just how it happened, the law presumes that, at the time of the accident, the deceased was exercising due care, and that the burden was upon the defendant to overcome such presumption, and that there was a further presumption that the deceased looked and listened for approaching engines before venturing upon the tracks, and adopted the requisite precautions.

In the absence of any evidence in an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, that the deceased was in the exercise of due care, the presumption that he looked and listened, and was in the exercise of ordinary care to avoid possible collision with passing trains, is overcome by the logical and irresistible conclusion that deceased, had he listened, could have heard the train which killed him, and had he looked, he must have seen it in time to avoid the collision. Porter v. Missouri P. R. Co. 199 Mo. 82, 97 S. W. 880.

But this presumption does not furnish sufficient evidence of absence of contribu-

the fact alone that experience has shown that, in spite of this instinct, in a very large number of accidents the injured person has been at fault. The rule that no presumption will be indulged one way or the other may be based upon the fact that experience has proved that injured persons are sometimes careful and sometimes careless, and that it is impossible to ascertain from these cases whether in any particular instance the person hurt is likely to have been in the exercise of due care. Undoubtedly the rule that a presumption of due care arises from the instinct of self-preservation arose out of the desire of the courts to relieve plaintiffs, under certain circumstances, from the harshness of the rule placing upon them the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence.⁷⁰

2. Plaintiff entitled to presumption although he has the burden of proving due care.

The cases cited in this subdivision of the note show that the rule that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff is not founded on the presumption that the injured person was guilty of contributory negligence, but, on the contrary, that a presumption of due care may exist in favor of the plaintiff although the burden of proof as to the issue of contributory negligence is upon him. It is said, for example, in Illinois, where this burden is held to be on the plaintiff, that the natural instinct prompting the preservation of life, and the avoidance of injury and consequent suffering and pain, may be taken into consideration where there is no eyewitness to an accident on the question whether the deceased or the person injured was exercising due care.⁷¹ In Iowa it is held that where direct and positive evidence cannot be obtained that a person found dead at the foot of an elevator shaft was in the exercise of due care, it is proper for the jury to consider the instinct of men which naturally leads them to avoid danger, as evidence of due care on tory negligence to take the case to the jury, where it appears that a person of mature faculties and unimpaired senses attempts to cross the tracks in a railroad yard at night, and steps in front of a road engine and tender, backing at the rate of 6 miles an hour, and is killed. Rich v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 78 C. C. A. 663, 149 Fed. 79.

There is in all men a natural instinct of self-preservation, and such instinct is an element of evidence which the jury may take notice of, and, in the absence of all testimony upon the subject, find that a deceased party, in obedience to the ordinary instincts of mankind, exercised that care for his safety which a prudent man would, under the same conditions, have made use of. Broadbent v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 64 Ill. App. 231.

Where there was no eyewitness to the killing of a person at a railroad crossing, the fact that the deceased was a steady, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sober, and industrious man, in good health, and so situated that it was fairly inferable that the instinct of self-preservation was as strong in him as in other men, it was held that these facts of themselves might be considered on the question whether he exercised due care, and that they legally tended to prove the fact. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Gunderson, 174 Ill. 405, 51 N. E. 708.

Where a brakeman who was riding on cars he had uncoupled fell off directly after a collision, and was run over and killed, and the evidence showed that the lantern of the deceased was first seen to fall, followed by the deceased himself, and there was no evidence of negligent conduct on his part, the court said the presumption of law must be, where the fact is not susceptible of direct proof, that a person does not voluntarily incur danger or the risk of death, and that, in view of the known condition, he was exercising due care for his own safety. Chicago Terminal Transfer R. Co. v. Reddick, 131 Ill. App. 515.

An instruction that the jury might take into consideration with other facts and circumstances in the case, the instinct which naturally leads men to avoid injury and preserve their own lives, in determining whether the deceased was using due care for his own safety, was held not misleading, where there was evidence of facts and circumstances and the character and habits of the deceased from which the jury might rightfully find that he was in the exercise of ordinary care. Collision v. Illinois C. R. Co. 239 Ill. 532, 88 N. E. 251.

In Collision v. Illinois C. R. Co. supra, it is said: "It is true that there is an instinct of self-preservation common to all, and that such instinct raises a presumption against an affirmative act tending to the part of the deceased.⁷² And where a conductor and a brakeman who were standing side by side on a flat car of a backing gravel train saw the headlight of an approaching engine, and signaled for the emergency brakes, which were instantly applied, and the conductor, in anticipation thereof, braced himself and saved himself from being thrown off, but the brakeman was thrown and killed, it was held that as the question of contributory negligence of the deceased hinged entirely upon whether he had used reasonable care and caution in bracing himself in anticipation of the shock which would result from the application of the brakes, and as there was no evidence on this point, an instruction that the jury might take into consideration the instinct of self-preservation in determining whether the deceased had been in the exercise of due care was proper.⁷³ And where a boy was smothered in some manner by the falling of oats upon him while in a bin into which he had been sent, it was held, in an action to recover for his death, that the boy being dead, the case was aided by the presumption that he was in the exercise of due care when he received his injuries.⁷⁴ The decisions in Maine do not seem to be in harmony upon this point. In a case in which a gig went off from a bridge upon which there was no destroy life, such as suicide, and raises a presumption as to the conduct of a person where there is a known danger to be avoided. The presumption is based upon human experience that a man will, in the presence of danger, act in accordance with the instinct of self-preservation, but that instinct is only operative when danger is perceived. The law recognizes that there are persons who are careless, heedless, and inattentive, as well as those who are prudent and careful, and that the instinct of self-preservation does not uniformly lead men to exercise care to ascertain whether conditions exist which are likely to inflict injury. To establish and apply a general presumption in favor of care would obviate the necessity of making proof of the fact which this court has uniformly held must be made."

For cases holding that circumstantial evidence may be aided by presumption, see infra, V., note 79.

Where a clinker puller went under a locomotive to work, and while there another engine collided with it, and caused it to run over him, it was held in an action brought to recover for his death, that an instruction that the jury might consider the instinct which naturally leads men to avoid injury and preserve their own lives, and the presumption that they will ordinarily do so, was good, there being no direct evidence of what the deceased was doing at the time of accident, or how he came to receive his injuries. Morbey v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 84, 89 N. W. 105.

Where a nine-year-old boy fell off of a sidewalk and was killed, and no one saw the accident, this was held to be a proper case for the application of the rule that the presumption is that a person will exercise due care for the preservation of his own life. Schnee v. Dubuque, 122 Iowa, 459, 98 N. W. 298.

Where a boy employed in a sawmill was killed by a board violently thrown from the saw, and at the moment of the injury the deceased was not observed by any witness, and the manner in which the boy came in contact with the saw, and the agency, if any, of the deceased in bringing it about, were matters of which no witness was able to speak of his own knowledge, it was held that there was a presumption of due care on the part of the deceased which the jury was entitled to consider. Woolf v. Nauman Co. 128 Iowa, 261, 103 N. W. 785.

In an action for the death of a girl killed by an explosion of a substance sold for kerosene oil, it was held that where there was no living witness of the explosion, or of the circumstances under which the deceased met her death, the administrator of her estate was entitled to the presumption of due care on her part, arising from the common instinct of self-preservation which naturally leads a normal person to avoid danger. Ellis v. Republic Oil Co. 133 Iowa, 11, 110 N. W. 20.

Where there were no eyewitnesses to the killing of a section foreman by the backing of a train upon him as he was about to cross a railroad track, it was held that the presumption arising from the instinct of self-preservation would be sufficient to sustain the burden of proof in the first instance that the deceased was not at fault for the accident. Christopherson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 135 Iowa, 409, 124 Am. St. Rep. 284, 109 N. W. 1077. The court said that it is true that such presumption cannot prevail against evidence which shows that the injured party could not have exercised due care. But unless the evidence conclusively shows contributory negligence, the presumption of the instinct of self-preservation should be taken into account; and the jurors, had the case been submitted to them, would have been justified in assuming that deceased was not doing a negligent act when he was injured, if the injury could be accounted for without contributory negligence on his part.

⁷⁴ Meier v. Way, J. L. & Co. 136 Iowa, 302, 125 Am. St. Rep. 254, 111 N. W. 420.

Where there are no eyewitnesses of a transaction in which a party is injured, and in which he may or may not have been guilty of contributory negligence, the natural instinct of self-preservation may be railing, and plaintiff was hurt, it was said that, in the absence of all opposing proof, it may not be too much to infer care from common experience, when essential to personal security.⁷⁵ In later cases, however, it has been held that the presumption as to freedom from negligence will not be indulged merely because of the instinct of self-preservation.⁷⁶ In New Hampshire, it has been held that the exercise of due care on the part of a person injured at a railroad crossing may, under some circumstances, be inferred from the ordinary habits and dispositions of prudent men and the instinct of self-preservation.⁷⁷ But that this alone is not sufficient to discharge plaintiff's burden of proving due care.⁷⁸ Freedom from negligence may, however, it is declared, be inferred from this instinct and other circumstantial evidence, such as the careful habits of the deceased.⁷⁹ And the rule in New York is that the instinct considered as bearing upon his conduct. Stephenson v. Sheffield Brick & Tile Co. — Iowa, —, 130 N. W. 586.

But in Bell v. Clarion, 113 Iowa, 126, 84 N. W. 962, an action to recover for injuries received by reason of a defective sidewalk, an instruction to the effect that, in view of the instinct of self-preservation, a presumption arises that the injured person was careful, which presumption will prevail unless overcome by evidence satisfying the jury that the injured person was negligent, was held erroneous. The court said that "this statement of the law, if it were correct, would entirely revolutionize the doctrine, well established in this state, that the plaintiff has the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence. If a presumption of due care is to be entertained, then the burden of proof would in practically every case be upon the defendant to show that the plaintiff was negligent. The mere statement of this proposition," said the court, "is sufficient to show that it is erroneous. The lower court was no doubt misled by the ambiguous use of the term 'presumption,' which is found in some of the cases. Frequently that word is used as indicating merely an inference which may be drawn from certain facts; and where it has been used in the previous decisions of this court in this connection it must be so interpreted. . . . In the present case the inference to be drawn from the instinct of self-preservation could properly be considered by the jury, and . . . [the court] would not therefore be justified in sustaining the contention of defendant that there was no evidence of want of contributory negligence on the part of deceased. . . . But that is a very different thing from saying to the jury that a presumption arises therefrom requiring evidence to the satisfaction of the jury to overcome it."

⁷⁵ Foster v. Dixfield, 18 Me. 380.

⁷⁶ In Chase v. Maine C. R. Co. 77 Me. 62, 52 Am. Rep. 744, in holding that the instinct of self-preservation does not afford proof of the absence of contributory negligence, the court said that such a consideration is by no means evidence, for if it were so, a jury might accept it as conclusive evidence. That it is no more than an accompaniment or an appurtenance of evidence; that it may have some influence upon the interpretation of facts affirmatively presented; that it pertains to those natural laws in connection with which all evidence may be weighed; it may give character or force to facts already proved, but that it does not of itself add or create proof; that it is rather an argument or mode of reasoning upon evidence. Continuing, the court said: "But the weakness of the plaintiff's position lies in the fact that this motive for personal safety does not operate upon the minds of men until they can clearly see that they are endangered by their carelessness. It does not keep them from careless acts. The danger is often not seen until too late to be extricated from it. The careless act usually precedes the moment when the natural instincts for self-preservation are aroused. And a man is quite prone to take risks. And a man is careless to take a risk in crossing a railroad in advance of a coming train. We all know that he often does it. There is no doubt that the intestate was impelled by all his instincts and love of life to save himself when he saw that the horrible danger was upon him. But how the unfortunate man got into the awful situation no one seems to know and no evidence explains to us. It seems to be an unexplained catastrophe."

In McLane v. Perkins, 92 Me. 39, 43 L.R.A. 487, 42 Atl. 255, it is said that if freedom from contributory negligence is sought to be established by inference, it must be by inference from facts in evidence in the case. It cannot be inferred from general conduct, nor from the habits or instincts of mankind, nor from the argument that men are likely to be careful in danger. It is as true that men are careless as that they are careful.

⁷⁸ The instinct of self-preservation is not alone sufficient to establish due care on the part of a pedestrian, killed while attempting to cross a railroad track in front of a moving train. Wright v. Boston & M. R. Co. 74 N. H. 128, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 832, 124 Am. St. Rep. 949, 65 Atl. 687.

⁷⁹ Where a brakeman was killed while ascending a ladder on a car by being struck by an overhead bridge, and there was no evidence that the deceased was insane, intoxicated, or possessed of suicidal intent, it was held that the exercise of due care could be inferred from the ordinary habits and disposition of prudent men, and the instinct of self-preservation, taken in connection with other circumstantial evidence in the case, and that the attempt of self-preservation may be taken into consideration in determining the injured person's conduct at the time of the accident, but that a presumption of due care or an inference of due care cannot be based solely upon that fact.⁸⁰ In one case a coal driver was killed by the falling of a heavy iron grating upon him. The grating swung on hinges and was used to cover an opening in the sidewalk through which the coal was delivered, the grating being open or swung back at such time. The deceased was observed immediately before the accident standing near his cart, which was then backed to within a foot of the hatchway where the coal was to be dumped. A moment after another coal driver coming out of the hatchway was struck in the breast by the feet of the deceased, as he was borne to the earth by the grating. What happened in this short interval was not observed by any eyewitness. The plaintiff attempted to prove that the deceased was called upon in the performance of his duty to go into the basement to secure the signature of some official of the city to whom the coal was being delivered, to a ticket showing the weight of the load he had to deliver. This evidence was rejected by the trial court and the plaintiff was nonsuited. This was held error. The court said the jury had the right to infer from all the facts that the deceased was called to the place where he received his injuries, in the performance of his duty, and had not omitted the precaution which a prudent man would take in the presence of a known danger. That he had some to ascend the ladder at the time and place he did was due solely to his inadequate understanding of the risk. Miller v. Boston & M. R. Co. 73 N. H. 330, 61 Atl. 360.

In Huntress v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 N. H. 185, 49 Am. St. Rep. 600, 34 Atl. 154, a crossing-accident case, it is said that when there is no evidence of insanity, intoxication, or suicidal purpose, and no evidence on the question of the plaintiff's care, except the instinct provided for the preservation of animal life, it may be inferred from this circumstantial proof that, for some reason consistent with ordinary care and freedom from fault on his part, his attempt to cross was due to his inadequate understanding of the risk.

See also IV., note 77, supra.

A plaintiff suing for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing is not required in all cases to prove that the deceased looked and listened, since it may be inferred, in view of the circumstances, that he did what a prudent man would do to save his life, and was governed by the instinct of self-preservation. Lyman v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 N. H. 200, 11 L.R.A. 364, 20 Atl. 976.

⁸⁰ The culpability of the defendant must be affirmatively proved before the case can go to the jury, but the absence of any fault on the part of the plaintiff may be inferred from circumstances; and the disposition of men to take care of themselves and keep out of difficulty may properly be taken into consideration. Johnson v. Hudson River R. Co. 20 N. Y. 65, 75 Am. Dec. 375, affirming 6 Duer, 633.

While the absence of contributory negligence need not be established by direct evidence, but may rest upon inferences properly drawn from the surrounding facts and circumstances, an inference of due care cannot be based solely upon the presumption that the person whose life is exposed to danger will adopt proper means to protect himself. McSweeney v. Erie R. Co. 93 App. Div. 496, 87 N. Y. Supp. 836.

which may be properly drawn from the surrounding facts and circumstances, such inferences cannot be drawn from a presumption that a person will exercise care and prudence in regard to his own life and safety, for the reason that human experience is to the effect that persons exposed to danger will frequently forego the ordinary precautions of safety. And when the circumstances point as much to the negligence of the deceased as to its absence, or point in neither direction, a nonsuit should be granted. Wiwirowski v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 420, 26 N. E. 1023.

In Reynolds v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 248, it was said that the jury might infer that a person killed at a railroad crossing was governed by the natural instinct of self-preservation, and would not put himself recklessly and consciously in peril of death; but that men are careless, and subject themselves thereby to injury, is the common experience of mankind; and when injured, no presumption exists in the absence of proof that they were exercising due care at the time.

The inference of freedom from contributory negligence cannot be drawn from the presumption that one will exercise care and prudence in regard to his own life and safety. O'Reilly v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 82 App. Div. 492, 81 N. Y. Supp. 572.

When a person has been killed at a railroad crossing, and there are no witnesses of the accident, the circumstances must be such as to show that the deceased exercised proper care for his own safety. When the circumstances point just as much to the negligence of the deceased as to its absence, or point in neither direction, the plaintiff should be nonsuited. The presumption that every person will take care of himself from regard to his own life and safety cannot take the place of proof; because human experience shows that persons exposed to danger will frequently forego the ordinary precautions of safety. Cordell v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 75 N. Y. 330.

reason for taking the position where he was injured was altogether probable; and it was unreasonable to suppose that he carelessly placed himself in a position to be injured. The court approved the rule that the absence of any fault on the part of the plaintiff may be inferred from the circumstances, in connection with the ordinary habits, conduct, and motives of men, and that the character of the defendant's negligence may be such as prima facie to prove the whole issue.⁸¹

3. Plaintiff entitled to presumption where burden of proving contributory negligence is on defendant.

In jurisdictions in which the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, it is also held that the absence of any fault upon the part of a person killed by the negligence of another may be inferred from the circumstances, in connection with the ordinary habits, conduct, and motives of men, and that the natural instinct of self-preservation in the case of a sober and prudent man stands in the place of positive evidence.⁸² In the absence of all evidence on the subject, it would not be presumed that the deceased did not exercise proper care, for he had the greatest incentive to caution to protect his own life.⁸³ The law of self-preservation as well as of self-defense raises the presumption that everyone will exercise ordinary care to look out for himself.⁸⁴ The presumption stands in the place of positive evidence, and is sufficient to warrant a recovery in the absence of countervailing testimony.⁸⁵ So, where no one saw a person killed at a railroad crossing, and there is no evidence whether he looked or listened before attempting to cross, the instinct of self-preservation might be taken into consideration on the question whether he was in the exercise of due care.⁸⁶ And where

In Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 153, the question was thus put by the court: "Where the testimony as to the defendant's conduct does not also show what was the conduct of the plaintiff, must the plaintiff go further and show that he exercised proper caution and prudence, or that no negligence on his part contributed in any degree to the injury? If, under the circumstances of the case, he is able to show what his conduct was, it would be no hardship to require him to prove himself blameless; but suppose he is unable, as in the present case, to show by direct testimony what his conduct was,—is the jury bound, as a matter of law, to return a verdict for the defendant, notwithstanding his fault is clearly established; or, which amounts to the same thing, is the court in such a case bound to nonsuit the plaintiff?" While the court admitted the general rule, that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to make a case which will leave him blameless, it did not understand that it followed that he must prove affirmatively in all cases that he exercised ordinary care and diligence. In the absence of any direct proof, the jury is at liberty to infer ordinary care and diligence on the part of the plaintiff from all the circumstances of the case, his character and habits, and the natural instinct of self-preservation. To hold otherwise would be in effect to presume negligence on the part of one in excuse of negligence on the part of another. If the plaintiff makes a case which does not show his own negligence, the case should go to the jury.

⁸³ Hemingway v. Illinois C. R. Co. 52 C. C. A. 477, 114 Fed. 843.

So, where a person was engaged in unloading a car, and was thrown from the car and killed by its sudden starting, it was held that absence of fault on the part of the deceased might be inferred from the general and known disposition of men to take care of themselves and to keep out of the way of difficulty and danger, where the evidence was conflicting, tending to create doubt as to whether the deceased was in fault, in bringing upon himself his misfortune. ⁸⁵ Northern P. R. Co. v. Spike, 57 C. C. A. 384, 121 Fed. 44.

As the love of life and the instinct of self-preservation are the highest motives for care in any reasoning being, they will stand for proof of care until the contrary appears. Cleveland & P. R. Co. v. Rowan, 66 Pa. 393.

⁸⁶ Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill, 57 Kan. 139, 45 Pac. 581.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, a jury may infer from the universal instinct of self-preservation, that a person about to cross an electric street railway track both looked and listened before venturing to do so. Kansas City-Leavenworth R. Co. v. Gallagher, 68 Kan. 424, 64 L.R.A. 344, 75 Pac. 469.

Where there is no evidence that a person killed at a railroad crossing looked or listened for an approaching train before he went upon the track, the law presumes from the natural instinct of self-preservation that he both looked and listened. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Baumgartner, 74 Kan. 148, 85 Pac. 822, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1094.

A person approaching a railroad crossing has the right to presume that the company will obey an ordinance of the city regulating the speed of its trains, and requiring to be placed on every moving train after a person approached a street car track on a dark night, with an umbrella over his head, and went in front of a car approaching at an unlawful rate of speed, and was killed, and no one knew whether he looked or listened before stepping upon the track, it was held that the presumption that he was in the exercise of due care, and looked and listened, would be indulged.⁸⁷

The rule is held to be especially justifiable in crossing-accident cases where the circumstances are such that the injured person, even by the use of his senses, might not have seen or heard the train.⁸⁸ Where there is no evidence of the fact, the presumption is said to be against contributory negligence, even in the absence of any statute making it a matter of affirmative defense.⁸⁹ And it has even been held that sunset certain lights, and requiring the engine bell to be rung, and when, in an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a crossing, these presumptions, together with the presumption that the deceased was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of due care, are indulged, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover unless it conclusively appears from the evidence adduced by him, either by the direct or cross-examination of his own witnesses, that the deceased was guilty of negligence contributing directly to his own injury; and in order to overcome the presumption, and to defeat plaintiff's action, it devolves upon the defendant to show by the weight of the evidence a failure on the part of the deceased to exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury, and that his failure to exercise such care was its proximate cause, and so direct and immediate that, but for the want of such ordinary care, the injury would not have occurred. Weller v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 164 Mo. 180, 86 Am. St. Rep. 592, 64 S. W. 141.

The plaintiff being rendered unconscious by being struck by a train at a crossing, and unable, therefore, to tell what she was doing immediately before the accident, and being able to produce no witness on that point, is entitled to certain presumptions, one being that, because of the natural instinct of love of life, she was in the exercise of due care. Stotler v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 200 Mo. 107, 98 S. W. 509.

In Davis v. Kansas City Belt R. Co. 46 Mo. App. 180, it was held that an instruction that the instinct of self-preservation is not a proper consideration for the jury in determining whether a person injured at a railroad crossing exercised due care would be erroneous in Missouri, where the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, and where the plaintiff is presumed to have been in the exercise of ordinary care. The court said that whether or not sufficient evidence is produced by defendant to overcome this presumption, founded on the prevailing in-where, according to the admissions of the plaintiff, the accident may have occurred through his fault, and there is nothing to lead the jury to the conclusion that it did not, this will not warrant an instruction to find for the defendant.⁹⁰ And, finally, it has been held that the rule as to the presumption arising from the instinct of self-preservation will prevail, whether the action is brought by the administrator of a deceased person, or by the plaintiff in his own behalf.⁹¹

4. Presumption not to stand for proof of fact.

In Indiana, where, before the passage of a statute declaring to the contrary, the burden of proving contributory negligence instinct of self-preservation, and standing to the credit of the plaintiff, is a question for the jury.

It is not required in all actions for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, that the plaintiff prove affirmatively that his intestate looked or listened. It may be inferred, in view of the circumstances, that the deceased, governed by the instinct of self-preservation, did what a prudent man ordinarily would do to save his life. Hendrickson v. Great Northern R. Co. 49 Minn. 245, 16 L.R.A. 261, 32 Am. St. Rep. 540, 51 N. W. 1044.

⁸⁷ Riska v. Union Depot R. Co. 180 Mo. 168, 79 S. W. 445.

In an action to recover for injuries received by one who was struck by a horse and wagon as he was crossing the street, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of evidence, that he was exercising the care and caution of an ordinarily careful and prudent man in the manner in which he was using or crossing the street at the time of the accident, since this would deprive him, at the very outset, of the presumption that every man of sound mind will avoid personal injuries. Burke v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 102 Tenn. 409, 52 S. W. 170.

⁹⁰ German-American Lumber Co. v. Brock. 55 Fla. 577, 46 So. 740. The court said that in an action against the master to recover damages for injuries to the servant as a result of the master's negligence, the presumption that arises from the instinct of self-preservation and the known disposition of men to avoid injury to themselves constitutes a prima facie inference that the servant exercised ordinary care and was free from contributory negligence; and burden of showing such negligence is on the defendant.

⁹¹ Jackson Knife & Shear Co. v. Hathaway, 27 Ohio C. C. 745.

was on the defendant, it was held that the presumption of due care, arising from the instinct of self-preservation, would not be allowed to stand in place of proof of the fact. The court could not conceive the correctness of the doctrine that the presumption that men will avoid danger rather than to court or defy it will be sufficient to overcome the necessity for some evidence of the absence of contributory fault. Such a doctrine was said, in the judgment of the court, to be in direct conflict with the decided cases in the Indiana courts.⁹² It was declared that the rule requiring the plaintiff to establish freedom from contributory negligence did not require him to make proof, and then proceed, by the application of a presumption of law, to furnish the proof for him, but he was required to establish the fact.⁹³

⁹² Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bennett, 9 Ind. App. 92, 35 N. E. 1033.

⁹³ Nichols v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 33 Ind. App. 229, 70 N. E. 183, 71 N. E. 170.

Where there is direct evidence as to the circumstances of the accident, the presumption is not to be entertained. Ames v. Waterloo & C. F. Rapid Transit Co. 120 Iowa, 640, 95 N. W. 161.

In an action to recover for injuries received by a fall down a coal shaft, there was direct testimony as to the circumstances under which the accident happened, bearing upon the plaintiff's care or lack of care. It was held that, in view of such testimony, it was erroneous to instruct the jury that the instinct of self-preservation might be taken into consideration in determining whether the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence. Salyers v. Monroe, 104 Iowa, 74, 73 N. W. 606.

Where there is direct evidence of contributory negligence at the instant of the accident, this will not be overcome by a pure presumption with reference to the exercise of care at some other time. Ames v. Waterloo & C. F. Rapid Transit Co. supra.

Ordinarily where one is killed and there are no eyewitnesses of the transaction, the law will presume that the person killed was in the exercise of ordinary care, and doing nothing to jeopardize his life or limb. But this rule does not obtain where there are eyewitnesses. Wilson v. Illinois C. R. Co. — Iowa, —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 129 N. W. 340.

⁹⁵ The presumption of the exercise of due care and caution on the part of one approaching a place of danger is essentially inferior in probative force to credible evidence, either direct or circumstantial, ex- 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

5. When presumption may be invoked.

It would seem that if the presumption of due care arising from the instinct of self-preservation is to be entertained, it should be invoked only when direct or circumstantial evidence on the issue of contributory negligence is not obtainable; as where there are no witnesses of the conduct of the injured person at the time of the accident; and this is the holding of some of the cases.⁹⁴ It is, as has been said, essentially inferior in probative force to credible evidence.⁹⁵ Direct evidence, for example, that a boy attempted to board a moving elevator, is much stronger than any presumption could be that he was in the exercise of due care.⁹⁶ If there is direct evidence, there is no room for the in-planatory of the actual occurrence; and in those courts where the presumption underlies the rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence rests upon the defendant, and must be maintained by a fair preponderance of the evidence, its force and influence are so largely embodied in the enforcement of that rule, that it has little independent application, save that it rests upon a general but not invariable rule of human experience which may and should be considered in determining the credibility of evidence, and the weight to be given to it, when these matters are not otherwise entirely clear. Wabash R. Co. v. De Tar, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352, 73 C. C. A. 166, 141 Fed. 932.

In Bell v. Clarion, 113 Iowa, 126, 84 N. W. 962, it was said that it had been fully settled in Iowa, that, in the absence of any direct evidence whatever, the instinct of self-preservation may be considered, and will constitute a sufficient basis for the inference of want of contributory negligence; but where there is direct evidence as to whether or not the injured party was negligent, then the inference is entitled to but little, if any, weight. The court supposed that the idea involved in the latter proposition is that the direct evidence as to what took place is of higher character than the inference drawn from the instinct of self-preservation; and surely, declared the court, it must be conceded that in such a case the inference is entitled to but little consideration, if any.

⁹⁶ In A. M. Rothchild & Co. v. Levy, 118 Ill. App. 78, where a boy, attempting to get upon an elevator, fell down the shaft and was killed, and it was necessary for the plaintiff, in order to establish due care on the part of the deceased, to prove that the latter attempted to board the elevator when it was at rest, but there was direct evidence that he attempted to board it when it was ascending, it was held that he could not be aided by the presumption that arises from the instinct of self-preservation.

ference from such a presumption.⁹⁷ So, where there was evidence that the injured person took a danerous position upon a locomotive tender and was thrown off, it was held that the presumption would not be taken into consideration.⁹⁸ A similar conclusion was reached where the person for whose death the action was brought was seen to step from behind a moving wagon in front of an advancing car.⁹⁹ It is also held that where the injured person is living and can speak, that he must do so.¹⁰⁰

It has been denied, however, that this presumption applies only where direct or circumstantial evidence is not available. It has even been held that the presumption is strong enough to overcome the testimony of an eyewitness.¹

e. Presumption based upon presumption.

Although it is held in some jurisdictions that the presumption of due care based on the instinct of self-preservation will be indulged, a further presumption cannot be based thereon. So, where action was brought to recover for the death of a person killed on attempting to cross a street car track by being struck by a car approaching at a high rate of speed, it was held that the presumption arising from the instinct of self-preservation could not be used to establish the alleged fact that the deceased, on leaving the curbing, 17 feet from the street car track, looked in the direction from which the car was coming, and seeing it further south from a line of wagons which partially obstructed his view, and which must have extended at least 150 feet along the track, calculated that if the car was approaching at a lawful rate of speed, he would have time to cross the track before the car would reach him.² And while a jury may presume, in the absence of any evidence as to the conduct of a person killed at a railroad crossing at the time of the accident, that he both looked and listened for an approaching train, this presumption is not a circumstance in proof, and does not furnish a legitimate foundation for a second presumption that he was on the track at the time he was struck because he had lost control of a team of horses that he was driving.³

⁹⁷ The instinct of self-preservation planted in all persons may, in a proper case, be allowed some weight as raising an inference of care. But where the party who has the burden of proving care can show by direct evidence what care was exercised, he should show it by such evidence; and if the direct evidence shows care, or want of it, there is no room for mere inference. Dunlavy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 66 Iowa, 435, 23 N. W. 911.

⁹⁹ In Ames v. Waterloo & C. F. Rapid Transit Co. 120 Iowa, 640, 95 N. W. 161, it was said that had there been no evidence whatever as to the circumstances surrounding the deceased at the time his injury was received, or as to how the accident occurred, the presumption would be entertained that, prompted by the instinct of self-preservation, the deceased was taking reasonable precaution for his own safety; but as several witnesses saw deceased just as he stepped forward from behind the moving wagon and was struck by the car, and the fact that there was such evidence as to what occurred, prevents the presumption which would otherwise be drawn from the instinct of self-preservation from being entertained.

tion which would otherwise be drawn from the instinct of self-preservation from being entertained.

¹⁰⁰ Where the injured person is living, and does or can testify to the facts and circumstances, and in what manner the injury was received, the natural instinct which leads rational persons to avoid injury to their persons as far as possible is not an element of evidence proper for the consideration of the jury on the question whether the plaintiff was, at the time of the injury, exercising ordinary care and prudence. Reynolds v. Keokuk, 72 Iowa, 372, 34 N. W. 167.

¹ Northern P. R. Co. v. Spike, 57 C. C. A. 384, 121 Fed. 44.

In Davenport, R. I. & N. W. R. Co. v. De Yeager, 112 Ill. App. 537, the court denied that this rule applied only in cases in which there were no eyewitnesses to the accident, saying that the mere fact that the eye of a witness may have incidentally rested upon the deceased at the time of and just before the injury ought not to deprive the plaintiff of the presumption arising from the instinct of self-preservation.

² Ames v. Waterloo & C. F. Rapid Transit Co. 120 Iowa, 640, 95 N. W. 161.

³ Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Baumgartner, 74 Kan. 148, 85 Pac. 822, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1094.

It does not follow from the presumption that the deceased, who was killed at a railroad crossing, looked and listened before going upon the track, coupled with the fact that at any point within 10 yards from the crossing he might have seen the

Likewise, where a switchman standing on the footboard of an engine, in some manner fell off and was run over and killed, and the theory of the plaintiff was that the footboard was defective, and broke by reason of the weight of the deceased upon it, and the theory of the defendant was that the deceased first fell off, and the footboard broke by striking against his body as the engine passed over him, it was held that the presumption of due care arising from the instinct of self-preservation would not raise a corresponding presumption in support of the theory of the plaintiff as to the cause of the accident, relieving him from the burden of proving the negligence of the defendant, and that the injury was caused by such negligence.⁴

f. Rebuttal of presumption.

train which killed him for 50 yards along the track, and that he was on level ground, in broad daylight, without obstruction when there was no train from the other direction, that he would have seen the train in time to prevent the accident, and that, therefore, in going upon the track in front of it, he was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law. Schum v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 107 Pa. 8, 52 Am. Rep. 468.

⁴ Powers v. Pere Marquette R. Co. 143 Mich. 379, 106 N. W. 1117.

Where no one witnesses an accident, the presumption that the deceased was in the exercise of due care may be indulged, but such presumption may be rebutted by facts and circumstances to the contrary. Rietveld v. Wabash R. Co. 129 Iowa, 249, 105 N. W. 515.

Although a jury may infer ordinary care and diligence on the part of an injured person from love of life, or instinct of self-preservation, and the known disposition of men to avoid injury, the presumption that a person run over was in the exercise of due care may be overcome, of course, by due care on the part of the person injured is to have any weight where other evidence is procurable upon that issue, the presumption may, of course, be overcome by such evidence.⁶ So, the presumption arising from the instinct of self-preservation was held overcome by evidence that the deceased, a section man who was killed while walking on the railroad tracks on his way homeward, knew when the train was due, there being nothing to distract his attention, or excuse him from exercising due care, it also appearing that his hearing was good, and that he could have heard the rattle or the rumble of the train 400 feet away.⁶ And the presumption that a person killed at a railroad crossing was in the exercise of due care may be rebutted by evidence that from a point 155 feet from a crossing, and every step of the way from that point to the crossing, there was nothing to prevent the deceased from seeing the proof to the contrary. Dewald v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 44 Kan. 586, 24 Pac. 1101.

The presumption that a person killed at a railroad crossing was in the exercise of due care may be overcome by evidence that he was not. Crawford v. Chicago G. W. R. 109 Iowa, 433, 80 N. W. 519.

In Waldron v. Boston & M. R. Co. 71 N. H. 362, 52 Atl. 443, it is said that if the great majority of men when approaching a railroad crossing take some precautions against being injured by passing trains, which precautions are deemed reasonable, and if, in the absence of direct evidence, this general custom of mankind may become evidence that the deceased in a given case used similar reasonable precautions to avoid danger, the fact remains that some men, under similar circumstances, are careless and negligent to the extent of hazarding their lives upon the performance of foolhardy feats. It follows, therefore, that when it is shown what the deceased did or omitted to do for his protection, evidence derived from the instinct most men possess of securing their own safety in crossing a railroad track could not be used to prove that he used the same degree or kind of care. Its only office would be to furnish a test by which to determine the reasonableness of his known acts, not to contradict them or minimize their importance.

See also supra, IV., notes 66, 67, 68, and 69.

When the plaintiff is the representative of a deceased person killed by the alleged negligence of a railroad company, and no evidence can be given of the use made by the deceased of his eyes and ears, the law will assume that he was negligent if the evidence shows that by a vigilant use of his senses he could have seen or heard the approaching train if he had looked down the track in the direction from which it was coming; and where the evidence also shows that the deceased was a man forty-two years of age, in the possession of all his faculties, and that he nevertheless rode in a buggy behind a team which walked from that point to and upon the railroad crossing, and discovered the approach of the train only when the horses were upon the track.⁷ Whether the presumption has been overcome may be a question for the jury.⁸ But the fact that the presumption may be overcome by direct evidence does not mean that it will be overthrown by the mere fact of the injury; ⁹ for, manifestly, if it might be so overcome, it would be without value.

V. Jurisdictions holding burden on plaintiff.

a. in general.

In a few jurisdictions, the rule has been steadily maintained that the burden of proving the injured person's conduct at the time of the accident is on the plaintiff. This is the rule in Connecticut¹⁰ and in Illinois.¹¹ approaching train in time to avoid it. Ingersoll v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Thomp. & C. 416.

⁷ Bressler v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 74 Kan. 256, 86 Pac. 472.

But the mere fact that the deceased was struck by an approaching engine the presence of which with steam up and ready to move was known to him does not conclusively show he did not take reasonable care for his own safety, so as to rebut the presumption of due care arising from the instinct of self-preservation, where the engine was moving in an unusual manner which the deceased had no reason to anticipate. Christopherson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 135 Iowa, 409, 124 Am. St. Rep. 284, 109 N. W. 1077.

This presumption was held not overcome by evidence of a witness for the plaintiff that the deceased had an umbrella over his head at the time of the accident, and the witness did not notice him lift his umbrella before he was struck by the car, and the witness could not notice that it was drawn down over his head, and could not say that he raised the umbrella, or that he either looked to the right or to the left. Riska v. Union Depot R. Co. 180 Mo. 168, 79 S. W. 445.

⁸ Where a person was killed at a railroad crossing, and no one saw the accident or the manner of approach of the deceased, or how he went upon the crossing, it was urged by the company that because of the deceased's opportunity to see and hear the approach of the train if he had stopped and looked or listened, it was evident that he did not do so; and on the part of the plaintiff, that because of the absence of required signals and the unlawful speed of the train, deceased would not have known of its approach by stopping and listening, nor by looking at the points from which the train could be seen by him; and it was held that whether the circumstances were such as to overcome the presumption that deceased, prompted by the instinct of self-preservation, did exercise the care required of him, was a question for the jury. Dalton v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 104 Iowa, 26, 73 N. W. 349.

⁹ Where an accident results in instant death, the law, out of regard to the instinct of self-preservation, presumes the deceased was, at the time, in the exercise of due care; and this presumption is not overthrown by the mere fact of injury, but the burden rests upon the defendant to rebut it. Northern P. R. Co. v. Spike, 57 C. A. 384, 121 Fed. 44.

The law, out of regard to the instinct of self-preservation, presumes that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was in the exercise of due care; and this presumption is not overthrown by the mere fact of injury. Flynn v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 78 Mo. 195, 47 Am. Rep. 99.

So, it has been held in the latter state that the plaintiff is bound to prove more than enough to raise a fair presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant.¹² In an action to recover damages sustained through the frightening of a horse by a box car left standing in such a position as to project over the line of a street, it was said that, conceding that fault was imputable to the defendant in the location of the car, it would not follow that the defendant would be accountable for the plaintiff's injury unless the plaintiff should also prove that such fault was the proximate cause of the injury, and that he himself was in the exercise of due care for his own

In Calumet Iron & Steel Co. v. Martin, 115 Ill. 358, 3 N. E. 456, it was said that from the earliest case in the Illinois reports, where the question was passed upon, to the present time,—a period of more than thirty years,—the general rule has been declared and recognized in opinions announced from time to time that, in order to recover for injuries from negligence, it must be alleged and proved that the party injured was, at the time he was injured, observing due or ordinary care for his personal safety.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Trowbridge, 31 Ill. App. 190 (an action to recover damages for the killing of a team of horses on defendant's right of way, based upon the alleged negligence of the defendant by reason of failure to fence the right of way), it was held that the duty of using ordinary care is rested on the plaintiff, and that it was error to instruct the jury upon this question that the burden of proof rested upon the defendant.

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hazzard, 26 Ill. 373 (an action by a passenger to recover damages for personal injuries received while alighting from a car), it was said that the plaintiff must allege and show affirmatively that the defendants were guilty of negligence, and also that he himself exercised proper care.

But in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Simmons, 35 Ill. 242, the statements in the last-mentioned case (26 Ill. 373) were said to have been dictum, the court holding that failure to allege this fact would be cured by verdict.

Where the plaintiff, who was on a south-bound car, was struck by an advancing north-bound car, an instruction requiring the jury to find, in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, first, negligence of the defendant, causing the injury; and second, ordinary "precaution, forethought, and care" on the part of the plaintiff; and which told them that if the accident happened by reason of the plaintiff failing to exercise such ordinary care, he could not recover, was held good, where it appeared that before the accident the plaintiff had gone around in front of the south-bound car, and had gotten upon its footboard on the side next to the advancing north-bound car, which he saw, and where, at the time of the accident, he was swinging his head and body out in front of the advancing car. Schneider v. North Chicago Street R. Co. 80 Ill. App. 306.

Where a brakeman, in violation of the rules of the company, went between moving cars to uncouple them, and was hurt, it was held that he could not recover, since the burden was upon him to show freedom from contributory negligence, and this act was an act of negligence. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Myers, 95 Ill. App. 578.

Where a switchman while on top of a car was struck by a low overhead bridge with which he was familiar, it was held that there could be no recovery in the absence of a showing on his part of the exercise of due care for his own safety. Anderberg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 98 Ill. App. 207. In this case the deceased stood upon the top of a car with his back towards the structure, in which position he remained until he was struck. This, of course, was an affirmative showing of contributory negligence.

Where recovery is sought for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, it is not enough for the plaintiff to show that the defendant was running its train at a high and unusual rate of speed, at a rate prohibited by ordinance, that it failed to comply with the statute requiring a bell to be rung or a whistle to be blown, since the burden is still on the plaintiff to prove that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was in the exercise of ordinary care to avoid injury. Imes v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 105 Ill. App. 37.

safety, since the burden of proof on these questions rested on the plaintiff.¹³

Recognizing that the rule is that the burden is on the plaintiff, some doubt has been expressed whether an instruction to the jury that the plaintiff must prove that the injured person was in the exercise of due care is equivalent to the expression, "The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff."¹⁴

¹³ Harrigan v. Chicago & I. R. Co. 53 Ill. App. 344.

In an action to recover for injuries received by the explosion of a compressed-air tank in defendant's packing house, refusal to charge that in cases of this nature the mere fact of the accident, of itself alone, is not any evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, but that, before the plaintiff can recover, he must prove that the defendant was guilty of negligence which caused the injury, and that the plaintiff himself was free from any want of ordinary care, prudence, vigilance, and caution for his own safety, was error. Omaha Packing Co. v. Murray, 112 Ill. App. 233.

To sustain an allegation that the plaintiff was negligently ordered into a dangerous position, in which he was injured, the burden was held to be on the plaintiff to prove affirmatively that, at the time of the injury, he was acting under the orders of a superior whose orders it was the plaintiff's duty to obey; that the danger was known to the superior, or that, by the exercise of reasonable care for plaintiff's safety, should have been known; that the plaintiff did not know the danger, and could not have known it by the exercise of reasonable care for his own safety; and that he was free from negligence which in any manner contributed to the injury. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. Hill, 112 Ill. App. 475.

In an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, the plaintiff must prove that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was in the exercise of ordinary care and caution for his own safety. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Ayers, 119 Ill. App. 108.

So, refusal to instruct that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show not only that the defendant was guilty of negligence, but that he himself was not guilty of negligence or carelessness, was held error. Dyer v. Talcott, 16 Ill. 300.

In Chicago City R. Co. v. Freeman, 6 Ill. App. 608, an action to recover damages for personal injuries received through the alleged improper management of defendant's cars and turntable, it was held that an instruction which ignored the necessity of proof of care on the part of the plaintiff was erroneous.

The rule in Illinois is that, in suits for personal injuries caused by the negligence of another, the plaintiff must allege and prove that he was at the time in the exercise of due care; and in an action for

Prior to 1889, in Indiana the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence was on the plaintiff.¹⁵ Before the statute became effective, the Indiana courts uniformly held that one seeking to recover damages because of the negligence of another must aver and prove his own freedom from the contributory negligence.¹⁶ In Iowa the plaintiff must also show not only the negligence of the defendant, but absence death, the burden is upon the administrator to show that the deceased exercised ordinary care to avoid the injury. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Nowicki, 148 Ill. 29, 35 N. E. 358, affirming 46 Ill. App. 566.

But an instruction that a street railroad company must, in operating its cars, employ due care to avoid injuring those who are rightfully using that part of the street occupied by its tracks, was held not misleading because of the fact that it omitted all reference to due care for the safety of persons driving or crossing the tracks, where this point was fully covered in other instructions. West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Schulz, 217 Ill. 322, 75 N. E. 495.

¹⁴ In North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Louis, 138 Ill. 9, 27 N. E. 451, the court doubted whether the expression, "In this case the plaintiff must prove that she exercised ordinary care," etc., was equivalent in meaning to the expression, "The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff;" but conceding that it was, the court held that the instruction was still insufficient, because the rule is that the plaintiff is bound to prove the exercise of due care by a preponderance of the evidence.

It is too well settled to admit of debate that a party who sues for an injury to person or property resulting from negligence of contributory negligence.¹⁷ So, an instruction that if the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the neglect of defendant's employees to exercise reasonable care, etc., the plaintiff could recover, unless the jury must prove that he was himself without negligence. Lyons v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 101 Ind. 419.

It is not the rule in Indiana that the party insisting on contributory negligence must prove the facts from which such negligence is to be inferred. Hartzell v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 15 Ind. App. 417, 44 N. E. 315.

The burden is on the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the death of a person killed while walking on a railroad track, to show that the deceased was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of due care. Lamport v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 142 Ind. 269, 41 N. E. 586.

The onus is always upon the plaintiff not only to show the negligence of the defendant, but to establish by some affirmative evidence, either direct or circumstantial, his own freedom from fault contributing to the injury. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bennett, 9 Ind. App. 92, 35 N. E. 1033.

The rule is not that absence of contributory negligence may be assumed unless plaintiff's fault affirmatively appears. Trout v. Elkhart, 12 Ind. App. 343, 39 N. E. 1048.

Where the plaintiff grounds his right of recovery upon the negligence of the defendant, he must allege and prove that he was himself not guilty of contributory negligence. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. v. Hiltzhauer, 99 Ind. 486.

In an action to recover for the death of a brakeman knocked off by a car by a water plug standing too near the track, it was held that failure of the evidence to show that the deceased was free from contributory negligence was fatal to recovery. Pennsylvania Co. v. Finney, 145 Ind. 551, 42 N. E. 816.

Where the only facts appearing in a special verdict were that the plaintiff, a drayman, hitched his horse at the corner of a railroad station, and that a train came along upon one of the cars of which was a pile driver, which struck a wire stretched across the track, breaking it and causing a number of telephone poles to fall, which in turn knocked over a ladder, which struck the plaintiff's horse, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover. Hartell v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 15 Ind. App. 417, 44 N. E. 315. The court said that where, as here, the facts exemplifying the plaintiff's conduct are not set forth with sufficient fullness to enable the court to say whether or not he was himself in the exercise of due care, or free from contributory negligence, then the plaintiff must fail, because he has not sustained the burden which the law imposes upon him. The facts contained in the verdict, said the court, did not indeed show should further find that the plaintiff's carelessness directly contributed to produce the injuries, was held erroneous because under it the jury would be required to find for the plaintiff if there were no evidence the plaintiff to have been guilty of negligence, neither did they show him not to have been guilty of contributory negligence. Under such circumstances, the defendant was entitled to judgment.

The care taker of stock riding in a cattle car instead of a caboose, has, in an action to recover for injuries received in a wreck, the burden of showing that he was justified in riding where he did. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Teeters, — Ind. App. —, 74 N. E. 1014.

The rule that where a plaintiff seeks to recover for injury or damage to property by reason of the negligence of the defendant, he is required to show in his complaint absence of fault or negligence on his part, extends and applies to actions where the negligent act or acts of the defendant consist in allowing water to flow upon the premises of the plaintiff. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wisheart, 161 Ind. 208, 67 N. E. 993.

The rule that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff applies to an action for injuries due to the negligent administration of a drug by a dentist. Rabe v. Sommerbeck, 94 Iowa, 656, 63 N. W. 458.

In Gwynn v. Duffield, 66 Iowa, 708, 55 Am. Rep. 286, 24 N. W. 523, it was held that an instruction that the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff to sustain his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence did not clearly enough show that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is upon the plaintiff, although the court said it might not feel justified in reversing upon this ground alone.

In an action to recover for injuries received by catching hand in mill machinery, whatever respecting his negligence.¹⁸ And in an action to recover for the death of a person run down and killed by a locomotive, an instruction that if the evidence in the case failed to show that the deceased, at the time of the accident, contributed to his death by his own negligence or want of proper care, then plaintiff was entitled to recover, was held wrong because of the fact that it placed the burden of the issue of contributory negligence on the defendant, whereas it should be on the plaintiff.¹⁹

This is also the rule in Maine,²⁰ and in Massachusetts.²¹ In the latter state this it was held that an instruction that unless plaintiff "has shown by a preponderance of the evidence that he was not guilty of a failure to exercise ordinary care, or that if he was, such negligence in no way contributed to his receiving the injury that he complains of, then he is not entitled to recover in this case," was not open to the criticism that it allowed recovery even though the plaintiff were guilty of slight negligence. Wilder v. Great Western Cereal Co. 130 Iowa, 263, 104 N. W. 434.

But an instruction in substance that if plaintiff showed what his acts were, and if they did not appear to be negligent, the jury would be justified in finding that he was free from negligence, while not proper as an abstract proposition, since it may happen, and sometimes does, that the person injured is guilty of negligence in what he omits to do, was upheld where the facts of the case were such that it seemed certain that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence unless it was by reason of something which he did. Raymond v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 152, 21 N. W. 495 (rehearing).

In an action to recover for injuries received by being thrown from a wagon by reason of the fact that the horse which plaintiff was driving stepped into a hole in a defective bridge, an instruction that, in order to find for the plaintiff, the jury must believe from the evidence that, in attempting to cross the bridge, he used ordinary care and prudence, but if the plaintiff knew of the defect, or if it was apparent, and could have been seen by him with ordinary care and prudence, and he imprudently and recklessly drove his horse upon the same, and the accident happened in consequence of such imprudence and carelessness, or if it could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, they must find for the defendant, was proper, since it did not require the defendant to assume the burden of proving contributory negligence. Rusch v. Davenport, 6 Iowa, 443.

In an action to recover for personal injuries received while alighting from a car, an instruction that if the jury found that the plaintiff failed to use ordinary care, and that her failure in any degree contributed to her injury, their verdict should be for the defendant, was held not open to the objection that it threw the burden of proving contributory negligence upon the defendant, where, in the same instruction, the jury were expressly told that as to the issue of the plaintiff's contributory negligence, the burden of proof was upon her to establish by a preponderance of evidence that she was in the exercise of ordinary care and caution, and not guilty of negligence which contributed to her injuries. Hutcheis v. Cedar Rapids & M. C. R. Co. 128 Iowa, 279, 103 N. W. 779.

The burden is on the plaintiff to show that no want of ordinary care on his part contributed in the slightest degree to the injury complained of. Ward v. Maine C. R. Co. 96 Me. 136, 51 Atl. 947.

And it was held that to entitle a plaintiff to recover in an action in trespass for the death of a cow, plaintiff must prove that the loss sustained occurred without fault on his part, and in consequence of the neglect of defendant. Waldron v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co. 35 Me. 422.

In an action to recover for injuries received by reason of a defective highway, the plaintiff is bound to prove that he was in the use of ordinary care at the time of the accident, or he will not be entitled to a verdict; the defendant is not bound to prove that the plaintiff's carelessness was the cause of the injury, in order to be relieved from liability. Merrill v. Hampden, 26 Me. 234.

Where a woman was injured by jumping off of a car in which she had been invited by the station agent to sit while the waiting room was being cleaned, it was held that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove that she was not guilty of contributory negligence; that is, that she had a good excuse for her act. The court said that the same evidence which describes the occurrence may be proof enough upon the point, but that if not, other proof must be adduced. *Shannon v. Boston & A. R. principle was applied in the case of a collision between vessels in a harbor.²² And in an action by a woman to recover for injuries received by the overturning of a sleigh, due to the unsafe condition of a highway, it was held that the burden of proof was not on the defendant to show that the plaintiff was violating a city ordinance at the time of the accident.²³ In the case of injury to a child, the burden of showing due care on the part of the parents was held to be on the plaintiff.²⁴

In New Hampshire, the burden of proving the proper conduct of the injured person is placed on the plaintiff,²⁵ and this is also the rule in Michigan.²⁶

The burden is always on the plaintiff to prove that he himself was in the exercise of due care, or that the injury was not in any way attributable to any want of proper care on his part. Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455, 3 Am. Rep. 390.

To entitle the plaintiff to recover for damages due to a collision of vehicles in the highway, he must show that the injury was attributable to the misconduct of the defendant, and under such circumstances as to exonerate himself from all neglect of duty. Parker v. Adams, 12 Met. 415, 46 Am. Dec. 694.

In an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, caused on the gross negligence, carelessness, and unfitness of the railroad company's servants in failing to have the gates lowered when the train was about to cross the street, or in giving proper warning or signals at the crossing, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the deceased was in the exercise of due care. Walsh v. Boston & M. R. Co. 171 Mass. 52, 50 N. E. 53.

In an action brought either for the death of a person struck and killed while walking along a railway track, or to recover for conscious suffering, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that the deceased was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident.²³ upon the plaintiff to prove that the deceased was in the exercise of due care. Adams v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 191 Mass. 486, 78 N. E. 117.

The burden is always upon the plaintiff to establish either that he himself was in the exercise of due care, or that the injury is in no way attributable to any want of proper care on his part. Murphy v. Deane, supra.

²² An instruction that, in order to enable the plaintiff to recover, it must appear that the accident was not caused by any negligence or want of skill on his part, was upheld. Carsley v. White, 21 Pick. 254, 32 Am. Dec. 259. The court said: "In cases of injury upon the land, occasioned by the collision of two carriages, or by the driving of the carriage of one against the person or property of another, it is well settled that the onus probandi is upon the plaintiff to show that he was using ordinary care and diligence; otherwise it cannot be shown that the injury was not attributable to his own negligence.

. . . The same principle, somewhat extended, applies to collisions on the water."

²³ Tuttle v. Lawrence, 119 Mass. 276. The court said that if, at the time of the accident, she was doing an unlawful act, and that unlawful act contributed to cause the alleged injury, she was not in the exercise of that due care which she is obliged to prove in order to recover. The allegation of due care implies not only that the plaintiff was not negligent, but also that she was not acting in violation of law when the alleged injury occurred. On the issue of due care, the plaintiff had the burden of proof, and if she failed to sustain the burden, she must fail in her action.

²⁵ Hutchins v. Macomber, 68 N. H. 473, 44 Atl. 602; Waldron v. Boston & M. R. Co. 71 N. H. 362, 52 Atl. 443.

In a suit for injury upon a railroad crossing, as in all cases of negligence, the plaintiff is bound to prove that his injury was not due to his own fault, but was caused by the fault of the defendant. Gahagan v. Boston & M. R. Co. 70 N. H. 441, 55 L.R.A. 426, 50 Atl. 146.

In a few of the earlier cases of New York, it was held that the burden of proving contributory negligence was on the defendant.²⁷ It was said that there was no precedent of the common law for the opposite position.²⁸ But the courts of that state very soon allied themselves with the jurisdictions placing the burden upon the plaintiff, and, in the absence of statute, this has ever since remained the rule.²⁹ Harshly as the rule was acknowledged to operate in some cases, it was nevertheless admitted by one court to be too thoroughly established in the jurisprudence of the

In an action to recover damages against a vessel for collision, a statement in 1 Western Law Journal, 30, "In cases of collision, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff, not only to show negligence on the part of the defendant, but ordinary care on his own part," was cited with approval. Drew v. The Chesapeake, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 33.

In an action for the death of a person run down by a street car, the plaintiff must show that the deceased did not, by any act of his, assist in producing the accident. Kelly v. Hendrie, 26 Mich. 255.

In a crossing-accident case, an instruction that the plaintiff is not bound to prove more than enough to raise a fair presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant, and of resulting injury to herself, and that if she does this, she is entitled to recover unless the defendant produces evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption, was held erroneous. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274.

But the rule that the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence is on the plaintiff only requires of him that he should put in evidence the facts and circumstances attending the injury; and if these show negligent conduct in the defendant from which the injury followed as a direct and proximate consequence, and do not show any contributory negligence in the plaintiff, a prima facie case for the jury is made out. He cannot be required to go further than this in negating his own fault, and in many cases where there are no eyewitnesses, it would be impossible. Teipel v. Hilsendegen, 44 Mich. 461, 7 N. W. 82.

The rule does not require him to go so far as to repel a supposed presumption that, in case of a collision between a traveler and a railroad train at a crossing, the injured person did not look or listen, or, if he looked and listened, that he heedlessly disregarded the knowledge so obtained. ²⁸ In Hackford v. New York C. R. Co. 6 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Lans. 381, affirmed in 53 N. Y. 654, it is said that no precedent of common-law declaration in case for negligence can be found in which the plaintiff asserts that he was free from negligence, nor any decision that he is bound to make such proof. But when, on the trial, there is evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, whether it comes from the plaintiff's or defendant's witnesses, the plaintiff must overcome it in order to entitle himself to recover. In this way, and in this way only, is the plaintiff bound to disprove his own negligence.

state to be ignored or questioned.³⁰ The same rule has been adopted in Rhode Island.^{30a}

In Vermont, although the rule is that the burden is on the plaintiff,³¹ the courts have endeavored to soften it somewhat. In an action to recover for injuries received by reason of the insufficiency of a highway, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should prove affirmatively that he was acting carefully and prudently at the time of the accident. The court said evidence which proves affirmatively that an injury was caused by a defect in a highway must necessarily, to a certain extent, show negatively that it was not caused by anything else. To this extent, and this only, can it be said that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff in such a case to show at the outset that his own negligence did not cause or contribute to his injury.³²

In jurisdictions where the doctrine prevails that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, the rule is sometimes stated to be that, if wilfulness and wantonness are not charged, ³⁰ Peaslee v. Chatham, 69 Hun, 389, 23 N. Y. Supp. 628.

It is well settled in New York that the plaintiff in an accident case assumes the burden of showing that the injury occurred without fault on the part of the person injured, or of giving evidence from which the jury may infer that he was without fault, and that his act did not contribute to the casualty. Rodrian v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 526, 26 N. E. 741, reversing 55 Hun, 606, 28 N. Y. S. R. 625, 7 N. Y. Supp. 811.

Failure to show absence of contributory negligence is fatal. Cusick v. Interurban Street R. Co. 86 N. Y. Supp. 758.

Plaintiff held properly nonsuited for not establishing that a person for whose death the action was brought was free from contributory negligence. McDermott v. Third Ave. R. Co. 44 Hun, 107, affirmed in 115 N. Y. 670, 22 N. E. 1126.

It is not enough that there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the defendant's negligence, since the plaintiff is bound to show freedom from contributory negligence. Axelrod v. New York City R. Co. 109 App. Div. 87, 95 N. Y. Supp. 1072.

In an action to recover for injuries to a horse and wagon while in the defendant's custody, the character of the horse being the main fact upon which the defense of contributory negligence was based, and being assailed by evidence, the burden of proving that the horse was not vicious, or of showing that this did not contribute to the accident, was held to be on the plaintiff. Hale v. Smith, 78 N. Y. 480.

The burden of showing that a person killed on railroad tracks while attempting to rescue his property from injury or destruction was free from contributory negligence is on the plaintiff. Morris v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 148 N. Y. 182, 42 N. E. 579.

In an action to recover for injuries received by a collision between a cart and a railroad car going in the same direction, the plaintiff must show that the collision proceeded exclusively from the negligent acts of the defendant, and not from his own negligent acts, or his own negligent acts combined with those of the defendant. Suydam v. Grand Street & N. R. Co. 41 Barb. 375.

In an action brought to recover for injuries received by a brakeman struck by a low bridge, it was held that the plaintiff must bear the burden of satisfying the jury by a preponderance of evidence that he was free from contributory negligence, and that he did not know that it was a low bridge, and also to satisfy the jury that, in the exercise of ordinary care and caution, he could not ascertain that it was a low bridge. Williams v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 39 App. Div. 647, 57 N. Y. Supp. 203.

And in Winifred Bros. v. Rutland R. Co. 71 Vt. 48, 42 Atl. 980, it is said that the plaintiff is not bound to prove as a distinctive affirmative proposition that the injured person was not guilty of negligence. It is a negative rather than an affirmative proposition. The burden is upon the plaintiff to show that the defendant's negligence was the sole, operative cause of the injury, which is equivalent to saying that no want of due care on the part of the intestate helped to cause the accident.

But in Walker v. Westfield, 39 Vt. 246 (a defective-highway case), it is said that in order for the plaintiff to make a case upon which he may safely rest, it is necesthe plaintiff must prove that he was in the exercise of due care.³³ This, of course, relieves the plaintiff from the burden of proving that issue, because, even conceding that contributory negligence existed, this would not relieve the defendant from liability.

In actions where contributory negligence would defeat plaintiff's right of recovery, it devolves upon him to prove that the injured person was in the exercise of ordinary care at the time he was hurt, although absence of contributory negligence is not alleged in the declaration.³⁴ As a consequence of the rule, if the plaintiff's case is barren of all evidence of freedom from contributory negligence, he cannot recover.³⁵ In an action brought to recover for the death of a servant, it uppeared that the deceased and others, at the time of the accident, were engaged in mending a belt which connected machinery with an overhead shaft. The belt had been slipped from the pulley, and the shaft left revolving, and in some unknown manner the deceased was caught and drawn around the shaft, receiving fatal injuries. There was nothing in the evidence to show how the accident happened. It was held that, under the circumstances, the rule must be applied that in an action to recover damages for the death of a plaintiff's intestate, where there is neither direct nor circumstantial evidence which points either to the presence or absence of contributory negligence, the plaintiff cannot recover without some affirmative evidence to show that the decedent was not guilty of contributory necessary that he should submit a state and character of evidence upon which the jury would be authorized to find affirmatively both that the defect in the road operated to produce the accident, and that no want of care on his part contributed to it. This is what he assumes, and this burden goes with him throughout the case; and in the end he must be able to have the jury, upon the whole evidence, find affirmatively the same that was necessary to be established by his opening evidence at the time he rested upon making his prima facie case. If the defect in the road did thus operate, and no fault of his contributed, then it was produced wholly by the defect in the road; if his fault contributed, then it was not produced wholly by the defect in the road, and he cannot be allowed to recover for the consequences of an accident to which his own fault contributed, however slightly, even though the accident would have happened if his fault had not contributed to it.

When wilfulness is not charged, the plaintiff, in order to recover, must make out a case of unmixed negligence, and that he was without fault. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Shanks, 94 Ind. 598.

If the injury was not wilful, a judgment on a special finding cannot be sustained where the finding leaves it uncertain whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Brannen v. Kokomo, G. & J. Gravel Road Co. 115 Ind. 115, 7 Am. St. Rep. 411, 17 N. E. 202.

If there is no evidence either way, plaintiff fails to sustain the burden. Tripp v. Wells, 104 Me. 29, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1145, 70 Atl. 533.

It is the duty of the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. Allyn v. Boston & A. R. Co. 105 Mass. 77.

A verdict in plaintiff's favor will be set aside. Bedford v. Neal, 143 Ind. 425, 41 N. E. 1029, 42 N. E. 815.

Where the plaintiff's case is silent on the question of contributory negligence, he cannot recover, since absence of contributory negligence is as much a part of his case as proof of the negligence of the defendant. Tompkins v. Barnes, 130 N. Y. Supp. 320.

It is not sufficient that the evidence is silent, and there is nothing therein tending to prove either contributory negligence or freedom therefrom on the part of the plaintiff. It is an affirmative allegation which is necessary to the statement of a cause of action, that the plaintiff was injured without any negligence on his part; and the burden rests upon him to prove it. It is well settled that where the circumstances point just as much towards the negligence of the injured party as to its absence, or points in neither direction, he cannot recover. Huntingburgh v. First, 15 Ind. App. 552, 43 N. E. 17.

Where there is neither direct nor circumstantial evidence which points either to the presence or absence of contributory negligence on the part of a decedent, there can be no recovery. Wieland v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 167 N. Y. 19, 82 Am. St. Rep. 707, 60 N. E. 234.

The complaint under such circumstances should be dismissed. McLain v. Van Zandt, 7 Jones & S. 347.

Where the evidence fails to show directly or inferentially that the person for whose death the action was brought used that degree of care which was incumbent upon him under the circumstance, the evidence fails to meet the burden imposed by the law in such cases, of showing that the deceased was free from fault, and the case negligence.³⁶ Of course, where a plaintiff offers no evidence that the injured person was in the exercise of due care, but, on the contrary, the whole evidence on which his case rests shows that he was careless, he cannot recover, and the court may rightfully instruct the jury, as a matter of law, that the action cannot be maintained.³⁷ Where there is no direct evidence either of care at the time of the accident, or the contrary, and the circumstances of the accident are not sufficiently disclosed to warrant any inference either of care or negligence, the plaintiff fails to make out his case.³⁸ Some proof, at least, is necessary to the success of plaintiff's cannot, therefore, be submitted to the jury. Perez v. Sandrowitz, 180 N. Y. 397, 73 N. E. 228.

If the whole evidence introduced by the plaintiff has no tendency to show care on his part, but, on the contrary, shows that he was careless, it is the duty of the court to direct the jury as a matter of law to return a verdict for the defendant. Warren v. Fitchburg R. Co. 8 Allen, 227, 85 Am. Dec. 700.

³⁸ Mosher v. Smithfield, 84 Me. 334, 24 Atl. 876.

The burden is on the plaintiff to show due care on his part and negligence on the part of the defendant; and if there is no evidence of such care on his part, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and this may be ruled as a matter of law. Halloran v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. 192 Mass. 104, 78 N. E. 381.

In an action for a negligent injury, the plaintiff must prove his freedom from negligence; and in the absence of evidence to the point, he should be nonsuited. Geoghegan v. Atlas S. S. Co. 3 Misc. 224, 22 N. Y. Supp. 749, judgment affirmed in 6 Misc. 129, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1116.

A four-year-old boy having been run over in the street, and there being no evidence as to what he was doing at the time, and nothing to show that he was in the exercise of due care, it was held that an action to recover for the injuries could not be maintained. Stock v. Wood, 136 Mass. 353.

Where a car, standing on a side track, was run into by another car, which caused it to run over a section foreman, it was held that there could be no recovery for his death where there was no evidence to show what he was doing at the time of the accident, or how he happened to be behind the car, since the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the deceased was in the exercise of due care. Lizotte v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 196 Mass. 519, 83 N. E. 362.

In an action to recover for the death of a general repair man who, while on the roof of a building, was killed by coming in contact with an electric wire or wires, where there was nothing to show what he was doing from the time he began to ascend the ladder which led to the skylight, until ten minutes later, when he was seen writhing upon the roof with his hands over the defendant's wires, and there was no circumstance to throw the slightest light upon the question of the exercise of due care during the interval, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover. Ralph v. Cambridge Electric Light Co. 200 Mass. 566, 86 N. E. 922.

In Von Atzinger v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 83 Hun, 120, 31 N. Y. Supp. 632, absence of evidence in a crossing-accident case, in answer to such questions as: Did the deceased listen for the train? Did he look for it at any of the points at which he could have seen its approach? Did he see it before he drove his horse over the road near the crossing? If he did, how did he come to get in front of the engine? Did he try to avoid it, and if he did so, what did he do? Did he fail to see it? If so, what was the cause or reason for that?—was held fatal to plaintiff's case, since the court held that freedom from contributory negligence can never be presumed, and cannot be inferred from proof of the accident, or of negligence on the part of the defendant.

It is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove by some facts or circumstances from which a fair inference can be drawn that his intestate was free from contributory negligence. O'Brien v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 129 App. Div. 288, 113 N. Y. Supp. 320.

While the obligation to show freedom from contributory negligence may be discharged by showing surrounding facts and circumstances from which the jury can infer that the person injured did not, by his acts or conduct, contribute to the injury, yet there must be affirmative evidence from which the jury may properly infer that the person so injured discharged his duty under the circumstances. Ryan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 17 App. Div. 221, 45 N. Y. Supp. 542.

While slight evidence will do where direct testimony is impossible, there must be some facts or circumstances from which freedom from contributory negligence may be inferred. Palcheski v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 69 App. Div. 440, 74 N. Y. Supp. 987.

Undoubtedly, where there is no eyewitness of an accident, and death results, slight evidence will exonerate the decedent from the charge of want of care; yet there must be some proof,—some facts justifying the inference that contributory negligence may not be imputed to him. Wilson v. New York Mills, 107 App. Div. 99, 94 N. Y. Supp. 1090.

action.³⁹ It is sometimes held that in cases of fatal accidents, where there is no eyewitness to the conduct of the injured person, the rule with respect to the evidence by which due care is proved is not so rigid.⁴⁰ The burden, however, still remains upon the plaintiff.⁴¹ There must, as before stated, be something from which absence of fault may be inferred.⁴² So, where all that was known about the movements of the deceased was that he was hurrying down a flight of dimly lighted stairs, and that somewhere on the last flight he fell and was almost instantly killed, it was held that an action to recover for his death could not be maintained, there being no

Some proof of the absence of contributory negligence is requisite, and although the fact that the plaintiff was free from fault may frequently be inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case, still, whenever that cannot be done, it must be proved by direct evidence. In other words, it must appear in some way that the injury was caused solely by the fault or neglect of the defendant. Van Lien v. Scoville Mfg. Co. 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 74.

In an action to recover damages for injuries received by a collision between a street car and a truck, there can be no recovery where there is no evidence to show whether or not the driver took any precautions to avoid the accident. Byrnes v. Interurban Street R. Co. 84 N. Y. Supp. 193.

In Chadbourn v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 6 Daly, 215 (an action for injuries to a horse and wagon struck at a railroad crossing), it was held that plaintiff's evidence not disclosing contributory negligence, the burden of proving such negligence was on the defendant.

In St. Louis Nat. Stock Yards v. Burns, 97 Ill. App. 175 (an action to recover damages for the death of a switchman killed while in the performance of his duty), there being no evidence, or any fair inference from any evidence, tending to show that the deceased exercised such care and precaution as were required for his own safety, and there being no reasonable excuse for his failure to do so, this was held fatal to recovery, since the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show this.

In Lauster v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 43 Ill. App. 534 (an action brought to recover damages for the death of a person supposed to have been killed at a railroad crossing), no person having been a witness to the accident, it was held that a peremptory instruction for the defendant was proper, there being nothing to show that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was in the exercise of due care.

⁴⁰ In Rodrian v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 526, 26 N. E. 741, reversing 55 Hun, 606, 28 N. Y. S. R. 625, 7 N. Y. Supp. 811, it is said that in case of a death accident at a railroad crossing, it must often happen that the circumstances immediately preceding it and the acts and conduct of the deceased are left in great obscurity. But the rules of law governing the right of recovery are the same as in other cases, although slighter evidence of compliance with the duty cast upon the plaintiff might be deemed sufficient than where the injured person was alive and competent to testify.

In Pruey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 41 App. Div. 158, 58 N. Y. Supp. 797, affirmed in 166 N. Y. 616, 59 N. E. 1129, it was said that in a crossing-accident case where there is no eyewitness of the occurrence, there is a relaxation of the rule requiring strict proof that the deceased was vigilant and observant as he advanced toward the track. The regulation exists in its entirety, said the court, but the proofs presented may be inferential, may be dependent upon circumstances, and still be adequate to satisfy the court of the absence of contributory negligence.

In Charters v. Palmer, 113 App. Div. 108, 98 N. Y. Supp. 887 (an action brought to recover for the death of a street cleaner who, while crossing the street in a diagonal direction, was run down from behind by a heavily laden vehicle and killed), in holding that the fact that the deceased was looking straight in the direction in which he was going at the moment he was struck did not show that he was not exercising proper care, the court said that while the degree of care required to be exercised by the deceased was the same as if he had not been killed, yet, owing to the fact of his death and the difficulty in proving freedom from contributory negligence in such cases, the rule with respect to the evidence of care was not so rigid.

Although less evidence is required of a personal representative as to contributory negligence of the deceased than would be required in the case of a surviving person, in such cases, some evidence must be evidence from which freedom from contributory negligence could be inferred.⁴³ And where, in an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, it appears that listening and looking would not have been unavailable to avoid danger, and there is no evidence of the movements of the deceased from the time when he was last seen, a quarter of a mile away from the crossing, until the moment of the accident, there can be no recovery, since the plaintiff has failed to sustain the burden of proving that the decedent was not guilty of contributory negligence.⁴⁴

The question whether, under such circumstances, the presumption of due care arising from the instinct of self-preservation is sufficient evidence to sustain the plaintiff's burden, has already been considered.⁴⁵ Where the requirement as to the proof of due care is less rigid in the case of death and absence of eyewitnesses to the accident, it has been held that the fact that a person injured at a railroad crossing testifies that she does not remember anything concerning the happening of the accident does not put her in the same position in this respect as a plaintiff suing to recover for the death of a person killed at a crossing.⁴⁶

It has been held that the plaintiff, to entitle him to submit his case to the jury, must produce evidence sufficient to render reasonable a finding that he was free from fault.⁴⁷ So, for example, where the action was brought to recover for injuries received by reason of a horse falling through a defective highway bridge, and the only evidence of how the accident happened was that of the plaintiff, who said: "We were coming to the Smithfield bridge,—there is a descending,—coming down the hill. The horse was trotting down the hill,—the horse she touched on the bridge,—she was on the bridge somewhere, either the sixth or seventh plank, I can't exactly tell which. I saw the horse when she pitched forward, and I didn't see anything more at all,"—it was held that she had failed to show due care.⁴⁸

And where the only evidence offered by the plaintiff in an action to recover for the death of a person killed by a street car was that the deceased, upon leaving one car, immediately passed around the rear end of it and attempted to cross a parallel track upon which a car running in the opposite direction was approaching, and which struck and killed him, and the only witness to the accident, testifying on behalf of the plaintiff, said that he did not see the deceased look in any direction before he attempted to cross, it was held that there was no evidence from which freedom of the deceased from contributory negligence could be inferred.⁴⁹ Likewise, where it appeared that there was a space of 6 inches between the steps of a car and the station platform, and that the platform given from which the jury can find that the intestate did exercise the care required by law. Axelrod v. New York City R. Co. 109 App. Div. 87, 95 N. Y. Supp. 1072.

While it is true that in the case of the death of the injured person, there being no eyewitnesses of the occurrence, slight evidence may suffice, there still must be some fact or circumstance proven from which an inference may be drawn that the deceased exercised due care. Jones v. Ryan, 125 App. Div. 282, 109 N. Y. Supp. 156.

While the rule that the plaintiff must bear the burden of showing the want of contributory negligence in death cases has been somewhat relaxed in regard to the amount and kind of proof required, and especially where there are no eyewitnesses of the accident, yet it has not been abrogated in such cases, and it applies in the case of children as well as adults. Gallagher v. New York City R. Co. 124 App. Div. 868, 109 N. Y. Supp. 515.

There being no circumstances disclosed which tend to prove freedom of the deceased from contributory negligence, a recovery cannot be had for his death. Goodhines v. Chase, 100 App. Div. 87, 91 N. Y. Supp. 313.

⁴⁶ Drago v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 139 App. Div. 828, 124 N. Y. Supp. 374. The court said that the courts have gone a long way in holding that where a plaintiff's intestate has been killed, thus rendering impossible the giving of testimony by such intestate, inferences may be indulged to the effect that such intestate was free from contributory negligence. But we know of no case where it has been held that the injured party may be excused from giving evidence tending to free such party from the charge of contributory negligence by simply saying that he or she cannot remember as to the circumstances or facts of the accident, without giving any evidence that such want of recollection was caused by the accident which is complained of.

⁴⁹ Axelrod v. New York City R. Co. 109 App. Div. 87, 95 N. Y. Supp. 1072.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff attempted to cross a street from one corner to another, and as he left the curb, saw a car approaching a block or a block and a was 14 inches lower than the lowest step of the car, and a passenger, whose left leg was shorter than the right, attempted to alight at about dusk, and when he reached the lower step, put out his cane to feel the platform, because he could not see it, and then stepped down safely with his left foot, but, in attempting to reach the platform with his right foot, stepped into the space between the steps and the platform, and half away, and when he reached the track was struck by it, and there was nothing to prevent his having seen the position of the car at any time before reaching the track, had he looked, it was held that he had not sustained the burden of showing that he was free from contributory negligence. Lynch v. Third Ave. R. Co. 88 App. Div. 604, 85 N. Y. Supp. 180.

Where the evidence showed that a person who was killed by a street car saw the car 8 or 10 feet away just as he was about to cross the track, but observed it to slow up, whereupon he proceeded to cross, but that the car, instead of coming to a standstill, afterwards went ahead at full speed, striking the deceased just as he was about to step upon the track, it was held that the plaintiff had failed to show that the negligence of the deceased did not contribute to the accident. Thompson v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 89 App. Div. 10, 85 N. Y. Supp. 181.

The plaintiff cannot recover in an action brought for the death of a boy killed while playing in the street, by a car, where the plaintiff's testimony showed that the boy was struck while attempting to run across the tracks, but does not indicate whether the deceased saw the car or made an effort to discover whether a car was approaching from either direction, and the fact that a boy was following the decedent at the time does not aid the plaintiff's case. Sobol v. Union R. Co. 122 App. Div. 817, 107 N. Y. Supp. 656.

Plaintiff is bound to show affirmatively not only the culpable negligence of the defendant, but that a person killed thereby was, at the time of the accident, conducting himself with ordinary prudence and discretion. Fox v. Glastenbury, 29 Conn. 204.

The burden of proving his own freedom from negligence is as much a part of the plaintiff's case as is the burden of proving the defendant's negligence; and if he fails was injured, it was held that the evidence did not show absence of contributory negligence.⁵⁰

The plaintiff must establish two propositions: one, the negligence of the defendant; and the other, due care on the part of the person injured.⁵¹ It has been said that plaintiff's evidence must be such as to make out a prima facie case of freedom from contributory negligence,⁵² or a clear to prove either the one or the other, he has not proved facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Eades v. Clark, 23 Jones & S. 132, 11 N. Y. S. R. 725.

In McDaniel v. Acme Brewing Co. 113 Ga. 80, 38 S. E. 404, it was held that a servant seeking to recover for an injury takes the burden upon himself of establishing negligence on the part of the master and due care on his own part. In that case there was no direct evidence that the plaintiff's husband, for whose death the action was brought, who was a servant of the defendant, was in the exercise of due care at the time of his death, nor were there any circumstances in proof from which the jury could legitimately have drawn an inference to this effect. It was therefore held that a nonsuit was properly granted.

Where a party seeks to recover damages for a loss which has been caused by negligence or misconduct, he must be able to show that his own negligence or misconduct has not concurred with that of the other party in producing the injury; and the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show not only negligence on the part of the defendant, but also that he exercised proper care and circumspection; or, in other words, that he was not guilty of negligence. Aurora Branch R. Co. v. Grimes, 13 Ill. 585.

So, in an action to recover damages for death due to the alleged negligence of the defendants, it was held that an instruction which imposed upon the defendants the burden of proving the negligence of the deceased and the absence of it in themselves was erroneous. Brunswick v. Strilka, 30 Ill. App. 186.

An instruction in effect, that if the negligence of the plaintiff and the defendant both contributed to the injury, the verdict should be for the defendant, was held proper, on the ground that where a party seeks to recover damages for a loss which has been caused by negligence or misconduct, he must be able to show that his own negligence or misconduct has not concurred with that of the other party in producing the injury; and the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show not only negligence on the part of the defendant, but also that he exercised proper care and circumspection; or, in other words, that he was not guilty of negligence. Wabash R. Co. v. Jensen, 99 Ill. App. 312.

⁵² In an action for the death of a traveler killed at a railroad crossing, the plaintiff's evidence must be such as to make a prima affirmative case.⁵³ Being a part of his case, it is said that he must establish the fact by a preponderance of the evidence,⁵⁴

facie case of freedom from contributory negligence. Popke v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 81 Conn. 724, 71 Atl. 1098.

In an action to recover for injuries received while driving upon a defective highway in the nighttime, it was held that the plaintiff is bound to make out a prima facie case on freedom from contributory negligence as well as on other points. Barber v. Essex, 27 Vt. 62. The court, however, said that the requisite is rather that he was not guilty of negligence than that he should prove any positive diligence. And as in other negative propositions which it is often incumbent upon a party to establish, as where suits or indictments are brought for omissions of duty, after such negative evidence of the alleged fact as may be presumed to be in the power of the party is shown, the burden of proof is changed upon the other side. That appears to have been the case here. The plaintiff's case showed an acknowledged case of no negligence on his part except in regard to darkness. There seems to have been no question in regard to plaintiff's want of care, except in regard to the darkness of the night, and unless it can be assumed as a general proposition that ordinarily one is not allowed to travel a highway with a team in the nighttime, and we think it must be regarded as the general right of everyone to travel in this mode in the nighttime; and it was for the defendant, if there is no other testimony to show want of ordinary care, to prove that the night was so dark as to render it unsafe for travel.

⁵⁴ Gilman v. New York City R. Co. 107 N. Y. Supp. 770; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Stone, 109 Ill. App. 517.

The absence of contributory negligence is an element of plaintiff's cause of action and a part of his case; and he has the burden of showing that he or his intestate was guilty of no negligence contributing to produce the injury or death. Winslow v. Boston & A. R. Co. 11 N. Y. S. R. 831.

In cases where contributory negligence may be claimed, the absence thereof is part of the plaintiff's case, and the burden of satisfying the jury on that point by a preponderance of evidence rests upon him. Schindler v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 1 N. Y. S. R. 289.

The plaintiff must prove by a preponderance of evidence that he was in the exercise of due care at the time of his injury. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Levy, 160 Ill. 385, 43 N. E. 357, reversing 57 Ill. App. 365.

In an action to recover for the death of a person hit by a street car, the plaintiff is properly nonsuited where he fails to establish by a preponderance of evidence the deceased's freedom from contributory negligence. Kruck v. Connecticut Co. — Conn. —, 80 Atl. 162.

And an instruction that the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove by the greater weight of the evidence, not only the negligence of the defendant, as charged in the declaration, but also to prove by the greater weight of the evidence that the deceased was free from negligence which contributed to the collision which caused his death; and "if you find from all the evidence in the case that the plaintiff has not so proven both of these facts, you shall find the defendant not guilty,"—was held properly to state the rule as to the burden of proof, and it was declared that such instruction should have been given where the principle sought to be covered thereby was not fully stated in other instructions. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Appell, 103 Ill. App. 185.

In an action by a woman to recover for the death of her husband, killed at a railroad crossing, it is necessary for her to prove by a preponderance of evidence that at the time, and immediately preceding the occasion on which he received the injury causing his death, deceased was in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, unless it should be shown that the defendant wilfully and wantonly inflicted such injuries. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Stone, 109 Ill. App. 517.

The burden is upon one who was injured while attempting to cross railway tracks at a highway crossing to show by a preponderance of the evidence that he vigilantly used his eyes and ears to ascertain if a train was approaching; and if this is not shown by a preponderance of evidence, the plaintiff cannot recover. Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Howard, 124 Ind. 280, 8 L.R.A. 593, 19 Am. St. Rep. 96, 24 N. E. 892.

To hold a railroad company liable in damages for the death of a pedestrian killed at a street crossing, plaintiff must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the deceased was in the exercise of due care, which cannot be sustained by mere conjecture and speculation. Wright v. Boston & M. R. Co. 74 N. H. 128, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 832, 124 Am. St. Rep. 949, 65 Atl. 687.

So, failure of the plaintiff, who was hurt by falling through a hole in the floor from which a trapdoor had been removed, to show by a preponderance of evidence that he was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety, was held fatal to recovery. Mutual Wheel Co. v. Mosher, 85 Ill. App. 240.

In an action by a servant to recover for injuries received by using a broken and defective hay cutter belonging to his employer, an instruction that, to authorize a recovery, the plaintiff must prove by a preponderance of evidence, that he was exercising that degree of care and caution at by affirmative, positive proof.⁵⁵ Or, as has been said, the case starts at zero, and the plaintiff is called upon to establish affirmatively absence of contributory negligence.⁵⁶ It is not enough that the facts proven permit an inference that the deceased was free from contributory negligence, but the inference sought must be the

the time of the injury which a reasonably prudent and cautious man would have exercised, was held not erroneous by reason of a modification by the addition of the following words: "And in the situation that plaintiff was placed, as shown by the evidence." Donley v. Dougherty, 174 Ill. 582, 51 N. E. 714.

Co.* 80 Hun, 178, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1008.

The plaintiff must show by positive evidence that he was in the exercise of due care. Chaffee v. Boston L. R. Corp. 104 Mass. 108.

The plaintiff must satisfy the jury as an affirmative fact to be established by him that, as a necessary part of his case, at the time of the accident he was in the exercise of due care. Gleason v. Bremen, 50 Me. 222.

In Lesan v. Maine C. R. Co. 77 Me. 85, the court said that the plaintiff must produce affirmative proof, directly or indirectly, that he was not himself guilty of any negligence which helped to cause the accident. Sometimes this is impliedly shown by the proof of the manner of the injury. That is, by proving the defendant's negligence. The same proof may exculpate the plaintiff from any charge of negligence. It may be inferred that a plaintiff was, at the time of the accident, using due care, from the absence of all appearance of fault upon his part in the circumstances under which the accident happened. To state the requirement more precisely, the plaintiff must show affirmatively, or it must affirmatively appear, that he was himself in the use of due care. If it so appears from a full account of the circumstances attending the occurrence, whether the evidence be put in for one purpose or another, then he does affirmatively sustain the burden obligatory upon him.

To entitle a plaintiff to recover for injuries received by reason of the negligence of the defendant, it is incumbent upon him affirmatively to prove at least two propositions; one, that his injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendant; and two, that no failure to exercise reasonable care on his part contributed to bring about his injuries. Ouellette v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 106 Me. 153, 76 Atl. 280.

It is for the plaintiff by affirmative evidence to establish to the satisfaction of the jury his own freedom from negligence contributing to the injury of which he complains. Gaynor v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 100 Mass. 208, 97 Am. Dec. 96. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Among the allegations a plaintiff in a personal-injury case must support by proof in order to entitle him to recover is that of ordinary care. It is an affirmative fact, to be established as an essential part of the plaintiff's case, and before the defendants are required to set up a defense of contributory negligence; and if, on the whole testimony on this point, the weight of evidence is against the plaintiff, he cannot recover. Mosher v. Smithfield, 84 Me. 334, 24 Atl. 876.

In an action to recover for the death of a person killed by coming in contact with an electric wire, it was held that when the action of both parties must have concurred to produce the injury, it devolves upon the plaintiff to show that he was not himself guilty of negligence; but he must show affirmatively that he was in the exercise of due and reasonable care when the injury happened. Clements v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. 44 La. Ann. 692, 16 L.R.A. 43, 32 Am. St. Rep. 348, 11 So. 51.

In a highway case the town is not bound to show that plaintiff's carelessness or want of care was the cause of the injury. It must affirmatively appear that ordinary care was exercised in passing over the highway, or that the injury was in no degree attributable to any want of care on the part of the plaintiff. Mosher v. Smithfield, supra.

In an action to recover for personal injuries received by collision with a train at a railroad crossing, the plaintiff must establish by affirmative evidence his freedom from contributory negligence. He must show that he approached the crossing with due care and caution, alert to discover the first sign of coming danger. Smith v. Maine C. R. Co. 87 Me. 339, 32 Atl. 967.

To hold a town liable for injuries due to a defective highway, the traveler must show affirmatively that he was in the exercise of due care. Tripp v. Wells, 104 Me. 29, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1145, 70 Atl. 533.

Where a traveler is killed while crossing street railroad tracks, by collision with a car, in an action to recover for his death, the plaintiff must show by affirmative evidence that the deceased was in the exercise of due care. Mathes v. Lowell, L. & H. Street R. Co. 177 Mass. 416, 59 N. E. 77.

Recovery cannot be had for the death of a person stepping directly in front of a street car and being killed, without affirmative proof that the deceased was in the exercise of due care. Gleason v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. 184 Mass. 290, 68 N. E. 225.

The burden is upon the plaintiff of showing affirmatively, either by direct evidence or the drift of surrounding circumstances, that a person killed at a railroad crossing, only one which can fairly and reasonably be drawn from the facts proven.⁵⁷

If the evidence as to negligence and absence of negligence on the part of the person injured balances, the plaintiff does not sustain his burden.⁵⁸ If the circumstances proved are equally consistent with negligence or care, the verdict should be for the defendant.⁵⁹ Under such circumstances, it has been held that a nonsuit must be granted.⁶⁰ Although it would seem not to be necessary for plaintiff, as part of his proof of due care, to introduce evidence of sobriety, nevertheless, where intoxication is alleged, or there is evidence of it, the burden, it seems, is not only on the plaintiff to introduce evidence in refor whose death the action is brought, was himself without fault, and approached the crossing with prudence and care, and with senses alert to the possibility of approaching danger. Tolman v. Syracuse, B. & Q. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 198, 50 Am. Rep. 649.

The burden of showing affirmatively, either by direct evidence or by surrounding circumstances, that the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, is upon the plaintiff. Beckwith v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 54 Hun, 446, 7 N. Y. Supp. 719, 721, affirmed in 125 N. Y. 759, 27 N. E. 408.

⁵⁸ In view of the fact that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to prove that his own want of ordinary care did not contribute to the injury, if the testimony be in exact equilibrio upon the question of the plaintiff's sobriety at the time of the injury, the jury will not be justified in finding that he was sober. Hubbard v. Mason City, 60 Iowa, 400, 14 N. W. 772.

An instruction that if the jury find that the injuries complained of were in any degree contributed to by the fault, want of care, or negligence of the plaintiff, then the plaintiff could not recover, was held erroneous, since to justify a verdict against the plaintiff it was not necessary, as the instruction implied, that the jury should find affirmatively that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. They were bound to render such verdict if they simply failed to find that he was not guilty. Gwynn v. Duffield, 66 Iowa, 708, 55 Am. Rep. 286, 24 N. W. 523.

In Raymond v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. — Iowa, —, 17 N. W. 923, although the court instructed the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove that he was free from contributory negligence, it added that the requirement of the law was sufficiently complied with when the plaintiff's testimony failed to show contributory negligence. This was held to be erroneous, because it shifted the burden from the plaintiff to the defendant. It was said that the plaintiff cannot recover if the evidence is in equilibrio.

⁵⁹ Crafts v. Boston, 109 Mass. 519; Mahon v. Burns, 13 Misc. 19, 34 N. Y. Supp. 91.

If the facts proved point as much to negligence on the part of the injured person as to its absence, or point in neither direction, a recovery cannot be had. Caven v. Troy, 12 App. Div. 154, 52 N. Y. Supp. 804. To the same effect. Murray v. Troy & W. T. Bridge Co. 15 N. Y. Week. Dig. 16.

Assuming that the evidence admitted raised a doubt as to plaintiff's contributory negligence, or the circumstances pointed as much one way as the other, or pointed in neither direction, the plaintiff cannot recover. Door v. McCullough, 8 App. Div. 327, 40 N. Y. Supp. 806.

If from the whole evidence it cannot be determined whether the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, the finding and judgment must be against him. Brannen v. Kokomo, G. & J. Gravel Road Co. 115 Ind. 115, 7 Am. St. Rep. 411, 17 N. E. 202.

Where different inferences are deducible from the facts which appear, and are equally consistent with those facts, it cannot be said that the plaintiff has maintained his case. Mosher v. Smithfield, 84 Me. 334, 24 Atl. 876.

It is not enough to prove facts from which either the conclusion of negligence or the absence of negligence may be with equal fairness drawn, but the burden is upon the plaintiff to establish that there was no contributory negligence. Hart v. Hudson River Bridge Co. 84 N. Y. 56. In this case, action was brought for the death of a woman who walked off of an open drawbridge. As the evidence stood, there was no proof either way, and the court said it was by no means clear, in the absence of evidence, that the deceased was not chargeable with contributory negligence. It was not sufficient that the evidence in this respect was equally balanced, and it was essential that at least a prima facie case should be established.

The plaintiff must prove that death was caused solely by the negligence of the defendant, and that the want of care on the part of the deceased in no way made any contribution to the result; and the two points must be established by competent proof, and must not be left to speculation. Morrison v. Metropolitan Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 30 Abb. N. C. 143, 69 Hun, 100, 23 N. Y. Supp. 257.

The jury cannot be permitted to guess that a person killed by being wound around a revolving shaft, due to the fact that his clothing caught in a setscrew, used reasonable care and prudence in going near the shaft, and that he was caught without any fault or negligence on his part, without any evidence to support that proposition, and when the evidence fails to disclose whether he was free from negligence, plaintiff cannot recover. Huff v. American Fire Engine Co. 88 App. Div. 324, 84 N. Y. Supp. 651.

⁶⁰ In such a case a nonsuit must be granted. Jencks v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 33 App. Div. 635, 53 N. Y. Supp. 625; McAuliffe v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 85 App. Div. 187, 83 N. Y. Supp. 200; Lamb v. Union R. Co. 195 N. Y. 260, 88 N. E. 371.

buttal, but it is necessary for him to establish the fact of sobriety by a preponderance of the evidence.⁶¹

The burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence rests upon the plaintiff from the beginning until the end of the trial. The burden of introducing evidence to controvert the testimony offered on behalf of the plaintiff may rest upon the defendant after the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, but the burden of proving the issue, assigned to the plaintiff in the first place, does not shift.⁶²

Under the rule that the burden is on the plaintiff to show freedom from contributory negligence, it ordinarily follows that where it does not appear that the plaintiff acquiesced in a driver's negligence, if the latter was negligent, the presumption is that the plaintiff co-operated with the driver, and the latter's negligence will preclude a recovery. Hence, before there can be a recovery, it must appear affirmatively that the plaintiff had no control over the team or the conveyance; that the same was in charge of a careful and competent driver, or at least, a driver whom the plaintiff had good reason to believe to be such, and that ⁶¹ In Cramer v. Burlington, 42 Iowa, 315 (an action to recover damages for injuries sustained on account of being precipitated over a set-off in a sidewalk), it was held that when it becomes material to inquire whether the plaintiff was sober, and the defendant introduces some testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was intoxicated, the burden of overcoming this testimony is shifted upon the plaintiff; and the jury, in order to find upon the issue for the plaintiff, must be able to find from a preponderance of all the testimony, that the plaintiff was sober. In a dissenting opinion, Beck, Judge, said: "The conclusion of the majority of the court is based upon the position that a state of intoxication, even the first stage, is inconsistent with the exercise of care; and that where intoxication of plaintiff was shown, the burden of proof was then shifted upon him to show that, notwithstanding his intoxication, he did exercise care. But why impose a burden upon him to further prove care when his condition of intoxication did not warrant the conclusion of his inability, want of will, or absence of intention to exercise care? It is imposing a burden of proof where no necessity of proof exists, for we have seen that no inference of carelessness is necessarily to be drawn from the existence of the first stage of intoxication. In order, then, to show his care, he is not required to rebut the evidence of his intoxication. The majority of the court hold that the intoxication of the plaintiff must be denied by rebutting evidence before plaintiff can establish care. This can only be true on the ground that intoxication in all degrees—the first as well as all others—renders it necessary to infer carelessness. It will be observed, too, that care, according to the views of the majority, is to be shown by establishing sobriety,—by rebutting the proof of intoxication. This would render it utterly impossible for a man in any stage of intoxication to show that he did exercise care. The majority say if he was drunk, he can only show care by proving that he was sober; if his drunkenness be established or conceded, he must be held to be careless. This is a more severe penalty in the nature of a disability imposed upon intoxication than I think just. I am of the opinion that the rule adopted by the court below is correct; namely, the jury should determine from the evidence whether the intoxication of plaintiff was such as to authorize the inference of want of care for his safety."

In an action to recover for injuries due to a defective sidewalk, the defendant having alleged that the plaintiff was intoxicated at the time of the accident, it was held that an instruction that the defendant had the burden of establishing the claim of intoxication by a preponderance of evidence, or, in other words, that the plaintiff would be presumed to have been sober until the contrary was shown, was erroneous, as in conflict with the rule announced in Cramer v. Burlington, the last-mentioned case. Hubbard v. Mason City, 60 Iowa, 400, 14 N. W. 772.

If the testimony be in exact equilibrio upon the question of the plaintiff's sobriety at the time of the injury, the jury will not be justified in finding that he was sober. Ibid.

In Abingdon v. McGrew, 42 Ill. App. 109, an action to recover damages for injuries sustained by falling upon a defective sidewalk, where it appeared that, at the time of the accident, the plaintiff was intoxicated, it was held that an instruction by which the jury were told that the degree of intoxication must be such that the plaintiff was incapacitated from using ordinary care and diligence, and that the burden of proof to establish that, by a preponderance of evidence, was with the defendant, was erroneous, since the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that, at the time of the accident, he was in the exercise of ordinary care. If the evidence was evenly balanced as to whether the plaintiff, owing to his drunken condition, was exercising ordinary care, there could be no recovery.

In Chicago City R. Co. v. Lewis, 5 Ill. App. 242 (an action to recover damages for the death of a person who, while in a state of intoxication, was run over at night by a street car), it was said that the burden was on the plaintiff to show not only that the deceased used due care and circumspection to avoid danger, but that the defendant was guilty of want of care.

⁶² See supra, II. See also V., note 60. supra.

The burden throughout the trial is upon the plaintiff to show affirmatively, either by direct evidence or the drift of surrounding circumstances, that the person for whose

the plaintiff himself was without fault otherwise.⁶³ And the plaintiff must show not only that the driver was in the exercise of due care, but he must prove that the person injured was free from contributory negligence.⁶⁴ The burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence is upon an infant as well as upon an adult, varying in degree only, which degree depends upon natural capacity, physical development, training, habits of life, surroundings, and the like.⁶⁵

It has been suggested in one Vermont case, that there might be stronger reasons for applying the rule that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff in the case of collisions between persons and railroad trains than in other cases; ⁶⁶ but nowhere else has such a distinction been thought of.

Where, by reason of defendant's demurrer to the declaration, the defendant defaults as to the facts sufficiently alleged and essential to constitute a cause of action, and thereby admits them, it has been held not necessary for the plaintiff to prove use of ordinary care on the hearing in relation to damages. But it is competent for the defendant to prove any fact or circumstance tending to show that the injury was not occasioned wholly or at all by his negligence, but wholly or in part by the death the action was brought was free from negligence contributing thereto. Lamb v. Union R. Co. 195 N. Y. 260, 88 N. E. 371.

But an instruction in substance that if the plaintiff showed his acts in the transaction, and they "failed" to show contributory negligence, the burden upon this point would be shifted, while not correct as an abstract rule of law, was upheld where there was no question of negligence by reason of an omission, and no question in regard to the surrounding circumstances, and where the only question was as to whether the injured person, in view of the conceded circumstances, was negligent in what he did. Raymond v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 152, 21 N. W. 495 (rehearing).

⁶³ Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Boyts, — Ind. App. —, 43 N. E. 667.

In an action to recover for injuries received while a passenger in a wagon driven by another person, it is incumbent upon a plaintiff to prove affirmatively not only that he wanted of due care on his own part contributed to the injury, but likewise, that there was none on the part of the driver. Orr v. Oldtown. 99 Me. 190, 58 Atl. 914.

Where plaintiff was injured by reason of a defective bridge, and her father was driving at the time, it was held incumbent upon her to establish the fact that he was driving with due care. Mosher v. Smithfield, 84 Me. 334, 24 Atl. 876.

⁶⁴ Where the evidence showed that the driver of a vehicle struck at a railroad crossing looked and listened on approaching the crossing, but there was no evidence that he deceased did so, the court found that there was no affirmative evidence establishing freedom from contributory negligence, and consequently held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Durkee v. Delaware H. Canal Co. 88 Hun, 471, 69 N. Y. S. R. 9. 34 N. Y. Supp. 978.

In an action for an injury to a child of tender years, based on negligence, who may or may not have been sui juris when the injury happened, if the fact is material, as bearing upon the question of contributory negligence, the burden is upon the plaintiff to give some evidence that the party injured was not capable, as a matter of fact, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of exercising judgment and discretion. Stone v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 104, 21 N. E. 712. The court said that this rule would seem to be consistent with the principle of law well settled in New York, that in an action for a personal injury, based on negligence, freedom from contributory negligence on the part of the party injured is an element of the cause of action.

And a fifteen-year-old boy suing for injuries received by a defective sidewalk is only bound to prove that he was exercising such care as a person of his age would be expected to exercise. Dowd v. Chicopee, 116 Mass. 93.

In an action to recover for the death of a child struck by a street car, the plaintiff is bound to prove that his intestate was, at the time of the injury, in the exercise of such care as might reasonably be expected of children of the age of the deceased, or which ordinary children of his age, under similar conditions, would exercise. Beale v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 196 Mass. 119, 81 N. E. 867.

In an action to recover for injuries due to the bite of a dog, it is necessary for the plaintiff, although a boy, to show that he was in the exercise of due care. Plumley v. Birge, 124 Mass. 57, 26 Am. Rep. 645.

⁶⁶ In Hill v. New Haven, 37 Vt. 501, 88 Am. Dec. 613, in referring to cases in which it is held that where injuries have been received by collisions between railroad trains and persons on railroad tracks, the burden is on the plaintiff to show affirmatively that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, the court said: "It is manifest that there may be reasons for applying a different rule to this class of cases from the fact that the cars and engines of the road run upon a fixed and permanent track that cannot be deviated from, and from the peculiarly dangerous and uncontrollable power by which they are operated, so that a person who has placed himself within their range and power might properly be called upon to explain by his evidence how he came there before receiving damages for his injury. Whether in such cases a rule of evidence shall be adopted varying from that in general use between ordinary parties, we have no occasion to decide; it is enough for this negligence of the plaintiff; and in proving these facts he assumes the burden.⁶⁷

b. Discharge of burden by circumstantial evidence.

The plaintiff, in discharging his burden as to the issue of contributory negligence, case to say that we see no ground for its adoption in cases like the present, and the long and uniform course of trials of such actions of this state have shown no necessity for it."

⁶⁷ Daniels v. Saybrook, 34 Conn. 377.

One of the consequences of a default is a prima facie admission by the defendant of the truth of the allegation of the complaint that the person killed by the alleged negligence of the defendant was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident, and the assumption by the defendant of disproving such allegation. Such care may be inferred from all the circumstances shown to exist immediately prior to and at the time of the injury, and, in determining such question, the jury may properly take into consideration the instincts prompting to the preservation of life and the avoidance of danger. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Keenan, 190 Ill. 217, 60 N. E. 107.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Kief, 111 Ill. App. 354, it was said, in referring to the last mentioned case: "While that case seems is not confined to any particular kind or species of evidence.⁶⁸ He may establish his freedom from fault by circumstantial evidence.⁶⁹ The rule is that the plaintiff's case must be made out either by direct evidence, or by such circumstances as justify a fair inference that the injured person was free from contributory neglito hold generally that in cases of this character the plaintiff is entitled to the presumption, omitting the qualification as to the absence of eyewitnesses to the accident, the facts recited in the opinion fail to disclose whether or not there were eyewitnesses to the accident involved in the case. We may therefore properly assume that there were none."

Where no one saw the killing, direct evidence as to due care is unnecessary. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Nowicki, 148 Ill. 29, 35 N. E. 358, affirming 46 Ill. App. 566.

In actions to recover damages for negligence resulting in death, where there are no eyewitnesses of the accident, the freedom of the deceased from contributory negligence may be inferred, by proof of facts and circumstances from which it may fairly be inferred that he was not in fault. Noble v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 20 App. Div. 40, 46 N. Y. Supp. 645; Wieland v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 30 App. Div. 85, 51 N. Y. Supp. 776.

In Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen, 117 Ind. 439, 10 Am. St. Rep. 67, 20 N. E. 287, an action to recover damages for the death of a conductor alleged to have been caused by a defective brake, it was said that a verdict for the plaintiff would be upheld if, from all the facts and circumstances proved in the case, the inference arose that the deceased was, at the time of the accident, exercising proper caution, and that his death was caused while he was using the defective brake, even though there was no direct evidence given by persons who saw the deceased at the moment of the accident.

In Johnson v. Hudson River R. Co. 20 N. Y. 65, 75 Am. Dec. 375, affirming 6 Duer, 633, it is said that the true rule is this: The jury must eventually be satisfied that the plaintiff did not, by any negligence of his own, contribute to the injury. The evidence to establish this may consist in that offer to show the nature or cause of the accident, or in any other competent proof. To carry a case to the jury, the evidence on the part of the plaintiff must be such as, if believed, would authorize them to find that the injury was occasioned solely by the negligence of the defendant. It is not absolutely essential that the plaintiff should give any affirmative proof touching his own conduct on the occasion of an accident. The character of the defendant's delinquency may be such as to prove prima facie the whole issue; or the case may be such as to make it necessary for the plaintiff to show by independent evidence that ence.⁷⁰ The burden of establishing affirmatively freedom from contributory negligence may be successfully borne though there were no eyewitnesses of the accident, and even although its precise cause and manner of occurrence are unknown. If, in such case, the surrounding facts and circumstances reasonably indicate or tend to establish that the accident might have occurred without negligence of the deceased, that inference becomes possible, in addition to that which involves a careless or wilful disregard of personal safety, and so, a question of fact may arise, to be solved by a jury, and require a choice between possible but divergent inferences. If, on the other hand, those facts and circumstances, did not bring the misfortune upon himself.

In an action to recover for personal injuries where there were no eyewitnesses of the accident, the plaintiff put in such proofs of the attendant facts as were attainable under the circumstances, and from these it was by no means clear that the interstate was at fault. It was held that plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury. Teipel v. Hilsendegen, 44 Mich. 461, 7 N. W. 82. ⁷⁰ Waldele v. New York C. & H. R. R., 19 Hun, 60.

It is as much the duty of the plaintiff to show either by direct testimony, or by facts and circumstances by which it may be reasonably inferred, that he was himself free from negligence, as to establish the fact that the defendant was guilty of negligence. Muhr v. New York, 15 Daly, 12, 16 N. Y. S. R. 688, 2 N. Y. Supp. 59. The court said: "It is true that plaintiffs in negligence actions seldom fail to do this; and hence dismissals on the ground are rare. But when a case arises on uncontradicted evidence requiring the court to dismiss the complaint or direct a verdict, it is its duty to do so."

In order to recover, the plaintiff must show by direct proof or by circumstances that the deceased was free from contributory negligence. Jencks v. Lehigh Valley R., 33 App. Div. 635, 53 N. Y. Supp. 625. The plaintiff must make it appear either by direct evidence, or else by inferences fairly deducible from the facts proved, that a person killed at a railroad crossing was free from contributory negligence. Auliffe v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co., 33 App. Div. 187, 83 N. Y. Supp. 200.

⁷¹ Tolman v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co., 19 N. Y. 198, 50 Am. Rep. 649.

Where a traveler fell off of a defectively built bridge and was killed, and there was no eyewitness to the accident, it was held that, although the burden was on the plaintiff to establish freedom from contributory negligence, this might be inferred by the jury from the circumstances. Ryan v. Bristol, 63 Conn. 26, 27 Atl. 309.

In a case in which a rear-end freight brakeman was killed by being struck by an overhead bridge just as he had reached the top of a ladder on a car, it was held that, although the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the deceased was in the exercise of due care in ascending the ladder, and there was no direct evidence disclosing his conduct at the time of the accident, nevertheless, the exercise of such care could have been found from circumstantial evidence. Miller v. Boston & M. R. Co. 73 N. H. 330, 61 Atl. 360.

coupled with the occurrence of the accident, do not indicate or tend to establish the existence of some cause or occasion of the latter which is consistent with the exercise of proper prudence and care, then the inference of negligence is the only one left to be drawn, and the burden resting upon the plaintiff is not successfully borne, and a nonsuit for that reason becomes inevitable.⁷¹

It has been held that the exercise of due care on the part of the person injured need not be shown by affirmative,⁷² that is, by direct, evidence, but may be shown by evidence which excludes fault on the part of the plaintiff,⁷³ or by facts and circumstances from which absence of fault may be the top of a ladder on a car, it was held that, although the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the deceased was in the exercise of due care in ascending the ladder, and there was no direct evidence disclosing his conduct at the time of the accident, nevertheless, the exercise of such care could have been found from circumstantial evidence. Miller v. Boston & M. R. Co. 73 N. H. 330, 61 Atl. 360.

⁷² The exercise of due care on the part of the person injured need not be shown by affirmative evidence. Cassidy v. Angell, 12 R. I. 447, 34 Am. Rep. 690; Gaffney v. Brown, 150 Mass. 479, 23 N. E. 233.

It is not necessary that any positive act of care should be proved, since freedom from contributory negligence may be inferred from the absence of fault when sufficient circumstances are shown fairly to exclude the idea of negligence on the part of the person injured. Prince v. Lowell Electric Light Corp. 201 Mass. 276, 87 N. E. 558.

The rule is that while the plaintiff is bound to establish his freedom from negligence contributing to the accident, if all the circumstances under which the injury was received are proved, and the evidence excludes fault on the part of the plaintiff, and there is nothing in the conduct of the plaintiff, either of acts or of neglect, to which the injury might be attributed, in whole or in part, due care may be inferred from the absence of all appearance of fault. Wolpers v. New York & Q. Electric Light & P. Co. 91 App. Div. 424, 86 N. Y. Supp. 845.

fairly inferred.⁷⁴ Circumstances appearing from the proof offered to show the nature of the accident and cause of it will often be sufficient for this purpose.⁷⁵ But the fact that due care on the part of the injured person is not inconsistent with the circumstances proved is not enough to satisfy plaintiff's burden.⁷⁶ Where the circumstances are relied upon in the absence of direct evidence, to show a lack of contributory negligence, they should point by a fair and reasonable inference to such conclusion.⁷⁷

But if there is no eyewitness to the kill-

⁷⁴ Absence of contributory negligence may be shown by proving facts and circumstances from which it may be fairly inferred, and if all the circumstances under which an accident took place are put in evidence, and, upon an examination of them, nothing is found in the conduct of the plaintiff to which negligence can fairly be imputed, the mere absence of fault may justify the jury in finding due care on his part. Hinckley v. Cape Cod R. Co. 120 Mass. 257.

In Foster v. Dixfield, 18 Me. 380, it was held that if the burden was on the plaintiff to prove the exercise of due care in an action to recover damages for personal injuries, which might well be doubted, such proof might be deduced from the circumstances of the case. The court said that if direct and positive proof to this effect is essential, the party who sustains an injury by reason of a defect in the highway when alone, or when the transaction is witnessed by no other eye, would be without remedy.

⁷⁵ In Adams v. Carlisle, 21 Pick. 146, an action to recover for injuries alleged to have been due to a defective highway, it was said: "It is a very difficult question what kind and degree of evidence are sufficient to stand as prima facie proof of this fact, and, in the absence of all controlling evidence, to establish it. That the person driving was commonly careful and skilful, that there was no apparent cause for the accident but the bad condition of the highway, the position in which the carriage was at the time, are all circumstances upon which jurors may pass their judgment, and infer that due skill and care were used. Circumstances arising out of the proof offered to show the nature of the accident and the cause of it will generally be such as to enable a jury to judge satisfactorily whether the carriage was driven with ordinary care and skill."

In Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Crowder, 63 Tex. 502, in which a brakeman was killed, it was thought, by catching his foot between unfilled ties and being run over, the court said that the true rule in this class of cases is that the servant seeking to recover for an injury takes the burden upon himself of establishing negligence on the part of the master, and due care on his own part. "There is no doubt," continued the court, "that cases occur in which the accident is of such character as of itself, when considered in connection with the facts which necessarily appear in showing the accident, to amount to sufficient proof of the want of due care by a defendant, and of the exercise of due care by a plaintiff, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) to authorize a jury to find both facts without any direct proof on either point; but this does not affect the question of burden of proof, but relates rather to the sufficiency of the evidence furnished by the accident itself. The burden of proof resting on a plaintiff upon the issues of negligence of the defendant, and his own exercise of due care, requires that he should show the facts surrounding and leading to the accident, and if from these, when shown, a jury may reasonably infer negligence in the defendant contributing to the injury, and the exercise of due care by the plaintiff when he is entitled to a verdict; but if he does not show how the accident occurred by which he was injured, by showing his own relation to it and the other surrounding facts, some or all of which may appear from the character of the accident itself, then he has not gone with his evidence as far as the law requires him to go to authorize a recovery."

The rule that the burden of proving due care is on the plaintiff is not now the rule in Texas. See infra, VI. a.

⁷⁶ That the deceased in a railway crossing accident might have come to his death, when, upon some supposable theory not inconsistent with the surrounding circumstances, he may have been free from fault, is not sufficient. The fact that the circumstances point just as clearly to his negligence as to his freedom from the same is sufficient to preclude a recovery. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bennett, 9 Ind. App. 92, 35 N. E. 1033.

In an action to recover for the death of a brakeman supposed to have been knocked off of a car in passing by a coal chute, it was held that an instruction that the jury might infer that the deceased was in the line of his duty and in the exercise of proper care, if such inference was in perfect harmony with the established facts, was held misleading, and therefore erroneous. Perigo v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 55 Iowa, 326, 7 N. W. 627. The court says it was not necessary for the plaintiff to show by direct and positive evidence that the deceased at the time of the accident was in the line of his duty and exercising proper care. It was sufficient if such was the reasonable inference from the facts proved. But such inference is not to be gathered from the facts which are simply not inconsistent with it.

⁷⁷ Voorhees v. Hudson River Teleph. Co. 109 App. Div. 465, 95 N. Y. Supp. 703, 1167.

In Miller v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 128 Ind. 97, 25 Am. St. Rep. 416, 27 N. E. 339, a man driving a buggy, and accompanied by his wife, attempted to cross ing of a person, his administrator may establish the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the deceased by the highest proof of which the case is capable, including the habits of deceased, and any other facts and circumstances from which the jury may rightfully find that he was exercising such care.⁷⁸ It has been held that the circumstantial evidence may be aided by the presumption of due care arising from the in-railroad tracks at highway crossing in front of an approaching train. It was held that, although the husband's contributory negligence could not be imputed to the wife, still she herself not having been affirmatively shown to have been free from contributory negligence, there could be no recovery. The court said that the fact that there was no contributory negligence may undoubtedly be inferred from circumstances, but, to authorize such an inference, there must be evidence of circumstances from which the inference can be legitimately drawn. There were no circumstances in the case before the court authorizing such an inference. The intestate approached the crossing known to her to be dangerous, and approached it when a train was in full view; she took no precautions to warn her husband, or to avert the threatened danger, although slight care might have avoided it.

Where a person who stepped off of a street car on one track was killed by a car approaching from the opposite direction on another track, and there was nothing in the evidence to show what the deceased had done from the time he stepped off of one car until he was hit by the other, it was held that there could be no recovery, since there was not sufficient showing of want of contributory negligence. Evansville Street R. Co. v. Gentry, 147 Ind. 408, 37 L.R.A. 378, 62 Am. St. Rep. 421, 44 N. E. 311. The court said: "It is true that but little evidence may be needed to negative contributory negligence on the part of one injured by the act of another. The instincts of self-preservation, and the desire to avoid injury or pain to one's self, might be sufficient, in connection with some slight, positive testimony; whether circumstantial or otherwise, to enable us to conclude that one who suffers an injury did not help to bring it upon himself. But there must be some evidence of due care. So many instances are known to us of lack of prudence, forgetfulness, and absent-mindedness or like want of ordinary care on the part of otherwise prudent and thoughtful persons, that we cannot conclude without some facts proved, some circumstances shown, that a person's injury was not brought upon him through his own inexcusable fault."

If there is only a partial disclosure of the facts, and no evidence is offered showing the conduct of the party injured in regard to matters specially requiring care on his part, the data for such an inference are not sufficient. It can be warranted only when circumstances are shown which fairly indicate care or exclude the idea of negligence on his part. Hinckley v. Cape Cod R. Co. 120 Mass. 257. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In an action to recover damages for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, evidence as to the careful habits of the deceased is competent on the question of due care, where no person witnessed the accident. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Wilson, 225 Ill. 50, 116 Am. St. Rep. 102, 80 N. E. 56.

It was urged that evidence that an engineer saw a person struck at a railroad crossing would render inadmissible evidence as to the careful habits of the deceased, in an action to recover damages for his death; but the court failed to decide the point, because the evidence did not clearly show that the engineer really saw the accident. Ibid.

But opinions of witnesses as to the general character of one killed at a railroad crossing, for carefulness, are not admissible on the question of his freedom from contributory negligence. Chase v. Maine C. R. Co. 77 Me. 62, 52 Am. Rep. 744.

So, it was held that, in a case in which a person was found fatally injured in an unguarded pit in a public highway, and no witness saw the accident, evidence of the habits of the deceased as to temperance, heedlessness, etc., might be considered on the question whether he was in the exercise of due care; also that he lived near and must have known of the danger. Cassidy v. Angell, 12 R. I. 447, 34 Am. Rep. 690.

Where a freight train broke apart, and a brakeman, while in the performance of his duties, fell between the cars and was killed, and there was nothing to show that he was careless, it was held that there was sufficient evidence from which the jury might infer that the deceased was in the exercise of due care, the case not being one where it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that he did a particular act by way of precaution. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co. 156 Mass. 13, 32 Am. St. Rep. 425, 30 N. E. 169.

Where an employee was killed by falling down an elevator shaft after the elevator had passed up, it was held that due care on the part of the deceased might be inferred from evidence that he was an intelligent, sober, and careful youth, there being no eyewitness to the accident and no countervailing evidence. Dallemand v. Saalfeldt, 175 Ill. 310, 48 L.R.A. 753, 67 Am. St. Rep. 214, 51 N. E. 645.

In an action to recover for the death of an engineer killed in a boiler explosion, where there was no witness to testify to the question whether he was, at the time of the accident, exercising due care, it was held that testimony to show that the de-instinct of self-preservation.⁷⁹ But the fact alone that the injury occurred is not sufficient evidence of the injured person's care or freedom from negligence contributing to his injury.⁸⁰ The fact that the locomotive whistle was not blown or the bell rung is not sufficient in itself to establish freedom from contributory negligence of a person who was injured by a collision with a train ceased had the reputation of being a careful and competent engineer, and of being a sober man, was admissible. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Prickett, 210 Ill. 140, 71 N. E. 435.

The fact that there was no eyewitness to an accident will not prevent the plaintiff from recovering, since he is not bound to show by direct evidence that the deceased was free from negligence, and freedom from fault may appear from testimony showing the age and condition of life of the decedent, his general constitution, habits, and surroundings, that he was lawfully at the place of the accident, that he was not intoxicated at the time, and was, on the contrary, in full possession of his faculties. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Keely, 103 Ill. App. 205.

⁷⁹ On the question of due care of a person killed at a railroad crossing, evidence as to the careful habits of the deceased may be aided by the presumption of the instinct of self-preservation in persons possessed of their natural faculties. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Wilson, 225 Ill. 50, 116 Am. St. Rep. 102, 80 N. E. 56.

In Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Howard, 124 Ind. 280, 8 L.R.A. 503, 19 Am. St. Rep. 96, 24 N. E. 892, an action to recover for injuries received by plaintiff by being struck by a railroad train at a highway crossing, an instruction that, if all of the circumstances under which the injury occurred were put in evidence, and, upon an examination of them, nothing was found in acts or omissions showing contributory negligence, or ground for suspecting or inferring such negligence, on the part of the plaintiff, the inference of care upon her part might be drawn from the absence of all appearance of fault, either positive or negative, on the part of the plaintiff, in the circumstances under which the injury was received; that, in considering the question of due care on her part, the jury had the right to take into consideration, together with the other facts and circumstances in the case, the instinct of self-preservation and the known and ordinary disposition of all persons to guard themselves against danger,—was held erroneous, since it told the jury substantially that if there was nothing in the evidence tending to show contributory negligence, the jury might, without proof, infer that there was no such negligence.

But in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Kief, 111 Ill. App. 354, it was held that an instruction that the jury might take into consideration, with other facts, the instinct and assumptions which naturally lead men to avoid injury and preserve their own lives, was erroneous where there were evidences to the accident.

So, a bill of exceptions which did not aver that there was evidence tending to prove due care and caution, or tending to prove facts from which due care and caution could reasonably be inferred, was not to present a case upon which judgment for the plaintiff could be sustained. Jones v. Illinois C. R. Co. 106 Ill. 597.

A verdict for the plaintiff in an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing cannot be supported by evidence that the deceased was run over and killed by the defendant's engine at a crossing in a deep cut, where the engine was behind time, running at an unusual and dangerous rate of speed, and approached the crossing coming down a grade without the sound of a whistle bell, as required by statute, since it does not affirmatively appear, either by direct or circumstantial evidence, that the deceased was free from contributory fault. Ind. B. & W. R. Co. v. Greene, 106 Ind. 55 Am. Rep. 736, 6 N. E. 603.

⁸² In an action to recover for the death of a boy caught in unguarded cogwheels, no person having seen the accident, and no witness having informed the court that it happened that the boy became entangled in the cogwheels, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, since there was no affirmative evidence, either by direct evidence or by legitimate inference from any evidence in the case, that he was in the exercise of due care, and did not negligently contribute to the injury. Cunningham v. Bath Iron Works, 92 Me. 501, 43 Atl. 106. The court said that the intestate was not wholly passive in the defendant's care at the time of the injury, like a passenger seated in a railway car at the time of a collision. He was himself in the exercise of an active agency of his own, involving a right and duty to regulate and control his movements in such a manner that no fault of care on his part should contribute to his injury.

care and circumspection properly to be demanded from one in his situation, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover.⁸³

The doctrine that there must be proof of some circumstances besides the accident itself, to establish freedom from contributory negligence, has also been applied in the case of a brakeman who, in some unknown manner, fell off of the cars and was killed;⁸⁴ of a track inspector killed while operating a tricycle on the car tracks;⁸⁵ of a watchman who fell into an open area way;⁸⁶ of a person hurt by slipping on the ground at a place where the boards of a sidewalk had been removed;⁸⁷ of a person who fell off of a bridge in the night;⁸⁸ of a pedestrian killed on a railroad track;⁸⁹ of a person who fell at night into an exca-

⁸⁴ In an action to recover for the death of a brakeman killed by falling off of the cars, it was held, where the evidence was such that it was impossible to tell how the intestate fell from the cars, or what he was doing at the time, that the plaintiff could not recover. Corcoran v. Boston & A. R. Co. 133 Mass. 507.

⁸⁵ Where a track inspector was operating a tricycle on the tracks of defendant, and was last seen alive driving the vehicle about five minutes ahead of a train which struck and killed him, but there was no evidence of what he was doing at the time he was struck, it was held that there was not sufficient evidence that he was exercising due care at the time of the accident. Tyndale v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 503, 31 N. E. 655.

⁸⁶ In an action brought to recover for the death of a watchman who fell into an open area way, in the nighttime, in an alley with which he was familiar, and the evidence did not show how the accident happened, and there was no plausible theory which would account for it, it was held that the plaintiff had furnished no proof from which freedom of the deceased from fault could be determined, and that therefore there could be no recovery. Bond v. Smith, 113 N. Y. 378, 21 N. E. 128.

⁸⁷ In an action to recover for injuries received by slipping on the ground at a place where the boards of a sidewalk had been removed, it was held that where there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff exercised any care or took any precaution, or in any way walked or attempted to walk over the place in question in any different manner from what she did over the sidewalk that had not been removed, there was no testimony from which freedom from contributory negligence could be shown, which was fatal to recovery. Neddo v. Ticonderoga, 77 Hun, 524, 60 N. Y. S. R. 344, 28 N. Y. Supp. 887, affirmed in 148 N. Y. 735, 42 N. E. 724.

Likewise, where it appeared that a careful, prudent, and healthy man left his home at 2 o'clock in the afternoon in December, and that his body was found early the next morning at a street corner about 3 or 4 feet from the sidewalk, the body lying face downward on the ground and frozen stiff, the nose flattened somewhat, apparently from the pressure against the ground, and the theory was that the deceased met his death by falling on account of a defective sidewalk, it was held that there was no evidence from which due care on his part could be inferred, no person having seen him at the time of his death. Chicago v. Carlin, 141 Ill. App. 118.

⁸⁸ In an action brought to recover for the death of a man killed by falling off of a bridge, where it appeared that there was no railing on the bridge, and that the night of the accident was dark, and that the deceased was familiar with the place and presumably knew of its dangerous character, and he was found at the foot of an abutment of the bridge suffering from injuries in consequence of which he died, it was held that there was no evidence showing freedom from contributory negligence, and that this was fatal to plaintiff's recovery. Peaslee v. Chatham, 69 Hun, 389, 52 N. Y. S. R. 695, 23 N. Y. Supp. 628.

⁸⁹ Where it appeared that the deceased was using the railroad tracks as a highway, at a locality with which he was familiar with the movement of trains, and that he stepped into the opening between two cars to avoid a train, and then stepped out upon a parallel track and was almost immediately killed, and there was no evidence that he looked or listened to see if there were any approaching trains while he was on the track, and, if so, how many, it was held that there was no evidence from which freedom from contributory negligence could be inferred. Ryan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 17 App. Div. 221, 45 N. Y. Supp. 542.

Similarly, where the theory of the plaintiff's case was that the deceased, for whose death the action was brought, was struck by a south-bound passenger train at a street crossing, and the only evidence was that the deceased and a companion had left a near-by clubhouse and proceeded towards the crossing, but just before the approach of the passenger train, two men were seen standing at the crossing in the dark, one of them looking in the direction from which the train was coming, and that afterwards the body of the deceased was found a few feet north of the crossing, it was held that there was no evidence from which freedom from contributory negligence could be found, it being a physical impossibility that a man standing at a crossing and struck by a south-bound train could be found immediately after the accident north of the crossing. Meinrenken v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 92 App. Div. 618, 86 N. Y. Supp. 1075.

In an action to recover for the death of a boy run over by a horse car, the plainvation in a street;⁹⁰ of one who fell through a skylight in the roof of a building;⁹¹ of a servant who was caught in the endless chain of coal conveyer;⁹² and of a traveler who slipped on icy steps.⁹³ Very slight circumstances, however, in connection with the happening of the accident, may be sufficient to warrant the inference that the person injured was in the exercise of due care. Where, for instance, although no one saw the accident, the evidence warranted the belief that the deceased, an engineer, fell from the footboard while in the act of oiling the engine when in motion, and was killed, and it appeared that the deceased was a competent and careful engineer, and there was some evidence tending to show that the engine could not well be oiled, on account of its peculiar construction, except when in motion, and there would have been no danger in so doing if the footboard had been in order, and that this was the usual mode of oiling the engine, and that the deceased was seen a few moments before the accident in the observance of due care, it was held that it could not be maintained that there was an entire want of evidence to sustain the averment of the declaration that the deceased used due care and diligence for his personal safety.⁹⁴ A distinctiff having rested his case without giving any evidence of the manner in which the accident occurred, none of his witnesses having seen the boy until he was under the horse's feet or beneath the car, it was held that there could be no recovery. Squire v. Central Park, N. & E. R. Co. 4 Jones & S. 436.

⁹⁰ In an action brought to recover for the death of a person who fell at night into an excavation in a street with which she was familiar, and there was no testimony whatever showing directly what care or caution she exercised in approaching the excavation, or showing any circumstance from which absence of negligence on her part might be presumed, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover. Caven v. Troy, 32 App. Div. 154, 52 N. Y. Supp. 804.

⁹¹ Where the deceased was hired to work in a hotel, and was directed to go to the cleaning girl's room on the roof, and was told where to go to receive instructions as to the location of the room, and in some manner, after reaching the roof, fell through a skylight in a different part of the roof from that in which she would naturally go to reach the cleaning room, and was killed, it was held that there were no circumstances from which freedom from contributory negligence could be inferred. Kane v. Whitaker, 33 App. Div. 416, 54 N. Y. Supp. 85.

And where a workman fell from an elevator into a shaft leading to a tunnel, and the theory of the plaintiff was that the fall was caused by the absence of a guard rail on one side of the car, but there was no evidence that anyone saw the accident, so that the manner of his exit from the cage was unknown, it was held that plaintiff could not recover. Conlin v. Rogers, 39 N. Y. S. R. 51, 14 N. Y. Supp. 782.

⁹³ Where the evidence was that the person for whose death the action was brought was seen to ascend the icy steps of an elevated railroad station until he had reached a spot within three or four steps of the upper platform, when he stopped, leaned against a low rail, and fell over sidewise across the rail, it was held there could be no recovery, there being no fact bearing upon the question of contributory negligence upon which to go to the jury. McMahon v. New York Elev. R. Co. 18 Jones & S. 507.

⁹⁴ Missouri Furnace Co. v. Abend, 107 Ill. 44, 47 Am. Rep. 425.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Cozby, 174 Ill. 109, 50 N. E. 1011, it was held that it did not follow that there was no evidence tending to show that a switchman who was run over and killed was, at the time of the accident, in the exercise of due care, because of the fact that no witness saw the deceased at the moment he was run over and killed, where there was evidence to show that he was a sober, temperate man, was very careful, was possessed of all of his faculties, eyes, hearing, limbs, sight, and body, and that he was young and active, that he was in the discharge of his duties in obedience to the orders of his superior, and was discharging them in the ordinary and customary mode. The court said that ordinary care could be established by circumstantial as well as direct evidence.

In Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Beaver, 199 Ill. 36, 65 N. E. 144, an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, it was held that it could not be said that the evidence did not warrant the inference that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was in the exercise of due care, where it appeared that there was no eyewitness to the killing, and the proof showed that the deceased was nineteen years of age, in good health, and in full possession of all his mental faculties, was going home when he was killed, was a member of a temperance society, and shortly before the accident was seen by several persons and appeared to be in a normal condition; where, for a number of years he had lived in the vicinity of the crossing, was familiar with the surroundings, knew when trains were due to pass, the train running over him being an extra work train, and where it also appeared that the whistle was not blown or the bell of the tion has been suggested between injuries to passengers while seated peaceably in a conveyance, and injuries to other persons, with respect to the evidence necessary to establish freedom from contributory negligence. In the case of an injury to a passenger under such circumstances, it would seem that mere proof of the accident, showing the negligence of the defendant, would be sufficient.⁹⁵

The practical question, of course, in all these cases, is whether the circumstances in evidence are sufficient to establish or make a prima facie case of absence of contributory negligence, and these facts vary with every case. In an action to recover damages for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, where there was no witness to the accident, it was held that freedom from contributory negligence could be inferred from evidence that the deceased started about midnight to walk towards the crossing, in the direction of his home, and that he was sober, and that the situation of the cars standing near the crossing would not have led one to think they were suddenly to be moved across the street.⁹⁶ In an action to recover for injuries due to locomotive sounded within half a mile of the crossing, and that the view of approaching trains was obstructed.

And where an experienced brakeman of good habits was last seen alive in the proper performance of his duties, and a moment later the train broke in two, and he, in some unknown manner, fell between the cars and was killed, it was held that it could not be said that there was no evidence which authorized the court to submit the question of due care on the part of the deceased to the jury, who had the right to consider all the circumstances, including the known habits of the deceased and the instinct of self-preservation, with which all men are imbued. The court declared that if the cause or manner of the death was wholly unknown, it might be that a different rule would prevail. Burns v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 450, 58 Am. Rep. 227, 30 N. W. 25.

In an action to recover for the death of a steamship engine oiler, caused by the fact that a bonnet and stem of a cushion valve blew out from the seat, it cannot be said that there was no proof that the deceased was free from contributory negligence, where the evidence discloses that he was in the ordinary performance of his duty at the time of the accident, which he had no reason to anticipate, and that he was seen stretching his hand up towards a throttle valve but a moment before the happening of the accident, which it was necessary for him to do in order to turn on the steam, and that then, in a moment, the rushing sound of steam was heard. Hoes v. Ocean S. S. Co. 56 App. Div. 259, 67 N. Y. Supp. 782.

bring about or prevent such an accident. In the case of the engineer or conductor of the train, or in the case of any person who might be exercising any active agency in the matter, such freedom from fault would not be apparent. So, in a disaster to an unseaworthy ship, a person on board shown by the evidence to be merely passive in the place assigned to him would affirmatively appear to be without fault, while other persons on board not shown by the evidence to be merely passive in their proper places would need to show by other evidence their freedom from fault."

So, the circumstances may sometimes show that a person killed by the negligence of another was in the exercise of due care, as in the case of a passenger injured by the negligence of a railroad company while sitting in his seat doing nothing. In the absence of affirmative evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, himself being an actor, as where one is struck at a railroad crossing, exercised on his part the care and effort incumbent on him to avoid the injury, he cannot maintain his suit. Day v. Boston & M. R. Co. 96 Me. 207, 90 Am. St. Rep. 335, 52 Atl. 771.

But in Dickey v. Maine Teleg. Co. 43 Me. 492, a passenger, in a stagecoach injured by the overturning of the coach, caused by striking a wire stretched across a highway, was held bound to show affirmatively the exercise of due and proper care and vigilance on his part. The point, however, discussed in the preceding cases, was not discussed, and the decision turned upon the imputable negligence of the driver.

In an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, no one having seen the accident, evidence that the engineer saw the body of the deceased roll off the pilot of his engine, that the tracks were somewhat obstructed by the position of another train, that the deceased was seen a moment before he was struck standing on the crossing between the rails of the track on which the engine which struck him was approaching, that the deceased was a sober, good, hard-working man, strong and sound, and that he was evidently attempting to cross the track at the time of the accident, for the purpose of reaching his home, was held sufficient escaping gas, it appeared that the plaintiff, who was too young to testify, was found insensible by the dead body of his mother, in the morning, when the room in which they slept was broken open. The gas had escaped from a crack in the pipe laid by the defendant through the street. There were no gas fixtures in the room, and no evidence that the plaintiff or his mother had notice of escaping gas, or were conscious of its presence in the room in time to leave or to take any precautions to prevent the consequences by opening doors or windows. There was evidence that, on the day before the accident, there was no smell of gas in the street, and there was also evidence that the mother was a sober and prudent woman. It was held that the jury might well have found that the crack in the pipe and the escape of gas first occurred some time during the night of the accident; and that would be justified in finding that neither the plaintiff nor his mother was charged with want of ordinary care in preventing or escaping the result.⁹⁷ Where the trolley on an electric car filled with passengers exploded, and the flames shot out and seemed to envelop the whole car, the passengers rushed to escape as a witness said, "All seemed to be leaping from the car in every direction"), and the plaintiff immediately afterwards was found unconscious on the ground at the rear of the car, and afterwards neither she nor her husband was able to tell how they got out of the car, it was held that there was no support for the inference of due care. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Nowicki, 148 Ill. 29, 35 N. E. 358.

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Gunderson, 174 Ill. 495, 51 N. E. 708, where a man was killed at a railroad crossing, and no person saw the accident, it was held that freedom from contributory negligence on the part of the deceased could be inferred from the fact that, at the time of the accident, he was waiting for a freight train to pass by, which would naturally attract his attention; that he could not see very far to the east, from which direction another train was approaching at an unlawful rate of speed; and that there was no evidence that the deceased knew this extra train was running at that time and at that speed; there being full proof that the deceased was a steady, sober, and industrious man, in good health, and so situated that it was fairly inferable that the instinct of self-preservation was as strong in him as in other men.

In Pruey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 41 App. Div. 158, 58 N. Y. Supp. 797, affirmed in 166 N. Y. 616, 59 N. E. 1129, it was held that freedom from contributory negligence could be inferred in a crossing accident case, from the darkness of the morning at the time of the accident, the moist condition of the atmosphere, the approach of the engine upon a wet track without light and without giving customary signals, the presence of a strong wind and the rumble of a freight train, although there was no evidence that the deceased looked and listened as he approached the crossing.

That there was no eyewitness to the killing of a person attempting to cross railroad tracks at a highway crossing does not necessarily preclude recovery on the theory that the deceased, by looking in the direction from which the train came, might have seen it in time to avoid the accident, where it appeared that the deceased was an educated, temperate man, forty-five years old, of good physical capacity, with good eyesight and hearing, and careful and cautious in disposition and temperament and was, at the time of the accident, walking across a railroad track upon a plank in the nighttime, and was struck by an express train masked from him both by freight cars and an abrupt curve which rushed upon him at a high rate of speed without warning. Woodworth v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 55 App. Div. 23, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1072.

Where it was one of the duties of a laborer to sweep grain which had fallen from cars that were being unloaded from the track, and when last seen alive, he was taken a broom apparently for this purpose, and disappeared, and a few minutes afterwards standing cars beside which he had to work were forcibly struck by a freight car, and after the accident, the laborer was found dead near the track, with the broom, it was held that these circumstances were sufficient from which to infer that the deceased was in the exercise of due care. Maguire v. Fitchburg R. Co. 158 Mass. 379, 15 N. E. 904. The court held that while due care must be shown by the plaintiff, in order that it may be seen that an injury to him was not occasioned by contributory negligence on his part, it is not necessary that any positive act of care shall be proved. It may be inferred from mere absence of fault, when such circumstances are shown fairly to exclude the idea of negligence on his part. A person is in the place where he may be fully engaged in duties which he is properly there to perform, under circumstances which do not require the exercise of special caution on his part against the acts or negligence of others, he is in the exercise of due care. A passenger sitting quietly in his seat in a railroad car is so far as relates to the management of the train, in the exercise of due care. When laborers are set to work upon a railroad track upon the assurance, expressly or implied, that the use of such track is suspended, they are not guilty of negligence if they continue their work without constantly watching for coming trains.

dence from which due care could be inferred, it not being expected that she could, under the circumstances, act with deliberation.⁹⁸ And where the evidence and the answer established the fact that a brakeman, in the discharge of his duty, mounted a ladder on a car, taking hold of a round which, owing to an old break, easily discoverable by the defendant if an inspection had been made, and not seen by the deceased on account of the darkness of the night and the necessary haste of its use, gave way, causing him to fall and be crushed by the train,—this was held necessarily to negative carelessness on the part of the deceased.⁹⁹

In the following cases the circumstantial evidence of freedom from contributory negligence has been held insufficient to satisfy plaintiff's burden: Where the evidence was that the deceased approached a railroad crossing with a small shawl over her head ⁹⁸ Beattie v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 201 Mass. 3, 86 N. E. 920.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff, as she was about to alight from the rear platform of a street car, requested the conductor to wait a moment for a team to pass, which was approaching at a high rate of speed on the side of the car on which she was, and that after it had passed, as she was putting one foot from the lower step to the ground, she was injured by the sudden starting of the car, it was held that there was evidence from which the jury would be warranted in finding that she was in the exercise of due care. Hutchins v. Macomber, 68 N. H. 473, 44 Atl. 602.

In an action to recover for injuries received from contact with an electric wire which had fallen to the ground, the plaintiff, who was the only witness of the accident, testified that his horse had fallen down in the street, and that he was unable to bring it into action with the reins, that he stepped down from the wagon in which he was seated, in the early morning light, with no reason to expect the electric light wires to be in the way, and came in contact with the wire with his feet, receiving a shock which rendered him unconscious. It was held that these circumstances were sufficient from which to infer freedom from contributory negligence, and that it was immaterial that he was found with the wire between his fingers. Wolpers v. New York & Q. Electric Light & P. Co. 91 App. Div. 424, 86 N. Y. Supp. 845.

Freedom from contributory negligence might be inferred, it was held, from the circumstances that the plaintiff—a woman forty-three years of age, who was thrown from a wagon in which she was riding, by the wheels striking against stones in the highway,—was, at the time of the accident, with her husband in the wagon, which was drawn by a single horse that was gentle and had never run away, and that they were driving down a steep hill with the brake applied to the wheels, that the plaintiff was looking ahead when the wheel on the husband's side of the wagon struck a stone, and she was tipped forward, and that, before she could gather herself up, the wagon struck a second time, and she was thrown to the ground and severely injured. Newell v. Stony Point, 59 App. Div. 237, 69 N. Y. Supp. 583.

⁹⁹ Jones v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 10 Abb. N. C. 200.

In Hart v. Hudson River Bridge Co. 80 N. Y. 622, the person for whose death the action was brought fell off of a bridge and was drowned. The trial court reversed on the ground that due care on the part of the plaintiff had not been shown. The court of appeals held that there had been. Commenting on his case, Westbrook, J., in Jones v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra, said that the action was tried before himself, and that the plaintiff was nonsuited, because, as he supposed, there was an entire absence of proof to show how the deceased fell, if she fell at all, through the open draw of the defendant's bridge, and, consequently, the freedom of the deceased from contributory negligence was entirely unproved. The appellate tribunal must, therefore, have reached the conclusion that the only facts which were shown, to wit, the starting of the deceased from East Albany to return to Albany in time to reach the open draw, the splashing as of something falling in the river, the wetting of the pier above the surface of the water, and the spot where the body was found, were sufficient to take it to the jury, and if sufficient for that purpose, then, of course, they were also ample to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff if one had been so found.

In an action to recover for the death of a person who, while skating, broke through the ice on a river and was drowned, the evidence being that there were two cuttings where the ice had again formed and become thick enough to bear up a person skating, but that upon a third the ice was only three quarters of an inch thick, and that it was while skating upon this ice that the accident happened, and that the ice on all of the cuttings was of the same color,—it was held that the circumstances were sufficient to support the inference that the deceased was in the exercise of due care, a statute requiring persons engaged in cutting ice to guard the cuttings by a sufficient fence until the ice which reformed had attained a thickness of 6 inches; and it was held immaterial that the deceased knew that he was skating on an ice cutting, it not being shown that he knew that the ice was unsafe. Sickles v. New Jersey Ice Co. 80 Hun, 213, 61 N. Y. S. R. 761, 30 N. Y. Supp. 10. But this case was reversed in 153 N. Y. 83, 46 N. E. 1042, on the ground that the facts showed contributory negligence.

and ears, and there was not the slightest evidence that she looked up or down the track before attempting to cross, or stopped or listened, and the only evidence offered was that she appeared to be looking directly in front of her, and where it appeared that the track on which the train came that killed her was free to observation for at least 700 feet from a point on the highway 8 feet from the nearest track, it was held that freedom from contributory negligence had not been shown.¹⁰⁰ On a dark, foggy night a brakeman was sent back from the engine over the top of a moving train of freight cars, to see if any part of the train had broken apart. That was the last seen of him alive. The train had, in fact, broken in two, and his dead body was found in the center of the track between the rails, and there were indications that he had struck on his feet between the tracks, and that he had been run over by that part of the train which was detached from the engine. It was held, in an action to recover for his death, that the plaintiff had failed to sustain the burden of showing due care.¹ Where one of the crew of a vessel lying at anchor was drowned, but no one saw the accident, the theory as to the cause of his death being that he fell through an improperly guarded gangway,—there being no direct evidence, however, that this was the fact, or that his exit from the ship was acci-

¹⁰⁰ Rodrian v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 526, 26 N. E. 741, reversing 55 Hun. 606, 28 N. Y. S. R. 625, 7 N. Y. Supp. 811.

In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bennett, 9 Ind. App. 92, 35 N. E. 1033, an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, the circumstances surrounding the accident were not proved. No one saw the deceased immediately before or at the time he was struck. His body was found near the street crossing, the face and forehead cut and bruised, the left shoulder crushed, and the neck broken. How he reached the point where he met his death the evidence did not disclose. There was evidence from which it might have been found that he was sitting stupefied by intoxication on the end of a cross-tie, or from which the jury might have found that he was not intoxicated. It also appeared that there was an unobstructed view of approaching trains of fully 930 feet from the crossing. The court held that this evidence did not show that the deceased was free from contributory negligence.

The mere fact that there was a change in the gait of a horse approaching a crossing, from a trot to a walk, does not warrant the inference that the person driving looked and listened for an approaching train, so that it may be said that the plaintiff has sustained the burden which the law puts upon him of establishing freedom from contributory negligence on the part of the driver, who was killed by a collision with a train. McSweeney v. Erie R. Co. 93 App. Div. 496, 87 N. Y. Supp. 836.

So, where the person for whose death the action was brought was driving four horses attached to an empty stone wagon, over a railroad track where the highway crossed at an acute angle, and the testimony presented by the plaintiff showed that the deceased had a clear and unobstructed view of the approaching train for more than a hundred feet from the crossing, if he had turned and looked partially backward, and that his horses were gentle and could have been stopped quickly, it was held that there could be no recovery.

McAuliffe v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 85 App. Div. 187, 83 N. Y. Supp. 200.

In Seidman v. Long Island R. Co. 104 App. Div. 4, 93 N. Y. Supp. 209, a crossing accident case, it is said that it is only where the accident results in death, and there are no eyewitnesses of the occurrence, that it has been held in New York that freedom from contributory negligence may be established by circumstantial evidence. "I know of no authority," said Hirschberg, P. J., "for the proposition that a plaintiff, other than the representative of a deceased person, can successfully support the burden of proof upon this subject without some direct evidence that he did not, in fact, see the threatened and apprehended danger. Where sight is impossible for any reason, and the person subsequently injured has failed to look because of that circumstance, or where the danger is so remote that, if seen, it might nevertheless be disregarded in the exercise of proper care, the rule, of course, is otherwise; but in this case, it was undisputed that the track was straight and unobstructed for many hundred feet, and there was an abundance of proof to the effect that the day was clear and the vision wholly unobscured, and, the plaintiff having actually looked for the train, the noise of which he concededly heard, I think it was incumbent upon him to testify expressly as to whether or not he saw it, rather than to leave that essential fact to be determined by deduction or conjecture."

In an action to recover for the death of a switchman supposed to have been killed while riding on a moving car, by striking a switch, it appeared that the deceased was seen walking towards the car with a lantern, to get a ride. When the car was opposite the switch, a bang was heard, and the switch shook, and the light on top of it went out. The deceased was found fatally injured, on the track with his lighted lantern on his arm, 10 or 12 feet from the switch, and on the opposite side of it from the point where he was last seen before the accident. Other evidence dental,—it was held that there could be no recovery.²

In an action to recover for injuries received by a collision between a car and a vehicle driven on the street, it appearing that the plaintiff was driving upon the tracks of a street surface railway operated by electricity, in a suburban community with which he was familiar, where he knew the cars must approach him from the rear, and that he was passing down a grade, where it was more difficult to stop a car than would have been the case on level ground or where the grade was running the other way, it was held freedom from contributory negligence could not be inferred from these facts, in the absence of direct evidence upon the point, and that therefore a nonsuit should have been granted.³

And where it was the duty of an office

showed that the deceased had probably struck the switch while he was riding on the car, but nothing further appeared to show how the accident happened. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover, because he had failed to show that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was in the exercise of due care. Dacey v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 168 Mass. 479, 17 N. E. 418.

Where it was the duty of the person for whose death the action was brought, to place oil or grease in cups above the bearing of a large pulley wheel, and the only evidence touching on the accident was that shortly before his death he was seen with a pail in his hand getting grease with which to perform this duty, and, a little later, part of his body was found on a platform near the shafting and between the shafting and the grease barrel, and the rest in the bottom of the pit underneath the large pulley wheel and on the inside of the rim of the wheel; that the grease pail was standing on the platform on the other side of the shafting from that on which the body was found; and that the guard rail which had been in front of and protecting the large wheel was found on the floor of the room, torn forcibly from its fastening,—it was held that there was insufficient evidence from which the deceased's freedom from fault could be inferred. Wilson v. New York Mills, 107 App. Div. 99, 94 N. Y. Supp. 1090.

In an action to recover for the death of an engineer, alleged to have been caused by the defective condition of the engine and floors of defendant's electric light works, where the only evidence offered by the plaintiff was that the deceased was found dead on the floor of the engine room in a passageway, between the rapidly revolving fly wheel and the wall of the building, with the top of his skull cut off, which indicated that he was probably struck by the fly wheel or some of its attachments, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, since there was no evidence to show that the deceased, at the time of the accident, was in the exercise of due care. McCarty v. Clinton Gaslight Co. 193 Mass. 76, 78 N. E. 739.

In McLane v. Perkins, 92 Me. 39, 43 L.R.A. 487, 42 Atl. 255, it appeared that a master sent a number of servants in a small leaky boat or punt, up a river at night in order to raft and send logs down to a mill. Nothing was seen after they left the shore to indicate their position, except a light from a lantern apparently moving along the surface of the water at about the position they were supposed to be, and this finally disappeared. There were no cries or anything to indicate a disaster, but several days afterwards their bodies were found at various places along the shore, and the evidence was sufficient to indicate that they came to their deaths by drowning a short time after they set out. It was held that these circumstances were not sufficient to warrant the inference of freedom from contributory negligence.

Where a servant fell into a vat of superheated tanning fluid, and was so severely scalded that he died, the evidence showed that the plank over the vat and upon which he was standing, in some manner, slipped and let him in. There being no other evidence of how the accident happened, it was held that the plaintiff, in an action to recover for the servant's death, had not shown freedom of the deceased from contributory negligence. Scheir v. Quirin, 77 App. Div. 624, 78 N. Y. Supp. 956, affirmed in 177 N. Y. 568, 69 N. E. 1125.

In an action to recover for the death of a woman suffocated by illuminating gas, it was the theory of the plaintiff that when the deceased retired she left the gas burning, and that, by reason of certain repairs in the mains by employees of the defendant, of which the deceased had no notice, the pressure was removed so as to cause the light to go out, and then shortly afterwards reasserted itself so as to cause the gas to flow unlighted from the open fixture. The deceased was last seen alive late in the evening of a Saturday night. She had spent the evening with the sister of a man to whom she was engaged to be married, and had left the house very happy. The acts of negligence complained of happened at 7 o'clock the next morning. Somewhere between half past 8 and 9 o'clock on that morning, the deceased was found in bed in her room partially dressed and almost wholly unconscious, the gas escaping from the open cock and the room being filled with gas. She died without having regained consciousness. It was held that the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence had not been sustained by the plaintiff. Hamma v. Haverhill Gaslight Co. 203 Mass. 572, 89 N. E. 1043.

In an action to recover for the death of boy at the end of a day's work to load the office books upon a truck, and take them to a vault in the basement by means of a freight elevator, and he was found dead at 6:30 o'clock, at the bottom of the shaft, while the elevator was at the top, and all the evidence as to how the accident happened was that the elevator had been left at the bottom of the shaft half an hour before, and that there was blood on the door leading to the elevator and above, and that the plaster above was cracked, indicating that the deceased had been crushed between the elevator platform and the wall, it was held that there was not sufficient proof of freedom from fault on the part of the deceased to warrant recovery.⁴

So, in an action brought to recover for a person killed by a street car, where it appeared from the plaintiff's evidence that the deceased was not seen for several minutes before the accident, that when last seen he was on the north side of the road, and when found dead, he was on the south side across the track, it was held that it was purely conjectural whether the deceased was in the exercise of due diligence or not, and that therefore the plaintiff could not recover. Cox v. South Shore & B. Street R. Co. 182 Mass. 497, 65 N. E. 823. The court said: "What he did in the meantime, what care he exercised, whether he tried to cross the tracks in front of an approaching car and fell, whether he stood too near the track with the intention of boarding the car, whether he was seized with an attack of heart disease or vertigo, are all matters upon which there is no evidence."

In an action to recover for the death of a passenger thrown off of the front platform of a car while rounding a curve, it was held that freedom of the deceased from contributory negligence could not be inferred, from the fact that he left the interior of the car where he was perfectly safe, and took a place upon the platform. Bruce v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 68 App. Div. 242, 74 N. Y. Supp. 324.

And where a woman started on an errand to a railroad station, and went upon the railroad tracks in the nighttime, and was struck and killed, and it appeared that she was seen by the engineer just before the accident, erect and facing the locomotive, between the rails of the track on which it was approaching her, and there was no evidence as to her acts or thoughts from the time when she started on the errand until the instant before she was struck, it was held that there was not enough evidence from which freedom from contributory negligence could be inferred. Moore v. Boston & A. R. Co. 159 Mass. 399, 34 N. E. 366.

Although recovery is permitted in some cases for negligence causing death, without positive evidence of eyewitnesses as to the conduct of the deceased at the time of the the death of a person, alleged to have been due to negligence of a town in the maintenance of a highway, where no one saw the accident, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, the evidence being such as to leave no doubt that he undertook to drive with a horse and pung over a road across which was flowing at the time a stream of water 30 or 40 rods wide, and in some places not less than 3 feet deep, with a current moving at the rate of 5 miles an hour, and carrying upon its surface cakes of ice, some of which were 25 or 30 feet in diameter; and that at some stage of his journey, and in some way, he and his horse got out of the road, and were precipitated into the deeper channel of the river below, and drowned. A direction for the defend-accident, it was held that this could not be done where plaintiff's husband, a bicycle rider, who was killed at night on the tracks of a street railroad company, was shown to have been, shortly before the accident, not in a condition to proceed with safety upon a bicycle along a street occupied in part by a street railway. Chicago North Shore R. Co. v. Green, 93 Ill. App. 105.

Where the deceased, a woman twenty-six years of age, in good health and in full possession of her faculties, was seen to step from a drawbridge to the stationary part of the bridge, with which she was familiar, just before the draw began to swing open, and then was seen to walk a few feet to the gate, which had been closed, and then to turn back and walk toward the open space, and was heard to scream, and was found dead in the river a few hours later, it was held that the circumstances were not sufficient from which to draw the inference of freedom from contributory negligence. *Murray v. Where a telephone employee was killed by an electric current while adjusting a wire connecting the house of a subscriber with the main line, and there was no evidence as to his movements just before he received the shock, the only witness testifying as to his conduct having seen him ascend the pole until he disappeared from view in the foliage, and having heard him calling the office and talking with the operator after he had evidently made the connection and having immediately afterwards heard an outcry of distress, and having seen the deceased falling through the branches of the trees to the ground, it was held that there was not enough evidence to warrant invoking the rule that due care may be proved if enough circumstances appear from which the jury can infer that nothing in the conduct of the plaintiff or his intestate contributed to his injury. French v. Sabin, 202 Mass. 240, 88 N. E. 845.

d. Comparative negligence.

The cases establishing the doctrine of comparative negligence hold that there must be fault on the part of the defendant, and no want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff; but that where there is fault on both sides, the plaintiff may in some cases recover; as where it appears that his negligence is slight, and that the negligence of the defendant is gross. This rule holds even when the slight negligence of the plaintiff in some degree contributes to the injury.⁹ It will be seen that even where this doctrine prevails, the injured person may be guilty of such negligence as will defeat his right of action, and as to such negligence the plaintiff would still have the burden of proof.¹⁰ But the doctrine of comparative negligence, once prevalent in Illinois, has been repudiated.¹¹

ant. The burden of proof, however, is on the plaintiff even in such case, to establish the freedom of plaintiff from such negligence as would defeat the action.

Under the doctrine of comparative negligence, the onus in establishing the relative degrees of negligence is not thrown on the defendant. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v.
Harwood, 90 Ill. 425.

The rule of comparative negligence has not changed or modified the general rule requiring the injured party, in order to recover for the negligence causing his injury, to observe due or ordinary care for his personal safety, and authorizing him to recover for such injuries where he has observed such care. Calumet Iron & Steel Co.

Ill. 581, 38 N. E. 946.

In North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Eldridge, 151 Ill. 542, 38 N. E. 246, an instruction that, as a matter of law, the burden of proof in a case in which the plaintiff was injured while attempting to step off of a car is upon the plaintiff, and that, if the negligence of the plaintiff and the defendant was equal, or nearly so, the verdict should be for the defendant, was held erroneous, the court stating that the doctrine of comparative negligence has been greatly modified, if not wholly repudiated, and that the rule which the court was committed to is that a plaintiff, before he can recover on the ground of mere negligence, must show that the injury of which he complains was caused by the negligence of the defendant, and that he himself, at the time, was in the exercise of ordinary care.

In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v.
Butler, 55 Ill. App. 594, where a servant was injured while standing on the step at the rear of a tender, it was held that an instruction that if the plaintiff was guilty of some negligence in riding where he did, still this would not prevent a recovery if the jury further believed from the evidence, that the negligence of the plaintiff

e. Pleading.1. In general.

In jurisdictions requiring the plaintiff to prove absence of contributory negligence, was slight as compared with the negligence of the defendant, and that the negligence of the defendant was gross, was erroneous, since the burden always rests with the plaintiff, when seeking to recover for an injury caused by the mere negligence of the defendant, to show that he exercised ordinary care.

But with the abrogation of the doctrine of comparative negligence, the old law was reinstated, and it was held that a party seeking to recover damages for negligence must show that his own negligence has not concurred with that of the other party in producing the injury. West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Boeker, 70 Ill. App. 67.

The plaintiff must allege not only the defendant's negligence in the act complained of, but he must allege that he was himself free from negligence contributing to the injury or loss for which he would recover. Richmond Gas Co. v. Baker, — Ind. —, 39 N. E. 552.

The declaration in an action for damages received by a person by driving against a public nuisance in a street must show that there was no fault on the plaintiff's part. Mt. Vernon v. Dusouchett, 2 Ind. 586, 54 Am. Dec. 467.

So, a complaint alleging that the plaintiff, a brakeman, was injured by a collision due to the carelessness of an incompetent engineer, of whose incompetency and carelessness the defendant had notice, was held insufficient for the reason that it contained no sufficient averments that the plaintiff did not by his own fault or negligence contribute to the injury received. *Evansville & C. In an action to recover for injuries due to the attack of a vicious dog, it is necessary that the plaintiff allege that he was without contributory negligence. William v. Moray, 74 Ind. 25, 39 Am. Rep. 76.

So, a complaint which alleged that the defendant so negligently constructed a fence across a stream that it caused the water to be dammed up, and to destroy property belonging to the plaintiff, was held bad for the reason that there was no allegation that the injury was sustained without the fault of the plaintiff, and there were no facts averred from which such freedom from negligence on the part of the plaintiff could be inferred. Stevens v. Lafayette & C. Gravel Road Co. 99 Ind. 392.

In an action to recover for injuries received by the bite of a savage dog, the complaint must allege that the plaintiff was without fault, or facts from which it can be inferred that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. Eberhart v. Kester, 96 Ind. 478.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Clough, 134 Ill. 586, 25 N. E. 664, 29 N. E. 184, it is said that if the declaration contains no allegation of due care and caution on the part of the plaintiff, the defendant, if he desires to avail himself of the omission, should either interpose a demurrer, or by other appropriate action call the attention of the court to the omission at some time before final judgment. The error may be cured by verdict.

And in Cahill v. Illinois C. R. Co. 137 Iowa, 577, 115 N. W. 216, it is declared that failure to allege freedom from contributory negligence may be cured by amendment after the statutory period for bringing the action has expired.

And in Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Then, 159 Ill. 535, 42 N. E. 971, affirming 59 Ill. App. 561, failure to plead freedom of plaintiff from contributory negligence was held cured by a verdict.

eral averment that an injury was inflicted without any fault or negligence on the part of the injured party is controlled by a statement of the specific facts and circumstances upon which the general averment is based.¹⁴ The averment must either be expressly made in the complaint that the injury occurred without the fault or negligence of the plaintiff, or it must clearly appear from the facts which are alleged that such must have been the case.¹⁵ If there be no general averment, but a statement of the facts in such a way as to exclude the presumption of contributory fault on plaintiff's part, this will be sufficient.¹⁶ It is, however, essential that it be clearly shown that the injured person was free from contributory negligence.¹⁷ In an action to recover for the death of a person run over by a locomotive, it has been held that an averment that the deceased was lawfully upon the track of the railroad does not satisfy the requirement;¹⁸ nor does the allegation that a passenger was killed in attempting to alight from a moving train at a station.¹⁹ Where the complaint

An allegation that plaintiff's injury was caused wholly by the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, and without the fault or negligence of the plaintiff, was held sufficiently to negative contributory negligence. Wilson v. Trafalgar & B. C. Gravel Road Co. 83 Ind. 326.

But an allegation that the plaintiff "has been in all things wholly blameless and without fault" is not a sufficient allegation of freedom from negligence at the particular time of the injury. Richmond Gas Co. v. Baker, — Ind. —, 39 N. E. 552.

If it be alleged that the injury occurred without the fault or negligence of the plaintiff, this averment will be sufficient, unless it plainly and clearly appear from the other facts stated, that the injury was produced by the fault or negligence of the plaintiff. Ft. Wayne v. De Witt, 47 Ind. 391.

If a complaint contain a general averment that the injury was received without any fault on the part of the plaintiff, it is sufficient in this respect, unless the facts pleaded make it appear, notwithstanding such general averment, that plaintiff's negligence contributed to the injury. *Lake Erie & W. ¹⁶ Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Hancock, 15 Ind. App. 104, 43 N. E. 659.

It was the settled law of Indiana before changed by statute, that where negligence is the issue, it must be a case of unmixed negligence, and that this must be made to appear by the complaint. This may be done by an averment that the plaintiff was without fault or negligence contributing to the loss or injury, or by such a statement of facts as show that he was thus without fault. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lockridge, 93 Ind. 191.

If he cannot set up such a combination of facts as show that he is free from negligence on his part, he must, by proper allegation, set up that the injury was caused by the wanton or wilful negligence of defendant, such as in law amounts to gross negligence and a reckless disregard of the consequences of his neglect. Denman v. Johnston, 85 Mich. 387, 48 N. W. 565.

¹⁸ Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Keely, 23 Ind. 133.

In Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Hancock, 15 Ind. App. 104, 43 N. E. 659, a crossing accident case, where there was no allegation concerning plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence, it was held that the allegation, "and without any fault or negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the said locomotive came in close proximity to said horse and plaintiff, while then and there attempting to cross railroad at said point, and frightened said horse, and caused him to turn around and upset or turn said buggy over, and throw plaintiff with great force and violence to the ground, fracturing her skull," and otherwise injuring her, was an insufficient allegation of facts to show freedom from contributory negligence within the rule.

¹⁹ Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Hendricks, 26 Ind. 228. The court said it is difficult to perceive upon what principle that fact alone can be regarded as any evidence that the passenger did not, by his own negligence, contribute to the injury. In many cases, the very nature of the casualty would doubtless afford prima facie evidence that the injury did not result from any fault of the passenger; but in such cases, the inference would be drawn rather from showed that the plaintiff, a passenger on defendant's railroad, on account of the crowded condition of the car, in company with several other passengers, with the permission of the conductor, got on the top or roof of one of the coaches, and, while the train was passing under a low bridge, was knocked off of the car and injured, it was held that these facts fell far short of showing freedom from contributory negligence, within the rule that such absence of fault may be inferred from the facts alleged, in the absence of a direct averment of freedom from contributory negligence.²⁰ And it was held that absence of such negligence on the part of the plaintiff did not clearly appear where it was set out in substance that it was the duty of the plaintiff to manage a certain hoisting apparatus, which had become damaged and broken in such a manner as to cause the cable passing over a pulley the cause producing the injury, than from the mere fact of the injury itself. But however this may be, the principle stated is one of evidence only, and not of pleading.

The rule that where there is no averment in the complaint of freedom of the plaintiff from contributory negligence, the facts stated must clearly show that he was without fault, is not satisfied by an allegation that the plaintiff, a passenger on defendant's train, had never been at a certain station where he was going before; that when the train arrived there it was dark, the wind blowing and the rain falling; that the train slackened its speed so that he could with safety have alighted therefrom had there been a suitable platform or place to receive him; that the conductor informed him that they had now arrived at such station and ordered him to alight; that he, in pursuance of such order and entirely relying on this instruction, stepped off of the train as directed; but, by reason of defendant having negligently failed to provide a suitable place for his reception, he fell and was thrown under the train, it appearing that the plaintiff was a man of mature age, presumed to have been in possession of all of his faculties. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. v. Peters, 80 Ind. 168.

And an allegation in a complaint that the defendant was a common carrier, and that on a certain day he undertook to carry the wife of the plaintiff, and that, by reason of the careless, negligent, and inefficient management of the horses and vehicle in which she was being carried, she was violently thrown from the vehicle and sustained great injuries, whereby plaintiff was damaged, etc., was held insufficient, it not being alleged that she was free from fault, and it not clearly and satisfactorily appearing from the facts pleaded that the injury occurred without contributory fault to run off and become entangled in the machinery and boxing about the same; that the defendant had neglected to repair the same, although promising to do so; that it was the plaintiff's duty to disentangle the rope whenever it ran off of the pulley; that he was injured while engaged in this work, without any fault whatever on his part as to the rope becoming entangled, or in his efforts to disentangle it.²¹

The allegation of freedom from contributory negligence must relate to and apply to the time and the act of the injury.²² And in an action to recover for damages by fire allowed to escape from a railroad, it is not enough to allege that the fire was suffered to escape through the negligence of the defendant, and without fault of the plaintiff, since this is not an averment that the loss resulted without any negligence of the plaintiff.²³

On the other hand, in an action to recover on her part. Wahl v. Shoulders, 14 Ind. App. 665, 43 N. E. 458.

²¹ Romona Oolitic Stone Co. v. Johnson, 6 Ind. App. 550, 33 N. E. 1000.

²² Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Arnold, 26 Ind. App. 190, 59 N. E. 394. In this case the action was brought to recover for injuries received by a passenger by being ejected from a train, and the averment in the complaint that the plaintiff was sitting quietly in his seat, that he said nothing offensive to anyone, and that he conducted himself in a proper manner, was held insufficient to show that he was free from fault, since it did not show what afterwards took place while he was on the platform of the car from which he was ejected, the complaint being silent as to the conduct of the plaintiff at the particular time that the alleged assault and battery occurred.

In an action to recover for damage to horses due to the breaking down of a defective bridge, allegation that the driver used due and ordinary care after the team and wagon were upon the bridge was held not equivalent to an allegation that the injury was caused without the fault or negligence of the plaintiff, since it does not show that the driver may not have been guilty of the grossest carelessness in driving upon the bridge in its defective condition. Riest v. Goshen, 42 Ind. 339.

²³ Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Johnson, 96 Ind. 40. The court said: "It is one thing to aver that the fire escaped without the negligence of the plaintiff, and quite another to show that he did not contribute to the injury, for his contribution may have been in some matter occurring before or after the fire was suffered to escape. It is not sufficient to show freedom from negligence on one point out of several; the care incumbent upon the plaintiff must extend to all points material to his cause of action."

damages for injuries to hotel property by the operation of a railroad, an allegation that the negligence of the defendant caused the building to jar and violently vibrate, so as to crack the brick walls and plastering, to loosen the same, to tear the wall paper, thereby greatly injuring and damaging the property by causing the walls to settle, become out of plumb and greatly weakened, was held sufficient to show absence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.²⁴

And in an action to recover for injuries received by a passenger due to the derailment of a train, an allegation that the defendant did not keep its road in good repair, but carelessly permitted a broken and defective rail resting on a rotten and defective cross-tie, to remain for a long time in a dangerous and unsafe condition, by means whereof the train of cars on which plaintiff was being carried was thrown off the track and precipitated down an embankment, by means whereof the plaintiff was injured, was held sufficient in the absence of a direct allegation of freedom from contributory negligence, the averments of the complaint being deemed sufficient to show that the injury was caused solely by the carelessness of the company in failing to repair its road track.²⁵ And in an action to recover for the death of a fireman, where the plaintiff alleged that the deceased went under the engine to clean the ash pit in the regular line of his duty, and that the brakes were set, and that he was run over by the sudden starting of the engine due to the force of a collision caused by the negligence of the defendant, this was held to be enough.²⁶

And in an action to recover for injuries received because of the negligent shooting of a gas well with nitroglycerin, an allegation that the "said explosion, and each and all of said injuries and damages to plaintiff, and to said well, were each and all caused, produced, and occasioned solely and entirely by the unskilfulness and negligence of defendants in shooting said well," was held to be a sufficient allegation of plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence.²⁷

The very allegation of the injury, however, may in some cases of itself negative contributory negligence. In an action for damages for malpractice, a complaint alleging that the defendants, as practising physicians and surgeons, undertook to set a broken arm of the infant son of the plaintiff, and that by reason of their unskilfulness, negligence, and want of care in treating the broken arm, it became inflamed and mortified, and had to be amputated, was held not bad on the theory that it failed to allege that the amputation of the arm was necessary without the fault of the plaintiff or the boy, since the allegation that the injury was caused by the want of professional skill and care could not be sustained, if it were made to appear that the negligence of the plaintiff or the boy contributed to it.²⁸ And even in ordinary negligence cases, it has been held that the plaintiff need not allege absence of negligence in his complaint, since that allegation is always involved in the assertion that the injury was caused by the defendant's negligence.²⁹

²⁵ Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. v. Lantz, 29 Ind. 528.

A complaint showing that the plaintiff, while seated as a passenger in one of the defendant's cars, was hurt by reason of the fact that a bridge belonging to the defendant broke down and precipitated the train into the river, the accident being caused by the negligence of the defendant, was held not defective on the theory that there was no statement of facts by which it was shown that the plaintiff himself was without fault, since the relation which he occupied to the railroad company, and the situation in which he was placed, required nothing of him except to remain passive while being carried, all presumption of negligence on his part being rebutted by the averments of the complaint. Bedford, S. & B. R. Co. v. Rainbolt, 99 Ind. 551.

In an action to recover for injuries received by a passenger due to the sudden starting of the train when she was about to alight, it was held that freedom from contributory negligence could be inferred from an allegation in the complaint that, on arriving at the station at which she was entitled to leave the train, the defendant stopped its train, that the plaintiff immediately and without delay proceeded as far as the door of the car, and that, while in the act of stepping out of the door onto the platform, the train suddenly started without any warning from the defendant, which caused her to be thrown to the floor of the car and hurt. ²⁷ Indiana Nitroglycerine & Torpedo Co. v. Lippincott Glass Co. 165 Ind. 361, 75 N. E. 649.

²⁸ Scudder v. Crossan, 43 Ind. 343.

²⁹ Even where the burden of proving contributory negligence is held to be with the plaintiff, it has been held that the plaintiff need not allege absence of negligence in his complaint, since that allegation is always involved in the allegation that the injury was caused by the defendant's negligence, to prove which it is necessary for the plaintiff to show, and the burden is upon him to establish, that his own negligence did not cause or contribute

The rule that, in actions by infants to recover damages for personal injuries, it is not necessary to aver, in direct or express terms, that the parents or custodians are free from contributory fault, cannot be invoked in support of the proposition that it is not necessary in an action by a father to recover damages on account of the death of his son nine years of age, to aver in the complaint that such child was so injured without fault on his part.³⁰ If the court cannot say as a matter of law that the child was sui juris, it is not necessary to aver that the child was without fault.³¹

It has been held that the rules as to the allegation of due care apply even in suits before a justice of the peace,³² and in the case of injuries to property as well as to the person.³³

.2. Knowledge of dangers or defects.

The question has many times arisen in master and servant cases where the injury was caused by certain dangers and defects of which the servant might have known, whether it is necessary for the plaintiff to allege absence of such knowledge in order to entitle him to recover for the negligence of the master. This subject will to the injury. Lee v. Troy Citizens' Gas-light Co. 98 N. Y. 115.

A direct averment that, "by reason and in consequence" of defendant's negligence, a collision by which plaintiff was injured took place, impliedly negatives any other cause of action, and the plaintiff will not be entitled to a verdict unless he affirmatively establishes that his negligence did not contribute to the accident. Benedict v. Union Agri. Soc. 74 Vt. 91, 52 Atl. 110.

It is the rule in Vermont that in actions to recover damages occasioned by the defendant's negligence, the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that such negligence was the sole operating cause of the injury, —that no want of due care on the part of the plaintiff helped to produce it. But it is not necessary that this should be alleged in the declaration. It is enough if the declaration states that the insufficiency of a bridge, in an action brought to recover for injuries received by the falling of the bridge, was the sole cause of the accident. And where it alleges that the damages occurred "by reason" of such insufficiency, the idea of the plaintiff's negligence is precluded. Mobus v. Waitsfield, 75 Vt. 122, 53 Atl. 775.

In Potter v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 20 Wis. 534, 91 Am. Dec. 444, an action to recover for the death of a child killed while attempting to alight from a train, it was held unnecessary for the plaintiff to allege that the deceased at the time of the accident was in the exercise of ordinary care, or was free from contributory negligence; but this was on the theory that the complaint, without this averment, sufficiently alleged that the negligence of the defendant was the sole immediate cause of the accident. "It is unnecessary for us," said the court, "to decide the question, so much discussed by counsel, whether the plaintiff at the trial, to make out a prima facie case, must prove both the negligence of the defendant and ordinary care on the part of the deceased; for whatever may be our opinion on that subject, we must hold in accordance with long and well-established practice, that the complaint is sufficient."

In such an action a general averment that the parents were free from contributory fault does not include the averment that the child was also free from fault contributing thereto, and therefore a complaint which does not allege that the child was without negligence is defective. Ibid.

³¹ In an action to recover damages for the death of a boy who, while on his way to school, fell into a large body of water that was allowed to accumulate by the side of a street, and was drowned, it was held that failure of the plaintiff to allege facts from which it could be determined that the boy, who was seven years of age, did not comprehend the danger to which he was subjected, would not render the complaint demurrable, where there was nothing alleged by which the court could say, as a matter of law, that the child was sui juris, and the facts specifically averred did not show him to have been guilty of contributory negligence, and where there was a general averment that he was free from fault. Elwood v. Addison, 26 Ind. App. 28, 59 N. E. 47.

³² A complaint in an action for the killing of a mule was held insufficient, even on a motion to arrest, where there was a failure to allege freedom from contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and the fact that the action was brought before a justice of peace, where the same strictness of pleading is not required, was held immaterial. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. v. Stanley, 4 Ind. App. 364, 30 N. E. 103.

³³ In Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Boland, 53 Ind. 398, it was urged that the rule should not be applied to cases of injury to property, which is incapable either of diligence or of negligence; that it should be applied only in cases where the injury is personal. But the court perceive no distinction in principle in this respect between injuries to the person and to property, and said that where one's own negligence contributes to an injury to his property inflicted by the carelessness of another, he can no more recover damages than if the injury were to his person. In such cases of concurrent negligence, the law affords no remedy.

not be discussed in this note because it belongs more properly to the doctrine of the assumption of risk,³⁴ although it is quite frequently stated as a species or branch of the doctrine of contributory negligence.³⁵ Indeed, the doctrine of assumption of risk, as well as its relation to the doctrine of contributory negligence, seems to be in much confusion.³⁶

3. General denial.

Where the rule is that the burden is on the plaintiff to show freedom from contributory negligence, it has been held that the question of negligence on the part of the plaintiff arises under the general denial.³⁷ So, in an action to recover for injuries received by plaintiff while a passenger, a special answer alleging that the injuries resulted from the carelessness of the plaintiff was held properly stricken out on motion, as this fact was provable under the general denial.³⁸ And in an action to recover damages to a horse and omnibus, caused by leaving an obstruction in a street unlighted and unguarded, it was held that a paragraph in an answer, following a general denial, which set up that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, was properly rejected. The court said that in such actions the burden is upon the plaintiff to allege and prove that he was without fault which contributed to the injury. The plaintiff having averred that the injury occurred through the negligence of the defendant, without any fault on his part, the only appropriate answer was a denial. The defendant could not confess and avoid.³⁹

4. Shifting of burden.

It sometimes happens that where the burden of proving absence of contributing negligence is on the plaintiff, the defendant unnecessarily sets up contributory negligence in his answer, but this does not throw upon him the burden of this issue.⁴⁰ So, where the defendant unnecessarily pleaded that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, it was held that an instruction: "But as to material affirmative allegations and defenses of the answer, the burden of proof devolves upon the defendant, and they must be established by a preponderance of the evidence," was erroneous.⁴¹ An instruction that the burden of proving negligence rests on the party alleging it is not correct in a case in which the answer unnecessarily alleges that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, since, even in that case, the burden is on the plaintiff to establish his freedom from fault.⁴² But under a statute providing for damages received by reason of defective bridges, culverts, or highways, which placed the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence on the plaintiff, it was held that where the defendant in his answer de-

³⁶ See article on "Assumption of Risk," by Walter M. Glass, 18 Case and Comment, 81. See also note to Scheurer v. Banner Rubber Co. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1207, "May servant assume the risk of dangers created by the master's negligence." 3 L.R.A.(N.S.)

⁴² Gamble v. Mullin, 74 Iowa, 99, 36 N. W. 909.

In an action to recover for an injury alleged to have been due to defendant's negligence in driving on a highway, an instruction that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to prove the negligence of the defendant, that being the gist of the case; but that, when the defendant relied upon the fact that the plaintiff conducted himself carelessly, the burden was upon the defendant to show that the plaintiff had not used ordinary care, was held erroneous, because of the latter part of the direction. Lane v. Crombie, 12 Pick. 177.

Although plaintiff's petition in an action to recover for personal injuries should nies all of the allegations of the petition, and then pleads contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and sets out certain particular acts of the plaintiff, and alleges that, by reason of such acts, plaintiff was injured, the burden of proving such facts is thrown upon the defendant.⁴³

VI. Jurisdictions holding burden on defendant.

a. In general.

The doctrine that contributory negligence is not a part of the plaintiff's cause of action, but is a defense to be alleged and proved like any other defense, is maintained in England and in Canada, and in by far the greater number of states in this countain an allegation of freedom from contributory negligence, yet, if no such allegation is made and the defendant alleges plaintiff's contributory negligence, the issue on that question is the same as though plaintiff had made the proper averment, and the burden of proof is still on the plaintiff to establish the fact of his own freedom from fault. It is error in such a case to throw the burden upon the defendant, and allow plaintiff to recover merely upon overcoming such proof of negligence on plaintiff's part as the defendant may introduce. Cahill v. Illinois C. R. Co. 137 Iowa, 577, 115 N. W. 216.

try. The leading Supreme Court case is that of Washington & G. R. Co. v. Gladmon, in which the rule that the burden is on the defendant is adopted. The court said that, while it is true that the absence of reasonable care and caution on the part of one seeking to recover for an injury so received will prevent a recovery, it is not correct to say that it is incumbent upon him to prove such care and caution. The want of such care, or contributory negligence as it is termed, is a defense to be proved by the other side; the plaintiff may establish the negligence of the defendant, his injury in consequence thereof, and his case is made out.⁴⁴ This is the well-settled rule of the Federal courts,⁴⁵ and governs there irrespective of the decisions in courts of the states where the Federal courts are

On all of the evidence, the rule of the Federal courts is that the burden of proof is on the defendant to sustain, by a preponderance of evidence, its defensive plea of contributory negligence. Hemingway v. Illinois C. R. Co. 52 C. C. A. 477, 114 Fed. 843.

The burden of proof of showing contributory negligence of an engineer in continuing to use a engine which he knew to be defective was held to be on the defendant. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 225, 25 L. ed. 617.

The burden of proof is not upon the plaintiff in an action for causing death, to show in the first instance that the person killed was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident. Union P. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 161 U. S. 451, 40 L. ed. 766, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 618.

Where the plaintiff was injured while sitting in a car before the train was made up, by reason of the fact that another car was kicked against it, and it was assumed that the burden was on the defendant of proving a defense to the effect that the plaintiff was in the car in violation of the reasonable and known directions of the company, the court, on appeal, refused to consider the question whether the plaintiff had the burden of affirmatively maintaining that there were no prohibitions against her entering the car. *Root v. Contributory negligence is in its nature defensive, and the burden of proof to show it is on the party who relies on it. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 95 Ala. 412, 11 So. 262.

So, a charge that the burden of proof is not upon the defendant, to show that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, was held properly refused. West v. Thomas, 97 Ala. 622, 11 So. 768.

So, a charge in substance that before the plaintiff can recover the jury must be satisfied that the plaintiff has been injured, and that his damage has been without the lack of any reasonable care on his part, etc., was held erroneous, in that it misplaced the burden of proof. Thompson v. Duncan, 76 Ala. 334. The court said it was not the plaintiff's duty to prove that the damage had been done through no want of reasonable care on his part, nor was it necessary that the jury should affirm that plaintiff had not contributed to the injury. That contributory negligence is in its nature defensive, the disproof of which does not rest on the plaintiff, unless in rebuttal of defensive testimony tending to establish it.

The effect of a charge that if the jury are unable to say that the injury was caused by want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, without a want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff directly contributing thereto, they must find for the defendant, was held to place the onus on the plaintiff to prove that the injury was caused without negligence on his part, thus misplacing the burden of proof. O'Brien v. Tatum, 84 Ala. 186, 4 So. 158.

A charge that if any individual juror is not reasonably satisfied that the plaintiff did not contribute proximately to his injury, the plaintiff cannot recover, was held to misplace the burden of proof. Alabama Steel & Wire Co. v. Wrenn, 136 Ala. 475, 34 So. 970.

A verdict cannot be directed for the defendant in an action to recover for the negligent killing of a person, on the theory that the plaintiff has failed to show due care on the part of the deceased. *Southern P. court said that the rule in this territory is that in actions for personal injuries where contributory negligence is relied upon as a defense, due care and caution on the part of the plaintiff, in the absence of affirmative proof to the contrary, will be presumed, and the burden of proving such contributory negligence rests upon the defendant.

In an action to recover damages for the killing of a miner by negligently permitting rock to fall upon him, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove that the accident occurred without fault of the deceased. Lopez v. Central Arizona Min. Co. 1 Ariz. 464, 2 Pac. 748.

Contributory negligence is a defense, and the proof of it devolves upon the defendant who alleges it, and who therefore holds the affirmative of this issue. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Atkins, 46 Ark. 423. The court said that the courts of last resort in Massachusetts and several other states have indeed adopted the contrary principle, but this, it is believed, is inconsistent with the rule of evidence adjusting the burden of proof according to the state of pleadings, and it is certainly opposed to the weight of authority as settled in England, in the Supreme Court of the United States, and a majority of the states of the Union.

An instruction that if defects in a road-bed where the plaintiff's intestate was thrown down, and mortally injured by the cars of the defendant, were easily and readily seen, and he had been accustomed to working there, and, in attempting to uncouple cars while in motion, received the injuries which caused his death, he was not entitled to recover, was held properly refused, on the ground that contributory negligence was a matter of defense. *Little Rock, M. When negligence on the part of a carrier is established by evidence, the burden is upon the carrier to prove contributory negligence of an injured passenger. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gilbreath, 87 Ark. 572, 113 S. W. 200.

An instruction that, in order to find for the plaintiff, the jury must be satisfied by a preponderance of evidence of the negligence of the defendant, and that the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, was held wrongfully to place the burden upon the plaintiff, and require him to prove by a preponderance of the evidence, not only the negligence charged in the complaint, but also, as a further fact essential to his recovery, the absence of negligence

Where it did not appear that a person killed at a railroad crossing looked both ways before as well as after he went upon the track, it was held that, since he might have done so, the burden was on the defendant to show that he did not. *Choctaw, O. & G. The burden of showing that one who goes upon a railroad track, and is struck by a passing train, is guilty of contributory negligence, is on the defendant. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Martin, 61 Ark. 549, 33 S. W. 1070.

In an action for the negligent killing of a child, even if the mother's contributory negligence is a defense to an action by the administrator, the burden of proving such negligence is on the defendant. Miles v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Ark. 485, 119 S. W. 837.

A charge that unless the jury find from the weight of evidence, first, that the defendant was guilty of negligence which contributed to the plaintiff's injury, and, second, that the plaintiff was free from fault or negligence, the verdict must be for the defendant, was held to misplace the burden of proof. *Little Rock & Ft. In May v. Hanson, 5 Cal. 360, 63 Am. Dec. 135, an action for damages sustained by plaintiff in crossing defendant's ferry, it was held unnecessary for the plaintiff to show that he had no agency in, and did not in any manner contribute to, the accident, the court saying that the proof of want of ordinary care on the part of plaintiff lies on the defendant, and that he who avers a fact in excuse of his own misfeasance must prove it.

And where the plaintiff was injured by stepping off of a car, the car being started

Where there was no question but that the evidence tended to prove negligence on the part of the defendant in running over a child in the street, it was held that the burden of proving contributory negligence of the parents of the child devolved upon the defendant, unless it had been made to appear by the evidence of the plaintiff. Daly v. Hinz, 113 Cal. 366, 45 Pac. 693.

So, in order to prevent recovery for injuries received by a servant working at a defective machine, where the plaintiff had been ordered by the master to work more rapidly, on the promise that the latter would repair, it was held that the burden was on the master not only to show that the plaintiff had knowledge of the defect, but also that, in obeying the order to operate the machine more rapidly, the plaintiff appreciated and understood that he was incurring obvious peril which no prudent man would hazard. *Anderson v. In *Quill v. Southern P. The burden of showing lack of knowledge or information on the part of a mine employee killed by the flooding of the mine, of conditions in an adjoining mine which were likely to result in such flooding, does not rest upon one seeking to recover for his death, but the mine owner has the burden of showing such knowledge, and therefore the court cannot direct a verdict in favor of defendant merely because the evidence tending to show absence of knowledge is not conclusive. *Williams v. ⁵³ Harmon v. Washington & G. R. Co. 7 Mackey, 255.

In Atchison v. Wills, 21 App. D. C. 548, the court said: "The rule that prevails in this jurisdiction is that the onus of proof is upon the plaintiff to establish his case by proof of the negligence of the defendant, the injuries resulting therefrom, and his case is made out. If there be circumstances which convict him of contributory negligence, the defendant must prove them, and thus defeat the action. Irrespective of statute law on the subject, the burden of proof upon that subject does not rest upon the plaintiff to show himself free from blame, that is to say, the want of care on the part of plaintiff is matter of defense, to be proved by the defendant."

So, in Mackey v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 8 Mackey, 282, it was held that a prayer for an instruction that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence should be refused.

Inland & Seaboard Coast-ing Co. 6 Mackey, 39, an action to recover damages for the crushing of a person's foot at a wharf caused by the negligent landing of a steamer, a prayer that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to establish affirmatively his care and prudence was held properly rejected, the court saying that after the plaintiff has proved negligence on the defendant's part, he is entitled to rest, and the burden then falls on the defendant to prove want of ordinary care and prudence in the plaintiff, if he relies upon that as his defense.

In an action against a railroad company to recover damages for the value of cattle alleged to have been run over and killed, the burden of establishing contributory negligence by a preponderance of evidence is upon the railroad company. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Peeples, 56 Fla. 145, 7 So. 392.

An instruction in substance that there could be no recovery unless a person run over by the cars, for whose death the action was brought, was in the exercise of due care at the time of the accident, was held proper, the court saying that the instruction did not ask that the plaintiff should be required to prove that, at the time of the accident, the deceased was in exercise of due care, as an independent and unconnected proposition of law, but relatively to the supposed facts that preceded it. Those facts were such as to warrant the presumption of want of due care and caution by the deceased in the protection of his person, and made it incumbent on the plaintiff to remove that presumption. In an action to recover for injuries received by plaintiff by stepping off of a high railroad platform in the nighttime, an instruction that if, from the evidence in the case, it appeared that the night was dark and that the platform was not properly lighted, because of the darkness and a lack of light, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff, before recovery, to show that she took greater care than she would have taken had the night been light and the platform well lighted, was held erroneous, because the effect of it was to impose upon the plaintiff the burden of showing that she was not guilty of contributory negligence. If the evidence does not affirmatively show contributory negligence, the case should go to the jury. Eidson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. — Kan. —, 116 Pac. 485.

In an action by a passenger against a common carrier, to recover for personal injuries received while traveling in a conveyance of the latter, proof of the accident and plaintiff's injury casts the burden upon the carrier to free itself from the presumption of negligence. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Burrows, 62 Kan. 89, 61 Pac. 439.

Where there was a plea of contributory negligence, but there was not evidence to support it, it was held that the court, in instructing the jury that before the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, the jury should believe from the evidence that she was herself in the exercise of ordinary care for her own safety, in addition to believing the establishment of the various ingredients of actionable negligence on the part of the defendant, was in error, because imposing upon her the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence. *Bevis v. In this case it was held not proper in any civil case to tell the jury in terms that the burden is on the one party or the other; and that while the giving of such an instruction might not be cause for reversal, it is the better practice simply to tell the jury to decide as they believe from the evidence the fact to be, without telling them upon which party the burden is. Ibid.

So, a defendant cannot complain of an instruction that, although the plaintiff cannot recover if, at the time of the injury, he was guilty of any negligence directly contributing to the injury, yet the plaintiff is not required to show that he was free from such negligence, but the defendant must show that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence directly contributing to the injury. *Churchman v. shown by a preponderance of the evidence in his favor that he was injured by defendant's train by reason of the negligence and want of care of the defendant's employees in charge of said train, and that plaintiff was guilty of no negligence which contributed directly to said injury, the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant, was held erroneous, as improperly placing upon the plaintiff the onus of showing not only that he had been injured by the negligence of the defendant, but also that he himself had not been guilty of contributory negligence. Swigert v. Laclede Gaslight Co. 209 Mo. 648, 108 S. W. 559.

In an action to recover for the death of a child run over by a street car, it was held that an instruction that if the jury should find that the defendant was guilty of the negligence charged, and that the negligence caused the injury in question, they should find for the plaintiff, provided they also should find that the plaintiff was exercising the degree of care incumbent on him, was held wrong, because putting the burden of proof on the plaintiff not only of establishing the guilt of the defendant, but also of establishing his own exculpation. It was held that the instruction should be, in effect, that if the jury should find that the defendant was negligent as charged, and that the negligence caused the injury, they should find for the plaintiff, unless they should also find that the plaintiff was negligent in the particular charged in the plea, and that such negligence contributed to the injury. The court said that the difference in the form of expression is the difference in the location of the burden of proof. Schmidt v. St. Louis R. Co. 149 Mo. 269, 73 Am. St. Rep. 80, 50 S. W. 921.

An instruction that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to establish that one killed while making a coupling was himself not guilty of carelessness or negligence which caused or contributed to the accident and death was held erroneous. Anderson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 35 Neb. 95, 52 N. W. 840.

In an action to recover for injuries received by reason of a defective bridge, the plaintiff, who was riding horseback along the highway, was found injured and unconscious upon the bridge in question, and the horse which he had been riding had its hind feet in a hole caused by a broken plank. Under these circumstances, there being no evidence from which want of care might be inferred, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to an instruction submitting the question whether the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant, without an instruction in any manner calling the attention of the jury to the principle of law requiring him to use ordinary care to prevent an injury. Clingan v. Dixon County, 82 Neb. 808, 118 N. W. 1082.

The plaintiff is not, as a condition precedent to his right to maintain his action, bound to prove affirmatively that the injury was not contributed to by his own negligence, under the penalty of being nonsuited. New Jersey Exp. Co. v. Nichols, 33 N. J. L. 434, 97 Am. Dec. 722.

In an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, contributory negligence of the decedent is a matter of defense, and the plaintiff is not required to prove its absence as a part of his case. Danskin v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 79 N. J. L. 526, 76 Atl. 975.

And the same doctrine obtains in North Dakota,⁷¹ and Ohio.⁷² There is a statute on the subject in Oklahoma.⁷³

Pennsylvania was among the number of older states adopting the rule that contributory negligence is a matter of defense.⁷⁴

A charge which seeks to throw upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that the person for whose death the action was brought was not guilty of contributory negligence is erroneous. Peoples v. North Carolina R. Co. 137 N. C. 96, 49 S. E. 87.

In an action to recover for the death of a person run over by a railroad train, an instruction that the plaintiff must satisfy the jury that there was a failure to sound the whistle, and that such failure caused the killing, and that if the defendant did give the warning whistle, or if at the time the intestate was down upon the track drunk or unconscious, so that no signal given at the usual safe and ordinary distance would have aroused the intestate in time to enable him to avoid the result, there was no negligent killing, was held erroneous, for one reason because it put the burden on the plaintiff of proving that the intestate was not guilty of contributory negligence, although the court had also charged that the burden of proving the intestate's negligence was on the defendant. Fulp v. Roanoke & S. R. Co. 120 N. C. 525, 27 S. E. 74.

A charge that, to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict, the jury must find from a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff herself was without fault, does not cast the burden on the plaintiff of showing by a preponderance of evidence that she was not negligent, where there was evidence on this issue offered by both parties, and the court, in another part of its charge, properly instructed the jury upon the question of the burden of proof. Where the plaintiff sues a carrier of passengers for injury alleged to have been received by him by the negligence of the carrier, while riding on a baggage car, the carrier must plead its rules and regulations relating to passengers and where they may ride, and allege the violation thereof by the plaintiff, if it desires to avail itself of such a defense. So, a charge that if plaintiffs have not shown affirmatively that their own negligence did not contribute in any degree to the injury, they cannot recover, was held erroneous, since contributory negligence is a matter of defense. Mallory v. Gridley. 85 Pa. 275.

Manifestly, a charge that the jury must be "thoroughly satisfied" that the accident did not occur through the carelessness of the plaintiff, because the burden was on the plaintiff to prove freedom from contributory negligence, is erroneous, both as misplacing the burden of proof and as to the degree of proof required. Bradwell v. Pittsburgh & W. E. Pass. R. Co. 139 Pa. 404, 20 Atl. 1046.

Where the defendant requested an instruction that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove that "he was not guilty of any negligence contributing in any degree to the injury he suffered," the court said that an unqualified affirmance of the point would have constituted plain error. Supherstein v. Bertels, 178 Pa. 401, 35 Atl. 1000.

In an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, plaintiff is not required to prove affirmatively, as part of her case, that there was no contributory negligence. The testimony offered by the plaintiff must not show that there was such negligence, and if it does not, and such negligence is alleged by the defendant, it is a part of the defense, and the burden of proof is on the defendant. Pennsylvania Teleph. Co. v. Varnau, 2 Monaghan (Pa.) 645, 15 Atl. 624.

In the case of a collision on water, an act done for the purpose of preventing injury, which is not shown to have caused any damage, does not impose upon the plaintiffs a necessity of proving that it did not contribute to the loss. Brown v. Gilmore, 92 Pa. 40.

Other states in which the doctrine prevails are South Carolina,⁷⁵ South Dakota,⁷⁶ Tennessee,⁷⁷ Utah,⁷⁸ Virginia,⁷⁹ Washington,⁸⁰ West Virginia.⁸¹ This doctrine of the larger number of jurisdictions in the United States is also the law of England⁸² and of Canada.⁸³

In Carter v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 19 S. C. 20, 45 Am. Rep. 754, it is said that it is a general rule that the burden of proof is upon the party who maintains the affirmative of the issue. In other words, he who asserts a fact necessary to sustain an action must prove it; and he who asserts one which is a bar to the action must also prove it. Generally, contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff will bar a recovery, and it would seem, therefore, to be a matter of defense, and that it would devolve upon the defendant to prove it.

Consequently, in an action brought to recover for injuries received by a common laborer, for negligently allowing a section of a heavy iron standard to fall upon him, it is unnecessary for the plaintiff's evidence to show that the plaintiff used reasonable efforts to avoid the result of defendant's negligence. *Whaley v. But the fact that the defendant was negligent in running its engine at an unlawful rate of speed, and collided with the deceased at a public crossing, does not impose upon the defendant the burden of proving that the deceased did not perform his duty, in that he failed to do a particular thing that he might have done, or did that which, under the circumstances, would not have been done by a reasonably prudent person. Southern R. Co. v. Hansbrough, 107 Va. 733, 60 S. E. 58. The court said it would be a most unreasonable requirement of the defendant in such a case, that it show that the injured party omitted to do what the facts and circumstances proved he might have done, and avoided the injury. This would be, in effect, to require proof of a negative, and take from the consideration of the jury the right to infer from the facts and circumstances surrounding the injury, that it was a result of the negligence of the party injured or the concurrent negligence of both parties.

All that can be required of the plaintiff, either by law or reason, is that he shall prove he has been actually damaged, and, in addition thereto, facts and circumstances from which the jury may fairly conclude such damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant, leaving out of consideration any question of contributory negligence, the burden of proving this being on the defendant. Johnson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 25 W. Va. 571.

P. 404, a crossing accident case, Lord Watson said: "I am of opinion that the onus of proving affirmatively that there was contributory negligence on the part of the person injured rests, in the first instance, upon the defendants, and that, in the absence of evidence tending to that conclusion, the plaintiff is not bound to prove the negative in order to entitle her to a verdict in her favor."

⁸³ It is not for the plaintiff to prove affirmatively, as part of his case, that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. Morrow v. Canadian P. R. Co. 21 Ont. App. Rep. 149; Shannahan v. Ryan, 20 N. S. 142.

In an action for injuries to a servant inclined to adopt the rule that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, but finally swung around to the opposite doctrine. It was first held in Delaware that the burden is upon the plaintiff to show by a preponderance of evidence that he was free from contributory negligence.⁸⁴ But this is not now the rule of that state.⁸⁵ The early decisions of Idaho were against the plaintiff on this issue.⁸⁶ But in Crawford v. Banners Ferry Lumber Co.,⁸⁷ without referring to the earlier decisions, the rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant was approved. A like reversal of opinion appears in Louisiana,⁸⁸ Maryland,⁸⁹ and in Mississippi.⁹⁰

In an early Oregon case, it was said that caused by a pile driver on which he was working falling upon him, it was said, in McMillan v. Western Dredging Co. 4 B. C. 122, that from the moment the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant, the onus is cast on the defendant, if he sets it up, to show contributory negligence.

In Valente v. American Bridge Co. — Del. —, 73 Atl. 395, reversed in 73 Atl. 400, the court said, in charging, that the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries must satisfy the jury that the injuries resulted from the negligence of the defendant, and that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was without fault or negligence which proximately entered into and contributed to his injury; that the burden of proving negligence on the part of the defendant rested upon the plaintiff, and that the burden of proving negligence on the part of the plaintiff rested on the defendant.

In an action by an employee to recover damages received by reason of a defective elevator, the court charged the jury that where contributory negligence is relied upon as a defense, the burden of proving such negligence is upon the defendant. Boyd v. Blumenthal, 3 Penn. (Del.) 564, 52 Atl. 330.

This rule was followed in Haner v. Northern P. R. Co. 7 Idaho, 305, 62 Pac. 1028, in which it was held that an instruction to the jury that the burden of proof was upon the defendant to establish contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff was erroneous.

But where the evidence showed that a part of machinery belonging to the defendant was in a damaged condition, and that, by reason thereof, an employee in the discharge of his duty could become entangled in such machinery and lose his life, or suffer great bodily injury, through no fault of his, this was held a prima facie case, 83 L.R.A. And in an action to recover damages for the death of a person run over by a street car, it was held that the burden of proving contributory negligence was on the defendant. Pilmer v. Boise Traction Co. 14 Idaho, 327, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 254, 125 Am. St. Rep. 161, 94 Pac. 432.

In Buechner v. New Orleans, 112 La. 596, 66 L.R.A. 334, 104 Am. St. Rep. 455, 30 So. 603, it was held that the burden of establishing contributory negligence is on the defendant, that contributory negligence must be pleaded by the defendant, and that, in the absence of such pleading, evidence is not admissible to show that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence. The court said that the doctrine that the defendant may prove, without alleging, contributory negligence, rests on the premise that plaintiff must allege and prove, either affirmatively or by inference, that he was without fault. From this point of view, evidence that the injury was occasioned by the concurring fault of the plaintiff is admissible in rebuttal of the evidence adduced on his behalf to show that he exercised due care and caution. "Several of our own state decisions," said the court, "enunciate this doctrine in a general way, but the clear-cut question is for the first time presented to this court by objections as to the admissibility of testimony to prove contributory negligence. Where the evidence is all in without objection, it is unnecessary to pass on the question of the burden of proof. . . . But in all cases the preponderance of the evidence as to contributory negligence must be on the side of the defendant. The law presumes, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that plaintiff was free from negligence."

⁸⁹ In an action against a city for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the defendant in not preventing or removing an accumulation of ice on a footway, the court said that plaintiff must show that he used reasonable care and diligence to prevent injury. Baltimore v. Marriott, 9 Md. 160, 66 Am. Dec. 326.

But it was afterwards held that the burden is on the defendant. Jones v. Unit- in actions for negligence, the burden of proof always rests upon the party charging it; that he must prove that the accident was caused by the wrongful act, omission, or neglect of the defendant, and that the injury of which he complained was not the result of his own negligence and the want of ordinary care and caution.⁹¹ This statements was said in a later case⁹² to have been a lapsus linguæ, and it was declared that all that was intended thereby was that the plaintiff must be prepared to meet this issue when presented as a defense. The language used in the early Oregon decision, the court afterwards said, was intended to apply only to the state of facts mentioned in that case, and it was not intended to lay down any general rule that would be applicable to any state of facts that might occur in that character of cases. It was said that contributory negligence had always been understood by the court Contributory negligence being a matter of defense, the onus of proof in respect to it is properly on the defendant. State use of Bacon v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 58 Md. 182.

The want of ordinary care on the part of the party injured is a matter of defense, and the onus of proof of the fact is upon the defendant. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 60 Md. 449; State use of Steever v. Union R. Co. 70 Md. 69, 18 Atl. 1032.

The rule that the burden of showing contributory negligence is on the defendant applies to accidents occasioned by defective country roads and ditches, as well as to railroad accidents. Prince George's County v. Burgess, 61 Md. 29, 48 Am. Rep. 38.

But in Baltimore Traction Co. v. Helms, 34 Md. 515, 36 L.R.A. 215, 36 Atl. 119, an action by a passenger to recover for injuries received just after alighting from a car, while he was attempting to cross another track, by being struck by a car coming in the opposite direction, Fowler, J., said: "By the well-settled law applicable to the class of cases to which this belongs, it is not enough for the plaintiff to prove the negligence of the defendant and the injury which followed, but he is bound also to establish by satisfactory proof, before he can recover, that he was himself free from negligence, and exercised ordinary care to avoid the consequences of the defendant's negligence. The right to recover depends upon two distinct propositions of facts, first, the negligence of the defendant, and, second, the exercise of due and ordinary care by the plaintiff; and if he failed to prove negligence on the part of the defendant, or, if it appeared from his own evidence that he was guilty of negligence directly contributing to the injury, he cannot recover." The first sentence of the above quotation was relied on in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Stumpf, 97 Md. 78, 4 Atl. 978, in support of the contention that the burden is on the plaintiff to establish freedom from contributory negligence, but the court said: "However that language might have been regarded, if it stood apart from any qualifying language, and if that case had been the first in this court dealing with this rule, it is impossible to suppose that the learned and careful judge who delivered that opinion intended to overrule, without even mentioning, the various cases in which it had been held that the burden of proof in this regard is on the defendant, and it is perfectly apparent from the very next sentence in that opinion that the defendant's counsel in this case has misconceived the meaning of the language cited."

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Stumpf, supra, a crossing accident case, it was urged by the defendant that it is the duty of the plaintiff to show how the accident happened as proof that it was caused by the negligence of the defendant; that, in doing this, he must necessarily negative the other possible explanations, that the theory of pure accident or the theory of the plaintiff's negligence, original or contributory, are open as possible causes; that he must show negligence of the defendant as the direct cause, and, in doing so, must negative negligence of the plaintiff; but the court adhered to the rule that the burden is on the defendant of showing contributory negligence.

⁹⁰ The burden is on the plaintiff to show that he, at least, exercised ordinary care and prudence. Vicksburg v. Hennessy, 54 Miss. 391, 28 Am. Rep. 354.

But in Hickman v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. 66 Miss. 154, 5 So. 225, it was pointed out that in the Hennessy Case, 54 Miss. 391, 28 Am. Rep. 354, the plaintiff's own testimony showed that the injury of which he complained was occasioned by his own fault, and that neither the question of pleading nor the burden of proof was before the court; and it was declared that the question whether it was necessary in an action to recover for the death of a person, caused by the alleged negligence of a railroad company, to allege that the deceased was free from fault or in the exercise of reasonable care at the time of the accident, was an open one in Mississippi. It was held that such an allegation was unnecessary, the allegation that the injury was produced by the negligence of the defendant implying that there was no negligence on the part of the deceased contributing to it.

to be a defense, and that it must be averred as such.⁹³ The rule is now settled that it is unnecessary for a plaintiff in a complaint in an action to recover damages for a personal injury, to allege or affirmatively show at the trial that he was free from negligence.⁹⁴

⁹³ Grant v. Baker, 12 Or. 329, 7 Pac. 318.

In Coughtry v. Willamette Street R. Co. 21 Or. 245, 27 Pac. 1031, Strahan, Ch. J., said: "The gist of this action is negligence; and, in order to enable the plaintiff to recover, he must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant violated some duty which it owed to the plaintiff; that is, that it did some act without due care which it ought not to have done, or that it omitted to do some act which it ought to have performed, and that such act or omission contributed to the injury of which the plaintiff complains; and in addition to this, that the plaintiff was guilty of no act which contributed to the injury."

The latter clause was said by the court, in Johnston v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Or. 94, 31 Pac. 283, to have probably been an oversight, unintentionally written, as the only questions presented by the record were "that the defendant had not been guilty of any negligence, and that plaintiff's evidence showed that he was guilty of negligence contributing to the injury." And for these reasons alone the case was reversed.

⁹⁵ In Walker v. Herron, 22 Tex. 55, it is said in an action to recover for loss of horses in consequence of a contagious disease taken by plaintiff's horses from those of defendant, that, to entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action, he must satisfy the jury that he had used ordinary care. "Otherwise," said the court, "it cannot be certain that he was not himself the cause of his own injury. If he was negligent, it cannot be known whether the injury was wholly imputable to the defendant, or to the fault of the plaintiff himself. If both were negligent, and thereby injury ensued to the plaintiff, though it could not certainly be known whether the injury was caused at one time or another, or in what particular manner it was occasioned, the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action. To entitle the plaintiff to recover, he must have satisfied the jury that he had used ordinary care, or that the injury was

The Texas courts took a very strong position at first, in favor of the doctrine that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, but, after considerable wavering, receded therefrom,⁹⁵ adopting the rule that the burden is on the defendant.⁹⁶ wholly attributable to the defendant's fault."

In Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Crowder, 63 Tex. 502, it was apparently held that the burden was on the plaintiff.

But, referring to the last mentioned case, it was said in Murray v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 73 Tex. 2, 11 S. W. 125: "We do not understand the court to hold that the plaintiff must do more than to develop his own case, and, in so doing, show negligence of defendant causing the injury, and at the same time, while showing his own relations to the occurrence, relieve himself of responsibility for it. Negligence might exist on his part outside of his own necessary proof."

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hester, 72 Tex. 40, 11 S. W. 1041, however, it was said that, to enable the plaintiff to recover damages for injuries arising out of the culpable fault or negligence of the defendant, the burden of proof is upon the former to show that the company was negligent, and that he, at the same time, must have used ordinary care, such as a prudent person, similarly situated, would have used, to avoid the injury complained of.

And in Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Crowder, 76 Tex. 499, 13 S. W. 381, it was said that the true rule in this class of cases is that the servant seeking to recover for an injury takes the burden upon himself of establishing negligence upon the part of the master, and due care on his own part. For former appeal, see 63 Tex. 503.

But in Murray v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. supra, it was held that after proof of plaintiff's case establishing the negligence of the defendant, and his own acts immediately connected therewith as free from fault, there may yet be such negligence on his part independent of his prima facie case, as will discharge the defendant of liability, and which, to become available as a defense, must be shown by the defendant. Such defense must be alleged and proved by the defendant.

And in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shieder, 88 Tex. 152, 28 L.R.A. 538, 30 S. W. 902, affirming — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 509, it was said that the great weight of authority, as well as the reason of the law, is in favor of the rule which imposes the burden of proof on defendant to establish plaintiff's negligence, and the court said it might be considered as the settled law of Texas.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shieder, supra, it is said that it cannot be denied that the opinions of the court in the earlier cases contain language showing that the learned judges delivering the same favored

So, in an action to recover for the killing of a dog by a street car, an instruction that if the plaintiff could have prevented the accident by the exercise of due care, and failed to do so, he could not recover, and that the burden of establishing his case

by a preponderance of the evidence was on the plaintiff, was held to cast too great a burden upon him, the burden not being on the plaintiff to show that he could not have prevented the injury.⁹⁷

The rule that the burden is on the defend-the reasoning of the Massachusetts and Connecticut courts, and, from an examination of the opinions and briefs of counsel, it appears that cases from those courts were relied upon. It does not clearly appear that the question of burden of proof was before the court in the case of Walker v. Herron, supra, and in the Crowder Cases, supra. The court held that the facts were not sufficient to show defendant's negligence; and since the case must have been disposed of upon that ground, it is probable that the question of burden of proof on the issue of contributory negligence did not receive a very careful examination.

⁹⁷ Marshall v. Dallas Consol. Electric Street R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 73 S. W. 63.

The granting of a requested instruction that the burden of proof is upon the defendant company on their plea of contributory negligence, and "you are charged that the defendant should establish this fact by a preponderance of the evidence, in order to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff," given with the addition that the charge is to be construed with the main charge that the plaintiff must show that the person for whose death the action was brought was injured without any fault or negligence on his part, in order to make out his case, was held good. Dallas Consol. Traction R. Co. v. Hurley, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 250, 31 S. W. 73.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Finley, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 64, 32 S. W. 51, a charge that the plaintiff must show that the death of a person alleged to have been negligently killed was not the result of his own contributory negligence, but that the burden of showing that his death was the result of his own contributory negligence rests upon the defendant pleading the same, was upheld, the court saying that the charge, while not as clear as it might have been, conveyed the idea that the duty rested upon the plaintiff to show that the deceased was in the exercise of due care, and that this being shown, the burden then rested upon the defendant to show contributory negligence.

Where the plaintiff is entitled to a charge that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, if the court fails to give an instruction upon that issue, the defendant has no reason for complaint. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Tisdale, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 372, 87 S. W. 1063.

An instruction that if the jury should find, among other things, that the injured person was not guilty of contributory negligence, the verdict should be for the plaintiff, was held wrongfully to place the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence on the plaintiff. Selman v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 101 S. W. 1030.

A charge in effect that if the jury should find facts establishing the negligence of the defendant, and if they should further find that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, the verdict should be for the plaintiff, was held erroneous, in placing the burden of proving such negligence on the plaintiff. Herring v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 108 S. W. 977.

A charge that the burden as to negligence is upon the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover provided one or more of the acts of negligence are proved, etc., unless the jury should find that the injured person was guilty of contributory negligence, does not place the burden of proving freedom from such negligence on the plaintiff. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Jackson, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 51, 90 S. W. 918.

passenger in a horse car, resulting from a collision between the car and a train at a crossing, the burden was held to be upon the defendant to establish its defense of contributory negligence on the part of the passenger, and it was held that the mere fact that the plaintiff had not shown that, while she was a passenger, she had exercised any care to discover the approaching train, would not justify the jury in finding her guilty of contributory negligence. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Pendry, 87 Tex. 553, 47 Am. St. Rep. 125, 29 S. W. 1038.

The burden is not on the person who is injured in attempting to board a moving train, of proving freedom from contributory negligence. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Foreman, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 46 S. W. 834.

In an action to recover for injuries received by a passenger while attempting to board a train, by the sudden starting of the cars, where the facts alleged in the petition, and the evidence adduced at the trial, did not establish prima facie, as a matter of law, negligence on the part of the plaintiff contributing to his injury, it was held that if the plaintiff attempted to board the train at a time and under circumstances which contributed to his injury, the burden of proof as to these facts rested upon the defendant. St. John v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 80 S. W. 235.

Where steam was turned through an exhaust pipe without the exercise of due care, so that a boy was scalded, it was held not error for the court in its charge to give the general rule as to the burden of proving contributory negligence resting on the defendant. *Houston & T. If a person killed while walking along a railroad track, by being struck by the pilot of an engine, was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to look and listen, the burden of proving that he did fail to look and listen is on the defendant. *Missouri, K. & T. ⁹⁸ Plaintiff must show that his own negligence did not in any way contribute to produce the injury. Chamberlain v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co. 7 Wis. 425.

⁹⁹ The above cases, in so far as they hold that a plaintiff in an action for an injury to the person must not only show negligence on the part of the defendant, but that, before he makes a prima facie case, he must also affirmatively establish by competent evidence that he was free from contributory negligence, have not been subsequently followed, and must, said court, in *Pfeiffer v. Plaintiff is entitled to go to the jury on the question of contributory negligence where his evidence does not show such negligence as a matter of law, since contributory negligence is an affirmative defense. Matthews v. Missouri P. R. Co. 26 Mo. App. 75.

Contributory negligence being a matter of defense, the burden is upon the defendant to establish it by affirmative evidence, unless it is shown by plaintiff's evidence. West v. Bayfield Mill Co. 144 Wis. 106, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 128 N. W. 992.

Since contributory negligence is a matter of defense, to be proved affirmatively by the defendant, upon whom the burden of proof rests, to justify the appellate court in disturbing the verdict, it must affirmatively appear as a matter of law from the undisputed facts, judged in the light of common knowledge and experience, of which the courts are bound to take judicial notice, that the plaintiff has not exercised such care as men of common prudence, usually exercise in positions of like exposure and danger. It must also appear affirmatively in the same conclusive way, that the negligence of the plaintiff was, in whole or in part, the proximate cause of the injury. In general, these questions are for the jury, whose verdict in favor of the plaintiff must be regarded as conclusive, unless the validity of the defense, both as to the existence of the negligence and its effect, as contributing proximately to the injury, follows necessarily from the undisputed facts. Schneider v. Market Street R. Co. 134 Cal. 482, 66 Pac. 734.

The defense of contributory negligence is an affirmative one, and the burden is always upon the defendant to prove it. Strickland v. F. W. Woolworth & Co. 143 Mo. App. 528, 127 S. W. 628.

The defense of contributory negligence is an affirmative one, and the burden is always upon the defendant to establish it; and when there is evidence tending to show that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant, that is all the plaintiff is required to prove. The burden is then cast upon the defendant to show that it occurred without any negligence upon its part; or, if it asserts that the injury was caused by the negligence of the injured party, it must offer proof of that act. Liston v. St. Louis Transfer R. Co. 49 Mo. App. 231, 130 S. W. 381.

Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense the burden of proving which is upon the party pleading it; and it must be established, if at all, by a preponderance of the evidence pertinent to that issue, contained in the whole record. Vertrees v. Gage County, 81 Neb. 213, 115 N. W. 863.

By force of statute as well as a settled rule of decision, the plea of contributory negligence is an affirmative defense in which the burden both of allegation and proof rests upon the defendant. Bolden v. Southern R. Co. 123 N. C. 614, 31 S. E. 851.

Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, and must be proven by the defendant, either by direct evidence or by proof of circumstances from which only the inference of contributory negligence can be drawn. Whaley v. Vidal, — S. D. —, 132 N. W. 248.

Where the plaintiff makes out a case of negligence, the burden of showing contributory negligence is on the defendant. Kings-ton Twp. v. Gibbons, 3 Sadler (Pa.) 399, 18 W. N. C. 344, 6 Atl. 115; Oliver v. Columbia, N. & L. R. Co. 65 S. C. 1, 43 S. E. 307.

If the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, the burden is on the defendants to disprove care, and thus establish negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Pennsylvania Canal Co. v. Bentley, 66 Pa. 30.

It is enough if the proof introduced and the circumstances attending the injury establish prima facie that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of the defendant. Achtenhagen v. Watertown, 18 Wis. 331, 84 Am. Dec. 769.

Where a prima facie case of negligence is made out against the defendant, the burden of proof is then cast upon the defendant to explain the cause of the accident, and to show, if that be the defense, that is on the defendant to establish it.⁹ In the absence of all evidence as to contributory negligence, it is no fault or defect of plaintiff's case that he fails to plead or prove that the defense of contributory negligence does not exist.¹⁰ The plaintiff need not call witnesses to declare the absence of contributory negligence, or to prove acts negating negligence, before the defendant is bound to answer;¹¹ and it has been held that it the plaintiff was negligent, and that such negligence caused or contributed to the production of the injury. Washington, A. & M. T. V. R. Co. v. Chapman, 26 App. D. C. 472, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 721; Kehan v. Washington R. & Electric R. Co. 28 App. D. C. 108.

Where the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant, and injuries resulting from such negligence, without any negligence on his part directly contributing thereto, the burden is on the defendant to show contributory negligence; and in the absence of any evidence tending to show it, it would be error to grant instructions to the effect that if the jury find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, he cannot recover. Anne Arundel County v. Carr, 111 Md. 141, 73 Atl. 668.

Where there is evidence of negligence by the defendant, and the right to maintain the action is resisted upon the theory that the plaintiff has, by his own negligence, so far contributed to the production of the injury as to disentitle him to recover, there the onus probandi of such defense is upon the defendant. Frech v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 39 Md. 574.

In Augusta v. Hudson, 88 Ga. 599, 15 S. E. 678, it was held that when the plaintiff in an action against the owner of a toll bridge proves his injury and the owner's negligence, as alleged, he is not bound to go further and prove his own diligence; want of care on his part being matter of defense.

The burden is on the defendant of proving acts of contributory negligence alleged in the answer. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mayfield, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 415, 56 S. W. 942.

When the plaintiff's declaration is that defendant was guilty of negligence, and that negligence caused the injury in question, and the defendant's plea is that the plaintiff was himself guilty of negligence contributing to cause the injury, the burden of proving the defendant's negligence and its consequence is on the plaintiff, and the burden of proving plaintiff's negligence and its contribution to the injury is on the defendant. Schmidt v. St. Louis R. Co. 149 Mo. 269, 73 Am. St. Rep. 380, 50 S. W. 921.

In an action for negligence when contributory negligence is relied upon as a defense, the burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish such defense unless contributory negligence is disclosed by the petition or by the evidence introduced by the plaintiff in making his case. New Omaha Thompson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Dent, 68 Neb. 668, 94 N. W. 812, 103 N. W. 1091.

If the defendant pleads that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, or that the accident resulted solely from his negligence, the burden is upon the defendant to prove those defenses, and does not shift during the trial of the case. McGahey v. Citizens' R. Co. 88 Neb. 215, 129 N. W. 293.

The plaintiff in an action founded on the alleged negligence of another does not assume the burden of disproving any contributory negligence. Ordinarily the burden of establishing the facts upon which such negligence may be predicated is cast upon the party who makes defense on that ground. Swanwick v. Monongahela City, 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 628.

In an action for damages occasioned by the negligence or misconduct of the defendant, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove the existence of due care and caution on his part, to entitle him to recover. If the defendant relies upon contributory negligence of the plaintiff to defeat the action, he must prove it, unless the fact is disclosed by the evidence of the plaintiff, or may be fairly inferred from all the circumstances. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Whittington, 30 Gratt. 805.

The burden of proving contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff rests upon the defendant unless the plaintiff, in making out his case, proves, or gives evidence tending to prove, that he was guilty of such contributory negligence; and when there is no evidence upon the subject, it is the duty of the court to assume that the plaintiff was not guilty of such contributory negligence, and so instruct the jury. Smith v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 4 S. D. 71, 55 N. W. 717.

is not error to exclude evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff to show freedom from contributory negligence.¹² But the unnecessary admission of evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, showing due care, will not entitle defendant to a reversal.¹³

It is sometimes said that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the party pleading it;¹⁴ but these cases must be understood with the qualification that it is the duty of the defendant to plead it, for, as will be seen later,¹⁵ the fact that the plaintiff unnecessarily alleges that the injured party was free from contributory negligence does not cast upon him the burden of proving it.¹⁶

The rule is often stated in Pennsylvania to be that it is the duty of a plaintiff seeking to recover where the gravamen of the action is the alleged negligence of the defendant, to show a case clear of contributory negligence on his own part. In other words, he must establish a prima facie cause of action resulting exclusively from the negligence and wrong of the defendant before the latter need answer at all.¹⁷ But this does not mean that the plaintiff has the burden of proving absence of fault on the part of the person injured, but simply means that the plaintiff must make out a prima facie case of negligence against the defendant; and that if his own evidence does not disclose contributory negligence, then the burden is on the defendant to establish that issue.¹⁸ This is the way the rule is stated in other jurisdictions where

The burden of proving negligence, whether on the part of the defendant or the plaintiff, rests upon the party by whom such negligence is alleged. Elliott v. Wilmington City R. Co. 6 Penn. (Del.) 570, 3 Atl. 1040.

Negligence and contributory negligence are matters to be proved; and the burden is on the one alleging injury from negligence to establish it, and upon the other, alleging immunity because of contributory negligence, to establish it, unless it is shown by plaintiff's testimony. Millsaps v. 3 L.R.A. In Harrington v. Eureka Hill Min. Co. 17 Utah, 300, 53 Pac. 737, the court said that the rule of evidence undoubtedly is that the burden of proof lies on the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue; and the rule, as applied to proof of contributory negligence in Utah, is, that the defendant is required to allege contributory negligence, and to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence; and the burden is not upon the plaintiff to disprove it.

Contributory negligence is a matter of defense, and the burden of proving it rests on him who alleges it. Eidson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. — Kan. —, 116 Pac. 485.

The burden of proving negligence, whether of the defendant or the plaintiff, rests upon the party by whom such negligence is alleged. Coyle v. People's R. Co. — Del. —, 80 Atl. 638.

¹⁷ Waters v. Wing, 59 Pa. 211.

It is the duty of the plaintiff seeking to recover where the gravamen of the action is the alleged negligence of the defendant, to show a case clear of contributory negligence on his own part. Lancaster v. Kissinger, 11 W. N. C. 151.

¹⁸ In Pennsylvania Canal Co. v. Bentley, 66 Pa. 30, it is said that the Waters Case, supra, note 17, is not authority for the proposition that it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show affirmatively freedom from contributory negligence.

In the light of subsequent explanations, all that was probably meant by the decision in the Waters Case, supra, is, that if the plaintiff's own evidence discloses facts which prove negligence, it is not necessary that the defendant should prove it. This is intimated in Hays v. Gallagher, 72 Pa. 136.

It was never intended to mean by the expression that the plaintiff must present a case clear of contributory negligence, that the plaintiff, after first proving affirmative-the burden is considered to be upon the defendant; that is, if the plaintiff in any case of personal injury can show negligence on the part of the defendant, without at the same time disclosing the inherent weakness of his own case by reason of contributory negligence, then such contributory negligence is a matter of defense (in confession and avoidance), affirmative in its nature, ly that defendant's negligence caused the injury, must also prove negatively that he himself was not guilty of any negligence that contributed to the result. Bradwell v. Pittsburgh & W. E. Pass. R. Co. 139 Pa. 404, 20 Atl. 1046.

The plaintiff is not required to disprove contributory negligence, but only to make out a case clear of it. Raulston v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 13 Pa. Super. 412.

Where the plaintiff is not required to disprove contributory negligence, but only to make out a case clear of it, unless his negligence appears affirmatively, he is entitled to go to the jury on the general presumption against him; and likewise, this is the case where the evidence is conflicting upon that question. Ely v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 158 Pa. 233, 27 Atl. 970.

The plaintiff is not called upon to disprove negligence on his part by negative testimony in the first instance. If he establishes a case against the defendant without disclosing negligence on his own part, he is entitled to go to the jury. Phillips v. Duquesne Traction Co. 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 210, 42 W. N. C. 528; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Weber, 76 Pa. 157, 18 Am. Rep. 407; Fitzpatrick v. Union Traction Co. 206 Pa. 335, 55 Atl. 1050.

A plaintiff in an action for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant is bound to show a case clear of contributory negligence; that is, his own evidence must not contain anything which would show contributory negligence on his part; but he is not bound to prove the negative, and show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. Lewin v. Pauli, 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 447.

Where the gravamen of the action is the alleged negligence of the defendant, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show a case clear of contributory negligence. It is enough that he makes out a case against the defendant without showing that his own want of due care under the circumstances also contributed to the injury. The burden of proving want of ordinary care rests upon the party alleging it; and ordinarily the burden of showing contributory negligence is on the defendant. Kingston Twp. v. Gibbons, 3 Sadler (Pa.) 399, 18 W. N. C. 334, 6 Atl. 115.

In an action to recover damages from a city for personal injuries sustained at an uncovered gutter crossing, it was held that the use of the word "burden" in an instruction that "a burden rests upon the

and the burden is upon the defendant to establish the defense by a preponderance of testimony, as in all other affirmative defenses of like nature.¹⁹ In a decision of the Illinois appellate court it is said that while the burden is on the plaintiff to show due care, yet if the facts and circumstances attending the injury show negligence in the defendant, and do not show any contributory plaintiff, even though the city was negligent. . . . He must make out a case of negligence on the part of the city, free from contributory negligence on his part,"—though perhaps not happily chosen, was not inaccurate. Heiss v. Lancaster, 203 Pa. 260, 52 Atl. 201. The court said that the plaintiff was bound to make out a case clear of contributory negligence, and that this may be properly described as a burden, though a negative one.

If the plaintiff can prove his case without disclosing his own contributory negligence, such negligence is purely a matter of defense, to be established by the defendant. Mares v. Northern P. R. Wyandotte, 20 Kan. 156.

In Stewart v. Nashville, 96 Tenn. 50, 33 S. W. 613, the statement of Judge Dillon in the second volume of his work on Municipal Corporations, § 1026, "That where the plaintiff's contributory fault does not appear from his own testimony, the burden of proof to establish it rests upon the defendant. In other words, the plaintiff is not bound to prove affirmatively that he was himself free from negligence. When the plaintiff's fault is relied upon as a defense to defeat a recovery, the burden to establish such defense rests with the defendant,"—was regarded as an accurate statement of the correct rule.

It is often stated that the plaintiff must show that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant, without any fault or negligence on his part. It would be more correct, it is thought, to say that the plaintiff must show that the injury of which he complains was produced by the negligent acts of the defendant, under such circumstances as did not develop any negligence on his part contributing to his injury. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Murphy, 46 Tex. 356, 26 Am. Rep. 272.

tory negligence in the plaintiff, a prima facie case will be regarded as made out.²⁰ This is a view hardly to be expected from an Illinois court, where the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence has always been held to be on the plaintiff. The court cites as authority a case in the supreme court of Illinois.²¹ There is some language in the opinion of the supreme court, taken from a Michigan case, which might point to the view that it entertained the opinion stated by the appellate court; but this does not seem probable, and if it were, indeed, the fact, it would be obiter, as the court, at the conclusion of its opinion, states: "We entertain no doubt that, under the repeated decisions of this court, as well as upon other authorities, there was competent evidence in this case tending to support the allegation of due care on the part of the deceased, and that the court very properly refused to take it from the jury." To hold that all it is necessary for the plaintiff to do in the first instance is to make out a case free from contributory negligence is to take from the defendant all the practical value of the rule placing the burden upon the plaintiff.

But to return to jurisdictions holding the burden to be upon the defendant. It is there held that the plaintiff, being able to prove the injury and loss by reason of the negligence of defendant, without disclosing any contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, may leave the whole question of contributory negligence to the pleadings and proofs of the defendant, and need not enter upon the negative task of disproving any possible negligence on the part of the deceased; and where there are neither pleadings nor proofs as to the contributory negligence of the deceased, the question is not presented for further consideration.²² If the defendant relies upon the defense, he must become the actor, and introduce his evidence to sustain it.²³ He has the bur-

Under the rule that if the plaintiff makes out a case without disclosing contributory negligence, the burden of proving such negligence is upon the defendant, it was held that in an action to recover for injuries received by falling through a trapdoor in plaintiff's own home, left open by plumbers, a verdict should not have been directed for the defendants because of plaintiff's contributory negligence in walking into the opening, where there was no evidence to show that she had any knowledge that there was any probability that the defendants would leave the trapdoor open. L. W. Pomerene Co. v. White, 70 Neb. 171, 97 N. W. 232, 98 N. W. 1040.

In Owens v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 88 N. C. 502, after a review of many of the leading cases, it is said: "While we do not undertake to reconcile the divergent decisions in reference to the burden of proof, we think a clear deduction from them, and, as well, supported by sound reasoning, is that if, in disclosing the facts which constitute the defendant's negligence, it does not appear whether the plaintiff exhibited the necessary watchfulness and care to avoid the consequent harm or injury, it will be assumed there was no such want of it on his part; and if the plaintiff in any legal sense were the cause, or the concurring cause, of his own injury, the duty of so showing in self-exculpation devolves upon the defendant."

A charge in effect that it rests with defendant to excuse its negligent act by showing contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, unless plaintiff's evidence tends to show in some degree that he was negligent, and that if there is anything in the evidence offered by plaintiff tending to show that he was negligent, he cannot recover unless the whole evidence, taken together, shows that he was not negligent, was upheld. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. O'Neal, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 45 S. W. 921.

Unless the petition alleges a state of facts such as can be said, as a matter of law, to show contributory negligence, or there is such a state of uncontroverted evidence on that issue as will justify the court in deciding, as a matter of law, that contributory negligence has been shown, the issue should be submitted to the jury, and the burden of proof should be on the defendant,—the party asserting such contributory negligence. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Lyons, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 53 S. W. 96.

In Wakelin v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 12 App. Cas. 41, Lord Fitzgerald said: "But if the plaintiff can establish his case in proof without disclosing any matters amounting to contributory negligence, or from which it can be reasonably inferred, then the defendant is left to give such evidence as he can to sustain that issue."

²³ If the plaintiff can make out his case without disclosing contributory negligence, and the defendant relies on such negligence, either to defeat or mitigate recovery, as to this defense, he becomes the actor, and his duty is to make it good by evidence, occupying with regard to it the same attitude as does the party who relies on a release or payment when sued on a contract. *Stewart v. If, after the plaintiff has rested, the case is in such condition as to require submission to the jury, and to put the defendant upon proof of his defense of contributory negligence, then the burden rests on him to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence. *Beatrice v. In Nebraska the rule has always prevailed that if the plaintiff can prove the allegations of his petition, showing his injury and the negligence of the defendant as the proximate cause producing it, then the defendant, in order to defeat a recovery on the ground of contributory negligence of the plaintiff, must establish such negligence by a preponderance of the evidence produced on the trial. Ibid.

In an action against the proprietors of a skating rink for damages for personal injuries, the defendants, after a general denial, having pleaded that the plaintiff's injuries, if any, were caused by her own negligence, it was held not error for the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff having made out a prima facie case, "the burden is on the defendants to establish by a preponderance of the testimony that the plaintiff is guilty of any negligence which caused her injuries." 33 L.R.A. Under an instruction that the burden of proof of contributory negligence rests upon the defendant, and "unless it proves the same to your satisfaction by a preponderance of evidence," etc., it was held that it would have been better to have left out the words "to your satisfaction," since they might tend to confuse the jury, and lead it to believe that something more than weight of evidence or preponderance of probability was required. Hutson v. Southern California R. Co. 150 Cal. 701, 89 Pac. 1093.

The defendant is not obliged to establish contributory negligence by clear and convincing evidence, but, like any other defense, by a preponderance of the evidence. ²⁵ Kansas City, L. & S. R. Co. v. Philibert, 25 Kan. 586.

In an action to recover damages for personal injuries the plaintiff cannot be required to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, such burden being cast upon the defendant; and if the evidence is equally balanced, the fact of contributory negligence is not established, and upon that issue the verdict should be for the plaintiff. Hainlin v. Budge, 56 Fla. 342, 47 So. 825.

In Georgia P. R. Co. v. Davis, 92 Ala. 300, 25 Am. St. Rep. 47, 9 So. 252, the plaintiff was injured by reason of the fact that a rock projected too far in one of the cuts of the defendant's right of way. A charge requested by the defendant, that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of evidence that he was at his post of duty when he was injured, and that if the testimony was equally balanced, or preponderated in favor of defendant, the verdict must be for the defendant, was held to misplace the burden of proof as to contributory negligence, which was on the defendant.

A requested instruction that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that he was free from contributory negligence, and that if the evidence balanced, and the jury could not say that it preponderated either way, to find for the defendant, was held properly refused. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. O'Neal, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 45 S. W. 921.

An instruction that the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff to establish his case by a preponderance of evidence, and that if, on any issue material to plaintiff's recovery, the evidence is of equal weight, to show not only that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, but that the contributory negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, places a heavier burden upon him than the law requires.²⁶

In cases of injuries to servants, as in other negligence actions, the burden of showing contributory negligence is on the defendant, or master.²⁷

It has been said in Texas, that, under certain circumstances, where the case goes to the jury, the propriety of giving an instruction as to the burden of proof is questionable.²⁸

b. May be sustained by circumstantial evidence.

the issue must be determined in favor of the defendant, was held erroneous and misleading, in that it was calculated to lead the jury to believe that the burden of proof upon the question of contributory negligence was on the plaintiff. Lambert v. Western U. Teleg. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 45 S. W. 1034.

It would be incorrect to instruct the jury that if the weight of evidence is in favor of the defendant, or if it is equally balanced, then the plaintiff cannot recover where there is an affirmative plea of contributory negligence which is an issuable fact, since this language is open to the construction that the plaintiff could recover only by having every point or issue found in his favor by the greater weight of evidence; in other words, if the evidence on the issue of contributory negligence was equally balanced, plaintiff could not recover. Hickey v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. 29 Utah, 392, 82 Pac. 29.

²⁸ In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Geiger, 79 Tex. 13, 15 S. right to find such deductions as facts when the facts directly proven tend, according to the evidence of common observation and experience, to prove the deduction.²⁹ So, in an action to recover for the death of an employee of a railroad company, run over and killed while walking on the defendant's track, where the evidence showed that no one saw the deceased on the track, nor saw him at the time he was struck, nor knew the situation he was in, but tended to show that the deceased could have seen and heard the engine which struck him if he had looked or listened, it was held that no such contributory negligence was shown as would defeat the action.³⁰

And where a person for whose death the action was brought was killed at a railroad crossing, and no one saw him until the instant he was struck, and there was no evidence whether he looked or listened for an approaching train, it was held that the burden of proving fault on the part of the deceased being on the defendant, it was not sustained.³¹ In a Pennsylvania by a street car, where the plaintiff's testimony was that he stopped to avoid an approaching car, and the dog started to cross the track, whereupon the plaintiff called him back, and the dog stopped on the track, 75 yards from the approaching car, which was not sounding a gong, and that the motorman was looking ahead in the direction of the dog; and the motorman's testimony was that he first saw the dog on the track under an electric light for a second or two, when the dog left the track and disappeared in the darkness, and then returned, and attempted to cross within a few feet of the car, when it was too late to prevent the accident,—it was held that the court should not have instructed as to the burden of proof on the issue of contributory negligence, but should have left it for the jury to determine whether, under all the facts, the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in permitting his dog to be exposed to the danger of being run over by the car. Marshall v. Dallas Consol. Electric Street R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 73 S. W. 63.

Direct evidence is not required to prove that a person run over and killed failed to look and listen as he approached a railroad crossing, since the surrounding circumstances are often as convincing proof as direct evidence. Stepp v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 229.

case it appeared that the plaintiff, late at night, was found beneath a highway bridge over a railroad, badly injured. He said he had fallen from the bridge, and it appeared that the railing had been torn or worn away at the time of the accident. There was no other evidence as to the manner in which the accident occurred, and the plaintiff, although present at the trial, was not called as a witness, either for himself or for the defendant. He was held entitled to recover.³²

It would seem that the mere happening of the accident would not be sufficient evidence of absence of care on the part of the person injured; and in a Virginia case, it has been held that it cannot be inferred, as a matter of law, that a person killed at a railroad crossing drove upon the track without stopping, and that he did not listen.³³

c. Burden in criminal cases.

It has been held that in criminal prosecutions for negligently causing the death of a person, the rule, as in the case of civil prosecutions, is that the burden of establishing freedom from contributory negligence is on the plaintiff.³⁴ So in a case in which there was an indictment for causing the death of a person at a railroad crossing, the court said that it is now the established law not only of this court, but of the highest courts of this country, that in order to entitle a recovery in this class of action, whether in form civil or criminal, it must affirmatively be shown that the defendants were guilty of negligence, that their negligence was the cause of the accident, and that the injured party was in the exercise of due care and diligence at the time of the injury; or, at least, that the want of such care on his part in no way contributed to produce it. It is not enough to show that the defendants were negligent.³⁵

d. Misleading instructions where burden is on the defendant.

In jurisdictions where the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, care is required of the courts in instructing the jury to avoid leaving the impression that this burden can be discharged only by evidence offered on behalf of the defendant. An instruction in such form that the jury may imply therefrom that the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff can be established only by testimony of the defendant's witnesses is, of course, materially erroneous.³⁶ A charge that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish contributory negligence is not rendered incorrect by reason of the fact that contributory negligence may be established by plaintiff's own evidence.³⁷ And a charge that the defendant must establish the defense of contributory negligence by a preponderance of evidence has been held not misleading.³⁸ That it might mislead the jury has been held

In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Schneider, 40 Ind. App. 38, 80 N. E. 985, an instruction that "it is the law at this time that where a person is injured on a railroad crossing of a public highway, the presumption is that the plaintiff used the degree of care and caution that the law requires. This presumption, however, may be removed by the evidence, and the burden is upon the defendant to remove that presumption,"—was held not open to the objection that it necessarily gave the jury the impression that evidence of contributory negligence could come only from the defendant's witnesses.

Where the court informed the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiff of proving negligence on the part of the defendant, and the burden was upon the defendant of proving contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it was held that, as reasonable men, they must have understood from the entire charge that they were to decide those issues from all the evidence bearing upon them; and that in so doing, they were not limited to the consideration of the evidence offered by either side. Harrington v. Eureka Hill Min. Co. 17 Utah, 300, 53 Pac. 737.

An instruction that contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, to be established by the defendant, and such contribunot to make it erroneous.³⁹ It has been said that while such a charge is not a model of clearness, it contains no erroneous principle of law.⁴⁰ Other charges that have been upheld are that the burden is on the defendant to establish contributory neglitory negligence must be shown by the defendant, by a preponderance of the evidence, to have been the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, is not open to the objection that it indicated that contributory negligence could be established only by the defendant's own testimony. Wistrom v. Redlick Bros. 6 Cal. App. 671, 92 Pac. 1048.

An instruction that the burden is cast upon the defendant to prove by a fair preponderance of the evidence is not erroneous, on the theory that in effect it tells the jury that the defendant must prove the fact by its own evidence. New Castle Bridge Co. v. Doty, 168 Ind. 259, 79 N. E. 485. The court said that the party having the burden of proof in any issue in any case, and who must secure a preponderance on penalty of failure, has a right to have the jury explore the entire field of the evidence, and make available in his behalf not only the evidence produced by the party himself, but also all the evidence in his favor that may have been produced by the opposite party, directly or otherwise, either express or that may arise by implication from facts proved by the opponent, or from facts and circumstances otherwise appearing in the case. In other words, in determining any issue or fact in a judicial proceeding, all items of evidence for or against, whether brought into the case by this party or that, should be properly credited by the jury, and when so credited, if the whole evidence preponderates in weight in favor of the party having the burden of proof, he wins; but if it appears evenly balanced, or preponderates against him, he loses; and any instruction that conveys a different conception will be either erroneous or misleading.

An instruction that the burden of proving contributory negligence rests on the defendant, and that unless the defendant has proven such contributory negligence by a preponderance of evidence, he cannot recover, does not deprive the defendant of the benefit of the plaintiff's own evidence upon that subject. Maguire v. St. Louis Transit Co. 103 Mo. App. 459, 78 S. W. 838.

A charge in effect that if plaintiff has established by a preponderance of evidence the defendant's negligence, the burden shifts to the defendant, and it must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the alleged accident, if any, was caused by reason of the contributory negligence of the injured person, was held not open to the objection that it required the defendant to show by a preponderance of evidence, that the accident was not caused by its negligence, and also, that it was caused by the contribugence, and that this must be determined, the same as all other questions at issue, from the facts and circumstances proven in the case; ⁴¹ that the burden of proving that the plaintiff contributed to the injury is upon the defendant, where the court also tory negligence of the injured person, the meaning of the instruction being that the burden was on the defendant to show that the accident was caused by contributory negligence instead of defendant's own negligence. El Paso Electric R. Co. v. Kitt, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 99 S. W. 587.

And in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Elmore, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 56, 79 S. W. 891, it was held that the jury would not infer that they could look only to the evidence of the defendant upon the issue of contributory negligence under a charge that where the defendant relies upon such negligence to defeat the action, it devolves upon him to establish the same by a preponderance of the evidence.

⁴¹ In an action to recover for injuries received by reason of a defective sidewalk, an instruction that if the jury should find that plaintiff would be entitled to recover but for her own contributory negligence, the burden would be on the defendant to establish such negligence, and this must be determined the same as all other questions at issue from the facts and circumstances proven in the case,—was held not open to the objection that it left the impression that contributory negligence must be established by the defendant's evidence alone, and that the defendant could not avail itself of evidence offered by the plaintiff, showing such negligence. Topeka v. Myers, 10 Kan. App. 576, 63 Pac. 273.

makes it plain that the defendant is entitled to any evidence offered by the plaintiff tending to sustain this issue.⁴²

On the other hand, an instruction that "the burden of proof is upon the defendants to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was careless and negligent, and that his carelessness and negligence directly contributed to the injury which he received, and if the evidence upon such matters, if any there be, is evenly balanced, or if it preponderates in favor of the plaintiff, then the defendant, failing to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, cannot defeat the claim of the plaintiff upon that ground,"—was held to be erroneous because it would leave upon the jury the impression that unless the defendants by their evidence established contributory negligence, the defense as to such negligence would fail.⁴³

⁴² The mere fact that the court instructs the jury that the burden of proving that the plaintiff proximately contributed to the injury is upon the defendant does not prevent the defendant from having the benefit of the evidence of the plaintiff on the question of contributory negligence, and is therefore not erroneous, especially where, in response to a request of the defendant, the court instructs the jury that although, upon the question of contributory negligence, the burden of proof is upon the defendant, yet that contributory negligence may be inferred from the evidence of the plaintiff. Winamac v. Stout, 165 Ind. 365, 75 N. E. 158, 651.

A charge that the burden is on the defendant is not likely to mislead the jury into believing that such proof must come from the defendant alone, where the court also instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover if it appeared by a preponderance of the evidence that the person for whose death the action was brought failed to use ordinary care in going upon the track upon which he was killed, or if they believed from the evidence that he failed to exercise ordinary care at the time he was killed. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Howard, 96 Tex. 585, 75 S. W. 805.

Even where the plaintiff's testimony raises an issue of contributory negligence, a charge that the burden of proof upon that issue is upon the defendant is not misleading, where the jury is expressly told that, in determining that issue, they are to look to all of the testimony, by whomsoever introduced. General Electric Co. v. Murray, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 226, 74 S. W. 50.

The defendant has no ground for complaining of an instruction that the burden of proof is on the defendant to show contributory negligence of the plaintiff by a preponderance of evidence, where they are told in the same connection that the plaintiff's own evidence may be considered in determining this question, and if contributory negligence appears from it, or from it and other evidence, it will be sufficient to establish such negligence. Waterman v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 82 Wis. 613, 52 N. W. 247, 1136.

An instruction that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant is not erroneous because of the fact that it fails to contain the qualification, "unless such contributory negligence appears from plaintiff's testimony." Little Rock R. & Electric Co. v. Doyle, 79 Ark. 378, 96 S. W. 353.

An instruction that the defendant has the burden of proving contributory negligence, and is required to establish it by a preponderance of the evidence, is not open to the objection that it is calculated to make the jury believe that, in passing upon the truth of the plea, it can look only to the evidence produced by the defendant (Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wilhoit, 87 C. C. A. 401, 160 Fed. 440), where the court also charges that the defendant may establish such negligence either by the evidence it introduces, or by the plaintiff's evidence.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wiggam, — Ark. —, 135 S. W. 889, it was held not erroneous to tell the jury that the burden of showing contributory negligence is upon the defendant, where the defendant pleaded that defense, and introduced evidence to establish it, and where it was evident that the court meant that the jury should consider all the evidence in the case upon that subject.

And an instruction that the burden of proof is on the defendant to prove that the plaintiff was negligent, and that his negligence directly contributed to the injury complained of, and it must establish such facts by a preponderance of the evidence, was held to be misleading, in that it tended to leave out of consideration any negligent act of the plaintiff appearing in the evidence introduced to support his side of the case, and in that it tended to minimize the effect of any negligent conduct of his which might have defeated the action had the defendant introduced no evidence. Burns v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 66 Kan. 188, 71 Pac. 244.

In an action to recover for injuries to a passenger by the sudden starting of a train while she was attempting to alight, an instruction that the jury were not entitled to presume that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, but that if that fact is relied upon by the defendant, it must be proved by the defendant by preponderating testimony, and if the jury should find that their minds were in a state of equipoise as to whether she was guilty of negligence or not, they could not find that she was guilty of negligence, was held erroneous, as depriving the defendant of the benefit of evidence of the plaintiff showing contributory negligence. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hand, 101 Md. 233, 61 Atl. 285. The court said that it can make no possible difference whether that negligence is proved by the plaintiff

And under a statute placing the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant, an instruction that "if it affirmatively appears from the evidence that the plaintiff did not use due care to discover the approach of cars upon defendant's track before he attempted to cross the same, he cannot recover for any alleged negligence of the defendant," was improperly modified by adding the words: "But the burden of proving contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff rests on the defendant." 44

All that it is necessary for the court to or the defendant. It is its existence, and not the party by whom its existence is proved, that is material. It is the thing itself that defeats the action, and not the mere accident that it happened to be proved by the one or the other of the opposite parties. It is just as complete a bar to the action when its presence is revealed in the evidence introduced by the plaintiff as it is when disclosed in the testimony adduced by the defendant. Inasmuch, then, as the negligence of the plaintiff directly contributing to the happening of the injury sustained bars a recovery, it would seem a priori that it is absolutely of no consequence by which party to the suit that negligence is proved.

An instruction placing the burden of proof of contributory negligence on the defendant, without qualification, is erroneous, since it is susceptible of misleading the jury into believing that the burden can be discharged only by evidence offered by the defendant. Suderman v. Kriger, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 29, 109 S. W. 373.

An instruction that if the plaintiff shall have established his case by a preponderance of the evidence, then the burden rests upon the defendant to establish by a preponderance of evidence the defense of contributory negligence pleaded by it, followed by a refusal to instruct that the burden of proof is on the defendant to show contributory negligence unless it appears from the plaintiff's own evidence, was held erroneous, on the ground that the jury might have understood it to mean that the defendant, in order to prevail upon the issue, must have adduced some evidence, or, in other words, that there must have been some evidence coming from its own side, tending to show contributory negligence, although the plaintiff's evidence may have made that fact apparent. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Reed, 88 Tex. 39, 31 S. W. 1058.

If the plaintiff's evidence makes it necessary that he explain the conduct of the deceased, in order to exculpate him from the charge of contributory negligence, it is improper for the court to charge the jury that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish the defense of contributory negligence, because such a charge is calculated to lead the jury to believe that they shall consider alone the evidence offered by the defendant on that issue. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill, 95 Tex. 629, 69 S. W. 136.

An instruction that the burden of proof is upon the defendants to show that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and that the defendants must prove that fact by a fair preponderance of the evidence, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.)

dence, was held erroneous, for the reason that it was equivalent to telling the jury that it must not charge the plaintiff with fault unless the defendants have proved the fact by a preponderance of the evidence, thus depriving the defendants of the benefit of any evidence that may have been disclosed by the plaintiff and his witnesses. Indianapolis v. Cauley, 164 Ind. 304, 73 N. E. 691.

But an instruction that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove the want of contributory negligence, but that the burden of establishing such contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff rests on the defendant, and that the same must be established by the defendant by a fair preponderance of evidence, was held (one judge dissenting) not so phrased as to lead the jury to conclude that the defendant could not avail itself of all the facts and circumstances which appeared as part of the plaintiff's case. M. S. Huey Co. v. Johnston, 164 Ind. 489, 73 N. E. 996. While there was a division in the court as to whether the giving of the instruction was reversible error, all of the judges agreed that its form was not to be commended.

And in an action to recover for injuries received by the upsetting of a wagon by a horse frightened by a banner displayed on a car driven at high speed, an instruction that the burden was upon the defendant to prove contributory negligence, if any, was held harmless error, where there was no evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff from which contributory negligence could be inferred. Indianapolis & G. Rapid Transit Co. v. Haines, 33 Ind. App. 63, 69 N. E. 187.

An instruction that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show negligence on the part of the deceased which contributed to his death, although erroneous, because leaving the impression upon the jury that the defense of contributory negligence must fail unless established by the defendant's testimony, was held not prejudicial in an action brought to recover for the death of a track repairer, run over by an engine, where there was no sharp conflict between the evidence of the plaintiff and the defendant as to plaintiff's negligence, and no person saw the deceased immediately before the accident, and neither the evidence of plaintiff nor that offered by defendant told the jury what his conduct was. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bentley, 78 Kan. 221, 93 Pac. 150, 90 Pac. 800.

An instruction which states that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish the defense of contributory negligence is not open to the objection that the jury might have been misled, when none of

do after instructing the jury that the burden is on the defendant is to make it clear that the defendant is entitled to the favorable testimony of the plaintiff on this issue, and that, in determining whether the issue has been established, they may look to all of the evidence in the case.⁴⁵ So, an instruction that contributory negligence is a defense, and if it is shown by the evidence to exist, the plaintiff cannot recover; that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, but it may arise in the whole evidence,—was held correct.⁴⁶ The better practice in such cases the evidence of plaintiff tends to prove contributory negligence. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson, 74 Kan. 83, 86 Pac. 156.

⁴⁵ An instruction that the defendant in his answer having alleged contributory negligence, the burden of proof is upon him to establish this allegation by a preponderance of the evidence, is bad in ignoring the fact that contributory negligence may be established by the plaintiff's own evidence; and the court should have added this qualification: "Unless you find from the plaintiff's own testimony that he was guilty of contributory negligence." Durrell v. Johnson, 31 Neb. 796, 48 N. W. 890.

In holding that a charge that the burden was on the defendant to prove the material allegations of its defense of contributory negligence was misleading and erroneous where the testimony of the plaintiff tended to show contributory negligence, since it was calculated to cause the jury to believe that, in considering the question of such negligence, they were not to consider evidence submitted by the plaintiff, it was declared that the court should have charged that the burden was on the defendant, but that the jury might take into consideration all the evidence bearing on that question, whether offered by the plaintiff or the defendant. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Howard, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 75 S. W. 803.

Under a statute placing the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant, an instruction that the burden of proving that a boy killed at a railroad crossing was guilty of contributory negligence was upon the defendant, and that the defendant must prove that fact by a fair preponderance of the evidence, although erroneous, was held cured by another instruction to the effect that such negligence need not be established by the evidence introduced by the defendant, but that it would be sufficient if it was made to appear by a preponderance of the evidence given in the case, whether by the defendant or by the plaintiff. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Miles, 162 Ind. 646, 70 N. E. 985.

An instruction that while the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that a person killed at a railroad crossing was guilty of contributory negligence, it is not required to be done by its own evidence; if the evidence introduced by the plaintiff shows that the deceased might, by the use of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the injury, then in such case he was guilty of contributory negligence which prevents a recovery,—was held proper. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Rogers, — Ind. App. —, 87 N. E. 28.

In cases in which plaintiff's evidence raises an issue of contributory negligence, an instruction that the burden of proving such negligence is on the defendant is misleading, unless the jury are also instructed that, in determining such issue, they may look to all the evidence in the case, whether introduced by the plaintiff or defendant. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Melville, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 87 S. W. 863.

⁴⁶ Sellersburg v. Ford, 39 Ind. App. 94, 79 N. E. 220.

And in an action to recover for injuries received by driving a wagon into a dangerous hole in a street, instructions that the burden of proof is upon the city on this point to satisfy the jury that the plaintiff was not exercising due care for his own safety, and that such conduct on his part contributed towards the happening of the accident, and that the burden of proof is on the defendant to establish, by a fair preponderance of all the evidence in the case, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury, were upheld. Indianapolis v. Mullally, 38 Ind. App. 125, 77 N. E. 1132.

And in an action to recover for the death of a woman who, while driving with her husband, was killed at a railroad crossing, an instruction that whether there was negligence on the part of the deceased that contributed towards producing her death, or negligence on the part of the husband, which was imputable to her, and which contributed toward her death, were matters as to which the burden of proof was upon the defendant, but they were matters to be determined upon the whole evidence, was held proper. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Robbins, 38 Ind. App. 172, 76 N. E. 804.

In an action by a passenger to recover for injuries received while alighting from a car, an instruction that if the whole evidence in the case showed contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part, whether such evidence were produced either by plaintiff or defendant, or by both combined, then such defense was made out, was held not open to the objection that it effectually deprived defendant of the defense of contributory negligence, on the theory that unless all plaintiff's as well as defendant's evidence proved it, the defendant had failed to come up to the measure of the amount of proof prescribed by the court. The court declared that the fair meaning of the instruction was that, if the evidence as a whole, whether produced by the plaintiff or defendant, established such contributory negligence, it would be a defense to the ac-would be to guard against such a possible construction, and so frame the charge upon that issue as to permit the jury to take into consideration all the testimony admitted, both of the plaintiff and of the defendant, in determining whether or not contributory negligence has been shown.⁴⁷

It has been suggested that an instruction that the burden is upon the defendant unless contributory negligence appears from the evidence of the plaintiff himself is misleading, in that it might incline the jury to the belief that evidence of contributory negligence given for the plaintiff other than by himself might not be taken into consideration.⁴⁸

tion and prevent a recovery. Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Miller, 43 Ind. App. 717, 88 N. E. 526.

But an instruction that the defendant must prove the defense of contributory negligence by a fair preponderance of all of the evidence, and an instruction that if the plaintiff had proved the material allegations of his complaint by a fair preponderance of all the evidence he would be entitled to recover, "unless you further find that the defendant has proved by a fair preponderance of all the evidence that the plaintiff's negligence contributed to his injury," were held erroneous, because implying that the contributory negligence must be shown by the defendant's negligence alone. Indianapolis & E. R. Co. v. Barnes, 35 Ind. App. 485, 74 N. E. 583. The court said that this was by no means equivalent to a charge that if the material allegations of the complaint be proved by a fair preponderance of the evidence, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover unless contributory negligence has been proved by a fair preponderance of the evidence.

⁴⁷ Suderman v. Kriger, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 29, 109 S. W. 373.

An instruction that the burden of proof of contributory negligence is on the defendant unless it appear from "plaintiff's own testimony" was held not open to the objection that it referred only to the testimony given by plaintiff himself. It was held to refer to all the testimony produced on plaintiff's behalf. New Omaha Thomson-

e. Effect of appearance of contributory negligence in plaintiff's own evidence.

1. In general.

The rule as to proving contributory negligence is often stated to be that the burden is on the defendant unless the plaintiff's own evidence establishes it.⁴⁹ It is said that the reason of the rule ceases, and it can have no application, when the plaintiff, by his own evidence, shows negligence on his part, and such negligence aided or contributed to the injury received. By such evidence he establishes a defense to his own action as much as if the same facts were Houston Electric Light Co. v. Baldwin, 62 Neb. 180, 87 N. W. 27.

But a modification of an instruction that the burden is upon the defendant to prove contributory negligence by the preponderance of evidence "unless the jury believe from the evidence of the plaintiff himself that he was guilty of contributory negligence" was held misleading, since the jury might consider that only the evidence of the plaintiff himself was to be considered on this point, and not the evidence of all the witnesses introduced by the plaintiff. Washington, A. & Mt. V. R. Co. v. Vaughan, 111 Va. 785, 69 S. E. 1035.

In Savannah & M. R. Co. v. Shearer, 59 Ala. 672, an action to recover damages for killing a person on the tracks of a railroad, it was said that contributory negligence, proved by the defendant.⁵⁰ The rule does not mean that the burden must be discharged by defendant's own evidence.⁵¹ Very generally the proof offered to show the negligence of the defendant discloses the conduct of all the parties concerned, and enables the court or the jury to determine which of the parties was, or were, really in fault.⁵² Contributory negligence may in fact be established by plaintiff's evidence alone.⁵³

Under the Indiana statute making the

when it exists, must generally spring out of the facts and circumstances which prove the injury. Hence, the court cannot say, as a matter of law, that the onus of proving it rests on the defendant. It evidently rests on the defendant unless the testimony which seeks to fix the blame on the defendant also inculcates the plaintiff.

Negligence on the part of the plaintiff is a mere matter of defense, to be proved affirmatively by the defendant, and which must be established by a preponderance of evidence, but which may be inferred from the circumstances proved by the plaintiff. Sanders v. Reister, 1 Dak. 151, 46 N. W. 680.

An instruction that the burden of proof is on the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, unless the evidence of the plaintiff or his own witnesses shows him guilty of contributory negligence, does not leave to the jury the question of determining where the burden rests. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Conway, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 68, 98 S. W. 1070.

⁵⁰ Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cavenesse, 48 Ark. 106, 2 S. W. 505; to the same effect, Hill v. New Haven, 37 Vt. 501, 88 Am. Dec. 613.

The reason that recovery is defeated when evidence of contributory negligence is offered by the plaintiff is that it negatives the affirmative fact which plaintiff must establish to make out his case, that the sole proximate cause of the alleged injury is the culpable negligence of the defendant. Hocum v. Weitherick, 22 Minn. 152.

⁵¹ Where the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, it does not follow that it must be established by the defendant's evidence alone. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. v. Reynolds, — Ind. App. —, 90 N. E. 94.

The rule that the defendant has the burden of proof does not mean that the defendant must introduce evidence of contributory negligence, even though such negligence is shown by the evidence of the plaintiff. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Sparks, 81 Ark. 187, 99 S. W. 73.

The rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant does not require the defendant to establish this with his own testimony, but he may rely on that offered by the plaintiff. O'Hara v. Central R. Co. 183 Fed. 739.

If the plaintiff's evidence shows contributory negligence, it is unnecessary for defendant to introduce evidence to establish his plea of contributory negligence. Bridges v. Jackson Electric R. Light & P. Co. 86 Miss. 584, 38 So. 788, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 662.

The rule that contributory negligence is a defense, which must be affirmatively proved by the defendant, upon whom the burden rests to show such negligence, and that it must be established by a preponderance of testimony, was held not to prevent the defendant from taking advantage of the proof of contributory negligence when introduced by the plaintiff, it being said that in such case the defendant is relieved from the necessity of introducing additional evidence on the point. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Baker, 67 Ark. 531, 55 S. W. 941.

The burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish contributory negligence, but in reaching the conclusion upon such issue, the jury may take into consideration all the evidence of the case. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Worcester, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 501, 100 S. W. 990.

When the case goes to the jury, the proof of contributory negligence must be submitted to them not alone upon the proof offered by the defendant in that behalf, but they must consider also any proof coming from the plaintiff or his witnesses, tending to establish that defense. Beatrice v. Forbes, 74 Neb. 125, 103 N. W. 1069.

⁵² Frech v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 39 Md. 574.

In State use of Bacon v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 58 Md. 482, it is said that it is not unfrequently the case that material defensive facts are disclosed by the testimony adduced on the part of the plaintiff, and where such is the case, and the evidence thus adduced by the plaintiff clearly establishes the fact of contributory negligence on the part of the party killed or injured, there is really nothing to be left to the jury to find. For while it is perfectly clear that where the plaintiff adduces evidence which, if uncontradicted, would justify and sustain a verdict, no amount of contradictory evidence, however strong, will justify the court in withdrawing the case from the jury; yet if it be proved as part of the plaintiff's case, or if it be otherwise proved, and not controverted or denied by the plaintiff, that the party injured or killed was clearly guilty of negligence in the occurrence of the accident, and that such accident would not have occurred but for the negligence of the party injured, directly contributing thereto, in such case the defendant is entitled to have the jury instructed that their verdict must be for the defendant.

burden of proving contributory negligence rest upon the defendant, it is held that the defendant may nevertheless be entitled to the advantage of the plaintiff's evidence upon this question.⁵⁴

The rule that when plaintiff's own case discloses contributory negligence, he cannot recover, is not peculiar to negligence actions, says the court in a Pennsylvania case; if, in an action on a book account, the plaintiff's own evidence shows that it has been paid, he must fail. But that does not establish that the onus of proving affirmatively that the account has not been paid is on him.⁵⁵ It is, indeed, immaterial whether the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, or on the plaintiff, if the plaintiff's evidence in fact establishes it.⁵⁶ Where it affirmatively appears from plaintiff's evidence that the

The defendant may rest upon proof of contributory negligence in plaintiff's own testimony as securely as if he had proved it himself. Cleveland & P. R. Co. v. Rowan, 36 Pa. 393.

If the plaintiff's own evidence shows contributory negligence, he cannot recover. Grant v. Baker, 12 Or. 329, 7 Pac. 318; Gerity v. Haley, 29 W. Va. 98, 11 S. E. 101.

Although plaintiff is not required to show want of negligence, yet if negligence on his part is disclosed by his case, it will defeat his right of recovery. Pereira v. Star Sand Co. 51 Or. 477, 94 Pac. 835; Scott v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 14 Or. 211, 13 Pac. 98; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Weber, 76 Pa. 157, 18 Am. Rep. 407; Winchester v. Carroll, 99 Va. 727, 10 S. E. 37.

Although contributory negligence is a matter of defense, yet if it appears by plaintiff's case that he is chargeable with such negligence, it is sufficient to defeat his right of recovery. Brennan v. Front Street Cable R. Co. 8 Wash. 363, 36 Pac. 272.

If it should appear from plaintiff's own proof, offered for the purpose of establishing defendant's negligence, that he was also guilty of negligence without which the injury complained of would not have occurred, such proof will defeat a recovery. Tucker v. Northern P. Terminal Co. 41 Or. 82, 68 Pac. 26; Gentzkow v. Portland R. Co. 54 Or. 14, 135 Am. St. Rep. 821, 102 Pac. 614.

Where negligence is the ground of the action, it rests upon the plaintiff to trace the fault for his injury to the defendant; and for this purpose he must show the circumstances under which the injury occurred; and from these circumstances, so proven by the plaintiff, it appears that the fault was mutual, or in other words, that contributory negligence is fairly imputable to him, he has, by proving the circumstances disproved his right to recover, and on the plaintiff's evidence alone the jury should find for the defendant. Butcher v. West Virginia & P. R. Co. 37 W. Va. 180, 8 L.R.A. 519, 16 S. E. 457; Overby v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. 813.

⁵⁶ If plaintiff's declaration or evidence establishes his own contributory negligence, it bars his recovery, no matter where the burden rests. Jackson v. Sumpter Valley R. Co. 50 Or. 455, 93 Pac. 356.

In Ryan v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 806, 11 So. 30, it was said that courts and text writers are divided as to where lies the burden of proof on the question of contributory negligence, but that all agree that if the plaintiff's own evidence establishes or strongly suggests his own contributory negligence, that bars recovery, no matter where the burden rests, unless he shall remove or explain away the adverse presumption thus created.

Practically all the courts agree that the fact of contributory negligence is fatal to the plaintiff's case (unless changed by statute), no matter how it appears, whether by affirmative evidence on the part of the defendant or by inference from the evidence on the part of the plaintiff. It is quite immaterial who proves the fact, so long as it is proved. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 106.

Although the defense of contributory negligence must be established by the defendant, it is not important whether the evidence showing it comes from the plaintiff or from the defendant. Schutt v. Adair, 99 Minn. 7, 108 N. W. 811. To the same effect, Robostelli v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 33 Fed. 800; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Reed, 36 Ind. App. 67, 75 N. E. 50; Indianapolis v. Mullally, 38 Ind. App. 125, 77 N. E. 1132; Stephens v. American Car & Foundry Co. 39 Ind. App. 414, 78 N. E. 335; Lind v. Uniform Stave & Package Co. 140 Wis. 183, 120 N. W. 839.

A charge that, in determining whether the defendant has "discharged" the burden of proving contributory negligence, the jury may look to all the facts and circumstances introduced in the evidence of either the plaintiff or defendant, or both, is not, in legal effect, materially different from one in which the jury is directed to examine the evidence to determine "whether the plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence." Beaumont Traction Co. v. Happ, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 122 S. W. 610.

An instruction that the burden of proving want of due prudence on his part was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, he cannot recover,⁵⁷ but may be nonsuited.⁵⁸ In North and South Carolina, contributory negligence was upon the railroad company, but that if the negligence of a person killed at a crossing affirmatively appeared from the evidence, it was immaterial upon whom the burden of proof rested; since in that event the plaintiff could not recover, was held not open to objection by the railroad company. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Berndt, 172 Ind. 697, 88 N. E. 612.

The inference of this co-operating agency may be drawn from the plaintiff's proof of the defendant's neglect or misconduct, as well as by substantive and independent testimony produced by the defendant. Owens v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 88 N. C. 502.

If it appears from the testimony of the plaintiff that the person sustaining the injury was guilty of negligence without which the injury complained of would not have happened, such proof, as a matter of law, will defeat a recovery. Carroll v. Grande Ronde Electric Co. 47 Or. 424, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 290, 84 Pac. 389.

While contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is a matter of defense, still, if the plaintiff's evidence shows that the injury was a proximate result of contributory negligence, a prima facie case has not been made out, and notwithstanding the negligence of the defendant, a demurrer to the evidence should be sustained. Union P. R. Co. v. Adams, 33 Kan. 427, 6 Pac. 529.

⁵⁸ Denver v. Dunsmore, 7 Colo. 328, 3 Pac. 705; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Baker, — Ind. Terr. —, 104 S. W. 1182.

If contributory negligence appears from the plaintiff's evidence, that is ground for dismissing his complaint. Wilson v. Northern P. R. Co. 26 Minn. 278, 37 Am. Rep. 410, 3 N. W. 333.

The rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant does not preclude a court from directing judgment by way of nonsuit whenever the evidence of the plaintiff conclusively establishes a defense which would lead the court to grant a new trial in case of a verdict in favor of plaintiff upon like evidence. McQuilken v. Central P. R. Co. 50 Cal. 7; Nagle v. California Southern R. Co. 88 Cal. 86, 25 Pac. 1106.

While the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, yet, when it appears from the undisputed facts shown by the plaintiff's own evidence that the person killed had not exercised such care as men of prudence usually exercise in positions of like exposure to danger, the question was held to be one of law for the court, it being declared that such negligence will prevent recovery. McGraw v. Friend & T. Lumber Co. 120 Cal. 574, 52 Pac. 1004.

If it appears without any conflict of evidence, from plaintiff's own case, or from the cross-examination of his witnesses, that he was guilty of negligence proximately contributing to produce the injury, it 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

will be the duty of the court to take the case from the jury by declaring, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff cannot recover. Buesching v. St. Louis Gaslight Co. 73 Mo. 219, 39 Am. Rep. 503.

In an action for a nuisance in causing to be made and continued, without sufficient cover or railing, an open area adjacent to a building of the defendant, into which the plaintiff, in the nighttime, fell and was injured, it was held that if want of care appeared by the plaintiff's own case, he must be nonsuited; for then he supplied his adversary with what is usually a matter of defense. Durant v. Palmer, 29 N. J. L. 544.

It is not the rule that if there is evidence of any negligence on the part of the defendant, that whatever may be the evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the issue must go to the jury, but if contributory negligence appears from the plaintiff's testimony, he may be nonsuited. Smith v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 99 N. C. 241, 5 S. E. 896.

In an action against a municipal corporation for injuries caused by an obstruction of a street or sidewalk, when the evidence of the plaintiff proves such facts and circumstances as shows that he was guilty of contributory negligence in causing the injuries, the court should, on the motion of the defendant, exclude all the plaintiff's evidence from the jury. Hesser v. Grafton, 33 W. Va. 548, 11 S. E. 211.

In New Jersey Exp. Co. v. Nichols, 33 N. J. L. 434, 97 Am. Dec. 722, it is said that it is undoubtedly the law of New Jersey that if it appears by the plaintiff's evidence that his own negligence contributed to the injury, it is the duty of the court to nonsuit.

Another rule from which there seems to be no dissent except in North Carolina is, that if the evidence in plaintiff's behalf establishes beyond question that his own omission to use ordinary care contributed immediately to or itself caused the injury, the court should on motion direct a verdict or grant a nonsuit. Cummings v. Helena & L. Smelting & Reduction Co. 26 Mont. 434, 68 Pac. 852.

In Hoyt v. Hudson, 41 Wis. 105, 22 Am. Rep. 714, it was held that the burden is on the defendant, where plaintiff's evidence does not tend to show contributory negligence; that if it tends to show contributory negligence, the case is for the jury; but that if it conclusively shows such negligence, a nonsuit should be granted.

In Prideaux v. Mineral Point, 43 Wis. 513, 28 Am. Rep. 558, it is said that the Hoyt Case, supra, does not put the onus probandi in all cases upon the defendant. "The rule intended in that case," said the court, "is, that a plaintiff giving evidence of the negligence of the defendant and the resulting injury to himself, without showing any contributory negligence, is bound

however, the rule as to nonsuit is otherwise.⁵⁹

It is also said that where the plaintiff's testimony discloses contributory negligence, a demurrer to the evidence should be sustained.⁶⁰ It has been held that it is competent for the trial court, on a motion for peremptory instruction, and also for the appellate court, in reviewing the judgment, to determine whether the defense of contributory negligence has been so fully developed by the plaintiff's own evidence as to justify sustaining the motion.⁶¹ But it has been declared that the court can only direct a nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff's evidence shows contributory negligence, where the plaintiff's evidence discloses facts which in law amount to such evidence. It is not enough that plaintiff's evidence may simply tend to establish such a state of facts.⁶²

The negligence must, it is said, be established by a preponderance of the evidence, without regard to its source.⁶³ The testimony must be such as to raise an unavoidable inference of negligence on the part of the person injured.⁶⁴ Even when contributory negligence is sufficiently dis-to go no further; he is not required to negate his own negligence. If, however, the plaintiff, in proving the injury, shows contributory negligence sufficient to defeat the action, he disproves his own case of injury by the negligence of the defendant alone. If the plaintiff's evidence leave no doubt of the fact, his contributory negligence is taken, as matter of law, to warrant a nonsuit. If the plaintiff's evidence leave the fact in doubt, the evidence of contributory negligence on both sides should go to the jury. This was perhaps not as clearly stated as it might have been, and has been criticized. Properly understood, the rule in Hoyt v. Hudson makes no confusion between the burden of proof and the weight of evidence; is sounder in principle and easier in practice than the rule in Massachusetts, which, with great deference for that court, this court then declined to adopt. The true ground of reversal in Hoyt v. Hudson was, that the charge of the court submitted the question of contributory negligence to the jury when there was no evidence of contributory negligence on either side; giving the jury to believe that the plaintiff was bound affirmatively to disprove it."

It is true that contributory negligence may be shown by the evidence of the plaintiff, but whether the weight of that evidence is sufficient to overcome the presumption in his favor arising from the burden of proof is a question for the jury. Bolden v. Southern R. Co. 123 N. C. 614, 31 S. E. 851.

In South Carolina a nonsuit cannot be granted upon the ground that the evidence shows contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, for the very obvious reason that it involves the decision of a question of fact of which, under the South Carolina Constitution, the jury alone has cognizance in a law case. Whaley v. Bartlett, 42 S. C. 454, 20 S. E. 745.

⁶⁰ Where an action is brought to recover for personal injuries, and the plaintiff's testimony shows that his own negligence contributed directly to the injury, he has failed to make out a prima facie right of recovery, and a demurrer interposed to the evidence should be sustained. Dewald v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 44 Kan. 586, 24 Pac. 1101.

⁶¹ Cahill v. Cincinnati, N. O. & P. R. Co. 92 Ky. 345, 18 S. W. 2.

⁶² Baker v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 122 Mo. 533, 26 S. W. 20.

If plaintiff's evidence conclusively shows contributory negligence, no burden in that direction rests upon the defendant, and in that situation, the court should take the case from the jury. Ouverson v. Grafton, 5 N. D. 281, 65 N. W. 676.

If, in the trial of an action to recover damages for personal injuries, the plaintiff's own evidence shows that he was guilty of negligence that contributed to his injury, the court should take the case from the jury. In that case the court does not weigh the plaintiff's evidence of defendant's negligence and pronounce it insufficient, but it takes the plaintiff's evidence of his own negligence at its face value, and passes judgment of nonsuit upon it. Schmidt v. St. Louis R. Co. 149 Mo. 269, 73 Am. St. Rep. 380, 50 S. W. 921.

⁶⁴ Contributory negligence being an affirmative defense, before the plaintiff can be debarred from recovery on that ground, testimony adduced by him must be such that the facts raise an unavoidable inference of negligence on his part. Florida v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 37 Mo. App. 598. In this case, a passenger on a sleeping car left his trousers containing money and other articles, in an upper berth, and they were stolen. This was held not contributory negligence as a matter of law.

In Harrington v. Eureka Hill Min. Co. 17 Utah, 300, 53 Pac. 737, it is said that if the evidence introduced by the plaintiff furnishes sufficient proof of contributory negligence, it is not necessary for the defendant to prove it also. In determining the question of contributory negligence, it is the duty of the jurors to consider the whole evidence bearing on the issue. If the plaintiff offers any evidence tending to prove or disprove negligence on his part, the jurors should consider that, with the closed by plaintiff's own evidence, unless the facts on which the alleged negligence rests are admitted or established by evidence which is undisputed, the court cannot declare, as a matter of law, that such negligence exists, but must submit the question under proper instructions to the jury.⁶⁵

Where, however, the plaintiff has made out a case for himself, he cannot be nonsuited, although another of his own witnesses shows his negligence.⁶⁶

2. Shifting of the burden.

(a) Where burden is held to shift.

In considering the cases collected under this subdivision of the note, the importance of keeping in mind the distinction between the two senses in which the term "burden of proof" is used will be apparent. There are many cases in which it is said that the burden of proof as to contributory negligence, under certain conditions, shifts from the defendant, where it originally rests, to the plaintiff. In most instances, it is apparent that the courts are using the term "burden of proof" in its secondary sense, that is, as meaning the burden of introducing testimony to rebut that already introduced on the issue. In some cases, it is impossible to tell in which sense the court has used the term; while in others, the courts have evidently been misled into believing that the burden of proof in its primary sense, that is, the burden of proving the issue by a preponderance of evidence, shifts. As already pointed out, the burden of proof in its primary sense never shifts, according to the best considered opinions. If it is on the plaintiff in the first instance, it remains with him to the end. If it is on the defendant, as it is held to be in jurisdictions the decisions of which are collected in this subdivision of the note, it is never transferred to the plaintiff. If the plaintiff's evidence tends to show contributory negligence, or is such as to make out a prima facie case of such negligence, of course, the burden is upon him to introduce testimony upon that issue. But that does not mean that when the evidence is all in, the plaintiff's testimony on the subject of freedom from contributory negligence must preponderate. The burden of proving the issue being upon the defendant, the evidence as to contributory negligence must preponderate that as to freedom from contributory negligence, or the plaintiff will prevail,—provided, of course, that he has established the defendant's negligence by a preponderance of the evidence.

In a leading case in Texas it is said that "to the general rule imposing upon the defendant the burden of proof on the issue of contributory negligence, there appears to be, in the very nature of things, two well defined exceptions:

"First. Where the legal effect of the facts stated in the petition is such as to establish prima facie negligence on the part of plaintiff as a matter of law, then he must plead and prove such other facts as will rebut such legal presumption. The plain reason is that by pleading facts which, as a matter of law, establish his contributory negligence, he has made a prima facie defense to his cause of action, which will be accepted as true against him both on demurrer and as evidence on the trial, unless he pleads and proves such other facts and circumstances that the court cannot, as a matter of law, hold him guilty of contributory negligence. When he has done this, he has made a case which must be submitted to the jury. For instance, if plaintiff's petition shows that he was injured by defendant's car while on the track under circumstances which, in law, would make him a trespasser prima facie, then the law would raise a presumption of contributory negligence against him, for which his petition would be bad on demurrer, and it would be necessary for him to plead some fact or circumstance rebutting such presumption, such as, that he was, after going upon the track, stricken down by some providential cause, in order to save his petition, and on the trial, the burden would be upon him to establish such cause. . . .

"Second. When the undisputed evidence adduced on the trial establishes prima facie, as a matter of law, contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, then the burden of proof is upon him to show facts from which the jury, upon the whole case, may find him free from negligence; otherwise the court may instruct a verdict for defendant.

evidence offered by the defendant, if any, tending to prove or disprove it, and it is the duty of the court so to inform the jury.

⁶⁶ Ely v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 158 Pa. 233, 27 Atl. 970.

But if the plaintiff's own testimony shows that he was negligent, he cannot complain if the court takes his case as he makes it, although another witness has done better for him than he has done for himself; but where his own testimony makes out a clear case, the contradictory testimony of another witness will not destroy it, as a matter of law, even though such witness has been called by himself.

Kohler v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 135 Pa. 346, 19 Atl. 1049.

there being no issue of fact for the jury.'⁶⁷ The situation, however, created by the appearance of contributory negligence in plaintiff's case, does not constitute an exception to the rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant. It is, as before stated, only the burden of introducing testimony on the issue that is shifted. The burden of maintaining the issue is still on the defendant.

In an action to recover for the death of a track hand run over and killed while working on the track, an instruction that if the evidence offered by the plaintiff did not disclose any want of care on his part, the burden was on the defendant to show that he contributed directly to his death, which must be shown by a preponderance of the evidence; but that if the plaintiff's evidence raised the presumption of contributory negligence, the burden rested upon him to remove that presumption by a like preponderance of the evidence, was held to mean that if, in the exercise of ordinary care, by looking the decedent would have seen the approach of the train, or by listening would have heard it, a presumption of negligence would arise on his part, which it was his duty to rebut; and the instruction was upheld.⁶⁸ Here it will be observed that the expression that the burden rested upon the plaintiff to remove the presumption of contributory negligence created by his own evidence, by a like preponderance of evidence, is incorrect, since it is a

To the general rule there are two well-defined exceptions, one being when the legal effect of plaintiff's pleading is such as to create a prima facie case of negligence on his part as a matter of law, when he must plead and prove such other facts as will rebut such legal presumption; the other exception being when the undisputed evidence establishes a prima facie case of contributory negligence against the plaintiff as a matter of law, then the burden is on him to show facts that will prove that he was not negligent. El Paso Electric R. Co. v. Shaklee, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 188.

It is the general rule in Texas that the burden of proof rests upon the party charging contributory negligence, to establish that fact, to which there are but two exceptions. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Parrish, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 43 S. W. 536.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Redeker, 67 Tex. 181, 2 S. W. 513, it was held that a railroad company had no reason to complain of an instruction that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that he was injured substantially as alleged in his petition, and that the injury was not caused by contributory negligence, and that if this had been shown, the burden of proof shifted to the defendant to show contributory negligence.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Scarborough, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 194, 68 S. W. 96, it appeared that a boy was standing on a skidway adjacent to a side track of a railroad company, and while standing there, a sufficient distance from the track to avoid cars properly loaded from coming in contact with him, intently watching an engine switching cars, was struck by a piece of timber projecting from the side of a passing car. It was held that the fact that the boy was standing on the skidway under such circumstances did not bring the case within either of the exceptions that where the legal effect of plaintiff's allegations prima facie establishes negligence on his part, or where the undisputed evidence prima facie establishes contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff as a matter of law, so as to relieve the defendant of the burden of establishing such negligence.

In Chicago, R. I. & T. R. Co. v. Long, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 40, 74 S. W. 59, writ of error refused in 97 Tex. 69, 75 S. W. 483, part of the members of a steel gang started for a tool house across a railroad bridge on foot, and part on a hand car. When the plaintiff had just entered upon the bridge, he looked back and saw the hand car motionless 360 yards away. When he and his companions were midway on the bridge, the car overtook them, and while his companions stepped aside and were unhurt, he was run over and injured. It was held that these facts did not bring the case within any of the exceptions to the general rule that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show contributory negligence.

In an action to recover for injuries received by being struck by a switch engine, where the evidence showed that the track was a general thoroughfare for pedestrians, and that it was not obviously an imprudent act for the injured person to go thereon, a charge shifting the burden of proving contributory negligence would have been erroneous. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Brooks, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 54 S. W. 1056.

The mere fact that the plaintiff failed to accompany a race horse which was properly put into a car to be shipped for about a hundred and twenty-five miles, there being no necessity for feeding and watering it in that distance, does not impose upon the plaintiff, in an action to recover for the loss of the horse, the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Parker, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 437.

confusion of the two senses in which the term "burden of proof" is used.

It has been said that the act of getting on or off a moving train is evidence of contributory negligence, and imposes upon one who is injured in doing so, the burden of proving that the peculiar circumstances of the case justified him in such a course.⁶⁹ It is evident that the court here used the term "burden of proof" in its secondary sense, that is, as imposing upon the plaintiff the burden of introducing further testimony upon the issue.

In an action to recover damages resulting from fire communicated to plaintiff's wood pile, it was held that the fact that the plaintiff had failed to clear the brush and combustible material out of an open draw through which the fire was communicated to the wood pile did not shift to the plaintiff the burden of proving absence from contributory negligence.⁷⁰ This might mean that the burden of proof in the primary sense—that is, the burden of proving the issue—does not shift, but it probably means that the fact mentioned was sufficient to shift the burden upon the plaintiff in the secondary sense, so as to require him to introduce further evidence on the issue of contributory negligence. But in most of the cases in which it is said that the burden of proof as to contributory negligence shifts, while it is not certain that the courts had in mind the distinct senses in which the term is used, it may be taken to have been employed in its secondary sense, and, if so, these decisions are not in conflict with those holding that the burden does not shift where the term "burden of proof" is used in its primary sense.

The rule is often stated to be that if plaintiff's evidence raises a presumption of contributory negligence, the burden of proving due care is at once cast upon him.⁷¹ The burden is upon him to remove the pre-

Likewise, where a person falls and is injured by the reason of a defect in the sidewalk caused by misplaced bricks, in an open and exposed place, the burden rests upon him to show conditions outside of himself which prevented him from seeing the defect, or which would excuse his failure to observe it. Lerner v. Philadelphia, 221 Pa. 294, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 614, 70 Atl. 755.

In an action brought to recover for the death of a person killed while lying on a railroad track, it appeared that the deceased was subject to epileptic fits, and that a short time previous to the accident he had been seen in an intoxicated condition. Under these circumstances, it was held that a charge placing the burden of showing contributory negligence on the defendant was erroneous. Louisiana Western Extension R. Co. v. McDonald, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 52 S. W. 649.

A charge in substance that if, in the testimony of the plaintiff, contributory negligence is disclosed, then it would defeat his recovery unless he by his own testimony relieved himself of the burden so cast upon him, was held proper. Weiser v. Broadway & N. Street R. Co. 6 Ohio C. D. 215.

⁷⁰ Northern P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 2 C. C. A. 446, 7 U. S. App. 254, 51 Fed. 658.

Likewise, where the complaint alleges that the plaintiff, without fault on his part, ran into a dangerous cut in a street while riding on his bicycle, it does not show that the proximate cause of the injury was due to any act on his part, so as to bring the case within the rule of throwing the burden upon him to prove that he was in the exercise of due care. Snook v. Anaconda, 26 Mont. 128, 66 Pac. 756. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

That the plaintiff, at the time he drove upon a bridge which broke down, was intoxicated, does not shift the burden of proof upon him to show that he was in the exercise of due care. Ford v. Umatilla County, 15 Or. 313, 16 Pac. 33.

In an action to recover for personal injuries, if the evidence is such as to establish intoxication on the part of the plaintiff, this does not cast the burden of proof upon him to show that he was in the exercise of ordinary care, intoxication being merely a circumstance to go to the jury upon the question of negligence. Seymour v. Lake, 66 Wis. 651, 29 N. W. 554. The court said that the burden of proof is on the defendant to prove contributory negligence, and the fact that the plaintiff makes proof on the trial from which the jury may or may not infer that there was negligence on his part does not cast the burden on him to make affirmative proof of his want of negligence.

⁷¹ Even in jurisdictions where contributory negligence is held to be a matter of defense, it is also held that whenever the plaintiff's own case raises a presumption of contributory negligence, the burden of proof is then upon him. In such a case it devolves upon him to clear himself of the suspicion of negligence that he himself has created. Southern R. Co. v. Bruce 97 Va. 92, 33 S. E. 548.

The court cannot say that refusal to charge that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant is erroneous, where it has not all the testimony in the case before it, since there may have been testimony offered by the plaintiff raising a presumption of contributory negligence which would throw the burden upon him to introduce testimony disproving it. Root v. Monroeville, 4 Ohio C. D. 53, reversed on another point in 54 Ohio St. 523, 44 N. E. 237.

umption by further proof.⁷² The rule that if the testimony of the plaintiff raises a presumption of contributory negligence, the burden is upon him to remove that presumption, is merely stating a rule of law that the plaintiff is bound to show by his evidence that he was in the exercise of ordinary care, and that his want of such ordinary care did not contribute to his injury.⁷³

That the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff is manifestly against a settled law of the state, since it is only where the plaintiff's own evidence raises a presumption of contributory negligence on his part that the law imposes upon him the burden of removing that presumption. Strong v. Pickering Hardware Co. 9 Ohio C. C. 249, 6 Ohio C. D. 212.

The burden of proof to show contributory negligence, if contributory negligence is relied upon as a defense, is upon the defendant, unless the evidence offered by the plaintiff raises a presumption that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, in which case, the plaintiff is bound to overcome this presumption by a preponderance of the evidence. McKeown v. Cincinnati Street R. Co. 2 Ohio Leg. News, 88.

The exception to the general rule that the duty to plead, and the burden to prove, contributory negligence, is upon the defendant, does not apply to an action against the master by a servant ordered to perform new work with which he was unacquainted, and in company with an inexperienced servant. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Tehan, 26 Ohio C. C. 457.

Where the facts stated in the petition do not raise a legal presumption that the injured person was guilty of contributory negligence, or the undisputed evidence does not establish a prima facie case of contributory negligence, the burden of showing such negligence is on the defendant. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Booth, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 97 S. W. 128.

The burden rests on plaintiff to disprove a presumption of contributory negligence arising from his own evidence in an action for personal injuries caused by defendant's negligence. Blair v. Pittsburg & L. E. R. Co. 37 Ohio L. J. 59.

There is a corollary to the rule, to the effect that whenever the plaintiff's own case raises a presumption of contributory negligence, the burden of proof is immediately upon him. In such a case, it devolves upon the plaintiff as of course, to clear himself of the suspicion of negligence that he has himself created. He must make out his case in full, and where the circumstances attending the injury were such as to raise a presumption against him in respect to the exercise of due care, the law requires him to establish affirmatively his freedom from contributory fault. Nelson v. Helena, 6 Mont. 21, 39 Pac. 905.

The rule announced in the last mentioned case was approved in Hunter v. Montana L. R. Co. 22 Mont. 525, 57 Pac. 140.

As to the corollary to the rule, the court in Harrington v. Butte, A. & P. R. Co. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mont. 169, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395, 95 Pac. 8, said: "We think it would be more accurate to say that whenever the plaintiff's own case presents evidence which, if unexplained, would make out prima facie contributory negligence on his part, there must be further evidence exculpating him, or he cannot recover. However, this is evidently what the court meant, and this doctrine has the support of practically all the authorities."

⁷² Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Zepperlein, 1 Ohio C. D. 22, 1 Ohio C. C. 38.

While it is true that the burden of proving contributory negligence is ordinarily on the defendant, this is not so when the plaintiff's own testimony raises a presumption of contributory negligence. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Levy, 8 Ohio C. C. N. S. 353, 28 Ohio C. C. 23.

Where the circumstances disclose or give rise to a presumption of contributory negligence, the matter of excuse must be shown by the injured person, and the rule is the same where the injured person is dead. Pennsylvania Co. v. Mahoney, 22 Ohio C. C. 469, 12 Ohio C. D. 366.

Where the evidence shows that the person for whose death the action was brought used a dangerous, instead of a safe, method of performing a certain piece of work, a presumption of negligence on his part arises, and before the plaintiff can recover, the burden rests upon the latter to remove such presumption, and show that the deceased was exercising ordinary care by a preponderance of the evidence. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Whidden, 13—23 Ohio C. C. 85.

The law will not presume that a plaintiff has been negligent in the absence of some evidence tending to show it; but when his evidence tends to create the presumption, then he must rebut the presumption by sufficient proof to produce a belief in the minds of the jury that negligence on his part did not in fact exist. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Foreman, 73 Tex. 311, 15 Am. St. Rep. 785, 11 S. W. 326.

⁷³ Cincinnati v. Frazer, 9 Ohio C. D. 487.

If the plaintiff's evidence raises a presumption of contributory negligence, it then becomes his duty to remove such presumption, and if he fails to do so, this will be fatal to his case. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Whitacre, 35 Ohio St. 627.

It has been frequently held that where the evidence of the plaintiff raises a presumption of his negligence contributing to the injury, the burden is upon him to remove the presumption before he can recover. Street R. Co. v. Nolthenius, 40 Ohio St. 376.

In Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Ackworth,

In applying this rule, it has been held that riding on the platform of a street car creates such a presumption of contributory negligence as it requires the plaintiff to remove.⁷⁴ So, the presumption has been held created, within the rule, where a conductor attempted unnecessarily to descend from a moving car; ⁷⁵ where the injured person jumped from a moving train; ⁷⁶ where an injured child was unattended in known place of danger; ⁷⁷ where a person run over and killed on a railroad track could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have seen the approach of the train; ⁷⁸ where an aged man

10 Ohio C. C. 583, 6 Ohio C. D. 622, it is said that this is a peculiar rule, and one which ought not to be extended, but strictly confined within the actual limit of its true application.

It is not correct to say that where a presumption of contributory negligence is raised by the plaintiff's evidence, the burden still rests upon the defendant to prove contributory negligence, if, after considering all of the evidence in the case, the presumption of negligence is removed. Where plaintiff is seeking to recover for injuries received through the negligence of the defendant, the legal effect of certain facts in the plaintiff's case, if they appear in his evidence, is to create a presumption that he was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore he cannot recover until the legal effect of those facts is removed and overcome by showing the existence of other facts sufficient to that end; and that means that the burden of proof to remove and overcome the legal effect of those facts, that is, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, rests upon the plaintiff; it does not thereafter shift to the defendant. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Woods, 9 Ohio C. C. 322, 6 Ohio C. D. 350.

"But in all those jurisdictions where contributory negligence is held a matter of defense, whenever the plaintiff's own case raises a presumption of contributory negligence, the burden of proof is immediately upon him. In such a case it devolves upon the plaintiff as of course, to clear himself of the suspicion of negligence that he has himself created. He must make out his case in full, and where the circumstances attending the injury were such as to raise a presumption against him in respect of the exercise of due care, the law requires him to establish affirmatively his freedom from contributory fault. And when the plaintiff's case on the face of it shows contributory negligence, there should be a nonsuit; but if there be any real question as to the plaintiff's negligence, he should not be nonsuited, but the question is for the jury." Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 427. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Baker, — Ind. Terr. —, 104 S. W. 1182.

⁷⁴ Alabama City, G. & A. R. Co. v. Ventress, — Ala. —, 54 So. 652.

⁷⁵ Where a conductor was injured in getting off of a train in the nighttime, because the stirrup or step of the car was loose and gave way when he put his weight upon it, it was held that the fact that he attempted to descend from the car while the train was moving at the rate of 4 or 5 miles an hour, while the rules of the company required him to bring it to a standstill for the purpose of permitting him to alight, raised, as a matter of law, a presumption of negligence against the plaintiff, within the rule casting upon him the burden of disproving contributory negligence. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. v. Blair, 11 Ohio C. C. 579, 5 Ohio C. D. 366.

Stepping off of a moving car is negligence per se, and where one is injured thereby, the burden is upon him clearly to demonstrate to the court why his case should go to the jury as a rare exception to the rule. Hunterson v. Union Traction Co. 205 Pa. 568, 55 Atl. 543.

⁷⁷ And the presence of a child five years and eight months old, unattended, in a known place of danger, was held to be prima facie evidence of contributory negligence, and where a satisfactory explanation could not be found in the evidence, the plaintiff could not recover upon the theory that the burden was upon the defendant to make an explanation which would show negligence, if any, upon the part of the plaintiff. Harrington v. Butte, A. & P. R. Co. 37 Mont. 169, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395, 95 Pac. 8.

Where a child is struck by a street car while in a dangerous and exposed situation, the plaintiff in an action for its death has the burden of proving a want of negligence on the part of the child or its custodian. Bamberger v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 95 Tenn. 18, 28 L.R.A. 486, 49 Am. St. Rep. 909, 31 S. W. 163. The court said: "Looking to the facts in this case, we find that the street car was legitimately upon its own track, running its usual ordinary line, where it had a right to be, and the child, when the injury occurred, was upon the track, where it ought not to have been, and was, in consequence, killed. Under these circumstances, no matter what the rule may be as an abstract proposition, it would be incumbent on the father to show that the presence of the child upon the track, or in a dangerous and exposed situation, was without negligence or want of proper care on his part, or the part of the child's custodian, if the negligence of either can be held to bar the right of recovery in this case."

⁷⁸ In an action brought to recover for the death of a servant who, while at work on a railroad track, was run over and

approached a railroad crossing without looking out for a train;⁷⁹ and where a person injured by reason of a defective sidewalk went upon it when it was plainly out of repair.⁸⁰

In an action to recover for injuries received by falling into an open drain in a street, a charge that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, was held not reversible error, where the record showed that the plaintiff was blind, and was on the street unattended when he received the injury, and had full knowledge of the existence and character of the drain when the accident occurred.⁸¹ This is another illustration showing how the court has fallen into error by failing to distinguish between the two senses in which burden of proof is used. While, under the circumstances mentioned, it would be necessary for the plaintiff to introduce testimony on the issue, it does not follow that he would be obliged to establish freedom from contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, since this would be requiring him to maintain the burden of that issue, which is on the defendant in Tennessee.

The fact that the person for whose death the action was brought was on or near a railroad bridge track at the time he was killed, when not a trespasser, was held not to raise a presumption that he was negligent, so as to cast the burden upon the plaintiff of proving that he was free from fault.⁸²

In some of the cases, it is said that if plaintiff's own evidence raises an issue of contributory negligence, the burden of proving such negligence does not rest upon the defendant.⁸³ Other courts say that the burden is cast upon the plaintiff if, by his own evidence, he makes out a prima facie killed, it was held that if the deceased, in the exercise of ordinary care, by looking, would have seen the approach of the train, or by listening, would have heard it, a presumption of negligence would arise on his part, which it was his duty to rebut. Green v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. 5 Ohio C. C. N. S. 497, 26 Ohio C. C. 609.

Likewise, where an employee of a railroad company using the tracks as a pathway to a place at which he was directed to work, in the proper exercise of his faculties of hearing and vision, would have been notified of an approaching train which struck him, the presumption arises when he does not discover that danger, that he did not exercise those faculties, and the burden is upon him to remove this presumption when it so arises. Byrket v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 29 Ohio C. C. 614.

⁷⁹ Where the plaintiff's evidence shows that the person for whose death the action was brought,—an old man, with the heads of two hogs slung upon his shoulder, probably interfering with his vision and hearing and his ability to escape from danger,—went upon a dangerous railroad crossing, where he must have known that trains frequently ran over the track, without having once looked to see whether a train was approaching, though he could have seen the track for perhaps 400 feet if he had looked a charge that the burden of proving contributory negligence rested upon the defendant was held erroneous, since the plaintiff's own evidence clearly raised a presumption of negligence on decedent's part contributing to the accident. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Murphy, 9 Ohio C. C. D. 703.

⁸⁰ In an action to recover damages for injuries received by reason of a defective sidewalk, if it appears that the plaintiff went upon the walk, and that it was plainly out of repair and dangerous, and appeared so to persons of ordinary intelligence, then the burden is upon her to show that she exercised ordinary care, not only while she was walking upon such a sidewalk, where she had put herself, but that she exercised ordinary care in going upon such walk in the first place. Peat v. Norwalk, 5 Ohio C. C. N. S. 614, 26 Ohio C. C. 161.

⁸¹ Stewart v. Nashville, 96 Tenn. 50, 33 S. W. 613.

⁸² Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Chisholm, 27 C. C. A. 663, 49 U. S. App. 700, 83 Fed. 652.

⁸³ The burden does not rest upon the defendant where the plaintiff's own evidence raises an issue of contributory negligence. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Jolly, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 512, 72 S. W. 871.

But, if the issue of contributory negligence is not raised by the plaintiff, but is put in issue by the pleadings of the defendant, no exception is presented to the general rule that the burden of proving such negligence is on the defendant. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Davenport, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 110 S. W. 150.

The burden is on the defendant if plaintiff's case does not raise an issue of contributory negligence. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Parish, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 93 S. W. 682.

Where, standing alone, plaintiff's testimony did not even raise the issue of contributory negligence, it was held that the burden of proving contributory negligence was on the defendant. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. White, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 55 S. W. 593.

In an action to recover for injuries received by a switchman while engaged in uncoupling cars, due to a premature signal, it was held that where the plaintiff, in the development of the case, presented the issue of contributory negligence, and, in addition to this, some of plaintiff's witnesses testified to facts which, if standing alone, would have authorized the submission to the jury of the issue of contributory negli-case of contributory negligence.⁸⁴ So, where the deceased was found a few feet from a railroad trestle, and it was evident that he had been struck by a train just as he stepped upon the trestle, or else that he had gone there before and remained standing or lying on the track, there being enough light so that he could have seen the approach of the train had he looked, it was held that these facts made such a prima facie case of contributory negligence as to cast upon the plaintiff, suing for his death, the burden of proving his freedom therefrom.⁸⁵ But it was held that it could not be said that because a passenger on a vessel went from the port door of the saloon alone, and, in doing so, put her left foot on the doorsill and then put her right foot forward, stepped on the deck, slipped and fell by reason of encountering a slippery substance, she was prima facie guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, so as to cast upon her the burden of rebutting such prima facie evidence before a recovery could be had.⁸⁶

It is also said that if the plaintiff's own evidence raises an inference of negligence against himself, then he is undoubtedly required to go further, and, in order to establish a prima facie case, to show that he

the court should have given no charge on the burden of proof as to that issue, or else should have given a charge so modified as to permit the jury to look to the whole evidence in determining whether the defense had been established. A charge, therefore, that the burden of proof was on the defendant to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the deceased was chargeable with contributory negligence was held erroneous. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 70 S. W. 103. Here, also, the court evidently fails to distinguish between the two senses in which burden of proof is used.

⁸⁴ The burden is on the defendant except where the petition or the evidence shows a prima facie case of contributory negligence. Huber v. Texas & P. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 113 S. W. 984.

The rule is that the burden of establishing the defense of contributory negligence is upon the defendant, except where the plaintiff's evidence convicts him prima facie of contributory negligence. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Conway, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 68, 98 S. W. 1070.

The burden of proof is upon the defendant, except in those cases where the declaration alleges facts which prima facie show contributory negligence, but coupled with matter in avoidance, and except where plaintiff's evidence discloses contributory negligence. Simms v. Forbes, 86 Miss. 412, 38 So. 546.

Where the accident results from the direct act or omission of the defendant which prima facie is negligence in itself, and the plaintiff receives an injury in consequence thereof, while pursuing his ordinary course of affairs, he will not be compelled, in order to recover his damages, to prove that he was free from fault. Grant v. Baker, 12 Or. 329, 7 Pac. 318.

In order to place upon the plaintiff the burden of exonerating himself from contributory negligence, either by allegation or proof, the evidence or plaintiff's allegation, as the case may be, must present his act as one showing prima facie negligence on his part; in other words, his allegation or proof must be such, standing alone, as would warrant an instruction that he had been negligent. Hillsboro v. Jackson, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 325, 44 S. W. 1010.

It is only in cases in which plaintiff's allegations or his evidence show prima facie negligence on his part, that it devolves upon him to show facts from which the jury, upon the whole case, may find him free from negligence. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Conuteson, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 111 S. W. 187.

Where the testimony offered by the plaintiff did not make out a prima facie case of contributory negligence, and the defendant relied on such negligence, the burden of proof was held to be on it to establish such defense. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Kelley, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 34 S. W. 809, 46 S. W. 863.

It is only when the averments of the petition show a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the injured party, that it becomes necessary that the plaintiff should negative by an averment and proof the existence of such negligence. When the case stated by plaintiff shows prima facie negligence of deceased, the defendant can avail himself of the defense of contributory negligence under the averments of the petition; otherwise, such defense must be pleaded. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Bennett, 76 Tex. 151, 13 S. W. 319.

⁸⁵ International & G. N. R. Co. v. De Ollos, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 76 S. W. 222.

⁸⁶ Gillum v. New York & T. S. S. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 76 S. W. 232.

In an action for injury to a wife under such circumstances, brought by the husband and the wife, there being no evidence whatever of any negligence on the part of the husband, a charge casting upon the plaintiffs the burden of showing freedom from contributory negligence is erroneous as to the husband. Ibid.

Where the pleadings and proof show that plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's train, and that as the train approached a small station which was his destination, and the conductor announced it, the plaintiff, knowing of the custom to stop only momentarily at such place, followed the conductor to the front platform and steps, so that he could alight with promptness, and that, after reaching the steps, he caught hold of the hand rails with each of was guilty of no negligence,⁸⁷ and that where the testimony of the plaintiff tends to show contributory negligence, it is error to charge the jury that the burden of proving such negligence is on the defendant.⁸⁸

The rule was stated by Dr. Wharton to be that, if the plaintiff's own case exposes his hands, and was exercising due care and caution for his own safety; that the conductor knew of his position, but, without warning, the speed of the train was suddenly slackened, so that the plaintiff was jerked and thrown off and injured, it was held that this evidence did not make out such a prima facie case of contributory negligence as to cast upon the plaintiff the burden of disproving it. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Harris, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 120 S. W. 500.

In Beaumont Traction Co. v. Happ, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 122 S. W. 610, a passenger who, on account of the crowded condition of a street car, was unable to get inside of it, took his position on the bumper or buffer in the rear of the car, and leaned his body through an open window in the rear vestibule of the car. While in this position, the car was backed up, and the passenger was injured by a collision between the car on which he was riding and another car. It was held that this did not establish a prima facie case of contributory negligence, so as to place the burden of disproving such negligence on the plaintiff. The court said that at most the evidence only raised the issue of contributory negligence, and, defendant having pleaded this issue as a defense, the burden was upon it to prove it.

And where the plaintiff, an inexperienced minor, after nine days' work as a section hand, was ordered with other employees, to place hand cars on the track in order to go to some work, and the cars were thereafter run in dangerous proximity to each other at a dangerous speed, in order to reach a switch before an approaching train, and one of the cars was for that reason derailed, and the car on which plaintiff was riding collided with it, causing the injuries complained of, it was held that a prima facie case of contributory negligence was not made out, so as to bring the case within any of the exceptions to the general rule placing the burden of establishing contributory negligence upon the defendant. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Pina, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 680, 77 S. W. 979.

Where the plaintiff was injured while attempting to board a slowly moving train, with the assistance of the conductor, it was held that this did not show a prima facie case of guilt of contributory negligence, so as to make a charge that the burden of proving such negligence was on the defendant erroneous. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Gist, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 662, 73 S. W. 857.

The mere admission of the plaintiff, a passenger in a caboose, that he was standing up at the time of a collision by which he was injured, does not make a case of negligence per se, or create a prima facie case of negligence, so as to cast upon him the burden of proving the circumstances and clearing himself of the charge. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gilbreath, 87 Ark. 572, 113 S. W. 200.

⁸⁷ Achtenhagen v. Watertown, 18 Wis. 331, 84 Am. Dec. 769.

If, in proving plaintiff's case, there is anything in the evidence from which concurring negligence may be inferred, then the burden is on him to rebut or explain this. Stewart v. Nashville, 96 Tenn. 50, 33 S. W. 613.

There is no just inference of a want of ordinary care in a boy in falling through a large hole in a bridge, of which his father and others had for a long time had notice, and of which he is presumed to have had notice, so as to make it necessary for the plaintiff to prove affirmatively that the boy was not guilty of contributory negligence. Strong v. Stevens Point, 62 Wis. 255, 22 N. W. 425.

⁸⁸ Texas Portland Cement Co. v. Ross, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 597, 81 S. W. 94.

If it appears from the plaintiff's evidence that he was guilty of contributory negligence, or if the plaintiff introduces evidence tending to show that he was guilty of such negligence, the burden rests upon him to explain and remove this apparent negligence. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Scott, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 27 S. W. 827.

Where there is some evidence which arises from the development of the plaintiff's case, tending to show that he was guilty of contributory negligence, the burden is not upon the defendant to establish such negligence. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Robinson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 72 S. W. 70.

Where all the evidence on the issue of contributory negligence is introduced by the plaintiff, and tends in some degree to show that he was not in the exercise of due care, a charge that the burden of proving such negligence is on the defendant is erroneous. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Plunkett, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 103 S. W. 663.

The rule as to the shifting of the burden has no application where the evidence on the part of the plaintiff does not show, or tend to show, that his negligence contributed to the injury. Stephens v. Elliott, 36 Mont. 92, 92 Pac. 45.

Where the evidence tending to show contributory negligence springs out of and forms part of the case relied upon by the plaintiff, the burden is on the plaintiff not only to show negligence on the part of the defendant, but also to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. Chicago, R. I. & G. R. Co. v. Clay, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 119 S. W. 730.

Where the defendant alleged contributory negligence, but the only evidence of such negligence appeared in the testimony of the

him to a suspicion of negligence, then he must clear off such suspicion.⁸⁹ This rule was followed in a few cases.⁹⁰ In applying the rule where the plaintiff alleged that while he was a passenger on a railroad train, the condition of the car was so crowded that he was forced to seek a place in another car, and that while on the platform he paused a moment, and was, by the sudden jerking of the train, thrown off and injured, it was held that this did not raise a suspicion of negligence on his part, so as to cast the burden upon him of acquitting himself of the imputation, but that the burden was rightfully on the defendant.⁹¹ But it was said in an Ohio case that the rule that the burden shifts should not be extended upon mere suspicion,⁹² and the rule suggested by Dr. Wharton has now been repudiated in Texas.⁹³ plaintiff, it was held that a charge which in effect instructed the jury that the burden of proving contributory negligence, by the greater weight of the evidence, was on the defendant, was erroneous, because it contained nothing whatever about the burden removing the suggestion of contributory negligence arising from the plaintiff's own testimony. Cincinnati Interurban Co. v. Haines, 8 Ohio C. C. N. S. 77, 28 Ohio C. C. 443.

⁸⁹ No doubt where, in an action for injuries caused by failure of duty on the part of the defendant, the failure of duty and the injury are shown by the plaintiff, and there is nothing that implies that he brought on the injury by his own negligence, then the burden is on the defendant to prove that the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence. On the other hand, when the plaintiff's own case exposes him to suspicion of negligence, then he must clear off such suspicion. Wharton, Neg. § 426.

Unless the plaintiff's case discloses want of care on the part of the injured party, or exposes him to suspicion of negligence, and the defendant relies upon the defense of contributory negligence, it must be pleaded and proved. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Bennett, 76 Tex. 151, 13 S. W. 319.

But in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mayfield, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 415, 56 S. W. 942, an objection was made to a charge that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, on the ground that when plaintiff's own case shows a suspicion of negligence, then he must clear off that suspicion; but the court said: "We understand from this proposition, that complaint is made only on placing the burden of proof on defendant, to prove the acts of contributory negligence alleged in its answer, and we think it is now well settled that the burden is on defendant in such cases."

⁹¹ Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Morris, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 60 S. W. 813, judgment affirmed in 94 Tex. 505, 61 S. W. 709.

But where the pleading and proof show that the person injured in getting off of a train was in a feeble condition, encumbered by her small children, and that she undertook to alight at a place dangerous on account of its height from the ground, these facts were held to raise more than a suspicion of negligence on her part, and to be sufficient to raise the issue of contributory negligence in attempting to alight from the train under the circumstances, so as to make a charge that the burden was upon the defendant to establish contributory negligence erroneous. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Martin, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 231, 63 S. W. 1089.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Lewis, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 63 S. W. 1091, the plaintiff, seated on a load of hay, was driving faster than a walk, on a descending grade towards a culvert, and when he reached the culvert, one wheel of his wagon settled into a hole, which caused him to be thrown off and injured. The evidence showed that he was familiar with the dangerous condition of the culvert, had driven over it several times before, and had received jolts while so doing. A companion with him at the time said that he and the plaintiff were talking and joking when the accident happened. It was held that this evidence raised more than a suspicion of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, requiring that issue to be submitted to the jury, and that, under such circumstances, an instruction that the burden of proof on that issue was on the defendant was erroneous. The court said that by such charge the jury might have understood that they were not to consider the presumption of negligence arising from plaintiff's evidence, and, unless the defendant's evidence showed contributory negligence on plaintiff's part, they might find for the plaintiff on this issue.

⁹³ Where the case as made showed that the plaintiff, a nine-year-old boy, who was injured while alighting from a moving street car, had either jumped on the car to catch a ride, or had been invited to get on by an employee of the company, and had then been ordered off, a charge that the burden of showing contributory negligence was on the defendant was held erroneous, since a suspicion of contributory negligence could be inferred from the plaintiff's case, and it was his duty to clear away such suspicion. Denison & S. R. Co. v. Carter, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 70 S. W. 322.

Upon rehearing, however, in 71 S. W. 292, the court withdrew its reference to the doctrine of suspicion of contributory

In an Oregon case, Thayer, J., said that he did not believe that it would be any departure from the rule requiring contributory negligence to be pleaded as a defense, to say that where the plaintiff had been the actor in the affair in which the injury was received, and his acts per se would indicate negligence, he could not recover without proof that he exercised that ordinary care which a person ought to observe under the particular circumstances.⁹⁴ negligence, and then said: "As stated in the opinion under the case as made, the court's charge imposed too great a burden on the plaintiff. The court should have submitted the issue of contributory negligence without affirmatively placing the burden of proof on either."

But mere suspicion of contributory negligence is not enough to cast upon the plaintiff the burden of disproving it, since this would be practically the same as the rule which places the burden of proof upon the plaintiff in all cases upon the issue of contributory negligence, for an accident could rarely occur in which there would not be some slight evidence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shieder, 88 Tex. 152, 28 L.R.A. 38, 30 S. W. 902, affirming — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 509.

It is no longer the rule of Texas that where plaintiff's evidence exposes him to a suspicion of contributory negligence, the burden is upon him to disprove such negligence. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Anglin, 9 Tex. 340, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 386, 89 S. W. 66. The court said that it is now definitely settled that in every case in which the plaintiff seeks to recover of defendant on the ground of negligence of the defendant, and the defendant relies upon the defense of contributory negligence, in order to maintain that defense, it must appear by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence.

⁹⁴ Grant v. Baker, 12 Or. 329, 7 Pac. 18.

So, in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. McTighe, 6 Pa. 316, it was said by Thompson, J., obiter: "I have no doubt there may be cases in which the plaintiff's case would be incomplete without proof of care; such, for instance, as where a prescribed mode of doing an act was required, out of which the injury sprung; or where a party should leap from a train of cars to avoid a collision, on well-grounded apprehension of it; or such and in many other cases which might be imagined, it would doubtless be necessary to cover the whole ground in brief necessary to entitle the plaintiff prima facie to recover. But if a party admit this, where it is not necessary to aver it in the narr., and the other side do not choose to demur or go to the jury on the want of such an element, but assume the burden of proof, he could not nonsuit the plaintiff for want of it, or ask a court to do more than to submit the question to the jury whether, from all the evidence, the plaintiff himself had been guilty of negligence or not."

Another statement of the rule is that where the plaintiff's evidence was such that it would have been improper to instruct the jury to find against him on the issue of contributory negligence, a charge that the burden of proving such negligence was on the defendant was held proper;⁹⁵ that contributory negligence, as a matter of law, should be shown.⁹⁶ Again bearing in mind the distinction between the primary and secondary sense in which the term "burden" is used, it is clear that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show the absence of such negligence. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Featherly, 64 Neb. 323, 89 N. W. 792.

So, if the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff shows the injury to have been directly caused, either in whole or in part, by his act, the burden is immediately upon him to prove that he was exercising ordinary care at the time. Cummings v. Helena & L. Smelting & Reduction Co. 26 Mont. 434, 68 Pac. 852.

⁹⁵ San Antonio v. Potter, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 263, 71 S. W. 764.

In an action for damages resulting from the alleged negligence of the defendant, when the evidence on the part of the plaintiff is such as to justify a finding that his own negligence contributed to the injury complained of, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show the absence of such negligence. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Featherly, 64 Neb. 323, 89 N. W. 792.

⁹⁶ A charge that the burden of proof is on plaintiff to relieve himself of the suspicion of contributory negligence is not proper if it is clear that contributory negligence was not shown as a matter of law. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cooper, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 319, 77 S. W. 263.

It is only in cases in which the allegation of the petition or the evidence of the plaintiff shows negligence on his part, as a matter of law, that the burden is upon him to refute the charge of contributory negligence. Lewis v. Houston Electric Co. 39 Tex. Civ. App. 625, 88 S. W. 489.

If plaintiff's own case establishes a prima facie case, as a matter of law, of contributory negligence, the burden is upon him to overcome that fact by showing facts from which, upon the whole case, the jury can find him free from negligence. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Brice, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 111 S. W. 1094. To the same effect. International & G. N. R. Co. v. De Ollos, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 76 S. W. 222.

Unless the pleadings or evidence of the plaintiff establish contributory negligence as a matter of law, the burden is always upon the defendant to show that fact. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Melville, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 87 S. W. 863.

And where it appeared that cars of the defendant overran an embankment at the end of a spur track, struck a wagon from which plaintiff was unloading cotton seed, and injured him, it was held that contributory negligence was not shown, as a mat-den of proof" is used, it would seem that this latter view is the correct one. If it is a case for the jury, it is not proper for the court to charge that the burden is upon the plaintiff at all, as that would be putting the burden of the issue upon him.

In Ohio, if the facts are such that it is doubtful whether or not the plaintiff's testimony raises a presumption of contributory negligence, the question of whether the burden is shifted to the plaintiff must go to the jury, the court not being permitted then to determine it; but if the presumption is not doubtful, if the facts are such that there can be no reasonable presumption but that of negligence, then the rule does not apply, and it is then a question of law only, to be determined by the court.⁹⁷

This is another curious illustration of the confusion which may arise from the inaccurate use of terminology. It being only the burden of proof in the secondary sense, that is, the burden of introducing evidence, that shifts, the question whether the burden in this sense has shifted is never a question for the jury, but always a question for the court.⁹⁸ It is evident, however, that the Ohio courts in these cases understood the term "burden of proof" in its primary sense, that is, the burden of establishing the issue, which, as has been stated, never shifts.⁹⁹

(b) Where burden is held not to shift.

From what has already been said, it will be apparent that in those cases in which it is held that the burden of proof does not shift, the court has in mind the primary meaning of the term "burden of proof," that is, the burden of maintaining the issue. Even in these cases, however, it is not certain that the courts had the distinction between the meanings of burden of proof clearly defined. The importance of remembering that the burden of proof in its primary sense does not shift has been pointed out.¹⁰⁰ ter of law, so as to take the burden of proving this issue off of the defendant. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Lyons, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 53 S. W. 96.

In a case in which no testimony was offered except that on the part of the plaintiff, it was held that, since this did not authorize a peremptory instruction for the defendant on the issue of contributory negligence, the jury was properly instructed that the burden of proof on this issue was on the defendant. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Gordon; — Tex. Civ. App. —, 54 S. W. 635.

The rule that the burden is on the defendant to prove contributory negligence does not apply where the evidence showing such negligence comes wholly from the plaintiff; but where facts and circumstances, likewise appearing from plaintiff's evidence, excuse the same, the burden does not shift, but remains with the defendant. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Conder, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 447.

An instruction that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show freedom from contributory negligence would not be proper in a case in which it cannot be said that the plaintiff's evidence, as a matter of law, raises a presumption of want of care. Monroeville v. Weihl, 13 Ohio C. C. 689, 6 Ohio C. D. 188.

⁹⁷ Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. v. Blair, 11 Ohio C. C. 579, 5 Ohio C. D. 366.

But when it is clear that the evidence of the plaintiff raises the presumption of negligence, it is the duty of the court to declare that the burden of disproving such negligence is upon the plaintiff. It is only in doubtful cases that the question should be left for the jury. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Ackworth, 10 Ohio C. C. 583, 6 Ohio C. D. 622.

as follows: "Upon the question of contributory negligence, or violation of the rule by Ackworth [the plaintiff], the burden of proof is upon the defendant, and this makes it incumbent upon the defendant to produce a preponderance of the testimony that Ackworth did not act with ordinary care, or was acting in violation of the rules, upon that occasion, and that this failure to so act, or the violation of the rules, contributed to produce or cause his injuries, unless the testimony offered by the plaintiff in this case raises the presumption of contributory negligence or a violation of the rules on the part of Ackworth, in which event, the burden of proof would then rest upon the plaintiff to rebut and remove this presumption, and to produce a preponderance of the evidence that contributory negligence did not exist, and that the rules of the defendant were being observed by him at that time."

In the Blair Case, the court says that the burden of proof of contributory negligence was upon the defendant, unless the testimony on the part of the plaintiff raised a presumption of contributory negligence on his part, and if the jury found that it did, then the burden of proof would rest upon the plaintiff to rebut and remove this presumption, and produce a preponderance of evidence that contributory negligence on his part did not exist.

¹⁰⁰ In Rapp v. Sarpy County, 71 Neb. 382, 98 N. W. 1042, 102 N. W. 242, an action to recover for personal injuries due to a defective highway, in holding an instruction that if the plaintiff's own testimony tended to show that she was guilty of any carelessness which caused or aided in causing the injury complained of, then the burden of proof shifts, and it devolves upon the plaintiff to satisfy the jury by a preponderance of the evidence that she was not guilty of contributory negligence, was

As will be seen from a glance at the last subdivision of this note, it has been held in a number of the Texas cases that if the plaintiff's own case raises a presumption of contributory negligence, the burden is shifted from the defendant to the plaintiff to prove absence of fault. The language of these cases has been criticized in one Texas decision, in which it is said: "The law does not, at any stage of trial, impose upon a plaintiff the burden of showing that he has not committed negligence. The law does require that a plaintiff's evidence show a state of facts which entitles him to a judgment; and hence, when the evidence adduced by him shows that, because of his own fault, he is not so entitled, he loses his cause, because he has proved the fact, but not because the law required him to prove the absence of it. The plaintiff's own evidence may conclusively show negligence on his part which contributed to his hurt, or may show facts which, though susceptible of explanation, are left unexplained, and so necessitate the conclusion of such negligence. In either of which cases, the court should decide or instruct against him as matter of law; or his evidence may merely raise a question to be solved by the opinion of the jury, and therefore to be submitted to the jury, as to whether or not his conduct was negligent and contributive,—a decision of which, by the jury against him, likewise results in his defeat. But these propositions are true because he has, in fact, furnished the evidence of his negligerroneous, the doctrine that the burden of proof shifts in such a case from the defendant to the plaintiff was repudiated, the court saying: "It is a rule, as well of law as of logic, and one which, humanly speaking, is indispensable to the right decision of any controversy whatever, that the burden of proof, or of argument, rests upon him who maintains the affirmative of an issue. Not only so, but it abides with him continuously from the opening of the debate until its close. In certain instances, deficiencies of otherwise incomplete proofs are supplied by presumptions more or less conclusive in their nature; but, in such cases, their effect is upon the weight of the evidence required to maintain the issue, not upon the obligation of the party to produce a preponderance of the former. The distinction is of the uttermost practical importance, and courts and law writers ought scrupulously to abstain from the inaccurate and misleading expression that the burden of proof 'shifts' during the progress of a trial. Oftentimes, it is true, the use of the term, because of the peculiar circumstances of particular cases, may work no harm; but there is always danger of its doing so, as it may very probably have done in this case, in which the jury were told that, if there was anything in the plaintiff's testimony tending to prove that her conduct was negligent, she was burdened with the responsibility of establishing a negative 'by a preponderance of the evidence.' This could not have been so. If she had admitted that she was negligent, or if her evidence had disclosed conduct on her part from which the law conclusively presumes negligence, the litigation would, of course, have been at an end, not because she would have thus assumed the burden of proof, but because she would have furnished the evidence requisite to enable the defendant to meet the requirement in that regard, which the issue made of him. But the mere fact that her testimony tended to show that she was negligent, if it did so, went no further toward maintaining the issue tendered by the answer, than would have done evidence of equal weight and credibility produced by the defendant. All that can justly be said about it is that the fact that the testimony was her own, it being in the nature of an admission against her own interest, added immensely to its weight and credibility; but, even so, there may have been other evidence in the case tending with equal or greater strength in the opposite direction, and unless, upon the whole record, there was a preponderance showing her negligence, she was not precluded, upon that issue, from recovery."

But in Union P. R. Co. v. Connolly, 77 Neb. 254, 109 N. W. 368, it was held that the defendant could not complain of an instruction that "the burden of proof of negligence on the part of the plaintiff is upon the defendants to establish by a preponderance of the evidence, unless you find that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff discloses negligence on his part which in any way caused or contributed to his injury; then it devolves upon the plaintiff, before he can recover, to prove by a preponderance of the evidence not only that the negligence of the defendants, or either of them, caused his injury, but also that he himself was free from any negligence on his part that contributed to his injury." This instruction reasonably admitting of the construction that if the plaintiff's testimony disclosed that the injury was in any way related to any negligent act or omission of the plaintiff, the burden of proof was upon him to show that such act or omission was not the proximate cause, or one of the proximate causes, operating to produce the injury, it was, at least, as favorable as the defendant had the right to ask.

And it was held that the defendant was in no position to complain that an instruction that the burden of proof of contributory negligence is on the defendant should not have been given, where the plaintiff's contributory negligence appeared from his own evidence, where the defendant not only alleged in its answer that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, but adduced evidence in support of that defense. Tinkle v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 212 Md. 445, 110 S. W. 1086 gence, and not because any rule of law ever exacted proof of its absence. Expressions in some of the opinions, which may seem to mean that the state of the evidence in particular cases may affect the application of the rule of law as to the burden of proof, are inaccurate. The rule of law, as it is established in this state, is that negligence, whether of the plaintiff or defendant, must be affirmatively shown, and this puts the burden on the party alleging it, to make it appear, either by evidence furnished by himself, or by availing himself of that furnished by his adversary, or both." ¹

But these decisions are inaccurate only in so far as the courts may have used the term "burden of proof" in its primary sense, which is the sense in which the term is used in the quotation just referred to.

And in a Supreme Court case, a contention that the general rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence is upon the defendant is not applicable, where the presumption that the plaintiff was not in fault is overcome by plaintiff's own evi-

¹ Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Harris, — Tex. —, 128 S. W. 897, affirming — Tex. Civ. App. —, 120 S. W. 500.

Likewise, in Randall v. Northwestern Teleg. Co. 54 Wis. 140, 41 Am. Rep. 17, 11 N. W. 419, it is said that the fact that the plaintiff, in making proofs on his part, introduces evidence tending to prove his own contributory negligence, does not change the nature of the issue. The affirmative of the issue and the question of the plaintiff's negligence is still with the defendant; and because he may use the evidence introduced by the plaintiff to support his side of that issue, that fact does not shift the burden of proof from the defendant to the plaintiff. If the defendant in an action upon contract pleads payment, and the plaintiff, in making out his case, offers some evidence which tends to prove payment, that fact does not relieve the defendant from the burden of proving the payment. He may make use of the plaintiff's evidence to prove his side of the case, but the burden of the proof is nevertheless on his shoulders. If, in making out his case, the plaintiff should admit his contributory negligence, or prove it by evidence which was conclusive of the fact, he would defeat himself, because he would prove the defendant's defense; but if he gave only testimony which might go to the jury, as evidence tending to prove such negligence, he would not be bound to give negative evidence to disprove such negligence, or be subject to an instruction that the burden of proof had been changed, so that, if it did not affirmatively appear that he had not been guilty of negligence, it would be presumed that he had been.

The burden of proving defendant's negligence rests upon the plaintiff, while the onus of showing contributory negligence rests upon the defendant. In both cases, this must be shown by a greater weight of the evidence, and of this relative weight the jury alone can determine. A negative presumption necessarily accompanies the burden, and remains until the burden is lifted or shifted by direct admissions or a preponderance of proof. Each issue bears its own burden, and it rarely happens that the burden of all the issues rests upon the same party. In cases of negligence like the present, it changes with each successive step, it being necessary for the plaintiff to prove the negligence of the defendant, the defendant the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and again for the plaintiff to show the last clear chance of the defendant, if that issue becomes material. Each of these issues depends upon the one preceding. The plaintiff must first prove that he was injured by the negligence of the defendant. If he fails to prove it, that is an end of the case, and the defendant is not then required to prove contributory negligence. Properly speaking, there can be no contributory negligence unless there is negligence on the part of the defendant. This distinction is important as affecting the burden of proof and the consequent direction of a verdict. If the negligence by which the plaintiff is injured is entirely his own, as in Mesic's Case, where, instead of the train running into the horse, the horse ran into the train, there is no evidence to go to the jury on the first issue, and the question of contributory negligence becomes immaterial. Where there is evidence tending to prove negligence on the part of both parties, the case must always be submitted to the jury, and it makes no difference if this evidence appears in the testimony of the plaintiff. The court may say to the jury that there is no evidence tending to prove a fact, but it can never say that a fact is proved. Cox v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. 123 N. C. 604, 31 S. E. 848.

In North Birmingham Street R. Co. v. Calderwood, 89 Ala. 247, 18 Am. St. Rep. 105, 7 So. 360, it is said that, although contributory negligence is defensive matter and the burden of establishing it is ordinarily on the defendant, it is not so if plaintiff's own testimony inculcates himself also.

This, of course, is so only when the term "burden of proof" is used in its secondary sense.

In Georgia P. R. Co. v. Davis, 92 Ala. 300, 25 Am. St. Rep. 47, 9 So. 252, it is held that the onus of proving contributory negligence is in all cases on the defendant, though the plaintiff's evidence sometimes relieves from the necessity of discharging it.

The fact that the plaintiff's evidence tends to show contributory negligence does not take the burden of proof as to such negligence from the defendant. Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Wilmer, 97 Ala. 165, 11 So. 886. The court said that the dence, was not upheld, the court saying that the burden as to contributory negligence remained the same under the circumstances.²

f. Pleading.

1. Allegation of due care.

The rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant is burden in all cases is on the defendant, although plaintiff's evidence sometimes obviates the necessity of proof by the defendant that the injury was due to contributory negligence, but that, even in such cases, it is inaccurate and misleading to say that the burden is on the plaintiff. The mere fact that there is evidence which tends to prove the affirmative of an issue, no matter from which side the evidence comes, does not, as a matter of law, discharge the onus resting on the party having the affirmative of that issue. The onus is not discharged by any tendency of the evidence which falls short of reasonably satisfying the jury of the facts involved in the tendency.

In Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Ryan, 17 Colo. 98, 28 Pac. 79, the court said: "It sometimes happens that evidence tending to show contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff may be elicited from his own witnesses when giving their testimony in chief. In such case, unless such evidence be contradicted or rebutted by counter evidence tending to show plaintiff's diligence, or freedom from negligence, he should, of course, suffer defeat, either by nonsuit or by the verdict of the jury. But this does not affect the correctness of the rule that contributory negligence, the same as any other negligence, is a matter to be proved, and that, in the absence of evidence, it is not to be presumed. Hence, where a defendant relies upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff as a defense, whether the averment in respect thereto appear negatively in the complaint or affirmatively in the answer, such contributory negligence must be shown by a preponderance of the evidence, or the defense will be unavailing. In general, from whatever source evidences of negligence or of contributory negligence may come, they are to be considered and weighed together, and the same quantum of proof will be required to establish one as the other."

The fact that the plaintiff, in making his proofs, introduced evidence tending to show contributory negligence, does not change the nature of the issue, the affirmative of the question being still with the defendant, and the introduction of evidence by the plaintiff supporting that side of the issue does not shift the burden of proof a rule of pleading as well as of evidence.³ Contributory negligence is a defense which necessarily implies negligence on the part of the defendant, and is therefore a plea of confession and avoidance.⁴ Where the onus of proof is on the defendant as to contributory negligence, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to make the allegation of due care in his complaint, and thus anticipate the defense.⁵ This rule has been an-

from the defendant to the plaintiff. Mares v. Northern P. R. Co. 3 Dak. 336, 21 N. W. 5.

The defendant can avail himself of anything in plaintiff's evidence tending to prove contributory negligence, but this does not change the burden of proof as fixed by statute. Wallace v. Western North Carolina R. Co. 104 N. C. 442, 10 S. E. 552.

In an action to recover for injuries received by reason of a defective bridge, the mere fact that the evidence shows that the plaintiff knew of the condition of the bridge does not shift on him the burden of showing affirmatively that he used due care and prudence in driving upon it. Prince George's County v. Burgess, 61 Md. 29, 48 Am. Rep. 88. The court said that "it is wise for a plaintiff shown to know of a defect, to prove that he drove with caution; but we cannot accede to the view that the onus of showing want of care rests anywhere but on the defendant. If the bridge was wholly impassable and the plaintiff knew it, his knowledge would be conclusive, and the case might have been taken from the jury; but not for the reason assigned in the prayer. In this case it does not appear from the proof that the bridge was wholly impassable. It was unsafe and had a hole in it, into which the appellee's horse fell and was injured. The simple fact of its existence, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, was not sufficient to bar recovery. It should appear that the hole rendered the bridge practically impassable to effect a bar because of knowledge. The hole might possibly have been avoided with ordinary care in driving, and the knowledge of its existence ought to have prevented carelessness on the part of the plaintiff, and naturally would have induced care on his part; but the onus of showing that such care and prudence was not exercised still rested on the defendants."

For cases in which burden of proof is said never to shift, see I. note 5.

It cannot be doubted that contributory negligence, while not a pure plea in confession and avoidance, is in the nature of such a plea. Gadonnex v. New Orleans R. Co. 128 Fed. 805.

nounced in many cases.⁶ So, in an action to recover damages for injuries received by the breaking down of a bridge while plaintiff was crossing with his wagon and team, it was held not necessary that he should aver that the bridge was broken without his fault.⁷ And a declaration charging a railroad company with carelessly and negligently killing the plaintiff's horse was held to set out a cause of action.⁸ The

v. Andrew, 86 Va. 272, 9 S. E. 1015; Carrico v. West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. 35 W. Va. 389, 14 S. E. 12; Southern R. Co. v. Bentley, — Ala. —, 56 So. 249.

The case of a party's own negligence concurring with that of the defendant in producing an injury is merely an exception to the general rule that he can recover for any injury inflicted on him by the negligent acts of the defendant. Though it would be the safer practice, the plaintiff is not bound to allege the nonexistence of an exception that may or may not exist as a defense to his action. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Murphy, 46 Tex. 356, 26 Am. Rep. 272.

A complaint is not demurrable on the ground that it fails to allege that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care. Smith v. Delaware River Amusement Co. 76 N. J. L. 461, 69 Atl. 970.

⁷ Smoot v. Wetumpka, 24 Ala. 112. The court said that the plaintiff deduced his right to damages from a tortious breach of the defendant's duty, which he avers has caused the injury of which he complains. If there be circumstances connected with the injury showing that it is to be attributed to some fault of the plaintiff, it is for the defendant to set them up in defense. It is not required that a plaintiff should, by his averments, negative every conceivable fact which might militate against his recovery. He is bound only to make out affirmatively a prima facie case for damages.

The plaintiff in an action for damages for being bitten by a dog does not fail to state a cause of action because of the fact that he does not negative contributory negligence. Boyd v. Oddous, 97 Cal. 510, 32 Pac. 569.

In Hines v. Georgetown Gas Co. 3 App. D. C. 369, it was held that in an action for damages to a laborer due to the escape of gas into a trench in which he was working, it is not necessary to allege that the plaintiff was ignorant of the noxious and dangerous quality of the gas, and of the danger of his employment in the trench, and that the plaintiff did not by his own negligence contribute to the injury complained of.

In an action for injuries received by reason of a defective sidewalk, it was held that failure of the plaintiff to allege that at the time of the accident he was exercising due and ordinary care was not a ground for demurrer. Orlando v. Heard, 29 Fla. 581, 11 So. 182. The court said that the plaintiff was not required to negative in his declaration a defense which the defendant must set up and maintain by proof in the absence of such a showing by the plaintiff.

In an action against a railroad company to recover damages for personal injuries to a brakeman, occasioned by the negligence of a coemployee, it is unnecessary for the plaintiff to aver that there was no fault or negligence on the part of the injured person. Missouri P. R. Co. v. McCally, 41 Kan. 639, 21 Pac. 574.

In an action to recover for the death of a boy who fell off of a private bridge into a canal and was drowned, it was held that the petition was not defective because of the fact that it failed to allege that there was no negligence on the part of the boy contributing to the accident. Louisville & P. Canal Co. v. Murphy, 9 Bush, 522.

⁸ Smith v. Eastern R. Co. 35 N. H. 356.

Where one person is killed by the neglirule being as stated, the defendant cannot object to the introduction of any evidence, on the ground that the petition does not allege that the person injured was without fault on his part.⁹

A declaration is fatally defective if it shows that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.¹⁰

It has been said that if the plaintiff in his petition suggests contributory negligence, the petition must be negatived by an allegation that he was without fault.¹¹ But it has been held that, to require him to do this, the plaintiff's petition must make out a prima facie case of contributory negligence,¹² or raise an issue of contributory negligence,¹³ or show that plaintiff's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.¹⁴

2. Allegation of knowledge of dangers and defects.

No attempt will be here made to collect all the cases bearing upon the question whether, in actions by servants to recover from a negligent or wrongful act of another, the plaintiff is not required to allege that the deceased was exercising ordinary care for his own safety at the time of his death. Johnson v. Westerfield, 143 Ky. 10, 135 S. W. 125.

In an action to recover for injuries due to a defective sidewalk, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should allege freedom from any contributory negligence. Pryor v. Walkerville, 31 Mont. 618, 79 Pac. 240.

In an action by a brakeman for injuries received by being knocked down by a car on a parallel track, it is not necessary to allege that he was exercising due care for his safety, since the burden of alleging and proving contributory negligence is on the defendant. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Collins, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 143, 57 S. W. 384.

⁹ O'Connor v. Missouri P. R. Co. 94 Mo. 150, 4 Am. St. Rep. 364, 7 S. W. 106.

¹⁰ Berns v. Gaston Gas Coal Co. 27 W. Va. 285, 55 Am. Rep. 304.

Where the burden is on the defendant, the allegation that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury is sufficient unless the complaint shows contributory negligence. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Goddard, 33 Ind. App. 321, 71 N. E. 514.

It is not necessary to negative contributory negligence where it does not appear affirmatively in the allegations of the complaint. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Browning, 34 Ind. App. 90, 71 N. E. 227.

¹¹ Street R. Co. v. Nolthenius, 40 Ohio St. 376.

¹² The plaintiff's petition not establishing a prima facie case of contributory negligence, it is not necessary for him to allege that, at the time of the injuries complained of, the injured person was in the exercise of due care. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. King, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 123 S. W. 151.

Where the petition does not establish prima facie, at least, contributory negligence, it is not defective in failing to aver that the injury charged was inflicted upon the plaintiff without any fault on his part in the transaction. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Murphy, 46 Tex. 356, 26 Am. Rep. 272.

Where a passenger on a free emigrant train was injured by the falling of an upper berth upon her while she was away from her seat, it was held that it was unnecessary for her to plead that she had left her seat from necessity, since this tended to prove contributory negligence, the burden of establishing which is on the defendant. Northern P. R. Co. v. Hess, 2 Wash. 383, 26 Pac. 866.

And the fact that a person is injured while crossing a street away from the regular crossing does not impose upon him the necessity of negating contributory negligence, in an action to recover for the injuries sustained. Randall v. Hoquiam, 30 Wash. 435, 70 Pac. 1111.

A complaint in an action to recover for the death of a switchman run over by reason of a misplaced switch does not disclose contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, where it not only alleges that the decedent was without fault, but that he had no notice, knowledge, or warning of the change of his switch, to which his injury is attributed, and that he could not have known thereof by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Goddard, 33 Ind. App. 321, 71 N. E. 514.

In a suit for damages against a railroad company on account of the alleged negligence of its agents, it is not necessary that the petition should negative, either by facts stated or by direct averment, the exercise of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and exception to this rule exists when the petition, from its averments, would establish, if unexplained, a prima facie case of negligence of the party injured. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Cowser, 57 Tex. 293.

A petition in an action to recover damages for injuries received by reason of a defective sidewalk does not raise the presumption that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, because of the fact that it alleges that she was walking upon the sidewalk and that it was out of repair. Peat v. Norwalk, 5 Ohio C. C. N. S. 614, 26 Ohio C. C. 161.

¹⁴ The existence of contributory negligence need not be negatived in the complaint, unless it appears from other allegadamages from the master for personal injuries, the plaintiff must allege absence of knowledge of the danger or defect responsible for the injury, as this is a matter more properly belonging to the law of assumed risk.¹⁵ The subjects are so closely related, however, that a few cases may be taken for illustrative purpose. It has been held unnecessary for plaintiff to allege his ignorance of the danger to which he was exposed.¹⁶ And in an action to re-tions therein that the proximate cause of the injury was the act of the plaintiff. Orient Ins. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 31 Mont. 502, 78 Pac. 1036.

Where the pleadings do not show that the injury was caused proximately by plaintiff's own act, and the facts shown by the proof are not before the court, the case falls within the rule that contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, and that the burden of establishing it by a preponderance of the evidence rests upon the defendant. Nord v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. 33 Mont. 464, 84 Pac. 1116, 89 Pac. 647.

If the complaint shows the proximate or a proximate cause of the injury to have been the act of the plaintiff, the complaint must also state his freedom from negligence in doing the act; otherwise the pleading is bad. Cummings v. Helena & L. Smelting & Reduction Co. 26 Mont. 434, 68 Pac. 852.

In Kennon v. Gilmer, 4 Mont. 433, 2 Pac. 21, it was held that where the plaintiff alleges that his own act was the proximate cause of the injury, as where he jumps from a stagecoach because actuated by great fear of bodily injury if he should remain thereon, and, in jumping, is injured, it then becomes incumbent upon him to show that, in thus acting, he exercised that degree of care and prudence that a reasonable person would have exercised in like circumstances.

A complaint charging that plaintiff's hand was injured by being caught between the rollers of a mangle or ironing machine at which she was employed, due to the failure on the part of the defendant to provide plaintiff with reasonably safe machinery, and to maintain it in a reasonably safe condition, does not show that the proximate cause of the injury was an act of the plaintiff, within the rule that under such circumstances the complaint must also state plaintiff's freedom from negligence. Ball v. Gussenhoven, 29 Mont. 321, 74 Pac. 871.

The rule that if the complaint shows that the plaintiff's own act was the proximate cause of his injury, or proximately contributed thereto, it will be held insufficient unless it goes further and, by appropriate allegations, shows that the plaintiff was at the time exercising ordinary care and circumspection, is based upon the obviously just principle that one who has brought injury upon himself by his own act can-cover for the death of a servant who, while on a car, was struck by a target pole while the car was passing it, and throws under the wheels, it was held that it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to allege that the deceased had no knowledge of the dangerous condition of the switch, and that he was free from contributory negligence.¹⁷ And where the plaintiff was injured by the explosion of a premature blast due to a defective fuse, it was held that it was un-not lay responsibility for it upon another, unless he can allege and show that the act causing the injury was impelled by the apparent necessities of a perilous condition brought about by the negligence of such other person. Montague v. Hanson, 38 Mont. 376, 99 Pac. 1063.

The rule does not apply to cases where the plaintiff has been injured upon going into a place where he has a right to go, by some hidden or unknown cause, of the existence of which it is the duty of the person having control of the place to give him warning. Ibid.

¹⁵ See supra, V. c, 2.

¹⁷ Johnston v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Or. 94, 31 Pac. 283.

But where an employee of a railroad company was killed by being struck by a low viaduct under which a car, upon the top of which he was riding, was passing, it was held not incumbent upon plaintiff to prove his intestate's want of knowledge of the fact that there was insufficient space between the viaduct and the top of the car to permit a man to stand with safety. Chicago Terminal Transfer R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 114 Ill. App. 345.

In an action to recover for the death of a servant killed by a vicious horse, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to allege that the deceased did not have the means of knowing, equally with the defendant, the necessary for him to allege that he did not have knowledge of such defect.¹⁸ So, it was held not necessary for a brakeman suing for injuries received by a collision due to the negligence of an incompetent and unfit engineer, to allege or prove his want of knowledge of such incompetency.¹⁹

According to some of the cases, whether the servant knew of the dangers or defects out of which the injury arose goes to the question of contributory negligence;²⁰ character of the animal. Donahue v. Enterprise R. Co. 32 S. C. 299, 17 Am. St. Rep. 854, 11 S. E. 95.

¹⁸ Conroy v. Oregon Constr. Co. 10 Sawy. 630, 23 Fed. 71.

The plaintiff need not allege want of knowledge of a defect in a platform, upon the condition of which he bases his right to recover. Knarborough v. Belcher Silver Min. Co. 3 Sawy. 446, Fed. Cas. No. 7,874.

Where a servant was injured by the derailling of a train by the striking of an animal on the track, and the negligence charged was that the road was not properly fenced and that the pilot was not in proper position, it was held unnecessary for the plaintiff to allege want of knowledge of such defect. Magee v. North Pacific Coast R. Co. 78 Cal. 430, 12 Am. St. Rep. 69, 21 Pac. 114.

In actions brought by servants against their masters, the burden of proof as to the master's knowledge, or culpability in lacking knowledge, of the defect which led to the injury, whether in the character of a fellow servant or in the quality of materials used, rests upon the plaintiff. But the plaintiff having proved the fault of the master in this respect, the burden of proving that the plaintiff also knew of such defect, and commenced or continued his service with such knowledge, rests upon the defendant. This fact being proved, it is then for the plaintiff to show, if he can, that defendant induced him to continue the work by promising to remedy the defect. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 99, p. 128, cited with approval in Crane v. Missouri P. R. Co. 87 Mo. 588.

The plaintiff need not allege lack of knowledge of the incompetency of defendant's employee. Matthews v. Bull, — Cal. —, 47 Pac. 773. The court said that in California the law seems to be settled that in this class of cases it is not necessary to allege in the complaint that the injury was one without fault or negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

In an action by an administrator against a stock-yard company for the death of a witchman, caused by defects in a railway track, it is not necessary to allege that he deceased had no knowledge of these defects, since that is a matter of defense which, to admit proof, must be pleaded. Union Stock Yards Co. v. Conoyer, 38 Neb. 3 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but it does not seem that the courts in the cases cited had in mind the proper distinction between the doctrine of assumed risk and contributory negligence.

3. Availability of defense under general denial.

It has been held in a number of cases, in jurisdictions where the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the de-

488, 41 Am. St. Rep. 738, 56 N. W. 1081.

In actions other than those between master and servant, the question of whether the person injured had knowledge of the danger or defect goes to the question of contributory negligence. In an action to recover damages for injuries received by reason of a defect in a highway, the burden of proving contributory negligence is not sustained by merely showing the knowledge by the complainant of the defect alleged. Muller v. District of Columbia, 5 Mackey, 286.

In an action to recover for injuries due to a defective sidewalk, it is not necessary for plaintiff to allege that he did not have knowledge of such defect. Denison v. Sanford, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 661, 21 S. W. 784.

In an action to recover for injuries due to obstructions in the street, it is unnecessary that the petition allege that the plaintiff was unaware of the obstruction, since the absence of contributory negligence need not be set out in the petition. Lancaster v. Walter, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2189, 80 S. W. 189.

Where a passenger who was carried beyond her station was injured while attempting to walk back, it was held unnecessary in an action to recover for the injuries sustained, to negative the fact that there was an open, obvious, and safe way which the plaintiff could have traveled from the point where she was put off back to the station. Alabama City, G. & A. R. Co. v. Cox, — Ala. —, 55 So. 909.

²⁰ In Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. 232, the court said that to state that the master is exempt from liability where the danger is known to the servant is but another form of stating that the plaintiff cannot recover for the injury to which his own negligence has contributed. Contributory negligence, says the court, is a matter of defense, and need not be negatived by the plaintiff in his declaration.

Where the action was for an injury to a brakeman while attempting to couple two cars, and the negligence charged was due to the fact that the defendant had failed to employ a suitable number of servants to convey a stop signal, it was held unnecessary for the plaintiff to allege that he did not have knowledge of the condition complained of, or was not ignorant of it in consequence of a want of ordinary care on his part. Thorpe v. Missouri P. R. Co. 89 Mo. 650, 58 Am. Rep. 120, 2 S. W. 3. The court said: "The cases from which the fendant, that if the defense is relied upon, it must be pleaded by the defendant; that it is not available under a general denial.²¹ rule for which defendant contends is taken are, we believe, from courts not in accord with this court as to the rule of pleading the contributory negligence of plaintiff, and which hold that the burden of proof is upon plaintiff to show both the negligence of defendant and his own care, which is not the rule in this state."

In an action by a miner to recover damages for injuries received by the fall of an overhanging rock in a place where he been ordered to work on the assurance that it was safe, it was held that whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence by knowing of the danger and failing to observe due care to avoid it, or otherwise, if susceptible of proof, was a matter of defense, which need not be negatived in the declaration. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Wombacher, 134 Ill. 57, 24 N. E. 627.

Failure of plaintiff, who was injured by reason of the breaking of a lumber truck through defective flooring, to allege that he could not have ascertained the condition of the flooring upon reasonable inquiry, does not render the pleading defective, since contributory negligence is a matter of defense, to be pleaded by the defendant, and not to be negatived by the complaint. Johnson v. Bellingham Bay Improv. Co. 13 Wash. 455, 43 Pac. 370.

A complaint is not insufficient because it fails to state that plaintiff was ignorant of the dangerous condition of a trench into which he was sent to work, since such an allegation, in an action to recover for injuries received in the trench, relates only to the defense of contributory negligence. Hall v. St. Joseph Water Co. 48 Mo. App. 356.

In an action to recover for injuries received by plaintiff while assisting in attempting to move a threshing machine engine over a country bridge, by the falling of the bridge, an instruction, "And if you believe from the evidence of the plaintiff himself, that the circumstances known and apparent to him, and immediately preceding and connected with the injury as disclosed by plaintiff's testimony, were such that a reasonably prudent and cautious man under like circumstances, in the exercise of reasonable prudence and caution, would have known, understood, and discovered the danger of going upon the bridge where he was injured, then the plaintiff cannot recover," was erroneous, for one reason, because, in effect, it was to tell the jury that plaintiff was bound to establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. Vertrees v. Gage County, 81 Neb. 213, 115 N. W. 863.

²¹ In keeping with the proposition that the burden of proof is on the defendant, it has been repeatedly ruled in Missouri, that if contributory negligence is to be relied upon, it must be pleaded by the defendant. Taylor v. Missouri P. R. Co. 26 Mo. App. 336.

Contributory negligence, if relied on as a defense, must be pleaded. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Schuster, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 65, 7 S. W. 874; Bevis v. Vanceburg Teleph. Co. 132 Ky. 385, 113 S. W. 811; Donovan v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 89 Mo. 147, 1 S. W. 232; Parsons v. Missouri P. R. Co. 94 Mo. 286, 6 S. W. 464; Schultze v. Missouri P. R. Co. 32 Mo. App. 438; Orient Ins. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 31 Mont. 502, 78 Pac. 1036; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Foster, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 87 S. W. 879; Holland v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 26 Utah, 209, 72 Pac. 940.

The defendant cannot take advantage of the plaintiff's contributory negligence, not developed by plaintiff's case, unless the defendant pleads it. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Gammage, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 96 S. W. 645.

Being a matter of defense, it is incumbent upon the defendant by his answer to plead contributory negligence, that he may avail himself of such defense, for, there being no issue as to contributory negligence, no finding in relation thereto would be required. Kenny v. Kennedy, 9 Cal. App. 350, 99 Pac. 384.

So, where the defense of contributory negligence was not pleaded, it was held that an instruction that, before a recovery could be had, it must appear from the whole of the testimony that the injured party used, under all the circumstances, care to avoid the danger, was not proper, as contributory negligence was not an issue in the case. White v. Trinidad, 10 Colo. App. 327, 52 Pac. 214.

Where the petition states a good cause of action, and does not develop a case of contributory negligence, it rests upon the defendant to allege that the injury was so caused, if it desires to rely upon such a defense. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Watson, 72 Tex. 631, 10 S. W. 731.

The defense of contributory negligence must be set up in the answer where there are no facts stated in the complaint which, as a matter of law, constitute contributory negligence. Duffy v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. 144 N. C. 26, 56 S. E. 557.

not by demurrer; ²⁴ that the defense is not available to the defendant unless he tenders an issue upon the question.²⁵

It is declared that a statement of a cause of action based upon the defendant's negligence does not involve the assertion that no negligence on the part of the plaintiff proximately contributed to the injury of which he complains, so that a mere denial of the allegations of the complaint casts the burden on the plaintiff to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence.²⁶ And it has been held that an answer of general denial, even where the complaint alleges that the plaintiff was free from fault, does not raise the issue of contributory negligence.²⁷

²⁴ Smith v. Southern R. Co. 129 N. C. 374, 40 S. E. 86.

It is a sufficient answer to the contention that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, that no such defense was raised by the answer, or presented to the jury by instructions asked by the defendant. Fell v. Rich Hill Coal Min. Co. 23 Mo. App. 216.

A defense of contributory negligence cannot be made under the general issue, but must be specially pleaded. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 95 Ala. 412, 11 So. 262.

Under a general denial, the defendant is in no condition to invoke the defense of contributory negligence, unless the evidence offered in behalf of plaintiff shows such negligence. Schlereth v. Missouri P. R. Co. 96 Mo. 509, 10 S. W. 66.

In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Farmer, 97 Ala. 141, 12 So. 86, the rule that the defense of contributory negligence is not available under the plea of not guilty was adhered to.

Where the case was tried solely upon the plea of not guilty, it was held that the want of care or diligence of the plaintiff was not an issue in the cause; that if the defendant had desired to raise the question of contributory negligence, it should have done so by a proper plea, and that it could not for the first time insist upon it in the appellate court. Alabama Midland R. Co. v. Johnson, 123 Ala. 197, 26 So. 160.

Where the defense of contributory negligence is not pleaded by the defendant, and plaintiff's own case does not raise a presumption of contributory negligence, and the complaint specifically alleges that plaintiff was entirely without negligence, the question of contributory negligence cannot be considered. *Birsch v. But it has been decided in an action before a court of a justice of the peace, that the defendant may have the benefit of evidence showing contributory negligence, although such negligence was not pleaded, since before such court the defendant is not required to make any written plea.²⁸

Though contributory negligence is an affirmative defense which must be specially pleaded, it is declared that it may nevertheless be available to the defendant, although not specially pleaded, if it sufficiently appears from plaintiff's evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury.²⁹ It has been said that in a case in which plaintiff shows prima facie contributory negligence, the

Where it clearly appears from the plaintiff's own evidence that he was guilty of negligence that directly contributed to produce the injury, it is the duty of the court to take the case from the jury by an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence. Chaney v. Louisiana & M. River R. Co. 176 Mo. 598, 75 S. W. 595.

The defendant may interpose a motion for nonsuit on that ground. Smith v. Ogden & N. W. R. Co. 33 Utah, 129, 93 Pac. 185.

In Taylor v. Missouri P. R. Co. 26 Mo. App. 336, the question was left to the jury.

Where the plaintiff's own testimony points to contributory negligence, a charge on that subject is proper. Nelson v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. 35 Mont. 223, 88 Pac. 785.

In an action to recover for the loss of stock killed at a crossing, in which plaintiff's contributory negligence was not pleaded, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover where his own evidence showed that he was guilty of negligence contributing to the accident. Milburn v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 86 Mo. 104.

In an action to recover for injuries received by coming in contact with an electric wire, evidence that plaintiff slipped while working on a scaffold, and, in endeavoring to save himself, threw out his arms and came in contact with the wire, does not show contributory negligence, so as to enable the defendant to take advantage of that defense in the absence of its being pleaded in the answer. Birsch v. Citizens' Electric Co. 36 Mont. 574, 93 Pac. 940.

defendant may take advantage of it without pleading such defense;³⁰ and that it should not be understood that in all cases where there may be evidence tending to show contributory negligence, such defense may be raised at the trial though not set up in the answer. To be thus utilized on the trial, the contributory negligence shown in plaintiff's evidence should be so clear and flagrant as to disprove the cause of action stated in the petition. If it falls short of this, and remains a question of fact which might be decided either way, then we have little doubt that it should be pleaded to be available as a defense;³¹ and that it is only where a conclusive inference of contributory negligence arises out of the plaintiff's own testimony, or that of his witnesses, either on their direct or their cross-examination, that contributory negligence will bar his recovery when it is not pleaded. In other cases, contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, to be pleaded and proved by the defendant in order to entitle him to have it submitted to the jury. If it is not so pleaded and proved, and is nevertheless submitted to the jury, the case falls within the rule that it is error to submit to the jury an issue not made by the pleadings.³² And that unless plaintiff's petition makes him prima facie guilty of negligence as a matter of law, or unless the undisputed evidence shows contributory negligence as a matter of law, the defendant, to make out that defense, must allege and prove the act or acts relied on as constituting such negligence.³³ The fact that contributory negligence is not affirmatively pleaded in the answer is immaterial where plaintiff's own evidence shows that he was guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury.³⁴ The defense may be considered, however, where it is manifest from the record that both parties, without objection, have tried a case for personal injuries to its conclusion as if upon issue joined upon the plea of contributory negligence, although the record shows no other plea than the general issue.³⁵

It is not intended in this note to go into the question of what constitutes a sufficient plea of the defense of contributory negligence, but a few of the cases in which the

No issue of contributory negligence having been presented by the pleadings, the court upon appeal cannot, in determining that question, consider any evidence other than that presented by the plaintiff in establishing his case. Kenny v. Kennedy, 9 Cal. App. 350, 99 Pac. 384.

In Brown v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 31 Mo. App. 661, where the defense of contributory negligence was not pleaded, it was urged that, although the evidence of the plaintiff did not so clearly show contributory negligence as to warrant the court in taking the case from the jury, if it nevertheless tended to show contributory negligence, it became an issue in the case, and should have been submitted to the jury; but the court did not pass upon the question, on the ground that, in the case before it, there was no evidence on the part of the plaintiff, either proving or tending to prove contributory negligence.

But in Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 95 Ala. 412, 11 So. 262, the court said that the defendant need not introduce evidence in support of a special plea, if the evidence introduced by the plaintiff has already established the defense. But the source from which the evidence to support a defense comes does not determine that it was not purely defensive matter, and available only under a special plea, or that the burden to prove it was not on the defendant. The term "contributory negligence," instead of implying such a denial of the material allegations of the complaint as is made by pleading the general issue, implies just the contrary. The theory of this special defense is that the defendant was negligent, but that the negligence of the plaintiff conduced to the injury complained of. The defense is in the nature of a confession and avoidance. It may be fully made out without denying a single allegation of the complaint. The pith of it is that, admitting that the defendant was negligent as charged, yet the plaintiff is not entitled to recover because his own negligence proximately contributed to the injury.

The cases are not in harmony as to the necessity of specially pleading the defense of contributory negligence, as this defense has been held available under the general issue or under a general denial.³⁷ In the United States courts there is a conflict on the question;³⁸ and in South Carolina the decisions are not in accord.³⁹ It would

A statement in an answer purporting to be a defense of contributory negligence to an action for damages for injury to the person, which only denies that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant, and alleges that it was "wholly" caused by the negligence of the plaintiff, is not such a defense, but only a denial of the negligence of the defendant, and needs no reply. Watkins v. Southern P. R. Co. 4 L.R.A. 239, 4 Sawy. 30, 38 Fed. 711.

An allegation in an answer that an intestate's death was not caused by any negligence of the defendant, but by his own negligence, is not a sufficient statement of the defense of contributory negligence. Cogwell v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 132 N. C. 52, 44 S. E. 618.

A plea by which the defendant denies each and every allegation in the complaint, and alleges that if the plaintiff's intestate was killed by a locomotive and cars of the defendant, as charged, he contributed thereto by his own carelessness and negligence, and that the defendant is not liable therefor, is not a good plea of contributory negligence, since the defendant must set out or admit its negligence, and seek to avoid its negligence by alleging negligence of the plaintiff as a proximate cause. Scott v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 7 S. C. 136, 45 S. E. 129.

In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Robbins, 168 Ind. 467, 80 N. E. 415, an instruction that contributory negligence is now a matter of defense, and provable under the answer of general denial, was said to be not subject to criticism.

³⁸ On principle, the pleading of this defense would seem to be requisite to raising it in the United States courts, especially in proceedings according to the course of the common law. Clark v. Canadian P. R. Co. 69 Fed. 544.

The defendant may prove contributory negligence, although it is not pleaded in his answer. Canadian P. R. Co. v. Clark, 20 C. C. A. 447, 38 U. S. App. 573, 74 Fed. 362. Lacombe, J., in a concurring opinion in this case, said: "A system of procedure which denies to defendant the right to avail of plaintiff's contributory negligence, unless he has alleged it in his pleading, is inherently vicious. There are many cases where the fact that plaintiff's negligence was the real cause of the accident is wholly unknown until the trial. It is locked up in plaintiff's breast, and only made manifest under the stress of cross-examination. Under such circumstances, how could an honest defendant have alleged it in his answer? He had no knowledge or information whatsoever, warranting a belief sufficient to authorize his verifying an answer which alleges that plaintiff was negligent. And how unjust to deprive him of a meritorious defense merely because he did not and could not have learned of it until the trial. It may be suggested that the court has the power to allow an amendment on the trial; but that power rests in the court's discretion, and it does not seem to be a very sensible system which contemplates amendment as a necessary essential of its usefulness. The inevitable result of such an illogical and unscientific system of pleading and practice would be to imperil the rights of the conscientious defendant, while the defendant with an elastic conscience would invariably aver and swear to plaintiff's negligence, although he had not the slightest knowledge or information to warrant any such averment. Certainly, no such practice should be encouraged."

But in Gadonnex v. New Orleans R. Co. 128 Fed. 805, it is said that no such injustice as pointed out in the concurring opinion in the Clark Case could be inflicted, because it is well settled that the defendant, even if he has not pleaded contributory negligence, can avail himself—without the necessity of an amendment and without right on the plaintiff's part to a delay,—of the plaintiff's contributory negligence appearing from the plaintiff's own case.

The Clark Case was an action on the case under common-law pleadings, and the court admits the rule which it announces might be different under Code pleading. The general issue at common law and the general denial under Code pleadings are not equivalent. Gadonnex v. New Orleans R. Co. supra.

likewise seem that the question is not settled in Texas.⁴⁰

4. Effect of allegations in complaint showing contributory negligence.

The same rule applies to pleading as to proof, with respect to the effect of the de-

In Gadonnex v. New Orleans R. Co. supra, a motion that the defendant's answer be made more specific concerning the defense of contributory negligence was granted. The court said that, on the issue raised by such a special defense, the defendant holds the affirmative, and stands in the attitude of a plaintiff quoad the special defense. If it be but just and fair that the plaintiff be required distinctly to inform the defendant as to his demand, it is equally just and fair that the defendant, who introduces an issue into the cause as a matter of special defense, should inform the plaintiff of the act or acts upon which reliance is placed in support of that defense.

³⁹ In Kennedy v. Southern R. Co. 59 S. C. 535, 38 S. E. 169, it was held that under a general denial the defendant could prove that the injury was caused solely by the negligence of the plaintiff. It was said that, "if a person is charged with having caused an injury to another by reason of his negligence, surely it is both reasonable and logical for him to say 'I deny the charge, and support such denial by showing that the injury complained of was caused by the negligence of the party injured, or that of some other person, and therefore I am not the cause of the injury complained of.' If a person is charged with taking the life of another, it is certainly competent for him to deny the charge, and sustain such denial by showing that the party took his own life, or that his death resulted from some other agency for which the party charged was not responsible. Indeed, this seems to us to be the strongest form of denial, for, if it is shown that the act or omission complained of was the result of some other agency than the act of the party charged, then it is shown that he not only did not do the act, but that it was impossible that he could have done it."

Without referring, however, to the last mentioned decision, the court in Scott v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 67 S. C. 136, 45 S. E. 129, says that it is well settled in South Carolina that when contributory negligence is relied upon by the defendant, it must be pleaded.

⁴⁰ In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shieder, 88 Tex. 152, 28 L.R.A. 538, 30 S. W. 902, the court said: We understand that two questions were decided in Murray v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 73 Tex. 2, 11 S. W. 125. First, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict on the issue of contributory negligence, and, second, that the evidence on such issue was admissible under the general denial, the special plea of contributory negligence having been held development of a case of contributory negligence by the plaintiff. If the declaration or complaint shows it, the pleading is demurrable.⁴¹ The rule, of course applies where a statute imposes the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant.⁴² So, in an action brought to recover for injuries received by the plaintiff fective. It is not necessary for us to determine here in what class of cases a special plea of contributory negligence is required, but it seems generally to be admissible in many jurisdictions under the general denial, even where the burden of proof is on the defendant.

But the reason why the court in the Murray Case, referred to, let the defendant have the benefit of contributory negligence under the general issue, was that such negligence had been developed by the plaintiff in proving his case, which, as has been seen, is in harmony with other decisions on the point.

⁴¹ If the declaration develops a case of contributory negligence, it is demurrable. Winchester v. Carroll, 99 Va. 727, 40 S. E. 37.

If contributory negligence be shown by the complaint, it will render the pleading insufficient. Indianapolis & E. R. Co. v. Barnes, 35 Ind. App. 485, 74 N. E. 583.

It is doubtless true that if the complaint states facts showing affirmatively that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to his injury, the complaint would be demurrable. Clark v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 28 Minn. 69, 9 N. W. 75.

Although contributory negligence is a defense which confesses and avoids the plaintiff's case, and must be affirmatively pleaded by the defendant, it may nevertheless be decided on demurrer to a petition, whether, according to the facts stated by the plaintiff, he was guilty of such contributory negligence as to defeat his recovery. Farr v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 91 Ky. 541, 16 S. W. 370.

⁴² And where a statute imposes the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant, nevertheless, if the facts pleaded in the complaint show that the plaintiff was in fault, he cannot recover. Rich v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 31 Ind. App. 10, 66 N. E. 1028.

Where a complaint shows that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, notwithstanding the fact that it also shows the defendant was guilty of the negligence which caused the injury, such a complaint is insufficient, and advantage may be taken of such defect by demurrer. Lafayette v. Fitch, 32 Ind. App. 134, 69 N. E. 414.

The statute putting the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant has not changed the common-law rule that where the facts specially alleged show that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury, the complaint will not withstand the attack of a demurrer for want of facts. Indianapolis Trac-

due to the falling of a pile of lumber upon him, the complaint having in effect alleged that plaintiff assisted in piling the lumber, which was partly covered with snow and in a slippery condition, upon a car in such a manner that a slight jar would cause the lumber to fall down unless the same were properly braced or shored up, which was not done, and that he got into the car, and while stooping down between the piles and in the act of counting the lower tiers, the pile fell upon him, it was held that he should have gone further, and alleged, if he could, other facts showing that he was without fault at the time.⁴³

5. Effect of allegation in complaint of freedom from fault.

The mere fact that the plaintiff unnecessarily alleges that the injured person was, at the time of the accident, not guilty of contributory negligence, does not cast the burden of that issue upon him;⁴⁴ and this is the rule although the defendant traverses the allegation.⁴⁵ Such allegations may be eliminated,⁴⁶ as they add no force to the complaint.⁴⁷

VII. Miscellaneous rules.

a. Exercise of due care by plaintiff after defendant's negligence.

1. In general.

It has been held that the burden of proving negligence on the part of the person injured, after the accident, rests upon the tion & Terminal Co. v. Pressell, 39 Ind. App. 172, 77 N. E. 357.

⁴³ Hoth v. Peters, 55 Wis. 405, 13 N. W. 119.

⁴⁴ Contributory negligence is a matter of defense, although freedom from fault is alleged in the complaint. Snook v. Ananda, 26 Mont. 128, 66 Pac. 756; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Preston, — Kan. —, 63 Pac. 44.

A case is not excepted from the general rule of the Federal court, that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, because of the fact that the plaintiff alleges in his declaration that he was "in the exercise of due care." Fitchburg R. Co. v. Nichols, 29 C. C. A. 500, 10 U. S. App. 297, 85 Fed. 945.

In Montgomery & E. R. Co. v. Chambers, 9 Ala. 338, the court said that if the plaintiff averred that the injury he complains of was caused by the negligence of the defendant without any fault or neglect of duty on his part, this does not change the burden of proof as to such contributory negligence. The defendant must still make the proof, unless the plaintiff's testimony proves also that he, plaintiff, by his own negligence, has contributed proximately to the injury.

In Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Ryan, 17 Colo. 98, 28 Pac. 79, the court said: "It is true, the complaint in an action for negligence usually contains the averment that the plaintiff, without any fault or negligence on his part, was injured by reason of the negligence of the defendant. In consequence of this negative averment, it has been supposed that the plaintiff must offer some affirmative evidence of the absence of negligence on his part in the first instance. But this does not follow. The negative averment, even if necessary,—a point we do not decide,—serves substantially as a plea of not guilty to any countercharge of contributory negligence which may be made by defendant. In the absence of evidence of defendant's negligence, the defendant is saved from defeat. So, in the absence of evidence of plaintiff's contributory negligence, the plaintiff is saved from defeat on that ground. Perhaps, the matter may be stated more clearly and logically thus: As the absence of evidence tending to show defendant's negligence leaves the charge of negligence unsustained against defendant, so the absence of evidence tending to show plaintiff's contributory negligence leaves the countercharge of contributory negligence unsustained against the plaintiff."

In Atchison v. Wills, 21 App. D. C. 548, the court said that the allegation is not a material one to be made in the declaration, but, being made, the natural instinct of self-preservation would stand in the place of positive evidence to support the allegation, until evidence by proof of contributory negligence furnished by the defendant,—or that may be gathered by the evidence introduced by the plaintiff in proving the cause of action alleged in the declaration,—overcomes this presumption in behalf of the plaintiff.

Where the plaintiff was injured by reason of a defective sidewalk, and the complaint alleged that the injury was without any fault or negligence on plaintiff's part, it was held that contributory negligence was a matter of defense. Pryor v. Walkerville, 31 Mont. 618, 79 Pac. 240.

The making of the unnecessary allegation in plaintiff's petition, that he was injured without fault on his part, does not change the rule as to the burden of proof, so as to cast upon him the burden of showing that he was without fault. Pares v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 57 S. W. 301.

⁴⁶ Allegations in the complaint that the plaintiff was exercising or using due care may be eliminated, since they do not change the burden of proof,—the defendant, setting up and relying on the defense of contributory negligence, being required to prove it, notwithstanding such averments. McDonald v. Montgomery Street R. Co. 110 Ala. 161, 20 So. 317.

⁴⁷ Where the statute casts upon the de-defendant.⁴⁸ The burden, for example, of proving mismanagement in the care of cattle injured by a train, after the accident, by which greater loss resulted than was necessary, is on the defendant.⁴⁹

Although this is not contributory negligence in its technical sense, it is often treated as such. In an action to recover for damages caused by the spread of fire from defendant's right of way, it was said that where, as in Indiana, the burden rests upon the plaintiff to show his want of contributory negligence, it becomes necessary for him to prove whether or not he or his servants in charge of the property had knowledge of the existence of the fire during its progress, and, if it is not made to appear that such knowledge did not exist, then it devolves upon the plaintiff to show what efforts were made to save him from loss, and it is incumbent upon him to prove the use of efforts reasonable under the circumstances.⁵⁰ And in an action by a passenger to recover for injuries received by reason of the fact that his train broke through a bridge, it was urged that the complaint was defective because it did not show that he might have conducted himself negligently after the bridge went down, in the endeavor to extricate himself from the wreck; but the court declined to hold that a passenger who, without fault, became involved in such a disaster, should be required to aver or prove that he acted with prudence and deliberation while so involved.⁵¹ defendant the burden of proving the plaintiff's contributory negligence, the fact that the plaintiff alleges freedom from fault in the complaint adds no force to the complaint, and does not put upon him the burden of this issue which by the statute is placed upon the defendant. Southern R. Co. v. Davis, 34 Ind. App. 377, 72 N. E. 1053.

Where the statute places the burden of showing contributory negligence on the defendant, the allegation of freedom from such negligence in the complaint does not change the burden of proof. Pennsylvania Co. v. Fertig, 34 Ind. App. 459, 70 N. E. 834.

⁴⁸ The burden of proof is on the carrier to establish that any increase in the amount of damages caused by its negligence, after the accident, was due to want of care on the part of the injured person. Secord v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 5 McCrary, 515, 18 Fed. 221.

⁴⁹ Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hudson, 77 Tex. 494, 14 S. W. 158.

In an action to recover damages to cattle due to the delay in the transportation of seed, the burden is on the defendant to show negligence on the part of the plaintiff in not procuring seed from other sources, by which the damages were enhanced. Belcher v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 92 Tex. 593, 50 S. W. 559.

⁵⁰ Wabash R. Co. v. Miller, 18 Ind. App. 549, 48 N. E. 663.

An interrogatory, "Did not the plaintiff and the members of his family make all reasonable efforts to subdue and extinguish said fire? Answer. Yes," does not show plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence. Ibid.

In Wissler v. Atlantic, 123 Iowa, 11, 98 N. W. 131, a sidewalk accident case, it was held unnecessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove, in order to authorize the recovery, that, following the accident, she was not guilty of any negligence contributing to the conditions complained of and made the basis of her demand for damages. It was for the defendant to bring forth facts to prove that the result of the injury had been attenuated or aggravated by some intervening cause which was the fault of the injured party. The court said: "Failure to exercise that degree of proper care and caution necessary to keep results within natural and ordinary bounds may operate, as a matter of course, to defeat a recovery in whole or in part, but it is a misnomer to speak of such as contributory negligence. The negligence of a tortfeasor ends when the accident out of which the injury grows is complete. From that time on, the law holds him to a responsibility for consequences. If conditions arise which are not traceable to the accident as a proximate cause, but which, on the contrary, are due to some act or want of care on the part of the injured party, such can in no sense be said to be the result of contributory negligence. Contributory negligence presumes the presence of primary negligence on the part of some other party, and which is active and operating at the time. A failure to exercise proper care by an injured party following his injury is primary negligence in itself, and the rule that steps in here, and forbids his recovery, has its origin in the fundamental doctrine that one man may not pass upon another the responsibility for something which he himself has done or omitted to do, and in respect of which such other had no part."

⁵¹ Bedford, S. O. & B. R. Co. v. Rainbolt, 99 Ind. 551.

But under the rule that it is the duty of a party injured to use ordinary care and diligence in securing medical or surgical aid after receiving such an injury, and that he cannot recover for any suffering or ailment brought about by his failure to use such care and diligence, it was held that such aggravation was a matter of defense, and that after an injury by the defendant's negligence has been established, the burden is on the defendant to show the plaintiff's failure to use ordinary care, judgment, and diligence in having his injuries properly treated. Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Hobbs, 15 Ind. App. 610, 43 N. E. 479, 44 N. E. 377.

3. Actions for malpractice.

In an action for malpractice, it has been held that the burden is on the plaintiff to show freedom from negligence contributing to the injury complained of.⁵² And on the other hand, it has been held necessary for the plaintiff in such actions to allege his own freedom from negligence.⁵³ In other words, the rule as to the burden of proving negligence of this sort seems to follow the rule as to the burden of proof in respect to contributory negligence in its technical sense.

In an eye due to a cinder getting in it, it was held that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that delay in consulting a specialist had not contributed to the loss of the eye. Morrison v. Long Island R. Co. 3 App. Div. 205, 38 N. Y. Supp. 393.

In an action to recover for injuries received by plaintiff in attempting to board a train, where both the pleading of the defendant and the charge of the court treat of the failure of the plaintiff to obtain proper medical attendance after the injury as if it were contributory negligence, it was held that a charge in effect that if the plaintiff established the negligence of the defendant to the satisfaction of the jury, then the burden of proof shifted to the defendants, and they must show by the evidence, to the satisfaction of the jury, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, was held reversible error. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Condra, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 556, 82 S. W. 528.

In an action to recover damages for the diversion of water, proof that plaintiff's inaction and culpable negligence aggravated his damages is a matter of defense. Colrick v. Swinburne, 105 N. Y. 503, 12 N. E. 427.

⁵² Whitesell v. Hill, — Iowa, —, 66 N. W. 894.

One who seeks to recover damages for malpractice must show that no negligence of his own contributed to the result complained of. Baird v. Morford, 29 Iowa, 531.

⁵³ Decatur v. Simpson, 115 Iowa, 348, 88 N. W. 839. In this case there was a contention that the action did not sound in tort, but was for breach of contract. The court hardly thought the counsel serious in this contention, stating that a bare reading of the petition showed that it was an action for negligence, in which the relation of the parties was material only as fixing the degree of care required.

A charge that the plaintiff could not recover if, by contributory negligence in disobeying his physician, he had contributed in any degree to the injury complained of, does not shift the burden of proving contributory negligence onto the defendant, where the jury was plainly told by another instruction that the plaintiff could not re-

b. Rule under special contracts.

Under an insurance contract providing that all loss of property insured, caused by a steam threshing machine, shall be paid, provided that due caution shall be exercised to prevent fire from its use, it has been held that the burden of proof would be on the insurance company in an action to recover for a loss, to establish that the insured had failed to exercise due caution.⁵⁴ And in an action on an accident insurance policy, the burden of proving contributory negligence on the part of the deceased is on the defendant.⁵⁵ Under the voluntary cover if he was guilty of any fault or negligence. Swanson v. French, 92 Iowa, 695, 61 N. W. 407.

In Lower v. Franks, 115 Ind. 334, 17 N. E. 630, in holding that contributory negligence was a defense to an action for malpractice, the court said that an action against a railroad company for a negligent injury to a passenger while under its charge is, though sounding in tort, really an action founded upon and arising out of a contract. Yet in that class of actions, proof of contributory negligence is fatal to a recovery. So important is it considered in this state that contributory negligence shall not appear as an element in actions of that class, that the plaintiff is required to aver in his complaint and to show at the trial that he did not contribute to the injury complained of. In pleading, therefore, contributory negligence is not in this state generally treated as a matter of defense, technically speaking, but as a thing to be negatived both in the complaint and by the evidence as a prerequisite to the right to recover for negligence of the defendant.

But, in Gramm v. Boener, 56 Ind. 497, in an action to recover damages for malpractice, a charge that proof of the commission by the defendant of the injuries complained of very generally carries with it prima facie proof of negligence and unskillfulness; and it is for the defendant to show that the injuries were the result of inevitable accident, or that they were occasioned by the negligence of the plaintiff himself, was held proper.

⁵⁵ Mulville v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 19 Mont. 95, 47 Pac. 650.

Under a policy insuring a person against bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means, providing, however, that the insurer shall not be liable unless the insured uses "all due diligence for personal safety and protection," the burden in an action to recover on the policy is on the defendant, or insurer, to show that the insured failed to use such diligence. Freeman v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 572, 12 N. E. 372.

exposure to unnecessary danger clause, the burden is on the company to show the carelessness of the insured.⁵⁶

Where a stipulation in a drover's pass provided that in case he should not ride in the caboose while the train was in motion, this should be deemed prima facie evidence of negligence on his part, it was held that this merely shifted the burden of proof of contributory negligence, and did not preclude recovery where the drover was injured while riding on the engine.⁵⁷

It is evident that the court, in this reference to the burden of proof, is speaking of it in its secondary sense; that is, the burden of introducing evidence on the issue. It would hardly seem reasonable to hold that, under such a stipulation, the burden of proving the issue of contributory negligence by a preponderance of the evidence would be cast upon the plaintiff.⁵⁸

c. Right to peremptory instructions.

Peremptory instructions in favor of the party having the burden of the issue when it depends upon oral testimony are not allowed.⁵⁹ And by this is meant, of course, the burden of proof as to contributory negligence in its primary sense. So, a statute having been passed placing the burden of proving contributory negligence upon the defendant, it was held necessarily to follow that a peremptory instruction which, under the rule requiring plaintiff to establish his freedom from contributory negligence was permitted only in favor of the defendant, could, the burden of proof having been changed, only be given in favor of the plaintiff.⁶⁰

In North Carolina, while the court can hold that a party on whom rests the burden of proof has failed to offer evidence to sustain it, it cannot adjudge that he has proved his case, for when there is evidence the jury alone can pass upon its truth.⁶¹

And in South Carolina, prima facie proof of negligence on the part of the defendant is sufficient to compel the court to send the case to the jury; but prima facie proof of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff is not sufficient to draw it from the jury, because whether the plaintiff contributed to the negligence or not is a fact which the court should not determine on prima facie evidence.⁶²

a. Acts fixing burden of proof.

1. Indiana.

(a) Proof.

In Indiana, the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence was always held to be on the plaintiff; but in 1889, a statute⁶³ was passed, re-enacted in 1901,⁶⁴ abrogating this rule. Since the

A defendant is not entitled to an instruction stating the contributory negligence of a decedent as a matter of law, where the burden is on the defendant to establish contributory negligence. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Henry, — Ind. App. —, 80 N. E. 636.

In an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, where the statute places the burden upon the defendant to establish the plaintiff's contributory negligence, it was held that a peremptory instruction for the defendant was not justified where the evidence was meager and unsatisfactory on the question of the surroundings of the accident, where there was no evidence as to the movements of the deceased from the time she left a point 300 feet from the railroad until the instant she was struck and killed, and where, although there was some evidence as to the freedom of the tracks from obstruction, there was nothing to show what the temporary condition in that respect was at the time the accident happened. and where, although there was some testimony as to the blowing of a whistle, it was not in itself sufficient to have justified the withdrawal of the case from the jury. It was said that the burden of showing conditions which would establish contributory negligence rested on the defendant. Wamsley v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 41 Ind. App. 147, 82 N. E. 490, rehearing denied in 41 Ind. App. 155, 83 N. E. 640.

passage of the statute, the burden has, of course, always been upon the defendant.⁶⁵ The statute in all things reversed the rule which had theretofore obtained,⁶⁶ relieving the plaintiff of the burden,⁶⁷ and changing the rule of both pleading and proof.⁶⁸ The ⁶⁶ Nichols v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 33 Ind. App. 229, 70 N. E. 183, 71 N. E. 170.

Since the passage of the statute, the plaintiff in a personal-injury case arising out of negligence is no longer required to show an absence of contributory negligence on his part, but the burden is placed upon the defendant to establish by a fair preponderance of all the evidence in the case applicable to such issue, that the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence. Davis v. Mercer Lumber Co. 164 Ind. 413, 73 N. E. 199.

In an action to recover damages for the killing of a switchman crushed between an engine and a car standing on a side track, it was held that the burden of proving contributory negligence was on the master. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Lawrence, 169 Ind. 319, 79 N. E. 363, 82 N. E. 768.

But an instruction that "if the burden is upon either party to show any particular fact called for in any question, such fact should be established by a fair preponderance of the evidence to warrant you in so answering the question as to show the fact established. If there is no preponderance of evidence on any question,—that is to say, if the evidence tending to prove the fact in question is only balanced by the evidence to the contrary,—then such fact would not be proved, and your answer should be in the negative,"—although practically the same as that in Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Reed, 151 Ind. 396, 51 N. E. 477, was held good under the statute changing the burden of proving contributory negligence. Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Brown, 32 Ind. App. 130, 69 N. E. 407.

In New Castle Bridge Co. v. Doty, 37 Ind. App. 84, 76 N. E. 557, in upholding an instruction that, under the statute relieving the plaintiff from the burden of establishing freedom from contributory negligence, the plaintiff is not bound to prove that he was free from fault in receiving his injuries; that the question of contributory negligence is now a matter of defense, and the burden is cast upon the defendant to prove, by a fair preponderance of the evidence, that the plaintiff was guilty of some act of negligence that contributed to his injuries, or that he did not use such care or caution as a reasonably prudent person would have done under the circumstances, before any action can be defeated for contributory negligence alone, if he has otherwise proved his case,—the court said that the instruction under consideration would be strictly accurate in a case where the defendant was relying upon payment, fraud, failure of consideration, duress, estoppel, illegality, release, tender, etc., as had been many times ruled and never denied by the Indiana supreme or appellate courts. If an exception to this well-defined principle was to be made where the affirmative defense relied upon consisted of a charge of negligence against the plaintiff, there must be some reason for such exception, and the court did not believe that any reason could be stated or found.

Under a statute imposing the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant, an instruction that "if you find that no facts have been adduced, either by the plaintiff or the defendant, from which you can reasonably infer what the conduct and actions of the decedent were at the time of his injury, then your verdict should be for the defendant," cannot be given. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Berndt, 172 Ind. 697, 88 N. E. 612.

⁶⁸ The statute changed the rule of pleading and proof with respect to contributory negligence, and it imposed the burden of alleging and proving such negligence upon the defendant. Ibid.

The statute makes contributory negligence a matter of defense. Evansville v.

plaintiff makes his case under the statute when he proves negligence on the part of the defendant, and resulting damages to him.⁶⁹ The burden of proof as here used, meaning the burden of the issue, does not shift; that is to say, the burden is upon the defendant to establish this issue by a preponderance of evidence; and under no circumstances will it devolve upon the plaintiff to establish it by a preponderance of evidence.⁷⁰ This has nothing to do with the measure of care required of the plaintiff.⁷¹

(b) Pleading.

Since the passage of the statute, it has not been necessary for the plaintiff to allege freedom from contributory negligence.⁷² So, it is not necessary for the Christy, 29 Ind. App. 44, 63 N. E. 867; Union Traction Co. v. Sullivan, 38 Ind. App. 513, 76 N. E. 116; New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Robbins, 38 Ind. App. 172, 76 N. E. 804; Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Brown, 32 Ind. App. 130, 69 N. E. 407; Stephens v. American Car & Foundry Co. 38 Ind. App. 414, 78 N. E. 335.

And since the burden is upon the defendant in respect to contributory negligence by virtue of the statute, the inferences upon that subject which the complaint admits of must be in favor of the plaintiff. Cleveland, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lynn, 171 Ind. 589, 85 N. E. 999, 86 N. E. 1017.

Under the Indiana statute (§ 359a, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901), an instruction that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff was held erroneous. Wortman v. Minich, 28 Ind. App. 31, 62 N. E. 85.

It is unnecessary since the passage of the Indiana statute that the plaintiff in an action against a railroad company for injuries or for death sustained at a railroad crossing should go into the details of the surroundings of the scene of the accident to show what obstructions were or were not present that would or would not prevent a person injured from seeing or hearing approaching trains, unless such facts are necessary to prove the defendant's negligence charged in the complaint. The fact that there were no obstacles or obstructions in the way that would have prevented the plaintiff's intestate from seeing an engine that struck her is a fact essential to be shown to establish contributory negligence. And this must be shown by the defendant. Wamsley v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 41 Ind. App. 147, 82 N. E. 490, rehearing denied in 41 Ind. App. 155, 83 N. E. 640.

Proof that a railroad company ran a car along the streets of a city on a dark and stormy night, without a headlight, or without sounding gong or whistles at street crossings, casts upon the company the burden of proving that one who is struck thereby was in the exercise of due care. Nelson v. Chicago, L. S. & S. B. R. Co. 41 Ind. App. 397, 83 N. E. 1019.

⁷⁰ The burden of proving contributory negligence is, under the statute, on the defendant; and this burden does not shift. Harris v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 32 Ind. App. 600, 70 N. E. 407.

⁷¹ By the statute, the burden of proving contributory negligence was thrown upon the defendant; but the measure of care to be used in nowise changed. Chicago, I & L. R. Co. v. Turner, 33 Ind. App. 264, 69 N. E. 484.

In Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Peyton, 157 Ind. 690, 61 N. E. 722, the court said that the statute did not in any manner excuse or relieve the plaintiff from the consequences of contributory negligence, long recognized by the law, nor make the presence of concurrent fault less effective to the defendant in escaping liability. Its obvious purpose was to restore to litigants in such cases the just and reasonable rule of the common law as interpreted by the English courts, and from which the Indiana courts had radically departed. Under the ancient rule alluded to, and which was said to be adhered to in most of the states of the Union, the plaintiff is required to allege and prove by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of his injuries; and if he has, by his own conduct, forfeited his right of recovery, this delinquency, when not voluntarily disclosed by the plaintiff, if made available to the defendant, must be established by him as a matter of defense by a like preponderance.

⁷² Frank Bird Transfer Co. v. Krug, 30 Ind. App. 602, 65 N. E. 309; Nichols v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 33 Ind. App. 229, 70 N. E. 183, 71 N. E. 170; Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Corps, 37 Ind. App. 586, 76 N. E. 902; Parkhurst v. Swift, 31 Ind. App. 521, 68 N. E. 620; Indianapolis & E. R. Co. v. Barnes, 35 Ind. App. 485, 74 N. E. 583.

Under the statute it is only necessary to allege that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Goddard, 33 Ind. App. 321, 71 N. E. 514.

Under the statute, a complaint is not defective, even in an action to recover for a death at a grade crossing, because no facts are therein disclosed to excuse the decedent from the exercise of that degree of care and caution which the law exacts of a traveler at such a place. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Berndt, 172 Ind. 697, 88 N. E. 612.

In a crossing-accident case, where the plaintiff set out the conditions existing at the crossing at the time of the accident, plaintiff to aver that a person killed or injured was not guilty of contributory negligence, or that he was without fault or without negligence, nor is it necessary to state any facts with a purpose thereby to negative contributory negligence;⁷³ and a complaint in an action by an engineer to recover for personal injuries received by being knocked down and run over by a mail car was held not insufficient because it failed to aver that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care and diligence, as required by the provision of an earlier employers' liability act,⁷⁴ the act of 1899 purporting to cover all cases of personal injuries.⁷⁵

No adverse inference will arise against the plaintiff by reason of the absence of the averment that the person for whose death the action was brought was free from contributory negligence.⁷⁶ The burden of showing contributory negligence being on the defendant, the pleading will be good even as against a demurrer, unless it alleges facts which overthrow the presumption of absence of contributory negligence.⁷⁷ In other words, if the complaint does show contributory negligence, the plaintiff has discharged the defendant's burden for him. From the language used by the court, it is evident that the court believes that the rule as to the burden of proof as to contributory negligence having by statute been imposed upon the defendant, it follows that a presumption as to the absence of contributory negligence arises.⁷⁸

The statute does not change the rule with reference to personal property, so that in actions to recover for injury to such property, the plaintiff should show that he was without fault.⁷⁹ The statute has, nevertheless, been held constitutional.⁸⁰

A North Carolina statute places the burden of proving contributory negligence upon the defendant.⁸¹ The statute requires the defendant both to plead and to prove contributory negligence.⁸²

E. 661, said: 'It is proper to say, however, that said act of 1899 did not repeal or modify that part of . . . [the statute providing that] 'the employee so injured being in the exercise of due care and diligence.' It only changed the rule of pleading and proof then in force, so that thereafter such fact need not be alleged or proved by the injured employee, but the same constituted a defense, and when shown to exist in a case by the complaint or the evidence, whether introduced by the plaintiff or the defendant or both, no recovery can be had.'

The statute provides: "That in all actions to recover damages by reason of the negligence of the defendant, where contributory negligence is relied upon as a defense, it shall be set up in the answer and proved on the trial." North Carolina Session Laws 1887, chap. 33, § 1.

3. Oklahoma.

Under the Code of Civil Procedure contained in the statutes of 1890, and adopted from the state of Indiana, it was held that the settled rules of interpretation and construction applied to it by the supreme court of that state would be followed in Oklahoma; and that therefore the plaintiff in an action to recover damages resulting from the overflow of water, due to the alleged negligence of a city in interfering with the natural condition of the land, must show that he himself was guilty of no contributory negligence. The court, however, did not approve this rule, and did not consider that it would be applied under the Code in force at the time of the decision.⁸³

4. Effect of statutes on presumption.

The erroneous supposition that the burden of proof as to contributory negligence is dependent upon certain presumptions has led courts in jurisdictions where the rule has been changed by statute to hold that this involved a corresponding change in presumptions. It is said, for instance, that the Indiana statute which changed the burden of proof as to contributory negligence of necessity removed the presumption against the plaintiff,⁸⁴ and gave rise to the presumption that the injured person was in all respects free from contributory negligence.⁸⁵ The presumption that the deceased exercised due care for himself is now expressly incorporated in the statutes which expressly impose the burden of proof upon the defendant who sets up contributory negligence as a defense.⁸⁶ So, in North Carolina it is said, as indicated in another subdivision of the note, that it does not follow from the fact that the rule as to the burden of proof has been changed by statute that rules as to presumptions of due care or contributory negligence theretofore existing are required to be changed. As was stated in one Indiana case, referring to the Indiana act, the statute does not attempt to create a presumption of law as to a contested issue, but only relieves a plaintiff of the burden of showing affirmatively the negative fact that he is without fault proximately contributing to his own injury.⁸⁷

So, a statute placing the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant does not change the rule that a traveler, approaching a railroad crossing of a highway, is presumed in law to have seen what he could have seen if he had looked attentively, and to have heard what he could have heard if he had listened attentively.⁸⁸

b. Employers' liability acts.

The Alabama "employees' act" of 1885, enlarging the liability of the master, but providing that he shall not be liable if the complaining employee knew of the defect or negligence which caused the injury, and not being aware that the fact was already known to the master or some person superior in authority, failed to communicate his knowledge to the employer or superior employee, does not require the ⁸⁵ Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Reed, 36 Ind. App. 67, 75 N. E. 50.

The burden of proving contributory negligence being on the defendant, the mere fact that the evidence does not show that a person killed at a railroad crossing looked or listened, or, if he did so, where he was at the time of doing so, or when he became aware of the railroad track, will not defeat recovery, since the presumption, in the absence of evidence on the subject, is that he did exercise such care as the law requires. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. v. Reynolds, — Ind. App. —, 90 N. E. 94.

⁸⁶ Cogdell v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 130 N. C. 313, 41 S. E. 541.

Under the statute, there is, of course, no presumption that the plaintiff contributed to the injury, and even where the defendant offers no testimony, it is not incumbent upon the plaintiff to show freedom from contributory negligence. Jordan v. Asheville, 112 N. C. 743, 16 S. E. 760.

⁸⁷ Indianapolis v. Keeley, 167 Ind. 516, 79 N. E. 499.

In this case, in holding that, in an action to recover damages for injuries received by reason of a defect in the street, an instruction to the effect that the plaintiff was presumed to be without fault and in the exercise of ordinary care at the time of the accident, was erroneous, the court said that the statute makes contributory negligence a ground of defense affirmative in character, and its existence must be established by a preponderance of evidence to defeat a recovery by a plaintiff injured through negligence of another. The burden of showing contributory negligence is upon the defendant, but it may be established by a fair preponderance of the evidence upon that issue; and a defendant is not required to have a preponderance plus so much evidence as may be deemed necessary to outweigh and overthrow a presumption of law in favor of the plaintiff.

pecies of contributory negligence to be negatived in the complaint.⁸⁹

To maintain an action under the Massachusetts employers' liability act,⁹⁰ for the death of an employee, it is necessary to prove that the employee was in the exercise of due care.⁹¹

The New York employers' liability act,⁹² providing that "the question whether the employee understood and assumed the risk of such injury, or was guilty of contributory negligence by his continuance in the same place and course of employment with knowledge of the risk of injury, shall be one of fact, subject to the usual powers of the court in a proper case to set aside a verdict rendered contrary to the evidence," does not relieve the plaintiff from showing freedom from contributory negligence, nor does it require the submission to the jury of this question where there is an utter absence of proof tending to establish the exercise of care by the person injured.⁹³

And a statute providing that "every railroad corporation doing business in this state shall be liable for damages sustained by any employee thereof within this state without contributing negligence on his part, etc.," does not, by reason of the provision "without contributory negligence on his part," place the burden of proving freedom from such negligence on the plaintiff.⁹⁴

c. Fellow-servant act.

The Arkansas fellow-servant act of March 8, 1907, which makes the master liable for the negligence of all his servants, does not take away his defense of contributory negligence, so that the rule in regard to the burden of proof is not changed, but remains with the defendant.⁹⁵

The Minnesota statute,⁹⁶ the object of which was to change, as applied to railroad operatives, the rule of the common law which exempted a common employer of several servants from liability to one for the negligence of his fellow servants, does not, by virtue of the qualifying words, "without contributory negligence on his part," change the Minnesota rule that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant.⁹⁷

The Wisconsin statute⁹⁸ providing that "every railroad company shall be liable for damages for all injuries . . . sustained by any of its employees . . . when such injury . . . shall have been sustained by any . . . employee of such company while engaged in the line of his duty as such, and which such injury shall have been caused in whole or in greater part by the . . . negligence of any other officer, agent, servant, or employee of such company . . . in the discharge of or . . . by reason of failure to discharge his duties as such,"—does not involve

The court said: "It will be observed that such words were not so embodied for the purpose of giving to the plaintiff a right of action, but for the purpose of more certainly securing to the defendant a defense in case of such contributory negligence. The case is clearly distinguishable from that line of cases where the right to recover is based wholly upon an exception in the statute, as, for instance, where 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the statute expressly prohibits all right of recovery except upon one condition, and the plaintiff seeks to bring himself within such exception."

The act of March 8, 1907, known as the fellow-servant act (Acts 1907, p. 162), providing that the injured servant, in order to recover under the provisions of the act, must have been "in the exercise of due care," was intended merely to preserve to the employer the defense of contributory negligence, and does not change the rule as to the burden of proof, which is still on the employer in such cases. *Soard v. a modification of the rule which casts the burden of proving plaintiff's contributory negligence on the defendant.⁹⁹ A provision of the Wisconsin act: ¹⁰⁰ "In all cases where the jury shall find that the negligence of the company . . . was greater than the negligence of the employee so injured, and contributing in a greater degree to such injury, then the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover . . ." does not change the rule casting the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant.¹

d. The Georgia and Florida acts.

The following interpretation has been given by the Georgia court of appeals of certain statutes² relating to presumptions and burden of proof. Where an employee sues a railroad company under the act of 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 160), now Civil Code 1910, §§ 2782 et seq., providing that if death does not result from the injury, the presumption of negligence shall be and remain as now provided by law in case of injury received by an employee in the service of the railroad company, the presumptions and methods of carrying the burden of proof are as follows:

"(a) If it does not appear that the plaintiff was himself connected with the transaction from which the injury flowed, and if it appears that he was hurt through the running of the defendant's cars or machinery, or by the act of some fellow servant, the presumption authorized by the Civil Code 1910, § 2780, comes to his aid, and he makes a prima facie case merely by showing that he was damaged through one of the methods specified. If the damage did not ensue from one of the causes specified in the Code, . . . the plaintiff must prove the defendant's negligence without the aid of the presumption.

"(b) If the plaintiff himself was connected with the transaction through which his injury ensued, he cannot rely solely upon the statutory presumption to make out his case. If the transaction is not one as to which the statutory presumption applies, he must prove the negligence by some affirmative proof, but need not go further and negative his own contributory negligence.

"(c) If the transaction in which the plaintiff was damaged was one as to which Civil Code 1910, § 2780, applies, and the plaintiff was himself a party to the transaction, he may make a prima facie case by proving either of two additional things; (1) that he did not bring about the injury

² The statutes are as follows: "Every common carrier by railroad shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier, or, in case of death of such employee, to his or her personal representative for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband or child or children of such employee; and if none, then of such employee's parents; and if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defects or insufficiency due to its negligence in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment: Provided, nevertheless, no recovery shall be had hereunder if the person killed or injured brought about his death or injury by his own carelessness amounting to a failure to exercise ordinary care; or if he, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. The measure of damage in case the injury results in death of the employee shall be that prescribed in §§ 4424 and 4425: Provided that the party or parties for whose benefit recovery may be had under this and the five succeeding sections may sue and recover in their name or names in the manner prescribed by § 4424 in case no administrator or executor has been appointed at the time suit is filed. In case death results from injury to the employee, the employer shall be liable unless it make it appear that it, its agents and employees, have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption being in all cases against the employer. If death does not result from the injury, the presumption of negligence shall be and remain as now provided by law in case of injury received by an employee in the service of a railroad company." Georgia Code 1911, § 2782.

"In all cases hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad now, or by virtue of any of the provisions of this, the preceding, or the four preceding sections, to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence not amounting to a failure to exercise ordinary care shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee: Provided that no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation of such common carrier of any such statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee." Georgia Code 1911, § 2783.

by his own carelessness amounting to a failure to exercise ordinary care; or (2) that the defendant or its other servants were in fact negligent in one or more of the respects charged in the petition. The defendant taking, at this stage, the burden of reply, can successfully defend by disproving either of these propositions, or by proving that, notwithstanding it or its servants were guilty of negligence, the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences.

"(d) If it appears either by affirmative proof or by presumption, that the defendant was negligent, and it also appears that the plaintiff was somewhat at fault (but less at fault than the defendant), the plaintiff may, nevertheless, go to the jury, and may recover (unless it appears that his injury was brought about by his own carelessness, amounting to a failure to exercise ordinary care, or that, by the exercise of ordinary care, he could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence); and in such cases, the jury may diminish the damages in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the plaintiff." 3

3 Wrightsville & T. R. Co. v. Tompkins, — Ga. App. —, 70 S. E. 955.

To make a prima facie case for recovery, a railroad employee suing the company for a physical injury resulting from an act in which he participated must prove either that he was not to blame, or that the company was. The burden of proof is as follows: after proving the fact and the degree of injury, if the plaintiff show himself not to blame, the law then presumes, until the contrary appears, that the company was to blame; or, if he shows, on the other hand, that the company was to blame, the law then presumes, until the contrary appears, that he was not to blame. So that, in order to make a prima facie case and change the onus, he need not go further than to show by evidence one or the other of these two propositions: either that he was not to blame, or that the company was. The company, taking at this stage the burden of reply, can defend successfully by disproving either proposition. The disproval of both is not necessary; but until one or the other shall be overcome, the defense is not complete. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kenney, 58 Ga. 485.

Under this ruling, a charge that "it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show that her husband was killed, or his death caused, by the act of other employees of the company. If this is shown by evidence, then the presumption would be that the defendant's employees were at fault, etc., etc."—was held erroneous because the deceased was directly concerned in the act which resulted in his death; and the onus was upon him to show himself without fault before it could be presumed that the other employees were at fault; or to show the other employees at fault before the law would presume him to be without fault. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Sears, 59 Ga. 439. The idea of the court was that where an employee had nothing at all to do with the act which resulted in his injury, he would stand upon the footing of a passenger in regard to presumptions of negligence; but if he were concerned therein, then the presumption would be that he had as much to do with the accident as another also concerned; and that it would be a very violent presumption to take it for granted without proof that everybody else was to blame except him, when he had as much to do with the cause of the disaster as anyone else.

An employee of a railroad, suing the company for injuries sustained by him from the negligent performance of any act in which he participated, does not make a prima facie case for recovery without proving either that he was free from fault himself or that there was negligence on the part of his fellow servants. Any presumption of negligence would apply as well to him as to others participating in the common act; and to be benefited by presumption against them, he must rebut it as to himself. Gassaway v. Georgia Southern R. Co. 69 Ga. 347.

Where a widow sues a railroad company to recover damages for the homicide of her husband (an employee of the company, who was killed in connection with his employment), she must show either that the deceased was free from fault contributing to his death, or that he was killed by the negligence of the company, as alleged in the declaration. Wallace v. Southern R. Co. 6 Ga. App. 526, 65 S. E. 299.

The burden of showing that the agents of the company have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence is not imposed upon the company in such a case until the plaintiff has prima facie established one or the other of the propositions above referred to. Western & A. R. Co. v. Jackson, 113 Ga. 355, 38 S. E. 820.

If he rests on a presumption of negligence without actual proof thereof, that presumption applies to him with the same force as to others who participated in the same act of common duty; and to get the benefit of the presumption as applied to others, he must rebut it so far as it applies to himself. Atlanta & R. Air Line R. Co. v. Campbell, 56 Ga. 586.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Jones, 132 Ga. 189, 63 S. E. 834, it was held that the court did not err in charging that "whenever it is shown you by evidence that the plaintiff's husband [the person for whose death the action was brought] was free from fault and was not guilty of any negligence . . . that . . . contributed to the causes which produced his death, then the burden would be shifted," and that in establishing one of the two defenses open to it, it would be required to do so by preponderance of the evidence.

In an action against a railroad company by one of its servants for injuries received through the alleged negligence of other servants in the performance of an act with which the plaintiff was connected at the time of the injury, it was held that the presumption of negligence was not against the company before the plaintiff proved he was without fault.⁴ So, in an action against a railroad company for the death of an employee through the alleged negligence of a fellow servant, an instruction that if the plaintiff proves that the death of the deceased employee was occasioned by the railway company in the running of its cars, and nothing further appears, a prima facie case of liability is made out, is erroneous.⁵ Where the duty of coupling cars was on the injured employee, in union with the conductor in signaling and the engineer in backing the car, it was held that he must show affirmatively that he was himself without fault; and that then the presumption would be that the others were negligent, and this would entitle him to recover unless the company rebutted this presumption of their negligence by consistent proof.⁶ In an

No presumption of negligence against the company arises until the plaintiff shows affirmatively that he was himself without fault. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Hicks, 95 Ga. 302, 22 S. E. 613.

In an action by an employee against a railroad company for injury inflicted by the negligence of a coemployee, the plaintiff must show that the injury was not the result of fault or negligence on his part. Redding v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 74 Ga. 385.

In an action against a railroad company by an employee for personal injuries alleged to have been received through the negligence of a coemployee, no presumption of negligence arises against the company until the plaintiff has affirmatively shown that he himself was free from fault. Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Burney, 98 Ga. 1, 26 S. E. 730.

Railroad companies are not liable to employees as they are to passengers, but, in an action by an employee against a railroad company for an injury to him, or by one who sues for his homicide, it must be shown either that such employee, at the time the injury was received, was free from fault, or that the company was at fault, before any presumption of negligence would arise against the defendant. If either one of these things were shown, the other could be presumed, and the onus would be upon the company to rebut that presumption; but the rule as to passengers is different. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Maloy, 77 Ga. 238, 2 S. E. 941.

A charge that, "the presumption in all cases like this is against the railroad, and that the burden is on it to show that ordinary and reasonable care and diligence were exercised by its agents, and to show fault in the deceased, and the presumption remains until removed by proof, but, if removed, the presumption ceases and the proof would prevail," is erroneous in this: that the court put upon the company the burden of showing not only that it was itself without fault, but that the deceased was in fault before the burden was shifted; the law being, under § 3033 of the Code, that when the company shows itself without fault by showing that its agents had exercised all reasonable care and diligence, there can be no recovery against it. Central R. Co. v. Moore, 61 Ga. 151.

Proof that a railroad company's employee, killed by the cars, was without fault, raises a presumption that the company was negligent. Proof that the servants of the company who were operating the train were in fault puts upon the company the burden of showing that the deceased himself was negligent. Augusta Southern R. Co. v. McDade, 105 Ga. 134, 31 S. E. 420.

In an action to recover for the death of an engineer, the plaintiff having clearly shown negligence on the part of the company, it is incumbent on the company to show that the engineer was negligent. Central R. Co. v. Vining, 116 Ga. 284, 42 S. E. 492.

And where there was an affirmative showing of negligence on the part of the company, it was held that the presumption would arise that one who was killed by the operation of the defendant's cars was free from fault. Roquemore v. Albany & N. R. Co. 127 Ga. 330, 56 S. E. 424.

In the case of an injury to an employee of a railroad company, caused by the running of a train, while the burden is on the company to prove that it used proper care and diligence, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that the injury was caused without fault or negligence on his part. Campbell v. Atlanta & R. Air Line R. Co. 53 Ga. 488.

In such a case, in order to authorize a recovery, the plaintiff must cause it to appear both that the defendant was negligent and that the employee was free from fault; but when the death of the employee is caused in the running of the train, either one or both of these elements, according to the nature of the case, may be prima facie supplied by the proof of the injury being so received.

⁶ Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kelly, 58 Ga. 107.

In Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kelly, supra, in which the injured employee was engaged with other employees of the company about the coupling of cars, it was held that he could not invoke the presumption of negligence against the company and of faultlessness in himself as a passenger could action by a locomotive engineer against a railroad company by which he was employed, for personal injuries received by him while running a locomotive, it was held error to charge that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to a recovery, it was necessary for him to show affirmatively both negligence on the part of the company and the absence of negligence on his part. If he showed that he was not negligent, the presumption of negligence was raised by law against the company. If he showed that the company was negligent, it then became incumbent on the company, as a matter of defense, to show that the plaintiff was negligent.⁷

do; or as an employee could do who was hurt by other employees in matters with which he was wholly disconnected. "For instance," said the court, "an employee is engaged to sweep the cars, to wait on passengers, to keep the baggage, check it, etc., etc., and has nothing to do with the management of the running of the cars. By the negligence or fault of the conductor or engineer in running the cars, he is hurt; we hold that he is upon the footing of a passenger, and every presumption is against the company and that he is without fault, just as it would be in case of a passenger."

In an action to recover for injuries received by a switchman hit on the shoulder by a bar of iron negligently let fall by laborers in the employ of the defendant, it was held that the fact that the employee was without fault or negligence is not a condition precedent to his recovery. In this case as in others, it was held that the presumption is against the company, and that it is for it to show its agents to be without fault or negligence, and the injured employee either at fault or negligent. Code, §§ 3033, 3034, 3036; Thompson v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 54 Ga. 509.

Where an employee of a railroad company sues for a personal injury sustained by him in consequence of a hand car leaving the track, upon which car he was riding, and the running of which he controlled, he must, in order to entitle himself to recover, show affirmatively that he was free from fault, or that there was negligence by the company sufficient to have caused the run-off. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kennedy, 58 Ga. 485.

In Central R. Co. v. Sears, 61 Ga. 279, it was held that where an emergency is relied upon in justifying a conductor in going out of his sphere, and taking upon himself the duty and hazards of a subordinate, and it is alleged that the emergency was occasioned by the train being behind time, it is incumbent upon the conductor, or those claiming through him, to make it clearly appear by evidence that the delay of the train was not caused by his fault or negligence.

In an action by a wife for the death of her husband, killed on the railroad, it was held not error to charge that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that her husband was without fault, or that the defendant was in fault. Prather v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 80 Ga. 427, 12 Am. St. Rep. 263, S. E. 530.

In Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Small, 80 Ga. 19, 5 S. E. 794, it was held that where the plaintiff, a track hand, was wholly unconnected with the running of the engine which injured him, he had the right to prove the negligence of the company, and rest his case upon it; and that he had this right, even if he were connected with the engine, without going into the question of his own negligence; to which the company could reply by showing either that it was not negligent, or that the plaintiff was.

It was held that the action being for the homicide of an employee of the company, and the evidence not showing affirmatively whether the employee was free from negligence or not, and no negligence on the part of the company adequate to have caused the homicide under the circumstances being shown, the most reasonable and probable cause of the disaster being an accident to the employee by which his life became suddenly exposed to a danger incident to his employment, there was no error in granting a nonsuit. Kendrick v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 89 Ga. 782, 15 S. E. 685.

In Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Day, 91 Ga. 676, 17 S. E. 959, there being evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's husband, a brakeman employed upon one of the defendant's freight trains, was killed by being knocked from the top of a car by a low bridge over defendant's road, and there also being evidence from which the jury might have inferred negligence on the part of the railroad company in failing to keep in suitable order warnings of approach of the trains to the bridge, and it not appearing from the testimony produced by the plaintiff that the deceased was himself guilty of any negligence, the motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled.

It was also held in this case that there was no error in refusing to charge the jury as follows: "In a suit against a railroad company by one of its servants for injuries sustained by alleged negligence of others of its servants in the performance of an act with which the servant was connected at the time of the injury, then the presumption of negligence was not against the company before the plaintiff proved that the servant was without fault," such a request being inapplicable to the case presented. Ibid.

So much of § 2321 of the Civil Code as is embraced in the phrase, "the presumption in all cases being against the company," is inapplicable to a case where a railroad company is sued for the killing of an employee, unless the plaintiff shows the deceased was free from fault; and consequently, on the trial of such a case, the law embodied in this section should not,

The burden of proving the exercise of due care on the part of the company, or the lack of care on the part of a person killed by the cars, rests by statute⁸ upon the defendant.⁹ In an action to recover damages for the death of a person run over by one of the defendant's trains, it was held that upon proof of the accident, there was immediately a presumption that the defendant was negligent in each and every respect alleged in plaintiff's petition; and that the burden was upon the company to disprove all the proximate acts of negligence alleged, or to show contributory negligence, or some other defense sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's action.¹⁰ And where a cow was killed by a railroad train, this was held to impose on the company the duty of showing that the company was in the exercise of all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, or that the damages were caused solely by the neglieither literally or substantially, be given in a charge to the jury without plainly and distinctly stating the qualification indicated. Augusta Southern R. Co. v. McDade, 105 Ga. 134, 31 S. E. 420.

And in Jones v. Central R. Co. 116 Ga. 27, 42 S. E. 363, it was held that although there was evidence from which the jury could have found that the plaintiff's husband, an employee of the defendant company, for whose homicide the suit was brought, was killed by the running of the defendant's train, yet, as it neither affirmatively appeared that he was without negligence, nor that the defendant was negligent, there was no error in refusing a petition for certiorari, complaining of the grant of a nonsuit upon the trial of the case.

In Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Hubbard, 86 Ga. 623, 12 S. E. 1020, a declaration alleging that the plaintiff's husband, an employee of a railroad company, was killed by an engine of the company, setting forth such a statement of the facts and circumstances connected with the killing as did not of themselves negative the existence of negligence on the part of the company, and distinctly averring that the deceased was without fault, and that the killing was caused by the negligence of the company's servants in running of such engine, was held not demurrable.

In Smith v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 87 Ga. 764, 13 S. E. 904, a declaration filed by a track hand of a railroad company, alleging that plaintiff was injured by a fall of earth, was held to set out a cause of action, although it did not distinctly allege that plaintiff was ignorant of the danger to which he was subjected.

⁸ "The burden of proof generally lies upon the party asserting or affirming a fact, and to the existence of whose case or defense the proof of such fact is essential. If a negation or negative affirmation be so essential, the proof of such negative lies on the party so affirming it." Georgia Code 1911, § 5746 (5160).

When a person is killed by a railroad company by the running of its trains, the presumption of negligence attaches by law to the company, and the onus is on it to show all ordinary and reasonable care by its officers and agents; or that the deceased's own negligence was the cause of the death; or that, by ordinary care, he could have avoided the consequences of the negligence of the company. Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Hoover, 74 Ga. 426.

Under the Georgia Code, negligence of a railroad company being presumed when injury by the running of its trains is shown, it is not necessary for a father suing for loss of services of his minor son, not an employee of the company, who was killed at a public crossing, to allege in his declaration either that he or the son was in the exercise of due care, or was without fault. Georgia Midland R. Co. v. Evans, 87 Ga. 673, 13 S. E. 580.

¹⁰ Ellenberg v. Southern R. Co. 5 Ga. App. 389, 63 S. E. 240.

In the case of the homicide of plaintiff's husband by the servants of the defendant by the operation of a locomotive, cars, and other machinery, where the plaintiff proved her relation to the deceased, and his physical condition and earning capacity, and rested, this was held to make a prima facie case for the plaintiff, the burden then resting upon the defendant to overcome it by making it affirmatively appear that the injury was the result of the negligence of the plaintiff's husband. Central R. Co. v. North, 129 Ga. 106, 58 S. E. 647.

Where those in charge of a railway train neglected to comply with the statutory precautions in approaching a highway, and a person on the crossing was struck and injured, it was held that the only defenses open to the company were that the injury was done by the consent of the person injured; or that, by the observance of ordinary care, he could have avoided the injury; or, in mitigation of damages, that his negligence contributed to it; that when such an injury occurs, the onus is upon the company to prove such fault on the part of the injured person. Bryson v. Southern R. Co. 3 Ga. App. 407, 59 S. E. 1124.

And where one who was knocked down by a car of the defendant showed the injury, it was held that this shifted the burden of proof to the defendant, and that it became incumbent upon the defendant to show that the plaintiff consented to the injury, or could have avoided it by the use of due care; or that the employees of the defendant exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence. Augusta R. & Electric Co. v. Arthur, 3 Ga. App. 513, 60 S. E. 213.

gence of the owner of the cow, or, to diminish damages, that both were at fault.¹¹

In an action by an employee under the provisions in the Florida act to recover damages from his employer for injuries alleged to have been inflicted by the negligence of another employee in performing some act in the defendant's service, in the performance of which, plaintiff, as a co-employee, was participating, the plaintiff must show either that he was free from fault himself, or that there was negligence on the part of his coemployee. Upon proof that the plaintiff was free from fault, the statutory presumption arises that the servants of the defendant were at fault, and it thereupon devolves upon the defendant to make it appear to the contrary.¹² Since the enactment of § 2, chap. 4071, of the Laws of 1891, making contributory negligence only a partial defense, the rule that the plaintiff need not negative contributory negligence in his declaration applies with even greater force than it did before the enactment of that statute.¹³

e. Statutory duty acts.

Statutes imposing special duties upon persons with a view of preventing injuries to others do not usually affect the rule with reference to the burden of proof as to contributory negligence that may obtain in the jurisdiction where such statutes are in force. The mere fact that injury results from a violation of a master's statutory duty does not relieve the plaintiff from his obligation to show freedom from contributory negligence as a part of his affirmative case, where there is no specific provision as to what plaintiff shall be required to establish in order to make out a case for recovery.¹⁴

Under a statute¹⁵ providing that "it shall be unlawful for any such corporation to knowingly or negligently use or operate any car or locomotive that is defective, or any car or locomotive upon which the machinery or attachments thereto belonging are in any manner defective, if the employee of any such corporation shall receive any injury by reason of any defect in any car or locomotive, or the machinery or attachments thereto belonging, owned and operated or being run and operated by such corporation, such corporation shall be deemed to have had knowledge of such defect before and at the time such injury is so sustained; and when the fact of such defect shall be made to appear in the trial of any action in the courts of this state, brought by such employee or his legal representatives, against any railroad corporation for damages on account of such injuries so received, the same shall be ¹¹ Georgia R. Co. v. Bird, 76 Ga. 13.

"A railroad company shall be liable for any damage done to persons, stock, or other property by the running of the locomotives or cars or other machinery of such company, or for damage done by any person in the employment and service of such company, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, a presumption in all cases being against the company." Georgia Code 1911, § 2780 (2321).

¹² Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Mooney, 40 Fla. 17, 24 So. 148.

The Florida act, copied from the Georgia statute, provides thus: "Section 1. A railroad company shall be liable for any damage done to persons, stock, or other property, by the running of the locomotives or cars or other machinery of such company, or for damage done by any person in the employment and service of such company, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company.

"Sec. 2. No person shall recover damages from a railroad company for injury to himself or his property where the same is done by his consent, or is caused by his own negligence. If the complainant and the agents of the company are both at fault, the former may recover, but the damages shall be diminished or increased by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to him.

fault, the former may recover, but the damages shall be diminished or increased by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to him.

"Sec. 3. If any person is injured by a railroad company by the running of the locomotives or cars or other machinery of such company, he being, at the time of such injury, an employee of the company, and the damage was caused by negligence of another employee, and without fault or negligence on the part of the person injured, his employment by the company shall be no bar to a recovery. No contract which restricts such liability shall be legal or binding."

If the act resulting in injury to plaintiff, an employee, was one being performed by other employees in the defendant's business, but in the performance of which plaintiff was not participating, then the presumption of negligence on the part of the agents of the defendant, and that plaintiff was free from fault, arises under the statute to the same extent as if plaintiff were not an employee; and it devolves upon the defendant to relieve itself, either by showing that plaintiff was at fault, or that its servants were not negligent. Ibid.

prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of such corporation,"—the burden of proof of want of knowledge of an existing defect, and of due diligence in ascertaining it, is cast upon the company.¹⁶ A statute requiring a railroad company to erect warning signs at crossings, and providing that the company "shall be liable in damages for all injuries occurring to persons or property by such neglect or refusal," does not relieve the plaintiff from the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence.¹⁷

Before there can be a recovery on account of the negligence of a railroad company in failing to give statutory signals, or for running at an excessively high rate of speed, it has been held that it must be shown that the person suffering injury from the negligence did not contribute to the injury by negligence on his part, and he cannot in all cases rely upon the railroad company to give the signals required by statute. The burden of showing this is on the plaintiff.¹⁸ The rule is otherwise, however, under such a statute in jurisdictions upholding the doctrine that the burden of proving contributory negligence, in the absence of statute, is on the defendant.¹⁹ Even in a jurisdiction where ¹⁷ Payne v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 44 Iowa, 236.

In an action to recover for injuries alleged to have been due to the failure of a railroad company to have a signboard required by statute, at a railroad crossing, warning persons of the proximity of the railroad, it was said that it is just as incumbent upon plaintiff to show reasonable care upon his part when the negligence of the defendant consists in the failure to observe a statute, as when it arises from any other omission or neglect. Dodge v. Burlington, C. R. & M. R. Co. 34 Iowa, 276.

A statute rendering a railroad company liable for damages sustained by a person by reason of the refusal or neglect of the company to erect a sign of warning at or near a highway crossing does not relieve the plaintiff from the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence. Lang v. Holiday Creek R. & Coal Min. Co. 49 Iowa, 469.

But to this provision the Code, § 1288, adds these words: "And in order for the injured party to recover, it shall only be necessary for him to prove such neglect and refusal;" so that, under the Code, failure or refusal of a railroad company to erect the sign renders it absolutely liable in a case wherein it is shown that a person was injured at a crossing. Payne v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 44 Iowa, 236.

The burden of proof of contributory negligence is on the defendant under the Iowa Code, § 1288, providing that an injured party, in order to recover damages from a railroad company for neglect or refusal to comply with the statute requiring safe crossing and cattle guards, need only prove such neglect and refusal. Ford v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 179, 24 L.R.A. 657, 59 N. W. 5.

Turner v. St. Louis & H. R. Co. 134 Mo. App. 397, 114 S. W. 1026.

Where, under a statute requiring a railroad company to ring a bell or blow a whistle within a prescribed distance of railway crossings, provided that, upon failure to do so, the companies "shall be liable for all damages which shall be sustained by any person by reason of such neglect," it was held that proof of failure to observe the requirement of the statute did not make out a prima facie case, and the statute was thereafter amended (Acts 1881, p. 79) so as to provide: "And said corporations shall also be liable for all damages which any person may hereafter sustain at such crossing when such bell shall not be rung, or such whistle sounded, as required by this section; provided, however, that nothing contained shall preclude the corporation sued from showing that the failure to ring such bell, or sound such whistle, was not the cause of such injury." The court declared that it was clear that it was intended by this amendment to establish the rule that when a person suing for damages sustained at the crossing by a railroad of a public road or street shows that neither the bell of the engine was rung nor whistle sounded, as required by the statute, he makes out a prima facie case, and that the burden of rebutting it is cast upon the corporation. Huckshold v. St. Louis, L. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Mo. 548, 2 S. W. 794.

The statute of 1881, p. 79, as to signals at railway crossings, shifts the burden of proof to the corporations as to the cause of the injury when it appears the statutory signals are not given, but in regard to the contributory negligence of the injured party, the rule remains the same in this class of cases as in all others. Crumpley v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 111 Mo. 152, 19 S. W. 820.

Under a statute providing that if a person is injured at a railroad crossing by a collision with the engine or cars of a railroad corporation, and it appears that the corporation neglected to give the signals required by the statute, and that such neglect contributed to the injury, the corporation shall be liable for all damages caused by the collision, etc. (Rev. Stat. §§ 1685, 1692), it the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, it has been held that under a statute requiring railroad companies to maintain sufficient grade crossings, and making them absolutely liable for all damages for failure or neglect to construct and maintain the same, the burden is on the defendant or railroad company to establish contributory negligence on the part of a person injured or killed at such crossing, in order to defeat recovery in an action for damages resulting in such injury.²⁰

It has been held in Maine that to maintain an action against a town for injuries received by reason of a defective highway which the town by statute was required to keep in repair, it is incumbent on the plaintiff, after proving the notices required by statute, to prove affirmatively that the highway was not safe and convenient for travelers at the point where the accident occurred, that no want of ordinary care on his part contributed to the accident, and that his injury was occasioned through the defect alone.²¹ In actions of this kind in Massachusetts, the plaintiff must allege the exercise of due care.²² The same rule prevails in Vermont,²³ but the opposite rule obtains in Kansas.²⁴

In a jurisdiction in which the general is not necessary that the plaintiff should show, in order to prove that the failure to give signals contributed to the accident, that the person for whose death the action was brought was not aware of the train's approach in time to avoid the collision, since this would result in casting the burden upon the plaintiff. The burden should not be on the plaintiff for two reasons: First, because it would be requiring the plaintiff, in violation of the general rule, to prove a negative. Second, because the knowledge of the deceased of the approach of the train in time to avoid a collision is a matter of defense, to be proved by the defendant, and not to be disproved in advance by the plaintiff. Nohrden v. Northeastern R. Co. 50 S. C. 87, 82 Am. St. Rep. 826, 37 S. E. 228.

In Peart v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 10 Ont. App. Rep. 191, under a statute requiring a railroad company to give warning by bell or whistle on the approach to highway crossings, it was held that it was not necessary for plaintiff to negative contributory negligence in an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a crossing by reason of the negligence of the defendant by failure to perform such statutory duty.

²⁰ See v. Wabash R. Co. 123 Iowa, 443, 9 N. W. 106.

Likewise in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Trowbridge, 31 Ill. App. 190, it was said that the rule laid down in Rockford, R. I. & St. R. Co. v. Lynch, 67 Ill. 149, that in an action based on the negligence of the company for failure to fence its road, the plaintiff need only prove the injury by the trains of the company, and its neglect to fence, in order to establish a prima facie case of liability, applies in all cases of injuring animals by railroad trains where the agency or control of the owner or those in charge of them is not a factor in the case; but that when it appears that the actions of animals are controlled by the conduct of the owner, or others representing him, in such a way as will affect the right of recovery, then, it devolves upon such owner to show affirmatively upon his part the proper degree of care before he can recover.

3 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the Lynch Case there was no question as to the burden of proving contributory negligence. The erroneous instruction in that case was that the plaintiff must prove failure to fence and "negligence in other respects." This was held to require too much; that proof of the breach of the statutory duty made out a prima facie case.

²¹ Cunningham v. Frankfort, 104 Me. 208, 70 Atl. 441.

²² Hilton v. Boston, 171 Mass. 478, 51 N. E. 114. The court said it was formerly considered that in an action against a town for a defect in a highway, it was unnecessary to allege that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care. Negligence on the part of the town was the gist of the action, and this was the main thing to be proved. The plaintiff put in evidence proof of his own care to negative his own negligence. But since the practice act of 1851, the schedule of forms in an action against a town for a defect in the highway contains an allegation of due care on the part of the plaintiff. Stat. 1851, chap. 233; Stat. 1852, chap. 312; Gen. Stat. chap. 129; Pub. Stat. chap. 167. And the commissioners on the statutes of 1851, in their note to the form in such a case, refer to May v. Princeton, 11 Met. 442. While negligence on the part of a town is the gist of the action, the plaintiff must, since the statute of 1851, prove as an affirmative proposition, the exercise of due care on his part.

In order to maintain an action against a town upon the statute for damage occasioned by want of repair in a highway, two things must concur: first, that the highway was out of repair; secondly, that the party complaining was driving with ordinary care and skill. Adams v. Carlisle, 21 Pick. 146.

²⁴ A statute (Sess. Laws of 1887. § 1, chap. 237; Gen. Stat. 1889, ¶ 7134) providing that "any person who shall, without rule is that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, under a statute giving a right of action for injuries due to defects in highways, provided that the injured person has not in any way brought about the injury or damage by his own act, or by having negligently contributed thereto, it is held that the plaintiff must allege as a point of his case, that the injuries complained of were not contributed to by his own fault.²⁵

Where the rule was that the burden of proving absence of contributory negligence is on the plaintiff, it was held in an action for negligence, growing out of the viola-a contributing negligence on his part, sustain damage by reason of any defective bridge, culvert, or highway, may recover such damages from the county or township wherein such defective bridge, culvert, or highway is located," etc., does not change the rule of pleading, and shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff, as to cases falling within its terms, its object being not to declare a rule, either of pleading or of evidence, but to declare a rule of right. Reading Twp. v. Telfer, 57 Kan. 798, 57 Am. St. Rep. 355, 48 Pac. 134.

Under a statute (Laws of Kansas of 1887, chap. 237), providing that any person who shall, without contributory negligence on his part, sustain damage by reason of any defective bridge, culvert, or public highway, may recover damages from the county or township in which said defective bridge, culvert, or public highway is located, the plaintiff must allege and prove that the injuries were sustained without contributory negligence on his part, and if the defendant deny the allegations of the complaint, the burden of proof as to contributory negligence is on the plaintiff; but if the defendant pleads contributory negligence, and sets out certain particular acts of the plaintiff in support thereof, the burden of proving such facts is thrown upon the defendant. Falls Twp. v. Stewart, 3 Kan. App. 403, 42 Pac. 926. To the same effect, Independent Twp. v. Guldner, 7 Kan. App. 690, 51 Pac. 943.

²⁵ Walker v. Chester County, 40 S. C. 342, 18 S. E. 936.

In construing the statute (highway statute) in McFail v. Barnwell County, 57 S. C. 294, 35 S. E. 562, McIver, Ch. J., said: "To maintain this action, it was necessary for the plaintiff not only to allege and prove that the injuries of which he complains against the county were 'occasioned by its neglect and mismanagement,' but also that he 'has not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his own act, or negligently contributed thereto.' If, therefore, the injury complained of was in any way brought about by the negligence of the plaintiff, or if he negligently contributed thereto, then the plaintiff, under the express terms of the statute, could not recover. The legislature, by the use of the language above quoted, manifestly intend-tion of a statute prescribing the duties of a mine boss, and making a violation of its provision negligence per se, that the plaintiff is required to allege that he was free from fault.²⁶

Under the Kentucky statutes²⁷ requiring each owner or lessee of a coal mine, under a penalty, to provide and maintain by appliances and means therein described a prescribed amount of ventilation throughout his mines, all that was necessary for plaintiff to do to make out his case prima facie was to show that the injury was caused by an explosion, and that the defendant had not complied with the stated to declare that in either one of two contingencies the plaintiff could not recover. First, if the injury was in any way brought about by his own act. Second, if he negligently contributed thereto. Now, if the statute had stopped after declaring the first one of these contingencies, then possibly the conclusion might have been that the negligence of the plaintiff, in order to bar a recovery, must be the efficient cause of the injury; or, to use the language of the circuit judge, must be the immediate, proximate cause of the injury, as the words 'brought about' would seem to imply. But the statute does not stop there, but goes on to declare another contingency upon which the plaintiff's right of recovery would be barred,—if he negligently contributed thereto. The use of the word 'contributed' necessarily implies that there was another cause to which the plaintiff's negligence might contribute; and although plaintiff's negligence might not alone be sufficient to cause the injury, yet if it contributed to some other cause,—for example, the defendant's negligence,—then the plaintiff could not, under the second contingency declared in the statute, recover." This case was overruled in Duncan v. Greenville County, 73 S. C. 254, 53 S. E. 367.

Under § 1347 of the Code of 1902, giving a right of action for injuries due to a defect in a highway, provided that the injured person did not in any way bring about the injury or damage by his own act "negligently contributing thereto," the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show that he was not guilty of any negligence which contributed to the injury as a proximate cause thereof. Ibid.

In an action brought to recover for injuries received by the alleged "mismanagement" of a steam roller in a highway, under a statute creating such a right, provided that the injured person "has not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his or her own negligent act, or negligently contributed thereto," it is necessary for the plaintiff, as a part of his case, to show that his own negligence did not contribute to the injury. Barksdale v. Laurens, 58 S. C. 413, 36 S. E. 661.

ute; thus shifting the burden upon the defendant to show that the injury was caused not by an explosion of accumulated gases of a noxious and inflammable character, but instead by the imprudent and negligent manner in which the blasting was done by plaintiff.²⁸

The rule that the burden is on the plaintiff was held not affected by a statute requiring the tumbling rods of threshing machines to be boxed, and providing that the owners shall be liable for damages to persons injured, upon failure to comply with the statute. The burden is still upon the plaintiff to show that the injury was not due to his own negligence contributing to the accident.²⁹ A Georgia statute³⁰ requires that it should affirmatively appear as a condition of recovery in an action for injuries received by reason of defective machinery, that the servant could not have known of the defect by the exercise of ordinary care.³¹

²⁸ Godfrey v. Beattyville Coal Co. 101 Ky. 339, 41 S. W. 10.

It was held, however, in this case, that an instruction putting the burden upon the plaintiff was not prejudicial, for the reason that the evidence clearly showed that the injury was caused by the negligent and reckless manner in which the plaintiff and his collaborators blasted the coal.

²⁹ Reynolds v. Hindman, 32 Iowa, 146.

³⁰ "The master is bound to exercise ordinary care in the selection of servants, and not to retain them after knowledge of incompetency; he must use like care in furnishing machinery equal in kind to that in general use, and reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care and diligence. If there are latent defects in machinery, or dangers incident to an employment, unknown to the servant, of which the master knows, or ought to know, he must give the servant warning in respect thereto." Georgia Code 1911, § 3130 (2611).

"A servant assumes all ordinary risk of his employment, and is bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to protect himself. In suits for injuries arising from the negligence of a master in failing to comply with the duties imposed by the preceding section, it must appear that the master knew or ought to have known of the incompetency of the other servant, or of the defects or danger in the machinery supplied; and it must also appear that the servant injured did not know, and had not equal means of knowing, of such fact, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof." Under a statute providing that any corporation owning a factory shall be liable for damages suffered by any employee by reason of its failing to guard or fence an elevator well,³² a person injured in this manner has the burden of establishing his freedom from contributory negligence. Where a statute does not otherwise provide, the rule requiring the plaintiff in an action for negligence to show that, at the time of the injury complained of, he was in the exercise of due care, is the same whether the action is brought under a statute or at common law. The doctrine of contributory negligence governs both classes of actions.³³

The Iowa Code,³⁴ providing that the owner of a dog "shall be liable to the party injured for all damages done by his dog, except when the party is doing an unlawful act," creates an absolute liability, so as to relieve the plaintiff from the necessity of alleging due care on his part.³⁵

Under a statute relating to the setting and spread of fire from railroads, providing that the use of adjacent property in the same manner in which it would have been used had no railroad been located there shall not be considered negligence, the evidence showing without dispute that the burned property had been used the same as before the coming of the railroad, it was held that the burden was not on the plaintiff to show freedom from contributory negligence in stacking straw in close proximity to defendant's tracks. ³⁴ § 1485.

³⁵ Gregory v. Woodworth, 93 Iowa, 246, 61 N. W. 962.

In Stuber v. Gannon, 98 Iowa, 228, 67 N. W. 105, the rule announced in the Gregory Case was followed by the majority of the court. Deemer, J., however, expressed individual views to the contrary. He said: "The only theory on which it can be sustained is that the statute in question is remedial in its nature, and in effect does nothing more than dispense with proof of the scienter required in actions at common law; that the action is still predicated upon the negligence of the defendant; and that the ordinary rule denying recovery to one for injuries resulting from his own negligence applies. To sustain the opinion it must also be found that the purpose of the exception stated in the statute, to wit, 'except when the party is doing an unlawful act,' was to limit the right of recovery, and not to extend it. . . . There is a class of actions in tort not based on negligence in which the defendant's care, or the want of it, is not in issue, in which some direct and positive act of the defendant makes out the cause of action. In such cases plaintiff makes out a prima facie case by proving the defendant's act and consequent injury. He has no occasion to prove

And under a statute³⁶ providing that when a dog does damage, his owner or keeper forfeits to the person injured double the amount of the damage done, to be recovered by action of trespass, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove due care.³⁷

f. Statutory actions for death.

Under the Connecticut statute, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that his intestate was in the exercise of due care at the time of the injury causing the death, the intent of the statute being merely to make a right of action survive, and not to change the general rule of law as to the burden of proof.³⁸

In an action to recover for the death of a brakeman, the administrator must, under the Maine statute,³⁹ affirmatively prove that the deceased was free from contributory negligence, the same as in an action by the deceased himself, had he survived.⁴⁰

Under the Massachusetts statutes,⁴¹ in an action by the administrator of a switchman killed while in the performance of his duty, to recover for the conscious suffering of the intestate, and by the next of kin to recover for his death, it must be shown by the plaintiffs that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence.⁴²

In an action brought under the Kentucky statutes,⁴³ to recover for death, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should prove that the deceased exercised ordinary care for his own safety.⁴⁴

The Maryland Code requires an averment of freedom from contributory negligence in actions of this kind.⁴⁵ But this is not the rule in an action to recover for death resulting from a pistol shot fired in defense of defendant's servant.⁴⁶ defendant's negligence, nor his own care in the first instance. . . . It seems to me that this is an action belonging to that class, and that plaintiff was not required to show freedom from contributory negligence."

But under a statute providing that when a dog does damage to a person or his property, his owner forfeits to the person injured the amount of the damage done, provided such damage was not occasioned through the fault of the person injured, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove freedom from contributory negligence. Garland v. Hewes, 101 Me. 549, 64 Atl. 914.

In an action under Pub. Stat. chap. 102, § 93, to recover double the amount of damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in stopping a dog fight, it was held that the statute was not penal, so as to require a different rule from that which prevails in actions of tort; that is, that the burden is on the plaintiff to prove freedom from contributory negligence. Raymond v. Hodgson, 161 Mass. 184, 36 N. E. 791.

³⁸ Chandler v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 159 Mass. 589, 35 N. E. 89.

The statutes provide (Conn. Gen. Stat. 1888, § 1008) that "all actions for injury to the person, whether the same do or do not instantaneously or otherwise result in death, . . . shall survive to his executor or administrator;" that "in all actions by an executor or administrator for injuries resulting in death from negligence, such executor or administrator may recover from the party legally in fault for such injury just damages, not exceeding five thousand dollars." (§ 1009.)

⁴¹ Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 1, as amended by Stat. 1893, chap. 359.

⁴² Dacey v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 168 Mass. 479, 47 N. E. 418.

In the statutory action to recover for the death of a boy killed by the alleged gross negligence of the defendant, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, or on the part of those who had charge of him. Manning v. Conway, 192 Mass. 122, 78 N. E. 401.

In the statutory action to recover for the death of a person, due to the alleged negligence of another, the burden of proof of showing due care is on the plaintiff. McCarty v. Clinton Gaslight Co. 193 Mass. 76, 78 N. E. 739.

In an action for the conscious suffering of a person killed while crossing street car tracks, and in the statutory action for his death, the plaintiff is bound to show that the intestate was in the exercise of due care. Haynes v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 204 Mass. 249, 90 N. E. 419.

⁴⁴ Warren v. Jeunesse, — Ky. —, 122 S. W. 862.

⁴⁶ In Tucker v. State, 89 Md. 471, 46 L.R.A. 181, 43 Atl. 778, the court said:

It has been held in Ohio that a statute providing that the administrator may recover in a case in which the deceased might have recovered if living does not cast the burden of disproving contributory negligence on the plaintiff, on the theory that the deceased could not have recovered if living, in a case in which he was guilty of contributory negligence.⁴⁷

In an action under a Massachusetts stat-

It has been held over and over again in this state that if a suit is brought under this statute for the negligence of the defendant, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove the negligence; yet, if the plaintiff's testimony makes out a prima facie case of negligence, and does not disclose want of care on the part of the deceased, the burden is on the defendant to establish contributory negligence if that is relied on.

So, although, by the terms of the statute, the plaintiff in such cases can only recover by proving that the death of the person was caused by the negligence or default of the defendant, the defendant has the burden cast on him to prove that the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the deceased, and that, too, notwithstanding the plaintiff is required to prove as part of his case that the negligence of the deceased did not directly contribute to the injury. It is true that the latter may be satisfied by the presumption of due care and the known and ordinary disposition of men to guard themselves against danger, when the plaintiff's testimony as to the accident does not show affirmatively that the deceased did directly contribute to the injury."

⁴⁷ Jackson Knife & Shear Co. v. Hathaway, 27 Ohio C. C. 745.

⁴⁸ "If a person is injured in his person or property by collision with the engines or cars of a railroad corporation at a crossing such as is described in § 163, and it appears that the corporation neglected to give the signals required by said section, and that such neglect contributed to the injury, the corporation shall be liable for all damages caused by the collision, or to a fine recoverable by indictment, as provided in the preceding section; or, in case the life of a person so injured is lost, to damages recoverable in an action of tort, as provided in said section, unless it is shown that, in addition to a mere want of ordinary care, the person injured, or the person having charge of his person or property, was, at the time of the collision, guilty of gross or wilful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law, and that such gross or wilful negligence or unlawful act contributed to the injury." Mass. Pub. Stat. 1882-1887, chap. 112, § 213.

"By reason of the negligence or carelessness of a corporation operating a railroad or street railway, or of the unfitness or gross negligence or carelessness of its servants or agents while engaged in its business, to recover damages for causing the death of a person by running him down at a crossing, it was held that to recover under § 212, it must be shown that the deceased was in the exercise of due diligence. To recover under § 213, it must be shown that the defendant neglected to sound its whistle or ring its bell, as required by § 163.⁴⁹

In an action against a railroad company

ness, the life of a passenger, or of a person being in the exercise of due diligence, and not a passenger or in the employment of such corporation, is lost, the corporation shall be punished by a fine of not less than 500 nor more than 5,000 dollars, to be recovered by indictment prosecuted within one year from the time of the injury causing the death, and paid to the executor or administrator, for the use of the widow and children of the deceased, in equal moieties; or, if there are no children, to the use of the widow; or, if no widow, to the use of the next of kin; but a corporation operating a railroad shall not be so liable for the loss of life by a person while walking or being upon its road contrary to law, or to the reasonable rules and regulations of the corporation. If the corporation is a railroad corporation, it shall also be liable in damages not exceeding 5,000 nor less than 500 dollars, to be assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of the corporation or of its servants or agents, and to be recovered in an action of tort commenced within one year from the injury causing the death, by the executor or administrator of the deceased person, for the use of the persons hereinbefore specified in the case of an indictment. But no executor or administrator shall, for the same cause, avail himself of more than one of the remedies given by this section." Mass. Pub. Stat. 1882-1887, chap. 112, § 212.

⁴⁹ "Section 163, of chap. 112, of the Public Statutes, is hereby amended by inserting after the word 'or' in the fourth line the words 'at least three separate and distinct blasts of,' so that said section shall read as follows:—§ 163. Every railroad corporation shall cause a bell of at least 35 pounds in weight and a steam whistle to be placed on each locomotive engine passing upon its road; and such bell shall be rung, or at least three separate and distinct blasts of such whistle sounded, at the distance of at least 80 rods from the place where the road crosses upon the same level any highway, townway, or traveled place over which a signboard is required to be maintained, as provided in the two following sections; and such bell shall be rung or such whistle sounded continuously or alternately until the engine has crossed such way or traveled place." § 1 of Mass. Acts and Resolves 1890, chap. 173.

"If a person is injured in his person or property by collision with the engines or cars of a railroad corporation at a crossing in Massachusetts for causing the death of a passenger, it is not incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that the deceased was in the exercise of due care.⁵⁰ such as is described in § 147, and it appears that the corporation neglected to give the signals required by said section, and that such neglect contributed to the injury, the corporation shall be liable for all damages caused by the collision, or to a fine recoverable by indictment, as provided in § 63 of part 1; or, if the life of a person so injured is lost, to damages recoverable in an action of tort, as provided in said section, unless it is shown that, in addition to a mere want of ordinary care, the person injured, or the person who had charge of his person or property, was, at the time of the collision, guilty of gross or wilful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law, and that such gross or wilful negligence or unlawful act contributed to the injury." Mass. Acts and Resolves 1906, chap. 463, part 2, § 245.

Before the plaintiff can recover in Massachusetts for the death of a person suffo-

Livermore v. Fitchburg R. Co. 163 Mass. 132, 39 N. E. 789.

Under the Massachusetts Statutes of 1881, chap. 199, § 2, in an action for causing the death of a person at a railroad crossing, the burden is upon the defendant of showing that the deceased was guilty of gross or wilful negligence. Copley v. New Haven & N. Co. 136 Mass. 6.

In an action to recover for the death of a person killed at a railroad crossing, based on the failure of the company to give the signals required by law, the company can relieve itself from liability only by showing that the deceased was guilty of gross or wilful negligence, and that such negligence contributed to the injury; and the burden of proof is on the defendant to show this. Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 213. Walsh v. Boston & M. R. Co. 171 Mass. 52, 50 N. E. 453.

In an action under Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 213 (Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 268), for the death of a boy killed at a grade crossing, due to failure of defendant to give signals required by Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 163; Stat. 1890, chap. 173 (Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 188), the plaintiff need not show that the deceased was careful. If the defendant relies upon the gross negligence of the deceased, that defense must be established by evidence. McDonald v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 186 Mass. 474, 72 N. E. 55.

In an action under the statute (Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 268) for the loss of the life of a person at a grade crossing, the burden is upon the defendant to prove that the plaintiff's intestate was grossly negligent. Brusseau v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 187 Mass. 84, 72 N. E. 348.

In an action under the statute (Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 213) for injuries received at a railroad crossing, the burden is on the defendant to prove gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Kenny v. Boston & M. R. Co. 188 Mass. 127, 74 N. E. 309.

In speaking of the English act,⁵³ Lord FitzGerald said: "Before the passing of ceived at a railroad crossing, the burden is on the defendant to prove gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Kenny v. Boston & M. R. Co. 188 Mass. 127, 74 N. E. 309.

In an action to recover for injuries received by being struck by a train at a railroad crossing, due to the alleged negligence of the defendant in failing to give statutory signals, as required under Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 268, the burden of proving gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff is on the defendant. Kelsall v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 196 Mass. 554, 82 N. E. 674.

An action under Statutes 1906, chap. 463, part 2, § 245, for the death of a person, due to the negligence of the defendant in failing to ring bell as train approached crossing, the burden is on defendant of proving gross negligence of plaintiff. Slatery v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 203 Mass. 453, 133 Am. St. Rep. 311, 89 N. E. 622.

⁵⁰ Merrill v. Eastern R. Co. 139 Mass. 252, 29 N. E. 666.

For statute, see supra, VIII., note 48.

If a person killed by a railroad company was a passenger, and his life was lost through the negligence of the defendant, or the gross negligence of its servants or agents, it is unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove that the deceased was not negligent, under Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212. McKimble v. Boston & M. R. Co. 139 Mass. 542, 2 N. E. 97.

⁵³ "Whereas no action at law is now maintainable against a person who, by his wrongful act, neglect, or default, may have caused the death of another person, and it is oftentimes right and expedient that the wrongdoer in such case should be answerable in damages for the injury so caused by him, be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present Parliament Assembly, and by the authority of the same. That whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although Lord Campbell's act . . . in a common-law action for an injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, and when that most convenient plea 'not guilty' was permitted, I always understood that if the defendant relied as a defense on contributory negligence, though he was permitted to establish it under 'not guilty,' yet the issue lay on him, and I am not aware that any different rule has been established since the passing of that statute, or since the practice has been adopted of putting in special defenses, whether the action was at common law, for a personal injury, or under the statute for a wrongful act causing the death."⁵⁴

g. Acts relating to pleading.

Under a statute providing that the answer "shall consist of a concise statement of facts constituting . . . the defendant's ground of defense," it was held that the defense of contributory negligence must be specifically pleaded in order that it may be availed of. But the court said, obiter, that it was probable that if the matter were before the court, it would follow what appeared to be the weight of authority that if the plaintiff in his own case showed that his negligence contributed to the injury, he could not recover, although the defendant might not have pleaded contributory negligence as a defense.⁵⁵

It is especially true that the defendant must plead the defense of contributory negligence under the provisions of a Code providing that the answer of the defendant shall contain, first, a special denial of each material allegation of the petition controverted by the defendant; second, a statement of any new matter constituting a defense.⁵⁶ the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony.

"II. And be it enacted, that every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the before-mentioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct.

"III. Provided always, and be it enacted, that not more than one action shall lie for and in respect of the same subject-matter of complaint, and that every such action shall be commenced within twelve calendar months after the death of such deceased person.

"IV. And be it enacted that in every such action the plaintiff on the record shall be required, together with the declaration, to deliver to the defendant or his attorney a full particular of the person or persons for whom and on whose behalf such actions shall be brought, and of the nature of the claim in respect to which damages shall be sought to be recovered.

"V. And be it enacted that the following words and expressions are intended to have the meaning hereby assigned to them respectively, so far as such meanings are not excluded by the context or by the nature of the subject-matter. That is to say, words denoting the singular number are to be understood to apply also to a plurality of persons or things; and words denoting the masculine gender are to be understood to apply also to persons of the feminine gender, and the word 'person' shall apply to bodies politic and corporate, and the word 'parent' shall include father and mother and grandfather and grandmother and stepfather and stepmother; and the word 'child' shall include son and daughter and grandson and granddaughter and stepson and stepdaughter.

"VI. And be it enacted that this act shall come into operation from and immediately after the passing thereof, and that nothing therein contained shall apply to that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland.

GENERAL INDEX

NOTES ARE INDEXED BY THE WORD "ANNOTATED,, AFTER THE PARAGRAPHS TO WHICH THEY APPLY.

(Separate Index to Notes Precedes this.)

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL.

From purchase money for loss by superior adverse title to portion of land conveyed, see Vendor and Purchaser.

1. The failure of a trustee in bankruptcy to intervene in a suit brought by the bankrupt in a state court before his adjudication will not abate the suit. Weaver Mercantile Co. v. Thurmond, 33: 1061, 70 S. E. 126, 68 W. Va. 530.

2. Under a statute providing that an action shall stand revived in the absence of sufficient cause shown against revivor, after service of a conditional order therefor, the court has no discretion to refuse to permit a revival. Boyes v. Masters, 33: 576, 114 Pac. 710, — Okla. —.

3. The method of reviving an action sanctioned by a statute providing for a revivor by service of a conditional order therefor is not exclusive where the statutes also provide that, in case of death of a party, the court may allow the action to continue against his representative, and authorize the court to allow supplemental pleadings alleging facts occurring after the former pleadings. Boyes v. Masters, 33: 576, 114 Pac. 710, — Okla. —. (Annotated)

4. The mere fact that the time allowed by the revivor statute has elapsed will not, in the absence of laches, prevent the revivor of an action foreclosing a mortgage which, after the death of the mortgagor, had been revived against his widow, who was also one of his executors, and his heirs, and after the death of the widow had been reversed and remanded on appeal, and an attempt made to revive against the other executor and the widow's representatives, without any attempt to bring in the heirs until after a motion was dismissed because of failure to do so. Boyes v. Masters, 33: 576, 114 Pac. 710, — Okla. —.

ABUTTING OWNERS.

Requiring consent of to standing of hacks in street, see Constitutional Law, 7.

ACCEPTANCE.

Necessity of notice of acceptance of guaranty, see Guaranty.

ACCORD AND SATISFACTION.

One who accepts in payment of overdue accounts upon which interest is due, which is not provided in the contract, checks containing a statement of the account, without interest, and bearing the announcement "in full payment of above account," waives his right subsequently to claim the interest, although he understands that the question of right to interest was left open, and as to the portion of the interest claimed so notified the one making the payment. Bassick Gold Mine Co. v. Beardsley, 33: 852, 112 Pac. 770, — Colo. —.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

To interrupt statute of limitations, see Limitation of Actions, 6.

ACTION OR SUIT.

Abatement of, see Abatement and Revival.

Dismissal and discontinuance, see Dismissal or Discontinuance.

Parties to actions, see Parties.

Premature; conditions precedent.

To enforce stockholder's liability, see Corporations, 2.

1. Dissolution of an injunction on motion does not mature a right of action on the injunction bond if the suit is still pending, although the statute provides that, in case of dissolution of an injunction, the complaint shall be dismissed of course unless sufficient cause be shown against its dismissal at the next succeeding term of court. Vicksburg Waterworks Co. v. Vicksburg, 33: 844, 54 So. 852, — Miss. —.

2. One is not bound to make a tender of any amount as a condition of instituting a suit to set aside an assessment for a public improvement, which is invalid in toto. Denver v. State Invest. Co. 33: 395, 112 Pac. 789, — Colo. —.

3. Tender of a portion of an assessment for a public improvement is not a prerequisite to the institution of a suit to set it aside for illegality, if no part of the assessment is due and payable when the suit is instituted. Denver v. State Invest. Co. 33: 395, 112 Pac. 789, — Colo. —.

Who may set up defense.

4. One seeking to set aside for fraud a contract by which he transferred corporate stock to his attorney, in consideration of the latter's securing money to relieve the business from financial difficulties, cannot set up usury in a transaction by which the attorney transferred a portion of the stock to persons who lent the money which he undertook to secure. Winsor v. Commonwealth Coal Co. 33: 63, 114 Pac. 908, — Wash. —.

Joinder.

5. A statutory action to quiet title and a common-law action to recover damages for trespass upon the property involved may be joined under a statute permitting the joinder of causes which arise out of transactions connected with the same subject of action. McArthur v. Moffett, 33: 264, 128 N. W. 445, 143 Wis. 564.

6. The physical presence of the injured person is not necessary to effect a transaction within the meaning of a statute permitting the joinder of causes of action arising out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action. McArthur v. Moffett, 33: 264, 128 N. W. 445, 143 Wis. 564.

7. In possessory and proprietary actions, whether involving real or personal property, the subject of action, causes arising out of transactions concerning which may, by statute, be joined in a single action, is composed of the plaintiff's primary right, together with the specific property itself. McArthur v. Moffett, 33: 264, 128 N. W. 445, 143 Wis. 564.

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Sufficiency of evidence to show adverse nature of possession, see Evidence, 39.

1. The intention determines the question whether or not the possession of one holding to a fence placed on a mistaken boundary is adverse to the true owner. Edwards v. Fleming, 33: 923, 112 Pac. 836, 83 Kan. 653. (Annotated)

2. Title acquired up to a division fence by adverse possession and acquiescence for the statutory period is not disturbed by a survey fixing the true boundary elsewhere, which was made under a statute providing that the boundary established by the survey shall be considered as permanently established and shall not thereafter be changed, since a statutory survey cannot change title 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APOLOGY.

As defense to action for battery, see Assault and Battery, 5.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

Finality of decision for purpose of appeal.

1. No appeal lies from an order refusing to dismiss an action brought by the state to determine which of two sets of trustees is entitled to administer a sectarian school, but the entry of appeal may be treated as an exception upon appeal from the final judgment. State ex rel. Kerr v. Hicks, 33: 529, 70 S. E. 468, 154 N. C. 265.

2. Permitting defendants in default to file pleadings after a reversal of a judgment on demurrer of part of the defendants, because the petition fails to state a cause of action, before any amendment of the petition, is not a final judgment from which a writ of error will lie. Tate v. Goode, 33: 310, 70 S. E. 571, 135 Ga. 738.

Right to appeal.

3. Compelling surrender of the parcel awarded plaintiff in an action of ejectment and payment of taxed costs, by threat of executing the writ of restitution which had been issued, prevents him from attempting to reverse the judgment on appeal, although he was denied relief as to a large parcel of land upon which he claimed that defendant had wrongfully encroached. Clairview Park Improv. Co. v. Detroit & Lake St. C. R. Co. 33: 250, 129 N. W. 353, 164 Mich. 74.

Parties; intervention.

4. A trustee in bankruptcy who fails to intervene in the trial court in a proceeding brought by the bankrupt before the proceedings were taken against him has no right to take such a proceeding for the first time on appeal. Weaver Mercantile Co. v. Thurmond, 33: 1061, 70 S. E. 126, 68 W. Va. 530.

Mode.

5. An appeal may be taken from a judgment which is void because of the unconstitutionality of the statute creating the court in which it was rendered, and a reversal had, where the case is preserved and presented by a case-made, that being one of the prescribed methods for the taking of an appeal. Fleeman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 33: 733, 109 Pac. 287, 82 Kan. 574. (Annotated)

Record on appeal.

6. Rulings on pleadings cannot be presented to the appellate court by bill of exceptions, if the pleadings appear only in such bill. Diener v. Star-Chronicle Pub. Co. 33: 216, 132 S. W. 1143, 230 Mo. 613.

Objections and exceptions; raising questions in lower court.

7. A reversal may be had to prevent injustice because of insufficient instructions to the jury, although the losing party did not except to those given, or request others. Lepley v. Andersen, 33: 836, 125 N. W. 433, 142 Wis. 668.

Rules of decision.

8. Where there is conflicting testimony in the appellate court as to whether or not a case made was served before the expiration of the time allowed, the certificate of the trial judge that the service was made in due time will control. Girard Trust Co. v. Owen, 33: 262, 112 Pac. 619, 83 Kan. 692.

Presumptions.
9. No presumption that a woman will perform her invalid contract to give her attorney a share of the allowance secured in a divorce proceeding as alimony will prevent the appellate court from affirming a special allowance for counsel fees made by the trial court. McConnell v. McConnell, 33: 1074, 136 S. W. 931, — Ark. —.

Discretionary matters.

10. The exercise of the discretion of the trial court, in permitting an amended bill to be filed, will not be disturbed by an appellate court, except in cases of abuse of such discretion. Floyd v. Duffy, 33: 883, 69 S. E. 993, 68 W. Va. 339.

Questions not raised below.

11. Failure to prove presentment and notice, which the declaration in an action against the indorser of a promissory note alleges to have been made, is fatal, even in the appellate court. Worley v. Johnson, 33: 639, 53 So. 543, — Fla. —.

12. The objection that an answer of a witness was not responsive to the question propounded to him is not available on appeal, if not taken at the trial, where the answer was ruled out because inadmissible. Britton v. Washington Water Power Co. 33: 109, 110 Pac. 20, 59 Wash. 440.

Errors waived or cured below.

13. Failure to take from the jury the question of murder in the first degree on a trial for homicide is not subject to review in favor of the accused, if the verdict is murder in the second degree. State v. Meyers, 33: 143, 110 Pac. 407, — Or. —.

Review of facts.

14. Where there is a direct invasion of personal rights under circumstances showing malice, or a wilful and wanton disregard of another's right to personal security, the amount of compensatory damages is not susceptible of exact computation, and must usually be left to the sound discretion of the jury. Kurpgewit v. Kirby, 33: 98, 129 N. W. 177, 88 Neb. 72.

15. The allowance of $50 per month as alimony to a wife having no property, against a man worth from $15,000 to $60,000, who causes the wife to leave the home because of his siding with his sister in her attempt to control the affairs of the house, will not be interfered with on appeal. McConnell v. McConnell, 33: 1074, 136 S. W. 931, — Ark. —.

Grounds for reversal.

16. Erroneous rulings of the trial court upon abstract propositions of law will not require a reversal if, upon the law and legal evidence, the result of the trial was right. Gordon v. Conley, 33: 336, 78 Atl. 365, — Me. —.

17. A judgment will not be reversed because new matter in a reply constitutes a departure from the petition, although timely objection has been made thereto in the trial court, where, notwithstanding the fault in the pleading, the contention of each party has been made clear, and each has had full opportunity to develop the facts. Savage v. Modern Woodmen of America, 33: 773, 113 Pac. 802, — Kan. —.

18. If, on appeal, it appears that the original bill is broad enough to admit the evidence and sustain the decree pronounced, the decree will not be reversed for failure to mature an amended bill unnecessarily filed. Floyd v. Duffy, 33: 883, 69 S. E. 993, 68 W. Va. 339.

19. The admission in an action by a servant of a street railroad company to hold the master liable for injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant who was alleged to be incompetent, of incompetent evidence as to the making of complaints to an officer having no authority to discharge him, is reversible error, although the jury are instructed to consider it merely as to a subordinate fact, if they are permitted to consider it on the question of notice to the company of such incompetence, and the officer alleged to have received the notice is made a witness and obliged to meet the testimony, which might destroy his value as a witness. Rosenstiel v. Pittsburgh Railways Co. 33: 751, 79 Atl. 556, — Pa. —.

20. Error in admitting in evidence a written statement of those in charge of a street car which was in an accident, in an action to hold the street car company liable for injuries thereby, is not cured by a charge to the effect that it is admitted only to contradict such persons' testimony as witnesses in the case, where, as to one of the witnesses, it was not admissible for that purpose because he had never adopted it by signing it, and it contains matters prejudicial to the objecting party other than those which are merely contradictory while, in a portion of the charge, the jury are authorized to use it as substantive evidence. Boyle v. Boston Elevated R. Co. 33: 552, 94 N. E. 247, 208 Mass. 41.

21. It is not reversible error to refuse to permit a witness who has testified as to the condition of weather on a certain day, to state whether or not he would call it a fair day, since the jury are able, from his description, to determine that fact for themselves. Pratt v. North German Lloyd S. S. Co. 33: 532, 184 Fed. 303, 106 C. C. A. 445.

22. Where an action for personal injury occurring in one state is brought in another state, where plaintiff had a right to bring it, it is error for the court to instruct the jury that the fact that plaintiff brought the action away from his home and among strangers may be considered by them in so far as it may throw light, or tend to throw light, upon the transaction. Mason v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 33: 280, 70 S. E. 225, 135 Ga. 741.

23. In a contest over the probate of a will, it is error to instruct the jury that 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

their verdict will be that the instrument offered for probate is not the will of decedent, if they find that she did not sign it, where the evidence is insufficient to sustain such a finding. Re Gray, 33: 319, 130 N. W. 746, 88 Neb. 835.

24. The giving of an erroneous prejudicial instruction is not cured by a conflicting one which announces the correct rule, if the former is allowed to stand. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Woods, 33: 855, 131 S. W. 869, — Ark. —.

25. An instruction in an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution, that the damages might include an allowance for suffering caused by cold and lack of bed and food during his imprisonment, cannot be regarded as prejudicial where the only evidence to which it is applicable is to the effect that the bed furnished was hard and that plaintiff ate nothing, which may have been due to his own volition. Seidler v. Burns, 33: 291, 79 Atl. 53, — Conn. —.

26. A verdict for $3,200 for the negligent crushing of the hand of an employee, leaving it in a permanently crippled condition, is not indicative of passion or prejudice so as to require interference by the appellate court. Poli v. Numa Block Coal Co. 33: 646, 127 N. W. 1105, — Iowa, —.

Judgment.
27. The fact of the death of a party between the submission and decision of a cause in the appellate court does not impair the validity of a judgment thereafter rendered, but that court will, on proper showing, satisfy the judgment, recall the mandate, and direct the clerk to refile the opinion and enter judgment in the case nunc pro tunc, as of the date when the same was submitted. Boyes v. Masters, 33: 576, 114 Pac. 710, — Okla. —.

28. Although a case is of such a character that the question of measure of damages is primarily one for the jury, if, under all the circumstances, the amount of the verdict is such as to indicate passion or prejudice, the appellate court will require a remittitur or reverse. Kurpgewelt v. Kirby, 33: 98, 129 N. W. 177, 88 Neb. 72.

29. The effect of a judgment cannot be avoided on the second trial on the theory of a difference in evidence if it is clear that the court, in rendering the first judgment, acted upon the facts substantially as they appear in the newly offered evidence. Thaler v. Wilhelm Greisser Constr. Co. 33: 345, 79 Atl. 147, 229 Pa. 512.

1. The court cannot by ex parte order require the publisher of a newspaper, although he is also an attorney at law, to justify in open court an article in which he raises a suspicion that the jury was bribed in an action tried before the court, where the information may necessitate the naming of persons in good standing before the community, and subject the publisher to libel suits. Warren v. Connolly, 33: 314, 130 N. W. 637, — Mich. —.

2. Publishing advertisements in other states, and sending pamphlets there, for the purpose of attracting their citizens to the state for the purpose of instituting divorce proceedings in its courts, and giving employment to the one doing the advertising, is misconduct on the part of an attorney within the meaning of a statute permitting his disbarment or suspension therefor. Re Schnitzer, 33: 941, 112 Pac. 848, — Nev. —.

15. The maker of a promissory note may defeat an action thereon by the original payee by showing that it was executed as a premium for a life insurance policy, and that neither policy nor note was to be valid unless the payee secured for the maker a loan upon the policy, which was not done. Smith v. Dotterweich, 33: 892, 93 N. E. 985, 200 N. Y. 299.

1. Delivery of an indemnity bond is 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

shown by evidence that it was executed by the insurer and sent by him to the agent of the assured, and that shortly afterwards the premium was paid to and accepted by the insurer. Title Guaranty & S. Co. v. Bank of Fulton, 33: 676, 117 S. W. 537, 89 Ark. 471.

2. The bond of a corporation organized for the purpose of engaging for profit in the business of guarantying the fidelity of contracts of a third party, given to indemnify the owner of property against loss from the failure of a contractor to perform the conditions of a building contract, while in form resembling a contract of suretyship, is in effect a contract of insurance, to which the rules governing ordinary contracts of insurance are applicable. George A. Hormel & Co. v. American Bonding Co. 33: 513, 128 N. W. 12, 112 Minn. 288.

(Annotated)

3. Where the legislature has not prescribed a standard policy, a guaranty insurance bond which is fairly open to two constructions, or as to the terms of which an ambiguity exists, should be strictly construed against the insurer; but if the terms of the contract be clear, and not fairly susceptible of two constructions, an ambiguity cannot be assumed and the plain intention of the parties nullified by constructions. George A. Hormel & Co. v. American Bonding Co. 33: 513, 128 N. W. 12, 112 Minn. 288.

4. A guaranty insurance bond securing the performance of a building contract which reserves the right to have changes made and extra work done without limit on the written order of the owner or architect, is not released by the giving of oral orders for changes and extras, where the architect audits and allows the amount thereof before payment. George A. Hormel & Co. v. American Bonding Co. 33: 513, 128 N. W. 12, 112 Minn. 288.

5. The requirement of a bond insuring the performance of a contract to erect a building, that the owner should immediately after knowledge of the occurrence of any breach by the contractor, or of any act on his part which might involve a loss for which the surety would be liable, give written notice thereof to the surety company, does not require that notice be given instantly upon learning of a default, but that it should be given within a reasonable time under all the circumstances. George A. Hormel & Co. v. American Bonding Co. 33: 513, 128 N. W. 12, 112 Minn. 288.

For fidelity of employee.

6. A fidelity insurance bond issued by a corporation in consideration of a premium paid need not be signed by the principal to render it valid, in the absence of any stipulation in the instrument or elsewhere which requires such signature. Title Guaranty & S. Co. v. Bank of Fulton, 33: 676, 117 S. W. 537, 89 Ark. 471.

7. A clause in a fidelity insurance bond which requires a statement from the employer as to habits and accounts of the employee whose fidelity is to be insured, and provides that said statement shall constitute part of the basis and consideration of the contract, does not make the statement a warranty so as to avoid the policy in case it is incorrect through mere mistake. Title Guaranty & S. Co. v. Bank of Fulton, 33: 676, 117 S. W. 537, 89 Ark. 471. (Annotated)

Charmley*, 33: 275, 129 N. W. 448, — N. D. —.

9. A deputy sheriff who, falsely claiming to have a warrant for the arrest of a person not charged with crime of any kind, goes to his house in the nighttime, and, under guise of the authority of his office, arrests and takes such person into custody, has committed an unauthorized and unlawful act under color of his office, for which the sureties upon his official bond are liable in a proper action. *Lee v. 3. Although the duty of enforcing statute requiring the separation of white and colored passengers is imposed upon conductors of trains, a railroad company may be held liable for injury inflicted upon a passenger of one race by a member of the other who is allowed to be in the wrong compartment without the knowledge of the conductor, if a subordinate employee, upon discovering his presence there, fails, as soon as practicable and within a reasonable time, to notify the conductor of that fact. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Renfro, 33: 133, 135 S. W. 266, 142 Ky. 590.

4. A railroad whose conductor fails as soon as practicable, and within a reasonable time after discovering a white passenger in a negro compartment, to require him to leave it, is, where the statute provides a penalty for permitting passengers to occupy compartments set apart for the other race and charges the conductor with the enforcement of the law, liable in damages for the unprovoked shooting by him of a negro. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Renfro, 33: 133, 135 S. W. 266, 142 Ky. 590. (Annotated)

The requirement of a bond insuring the performance of a contract to erect a building, that the owner should immediately after knowledge of the occurrence of any breach by the contractor, or of any act on his part which might involve a loss for which the surety would be liable, give written notice thereof to the surety company, does not require that notice be given instantly upon learning of a default, but that it should be given within a reasonable time under all the circumstances. George A. Hormel & Co. v. American Bonding Co. 33: 513, 128 N. W. 12, 112 Minn. 288.

For fidelity of employee.

6. A fidelity insurance bond issued by a corporation in consideration of a premium paid need not be signed by the principal to render it valid, in the absence of any stipulation in the instrument or elsewhere which requires such signature. Title Guaranty & S. Co. v. Bank of Fulton, 33: 676, 117 S. W. 537, 89 Ark. 471.

7. A clause in a fidelity insurance bond which requires a statement from the employer as to habits and accounts of the employee whose fidelity is to be insured, and provides that said statement shall constitute part of the basis and consideration of the contract, does not make the statement a warranty so as to avoid the policy in case it is incorrect through mere mistake. Title Guaranty & S. Co. v. Bank of Fulton, 33: 676, 117 S. W. 537, 89 Ark. 471. (Annotated)

By public officers.

8. The sureties upon the official bond of a deputy sheriff, who undertake that he shall faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of his office, are liable for any unlawful or oppressive act done by such officer under color or by virtue of his office. Lee v. Charmley, 33: 275, 129 N. W. 448, — N. D. —.

9. A deputy sheriff who, falsely claiming to have a warrant for the arrest of a person not charged with crime of any kind, goes to his house in the nighttime, and, under guise of the authority of his office, arrests and takes such person into custody, has committed an unauthorized and unlawful act under color of his office, for which the sureties upon his official bond are liable in a proper action. Lee v. Charmley, 33: 275, 129 N. W. 448, — N. D. —.

Who are passengers.

1. Where one intending to become a passenger, and while the work of preparing the train on which he intended to take passage is going on, necessitating dangerous switchings and coupling of the cars, of which he has notice, and at a point where the carrier is not accustomed to receive passengers, and without notice to, or invitation by, any officer or agent of the carrier with authority, enters one of the coaches, and, in attempting to go from one coach to another, is injured by a jolt or impact given to the coaches in making such switchings or couplings, the carrier is not liable to him in damages for his injuries thus sustained. Raines v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 33: 583, 70 S. E. 711, 68 W. Va. 694.

(Annotated)

Abuse of passenger; insult.

Mental anguish as element of damages, see Damages, 9.

2. A carrier cannot escape liability for insults addressed by its conductor to a passenger, on the ground that it did not authorize or ratify them. Bleecker v. Colorado & S. R. Co. 33: 386, 114 Pac. 481, — Colo. —.

Assault.

Evidence in action for assault on passenger, see Evidence, 31.

3. Although the duty of enforcing statute requiring the separation of white and colored passengers is imposed upon conductors of trains, a railroad company may be held liable for injury inflicted upon a passenger of one race by a member of the other who is allowed to be in the wrong compartment without the knowledge of the conductor, if a subordinate employee, upon discovering his presence there, fails, as soon as practicable and within a reasonable time, to notify the conductor of that fact. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Renfro, 33: 133, 135 S. W. 266, 142 Ky. 590.

4. A railroad whose conductor fails as soon as practicable, and within a reasonable time after discovering a white passenger in a negro compartment, to require him to leave it, is, where the statute provides a penalty for permitting passengers to occupy compartments set apart for the other race and charges the conductor with the enforcement of the law, liable in damages for the unprovoked shooting by him of a negro. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Renfro, 33: 133, 135 S. W. 266, 142 Ky. 590.

(Annotated)

5. A railroad company cannot be held liable for the killing of a negro passenger by a white person permitted to be in the negro compartment of a train, contrary to the provisions of the statute, if the shooting was done in necessary self-defense. Louis- ville & N. R. Co. v. Renfro, 33: 133, 135 S. W. 266; 142 Ky. 590.

8. The mere fact that a conductor is angered by words or conduct of a passenger does not absolve the carrier from liability for his assault upon him, if the words were not sufficient to justify the act, but, if the passenger's conduct is such as to justify the assault, the carrier is not liable; and, if it was sufficient to mitigate the conductor's act, the mitigation inures to the benefit of the carrier. Mason v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 33: 280, 70 S. E. 225, 135 Ga. 741. (Annotated)

Negligence as question for jury, see Trial, 9.

Correctness of instruction as to carrier's duty, see Trial, 15.

7. The exercise of reasonable care with respect to the condition of its decks as to their slipperiness is the measure of duty which a steamship company owes a passenger, and the court cannot be required to instruct the jury that it must exercise the greatest care. Pratt v. North German Lloyd S. S. Co. 33: 532, 184 Fed. 303, 106 C. C. A. 445. (Annotated)

8. A union depot company which relied upon train employees to direct passengers to their trains is liable for injury caused to a passenger's attendant by following the direction of such employee, which takes him into an unsafe place, where the danger is not obvious, although the one giving it was not in its immediate employ. Union Depot & R. Co. v. Londoner, 33: 433, 114 Pac. 316, — Colo. —. (Annotated)

Contributory negligence of passenger.

9. One who is accompanying live stock in shipment, and has occasion to walk at night between his train and a depot, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to be guilty of negligence if, in attempting to walk in the safe space between two tracks, he inadvertently gets close to one of them, so that he is struck by an approaching train. Losey v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 33: 414, 114 Pac. 198, — Kan. —.

10. Failure of a shipper of stock, walking between the train and station in a railroad yard, to carry a lantern, as required by his contract, will not prevent holding the carrier liable for killing him by a train running backward, without sufficient watch or signal. Losey v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 33: 414, 114 Pac. 198, — Kan. —.

11. Train men have the right to remove from the train a person who has boarded it 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

after the conductor has refused, because of his intoxicated condition, to receive him as a passenger, although he has a ticket entitling him to transportation. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Selsor, 33: 165, 134 S. W. 143, 142 Ky. 163.

12. A passenger on a street car who is entitled to transfer on payment of fare cannot make the simultaneous issuance of the transfer a condition of paying the fare, and in case he attempts to do so, and refuses to pay his fare without receiving his transfer, he may be ejected from the car, although experience has shown that, if the transfer is not issued when the fare is paid but after the conductor has finished collecting all fares in the car, he will reach his transfer point before receiving the transfer. Louisville R. Co. v. Hutti, 33: 867, 133 S. W. 200, 141 Ky. 511.

Disabled or incompetent passengers.

13. The conductor of a passenger train may refuse to receive as a passenger a person so far intoxicated as to affect his conduct. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Selsor, 33: 165, 134 S. W. 143, 142 Ky. 163.

Sufficiency of evidence to show duty to give warning of approach of train, see Evidence, 37.

Negligence as question for jury, see Trial, 9.

Correctness of instructions as to carrier's duty, see Trial, 15.

14. A railroad company is not bound to use the utmost care and foresight to prevent injuring a person standing on its platform waiting to take a train, by striking an animal on the track with an engine and throwing it against him. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Woods, 33: 855, 131 S. W. 869, — Ark. —. (Annotated)

15. A union depot company which undertakes to provide common terminal facilities for the passenger-carrying railroads entering a city owes to passengers and their attendants the duty of keeping the station and its facilities in a proper condition for their safety. Union Depot & R. Co. v. Londoner, 33: 433, 114 Pac. 316, — Colo. —.

Carriers of freight.

Measure of damages for breach of duty as to, see Damages, 3.

Passing of title on delivery to carrier, see Sale, 1.

16. A railroad company which is a common carrier of passengers and freight, and maintains within a city a freight line and spur tracks to industrial plants, cannot refuse to transport freight from one part of the system to another, on the theory that they are within its switching limits, and that, as to such limits, it does not assume the duty of a common carrier. Higdon v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 33: 442, 135 S. W. 768, 143 Ky. 73. (Annotated)

17. A railroad company cannot, by refusing to haul coal from a mine to industrial plants connected by belt lines, to spur tracks within the city, when it hauls other commodities to such points, establish the right to refuse to perform its duty as a common carrier, when such service is demanded. Higdon v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 33: 442, 135 S. W. 768, 143 Ky. 73.

18. The fact that a railroad company will receive a transportation charge on a finished product, the raw material for which it hauls from a warehouse to a mill within the limits of a city, while it will not secure such charge in case of coal hauled from a mine within the city to the mill, does not justify its refusing to haul the coal, and performing the service with respect to the raw material. Higdon v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 33: 442, 135 S. W. 768, 143 Ky. 73.

19. One who has secured the sole right to sell the product of a mine in a certain city cannot hold a railroad company liable in damages for refusing to haul coal for him, where the mine was required to fill his orders only after other contracts were cared for, and it does not appear that the railroad company's refusal caused him any loss because of inability to fill orders taken under his contract with the mine, which it was ready to fill. Higdon v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 33: 442, 135 S. W. 768, 143 Ky. 73.

20. A consignee of a machine shipped in parts cannot refuse to accept a tender by the carrier of a portion of the parts, although the others are missing, so as to prevent the liability of the carrier from changing from that of insurer to that of warehouseman. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gay, 33: 303, 135 S. W. 400, 143 Ky. 56.

Governmental control; discrimination; rates.

Equal protection and privileges in regulation of rates, see Constitutional Law, 3.

21. A carrier which, through innocent mistake, quotes a rate on merchandise which is less than that on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission, in response to a request for a rate in order to fix a selling price at destination, is not liable for the loss occasioned by the shipper's being compelled to pay the correct rate to get possession of his goods. Shenberger v. Union P. R. Co. 33: 391, 113 Pac. 433, — Kan. —.

(Annotated)

22. That a railroad company, when publishing its rates for hauling cars from one point to another within the limits of a city, was under the mistaken impression that it was not bound to do a regular freight business between such points, does not entitle it to charge more than its published rates for handling such freight, and it cannot avoid this result by insisting that the rate was only for switching service, where it had done both switching and transportation service at such rate. Higdon v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 33: 442, 135 S. W. 768, 143 Ky. 73.

2. A corporation organized to conduct a hospital as a public charity is not liable for the negligence of its servant in failing to prevent a patient, in a private room engaged for his use, under the direction of his private physician, from falling from the window, although the use of the room includes necessary care and attention by employees of the hospital. *Jensen v. Equal protection and privileges.

1. Where there is a substantial difference in the condition or situation of individuals or objects with reference to the subject embraced in a law, an appropriate limitation based on such difference, in the application of the law, does not make such legislation partial. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33: 494, 130 N. W. 545, — Minn. —.

2. The fact that a prohibition of the use of soft coal in locomotives does not apply to stationary engines does not make such prohibition partial legislation; there being obvious differences between the two classes of engines in respect to the tendency that burning soft coal has to cause a smoke nuisance, and other appropriate legislation having been enacted by the city to prevent the emission of dense smoke by stationary plants. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33: 494, 130 N. W. 545, — Minn. —.

3. A railroad company is denied the qual protection of the laws by a state statute requiring it to transport militiamen when in the performance of military duty, at less than the reasonable rate of transportation which has been fixed by the state officials. Re Gardner, 33: 956, 113 Pac. 1054, — Kan. —. (Annotated)

4. An exemption from a collateral inheritance tax when the estate is less than a certain value is not an unconstitutional discrimination, which will invalidate the tax. Godman v. Com. ex rel. Selligman, 33: 592, 13 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88.

5. No unequal grant of privileges or immunities, contrary to the Constitution, is effected by a statute requiring contracts to make compensation for procuring a purchaser for real estate to be in writing. Selva v. Talbott, 33: 973, 95 N. E. 114, — Ind. —.

6. A state statute requiring contracts to make compensation for procuring purchasers for real estate to be in writing is not forbidden by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, since that Amendment was not intended to interfere with the police power of the states. Selva v. Talbott, 33: 973, 95 N. E. 114, — Ind. —.

7. A municipal ordinance is not invalid as unconstitutionally granting special privileges which allows the municipality to grant special permission to licensed hack drivers who can procure the consent of the butting property owners, to stand their vehicles in the street in front of such property, when the same privilege is not granted to those who do not obtain such consent. McFall v. St. Louis, 33: 471, 135 W. 51, 232 Mo. 716. (Annotated)

8. Making railroad companies liable for injury to employees through the negligence of fellow servants, and forbidding the avoidance of such liability by a relief or indemnity contract with the employee, does not deprive such companies of the equal protection of the laws. McGuire v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 33: 706, 108 N. W. 902, 131 Iowa, 340.

due process; right to life, liberty, and property.

9. The interest of those who will take under a will or deed upon failure of a donee of a power of appointment therein to exercise it is not so far vested that the imposition of a succession tax upon the passing of them of the estate, in case of such failure, can be considered as a taking of property without due process of law. Minot v. Stevens, 33: 236, 93 N. E. 973, 207 Mass. 38. (Annotated)

10. The constitutional right of acquiring and protecting property does not include the mere privilege, right, or expectancy of inheritance, so as to prevent the legislature from placing a tax upon such privilege. Godman v. Com. ex rel. Selligman, 33: 592, 13 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88. (Annotated)

11. Forbidding railroad companies which have been rendered liable for injuries to employees by the negligence of fellow servants, to avoid such liability by relief or indemnity contracts with their employees, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.)

is not an unconstitutional interference with their liberty of contract. McGuire v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 33: 706, 108 N. W. 902, 131 Iowa, 340.

12. The hearing required by the constitutional provision for due process of law is not afforded by a municipality to which is delegated power to assess the cost of public improvements on property benefited thereby, where the body charged with the duty of conducting the hearing receives written protests and hears oral arguments, but refuses to take testimony, on the theory that it has no power to afford relief. Denver v. State Invest. Co. 33: 395, 112 Pac. 789, — Colo. —.

13. A legislative attempt to confer upon the court the power in a criminal case to appoint experts in case they are needed, and acquaint the jury with the fact, who shall prepare themselves and give testimony in the case, is invalid, as tending to deprive the accused of due process of law. People v. Dickerson, 33: 917, 129 N. W. 199, 164 Mich. 148. (Annotated)

Police power.

See also supra, 6.

14. The emission of dense smoke by yard and switch engines, being caused by the use of soft coal therein, a prohibition of such use within a populous city is substantially related to, and directly tends to, the prevention of a nuisance,—the emission of dense smoke,—and is an exercise of the police power of the state, within constitutional limits. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33: 494, 130 N. W. 545, — Minn. —.

15. The police power extends to requiring contracts to compensate one for procuring a purchaser for real estate to be in writing. Selva v. Talbott, 33: 973, 95 N. E. 114, — Ind. —. (Annotated)

16. A statute requiring a license as a condition to treating the sick has sufficient relation to the protection of the public health to be within the public power of the legislature, which cannot be controlled by the courts, and is not so unreasonable or capricious that it can be declared not to be an honest exercise of such power, although it may interfere with the right of the patient to choose his own method of treatment, and of the practitioner to pursue a calling of his choice. State v. Smith, 33: 179, 135 S. W. 465, — Mo. —.

17. The police power of the state extends to forbidding railroad companies which have been made liable for injury to employees through the negligence of fellow servants, from contracting with them for a relief or indemnity plan which will relieve the railroad company from a portion of the burden cast upon it by the statute. *McGuire v. 8. The invalidity in a contract for the transfer and pooling of corporate stock in consideration of a loan of money to finance the institution, of a provision which retains the owner in the board of directors and gives him employment as the sales agent of the corporation, does not necessarily invalidate the pooling agreement. Winsor v. Commonwealth Coal Co. 33: 63, 114 Pac. 908, — Wash. —.

9. An agreement by which an uncle undertakes to pay the premiums on policies of insurance to be taken out by his nephew in his own name, and assigned to the uncle with the privilege of redeeming one of them, but the uncle to have one policy absolutely, and in case the nephew does not pay the premiums to have the proceeds of both upon the nephew's death, is void, and the uncle cannot compel the nephew's administrator to account for the proceeds of the policy after he has collected them. McRae v. Warmack, 33:949, 135 S. W. 807, — Ark. —.

(Annotated)

10. A contract by one injured by another's negligence, to pay his physician a percentage of the amount recovered against the one responsible for the injury, for his services in treating the injury, is against public policy and void where the parties contemplate that the physician shall be a witness for his employer in case suit is necessary. Sherman v. Burton, 33: 87, 130 N. W. 667, — Mich. —.

(Annotated)

11. An agreement by a woman to pay her attorney a percentage of the alimony recovered in a suit for divorce against her husband is void as against public policy. McConnell v. McConnell, 33: 1074, 136 S. W. 931, — Ark. —.

(Annotated)

12. Where one who had been engaged in publishing a newspaper in a certain county sold the property connected therewith and the business and good will to another, and agreed not to conduct, either directly or indirectly, any other newspaper in that county without the consent of the other party, his heirs and assigns, such a contract was not void, as being in general restraint of trade, or unreasonable in its terms. McAuliffe v. Vaughan, 33: 255, 70 S. E. 322, 135 Ga. 852.

Performance; breach.

13. One who engages accommodations at a hotel for a party, promising that they will occupy and utilize them, is personally liable for the contract price in case the party upon arriving refuses to accept the accommodations and goes elsewhere. Danenhower v. Hayes, 33: 698, 35 App. D. C. 65.

(Annotated)

14. Where a building contractor, acting as owner, sublets a portion of the work, with the provision that the work is to be done to the satisfaction of its architects, upon whose certificate payments are to be made, recovery may be had in the absence of certificate upon proof that the certificate was not withheld in good faith. Thaler v. Wilhelm Greisser Constr. Co. 33: 345, 79 Atl. 147, 229 Pa. 512.

15. Merely paying monthly accounts for laborers furnished under a contract to furnish a certain number of hands per day does not waive a claim for damages for a shortage, where the full number of hands was at all times demanded. State v. Arkansas Brick & Mfg. Co. 33: 376, 135 S. W. 843, — Ark. —.

16. Mere failure to pay the instalments for the purchase price of a newspaper plant on the exact days when they are due under the contract will not, in case the seller receives them afterwards, permit him to claim such a breach on the part of the buyer as to authorize him to disregard his agreement in the contract not to conduct another paper in that county. McAuliffe v. Vaughan, 33: 255, 70 S. E. 322, 135 Ga. 852.

Change or extinguishment.

17. Where the parties to an overdue note enter into a written agreement, founded upon a sufficient consideration, by the terms of which a part of the debt is forgiven and the time for paying the reduced amount is extended, a provision therein that a default in the payment of interest shall mature the new principal implies that the debtor is not to forfeit the benefit of the reduction by a failure to meet promptly the terms of the readjustment. *Girard Trust Co. v. 1. A stockholder of an insolvent corporation cannot complain that suit to enforce his unpaid stock subscriptions was not brought in a court where he could bring in other stockholders and compel contribution by them if they were insolvent so that they could not have been made to contribute even if they were brought into the proceeding. Edwards v. Schillinger, 33: 895, 91 N. E. 1048, 245 Ill. 231.

2. No call for unpaid subscriptions need be made by the corporation or the bankruptcy court, to enable a trustee in bankruptcy to maintain a suit against stockholders for unpaid subscriptions which are necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors.

Edwards v. Schillinger, 33: 895, 91 N. E. 1048, 245 Ill. 231.

Pooling stock.

Partial invalidity of pooling agreement, see Contracts, 8.

3. A contract by which the owner of the majority of the stock of a corporation agrees with one to whom he transfers a portion of his stock in consideration of a loan of money to finance the corporation, that the stock might be pooled for a term of years in order to control the management, is not against public policy. Winsor v. 4. That a railroad company is the creature of another state, and is engaged in interstate commerce, does not make inapplicable to it a statute of a state in which it is doing business forbidding such companies to make contracts with their employees for the establishment of a relief or indemnity plan which shall relieve them from a portion of the liability imposed upon them by law for injuries to employees. McGuire v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 33: 706, 108 N. W. 902, 131 Iowa, 340.

5. One seeking damages for personal injuries from a domestic railroad company, which denies liability on the ground that it had conveyed its property to a foreign corporation, may question the right of the latter to take the title, for the purpose of showing that defendant had not relieved itself from responsibility for the operation of the road. Plummer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 33: 362, 136 S. W. 162, 143 Ky. 102.

6. A state has power to require foreign railroad companies to become domesticated as a condition to acquiring and operating railroads within the state. Plummer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 33: 362, 136 S. W. 162, 143 Ky. 102.

7. A foreign railroad company wishing to purchase a railroad line within the state must comply with the statute applicable to such corporations which wish to purchase and hold lands for depot, tracks, and other purposes, and compliance with the statute applicable to those wishing to possess, control, maintain, or operate a railway within the state is not sufficient. Plummer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 33: 362, 136 S. W. 162, 143 Ky. 102.

8. A constitutional provision that no foreign railroad company shall have power to acquire a right of way or real estate for a depot or other uses, until it shall have become a domestic corporation, applies to the purchase of existing lines as well as to 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the construction of new ones. Plummer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 33: 362, 136 S. W. 162, 143 Ky. 102.

9. Title to real estate taken by a foreign corporation without complying with the provisions of the local statute necessary to entitle it to do business in the state is subject to an unrecorded mortgage lien for unpaid purchase money in favor of a prior vendor, where the statute provides that every contract in relation to real estate made by a corporation under such circumstances shall be wholly void. Hanna v. Halsey Realty Co. 33: 355, 129 N. W. 1080, 145 Wis. 276. (Annotated.)

Jurisdiction; territorial limitations.

1. A receiver cannot confer upon the court jurisdiction of members of a mutual insurance company who are nonresidents of the county, by joining them in a single equity suit to compel payment of assessments which were overdue at the time of his appointment, where no facts exist to give equity jurisdiction of the action, the liabilities of the respective members upon their assessments being several, and not joint. Burke v. Scheer, 33: 1057, 130 N. W. 962, — Neb. —.

2. A nonresident may be prosecuted in a police court of a city, the jurisdiction of which is limited to offenses occurring within its limits, for permitting his cow to be at large within the city, contrary to a municipal ordinance, although he was not personally within the city at the time, if process is subsequently served upon him within the jurisdiction. Tutt v. Greenville, 33: 331, 134 S. W. 890, 142 Ky. 536. (Annotated.)

3. Holders of unpaid stock in a foreign corporation cannot defeat an action by its trustee in bankruptcy to set aside a fraudulent dividend applied in satisfaction of such subscriptions, and compel their payment, on the theory that it is an attempt to regulate the internal affairs of such corporation, which is not a party to the proceeding, where all solvent stockholders are parties, since the corporation and creditors are represented by the trustee, and all necessary parties are therefore before the court. Edwards v. Schillinger, 33: 895, 91 N. E. 1048, 245 Ill. 231. (Annotated)

Relation to other departments of government.

5. Courts are bound by the expressions of public policy found in constitutional statutes. McGuire v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 33: 706, 108 N. W. 902, 131 Iowa, 340.

6. Ordinarily the courts will not substitute their opinions for the judgment of the legislature as to the reasonableness of an act fixing the rate of speed at which motor vehicles may be lawfully driven. Schultz v. State, 33: 403, 130 N. W. 972, — Neb. —.

Probate courts.

7. A probate court may dissolve a partnership one member of which has died, notwithstanding a clause in his will providing that the business shall be continued by his executors, where the surviving partner is abusing his trust, misappropriating the funds, and a disagreement has arisen between him and the executors. Parnell v. Thompson, 33: 658, 105 Pac. 502, 81 Kan. 119.

What law governs as to length of imprisonment, see infra, 3.

1. One cannot be punished for selling intoxicating liquor at a time when the prohibitory law is, by decision of the highest court of the state, unconstitutional, although that court subsequently changes its opinion and holds the law to be valid. State v. O'Neil, 33: 788, 126 N. W. 454, 147 Iowa, 513. (Annotated)

Pleadings; motions; demurrer.

2. The question whether an information states facts sufficient to constitute an offense, is duplicitous, or is defective in the description of the offense, cannot be raised by motion to set aside, but only by demurrer. Childs v. State, 33: 563, 113 Pac. 545, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 474.

Sentence and punishment.

3. The right to require a convict whose sentence was illegally suspended by the court, to serve his full term of imprisonment, is not affected by the fact that, since suspension took effect, the legislature shortened the term for which persons convicted of the offense involved could be imprisoned, to a period less than that imposed by the original sentence. State v. Abbott, 33: 112, 70 S. E. 6, — S. C. —.

4. There is no power to make the serving of sentence for crime depend upon the subsequent conduct of the convict. Re Peterson, 33: 1067, 113 Pac. 729, — Idaho, —.

5. Where, upon a plea of guilty, accused is sentenced to a term of imprisonment and payment of a fine, or alternative imprisonment for a further term in case of its nonpayment, with a proviso that in case it is paid, the sentence of imprisonment shall be suspended until further order, if the fine is paid and the accused released without bail, the court has no power to compel him afterwards to serve out his term. Re Peterson, 33: 1067, 113 Pac. 729, — Idaho, —.

6. A court has no power to suspend a sentence of imprisonment during the good behavior of the convict. State v. Abbott, 33: 112, 70 S. E. 6, — S. C. —.

(Annotated)

7. The invalidity of an attempt by a court to suspend a sentence of imprisonment during good behavior of the convict does not affect the validity of the sentence, and it may be enforced even though the time covered by the sentence has expired. State v. Abbott, 33: 112, 70 S. E. 6, — S. C. —.

Sales of personalty.

2. That plaintiff in an action for damages for breach of warranty of a machine purchased for resale alleges loss of a sale does not confine his right to recover to the question of his diligence with respect to such sale, if he also alleges that the machine was wholly unsalable, useless, and without value. Loxterkamp v. Lininger Implement Co. 33: 501, 125 N. W. 830, 147 Iowa, 29.

In respect to freight.

3. One who contracts with a mine for a certain quantity of coal to fill orders already taken, and takes others in reliance thereon, and is prevented from filling his contract because of the refusal of a railroad company to haul the coal at its published rates, may hold it liable for the difference in cost of filling the orders under the conditions created by the refusal of the railroad to haul the coal, and what it would have cost him to fill them had the railroad company performed its duty, to the amount which the mine would have been able to furnish in compliance with his contract. Higdon v. Co. v. Londoner, 33: 433, 114 Pac. 316, — Colo. —.

Injury to water rights; pollution.

Nominal damages, see supra, 1.

7. The measure of damages for rendering land unfit or less valuable for pasture or other purposes for which it is adapted by turning chemicals into a stream running through it is the diminution of the market value of the property, if the injury is permanent, or the diminution of the rental value, if the injury is temporary. Hodges v. Pine Product Co. 33: 74, 68 S. E. 1107, 135 Ga. 134.

Mental anguish.

8. One who decoys a woman from home in the night on a fictitious errand of mercy, attempts to take undue liberties with her, slanders her and subjects her to humiliating gossip of the neighborhood, may be liable to answer in damages not only for the assault, but to compensate her for the mental suffering, humiliation, and disgrace caused by his act. Kurpgewelt v. Kirby, 33: 98, 129 N. W. 177, 88 Neb. 72. (Annotated: 1

9. A carrier is answerable in damages for mental suffering inflicted upon a passenger by insulting language addressed to him by the conductor without provocation, which is of a character calculated to humiliate, mortify, and disgrace him. *Bleecker v. EMINENT DOMAIN.

1. The right of the Federal government to exercise the power of eminent domain to secure land within a state for the irrigation of public land which it owns there is not affected in a particular case by the fact that it intends to supply water from its plant for the irrigation of land which has passed into private ownership, at least where, under the laws of the state, such private owners might have secured property necessary for the irrigation of their lands by right of eminent domain. Burley v. United States, 33: 807, 179 Fed. 1, 102 C. C. A. 429. (Annotated)

Necessity of making compensation.

2. A statute requiring the employment of one to secure a purchaser of real estate to be in writing is not in conflict with a constitutional provision that no person's property or particular services shall be taken without just compensation. Selvage v. Talbott, 33: 973, 95 N. E. 114, — Ind. —.

EQUITY.

Jurisdictional limitations of, see Courts, 1.

Jurisdiction and practice in particular cases, see Injunction; Set-off and Counterclaim.

As to trust, see Trusts.

1. Equity has jurisdiction of a suit by the payee of a note against a bank, and its cashier, who had lent the payee's money on the note before a specified indorsement had been secured, contrary to instructions, and the maker and designated surety, who had promised in writing to sign the note, to adjust the rights of the parties and affix the liability for the amount due. Petty v. Gacking, 33: 175, 133 S. W. 832, — Ark. —.

To protect remaindermen.

2. Equity has jurisdiction of a proceeding to hold the estate of a life tenant answerable for the sum necessary to make the repairs which he should have made upon the property. Prescott v. Grimes, 33: 669, 138 S. W. 206, 143 Ky. 191.

To avoid multiplicity of suits.

3. The receiver of an insolvent hail insurance company whose charter makes its members liable for the losses and expenses of the company, each to the extent of his obligation, cannot maintain a single equity suit against all, to compel them to pay assessments which had been levied against them, either by the directors or the receiver; at least, where the statute provides for an action at law against each member who neglects to pay his obligations. Burke v. Scheer, 33: 1057, 130 N. W. 962, — Neb. —.

(Annotated)

Equity principles.

4. Equity will not enforce a lien for purchase money reserved on land in a deed of general warranty, when a part of the land had been before sold by the grantor to other persons whose right is superior to that of the grantee, without abatement from the purchase money of the value of the land so lost to the grantee. Smith v. Ward, 33: 1030, 66 S. E. 234, 66 W. Va. 190.

ESTOPPEL.By contracts or agreements generally; ratification.

1. One who, in sending an answer to an advertised offer of a prize for a correct solution of a problem, agrees to abide by the decision of the judges, does not thereby estop himself from contesting their rejection of his solution on a ground not made a condition of the contest in the advertisement. Minton v. F. G. Smith Piano Co. 33: 305, 36 App. D. C. 137. (Annotated)

2. One who sells a newspaper plant by contract under seal, in his own name, cannot avoid his agreement not to conduct another paper in the same county, upon the ground that the property in fact belonged to his wife, and that he had no pecuniary interest in it. McAuliffe v. Vaughan, 33: 255, 70 S. E. 322, 135 Ga. 852.

By conduct, request, or admissions generally.

3. A memorandum made by the holder of a note at the time of receiving a partial payment thereon, "Indorsement on principal," followed by the amount received, does not estop him from afterwards applying enough of the payment to discharge the interest then due, since he has the option to apply the payment as far as necessary in satisfaction of interest due. Dollar Sav. & T. Co. v. Crawford, 33: 587, 70 S. E. 1089, — W. Va. —.

By laches, silence, or acquiescence.

4. Where a testator bequeathed property to three members of his lodge upon the promise of one, made in the presence of the others, that they would transfer it to the lodge, equity may compel them to effect the transfer. Winder v. Scholey, 33: 995, 93 N. E. 1098, 83 Ohio St. 204.

5. Failure of remaindermen to insist that the life tenant make the necessary repairs upon the property does not estop them from holding his estate answerable for the cost of those he should have made. Prescott v. Grimes, 33: 669, 136 S. W. 206; 143 Ky. 191.

By negligence or fraud.

6. Failure of the holder of an unrecorded purchase money mortgage on real estate to give notice thereof does not estop him from setting it up to defeat the title of a foreign corporation which purchased the property without complying with the provisions of the local statute necessary to enable it to do business in the state, under which circumstances the statute provides that its contract shall be wholly void. Hanna v. Kelsey Realty Co. 33: 355, 129 N. W. 1080, 145 Wis. 276.

Judicial notice.

1. The court takes judicial notice of the dates of general elections provided for by general statutes of the state. Diener v. Star-Chronicle Pub. Co. 33: 216, 132 S. W. 1143, 230 Mo. 613.

Presumptions and burden of proof.

Presumptions on appeal, see Appeal and Error, 9.

Complaining for first time on appeal of failure to prove presentment and notice in action against indorser, see Appeal and Error, 11.

2. The court cannot assume as matter of law, on a trial of one accused of killing an officer who was attempting to arrest him, that the arrest had the effect of exciting in his mind a sudden heat of passion such as to make the desire to kill irresistible, and thereby reduce the offense to manslaughter. State v. Meyers, 33: 143, 110 Pac. 407, — Or. —.

3. The maxim Res ipsa loquitur will not apply to establish on the part of a street car company liability for injury to a passer-by by a missile thrown from under a car, where both the act which caused the injury and the negligence of the street car company in relation thereto would have to be inferred from the accident. De Gloppe v. Nashville R. & Light Co. 33: 913, 134 S. W. 609, — Tenn. —.

4. The presumption of fact in favor 33 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of the master having performed his duty to furnish servants a reasonably safe working place, instrumentalities, and fellow servants, is overcome by evidence establishing the contrary to a reasonable certainty. Knudsen v. La Crosse Stone Co. 33: 223, 130 N. W. 519, 145 Wis. 394.

5. The bursting of a tank in which one has artificially stored water upon his property, and the escape of the water to the injury of neighboring property, raises a presumption of negligence. Weaver Mercantile Co. v. Thurmond, 33: 1061, 70 S. E. 126, 68 W. Va. 530.

5a. In an action against a municipality for personal injuries, there is no presumption that either plaintiff or defendant was guilty of negligence. Oklahoma City v. Reed, 33: 1083, 87 Pac. 645, 17 Okla. 518.

5b. In an action against a city for injury by an alleged defect in a highway, the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant. Oklahoma City v. Reed, 33: 1083, 87 Pac. 645, 17 Okla. 518.

6. A waiver of presentment and notice will not be inferred from doubtful acts or language on the part of the indorser of a promissory note, where he is entitled thereto by statute. Worley v. Johnson, 33: 635, 53 So. 543, — Fla. —.

7. The ordinary presumption is that a witness who uses the expression "I think" means that his observation was indistinct, or his recollection uncertain, regarding the matter testified to, rather than that he is without personal information on the subject. Losey v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 33: 414, 114 Pac. 198, — Kan. —.

Best and secondary.

8. A purported transcript from the record of a lower court in another state, certified by a person signing himself clerk of the court, but without seal, and not certified, as required by acts of Congress, is not admissible in evidence. Mason v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 33: 280, 70 S. E. 225, 135 Ga. 741.

9. A purported transcript of the record of the lower court of another state, not certified as required by statute, is not rendered admissible in evidence by testimony of the one who presided in such court, that he had fined defendant in that proceeding, and did not recollect the amount of the fine, but that the amount will be shown by the attached paper, certified by the clerk. Mason v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 33: 280, 70 S. E. 225, 135 Ga. 741.

10. Record copies of reports by trainmen as to the time of passing of trains are not admissible in evidence upon the question of liability for setting out fire, where the reports are in existence, and not produced, and there is nothing to show that the testimony of those operating the train could not have been produced. Cathey v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 33: 103, 133 S. W. 417, — Tex. —.

11. One party cannot make a paper otherwise incompetent as evidence competent in his favor against his adversary, by calling for it and inspecting it on its being produced on his call. Boyle v. Boston Elevated R. Co. 33: 552, 94 N. E. 247, 208 Mass. 41. (Annotated)

12. Letters announcing shipments of money to a bank are not competent evidence to establish the fact of actual shipment, for the purpose of establishing its embezzlement by an officer of the bank who has since absconded. Title Guaranty & S. Co. v. Bank of Fulton, 33: 676, 117 S. W. 537, 89 Ark. 471.

Parol.

See also infra, 23.

13. Parol evidence is admissible to show that a writing purporting to fix compensation for collecting a debt was in fact made to aid the collection of the debt by concealing the creditor's interest in the recovery, and that the collector was attempting to use the instrument for the dishonest purpose of retaining an amount in excess of the compensation to which he was entitled. Lepley v. Andersen, 33: 836, 125 N. W. 433, 142 Wis. 668.

14. In case a settlement with one of several joint tort feorsors is in writing, oral evidence is competent to show the intention of the parties thereto in an action against one not a party to the settlement. Fitzgerald v. Union Stock Yards Co. 33: 983, 131 N. W. 612, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

15. Parol evidence is admissible to show that a promissory note which was signed and delivered was not to take effect until the payee had secured a loan for the maker. Smith v. Dotterweich, 33: 892, 93 N. E. 985, 200 N. Y. 299.

16. Where an apparently absolute legacy was made in favor of several persons, upon the promise of one that they would hold it in trust for others, the fact that the promise was made on behalf of all may be established by parol evidence, and subsequent declarations of either of the legatees are admissible against all. Winder v. Scholey, 33: 995, 93 N. E. 1098, 83 Ohio St. 204.

26. The statutory rule that no party shall testify in his own behalf in respect to any transaction had personally with a person since deceased, where the adverse party is the heir at law, next of kin, or assignee of such deceased person, does not apply where the adverse party claims as the beneficiary of a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association to such decedent, because the beneficiary named in the certificate is not the assignee of the member to whom it was issued, and the circumstance that he is in fact his heir or next of kin is not material where his claim is not founded on that relationship. Savage v. Modern Woodmen of America, 33: 773, 113 Pac. 802, — Kan. —.

27. Upon trial of a man for incest who left home after the charge was made, evidence is not admissible of a conversation between his wife and her brother, in his absence, in which, because of an assumed separation, she was advised to return to her father. Gross v. State, 33: 477, 135 S. W. 373, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —.

28. In a prosecution for having in possession intoxicating liquor with intent to sell same, proof that the defendant kept large quantities of liquor concealed on his premises is competent as a circumstance tending to show the intent to sell. Childs v. State, 33: 563, 113 Pac. 545, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 474.

29. One on trial for perjury alleged to have been committed in a civil action, the parties to which are witnesses against him, may show the status of such action for the purpose of showing that such parties would profit by his conviction, because the action is still pending and his conviction would render him incompetent to testify in it. State v. Eaid, 33: 946, 104 Pac. 275, 55 Wash. 302.

30. Evidence of observations as to the washing of decks in respect to leaving them in a slippery condition, which one injured by falling upon a steamer deck had made on other voyages, is not admissible upon the question of negligence in respect to the one on which she fell. Pratt v. North German Lloyd S. S. Co. 33: 532, 184 Fed. 303, 106 C. C. A. 445.

31. Upon the question of the liability of a railroad company for an assault upon a colored passenger, because of the conductor's failure to obey the statutory requirement to remove a white man from the colored compartment of a train, evidence is not admissible of his failure to remove other white persons therefrom, of his failure to station a guard to prevent white passengers from entering the compartment, or of the manner in which white passengers were behaving in their own compartment. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Renfro, 33: 133, 135 S. W. 266, 142 Ky. 592.

32. Upon trial of a prosecution for incest in which the state relies upon a single act, evidence is not admissible of conduct at subsequent times tending to show a criminal intent. Gross v. State, 33: 477, 135 S. W. 373, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —.

33. In a prosecution for having in possession intoxicating liquor with intent to sell same, and to convey same from one place within the state to another place therein, evidence that previously a justice of the peace had caused the liquor to be seized under a search warrant, and, on the defendant's motion, has subsequently quashed the warrant and ordered the liquor redelivered to the defendant, is not competent or admissible in the defendant's behalf. Childs v. State, 33: 563, 113 Pac. 545, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 474.

34. An architect's certificate for work may be found not to have been withheld in good faith, where the work was accepted and used for several years without objection, until an attempt was made to enforce a mechanics' lien upon the property to secure compensation for it. Thaler v. Wilhelm Greisser Constr. Co. 33: 345, 79 Atl. 147, 229 Pa. 512.

35. To establish fraud which will permit the controlling of a written contract by a contemporaneous parol agreement, the evidence must be clear and satisfactory. Lepley v. Andersen, 33: 836, 125 N. W. 433, 142 Wis. 668. (Annotated.)

36. The incompetence of a servant which will render a master liable for injury caused to a fellow servant by his negligence may be established by evidence of reputation, although the alleged incompetence did not arise until after his lawful employment. Rosenstiel v. Pittsburg Railways Co. 33: 751, 79 Atl. 556, — Pa. —. (Annotated.)

37. Evidence that, at a railroad station where cattle in shipment were frequently detained at night, it was customary for persons accompanying live stock in transit to walk back and forth over the yards between their cars and the depot, is sufficient to justify a finding that the company owed a duty to such persons so engaged to give warning of the approach of a train. Lacey v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 33: 414, 114 Pac. 198, — Kan. —.

38. The mere fact that the attempt to move a heavily loaded street car stalled on a steep grade caused the wheels to revolve rapidly without imparting motion to the car, but throwing a missile against a passer-by, to his injury, does not establish negligence on the part of the street car company which will render it liable for the injury. De Gloppe v. Nashville R. & Light Co. 33: 913, 134 S. W. 609, — Tenn. —.

39. Intention to claim adversely up to a division fence, which will give title by adverse possession, may be found from the fact that the claimant and his grantors had been in possession, claiming title up to the fence for more than fifteen years, and that the owner of the neighboring property made no claim beyond the fence for all that time. Edwards v. Fleming, 33: 923, 112 Pac. 836, 83 Kan. 653.

1. The word "gaming" has no technical meaning, but includes every contrivance or institution which has for its object any sport, recreation, or amusement for the public upon which money or any other article of value can be won or lost by the result of such contrivance or institution, and includes bets or wagers made upon any physical contest, whether of man or beast, when practised for the purpose of deciding such bets or wagers. James v. State, 33: 827, 113 Pac. 226, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —.

2. One who opens or conducts a house, room, or place where the public are invited to assemble and by means of any plan, device, or scheme bet or lay wagers upon the result of horse racing, is punishable under a statute providing punishment for every person who deals, carries on, opens, and conducts any game or any device for money, checks, credit, or any representative of value. James v. State, 33: 827, 113 Pac. 226, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —. (Annotated)

3. The keeping of a common gaming house is a misdemeanor at common law and consequently a violation of the law of this state. State v. Baker 33: 549, 71 S. E. 186, — W. Va. —.

4. That only those who gamble are admitted to the room where the gambling is carried on, and the rest of the public are excluded therefrom, does not affect the crime. State v. Baker, 33: 549, 71 S. E. 186, — W. Va. —. (Annotated)

1. An information which charges a defendant with having in possession intoxicating liquor with the intent to sell same, and with the intent to convey same from one place within the state to another place therein, does not charge two offenses. Childs v. State, 33: 563, 113 Pac. 545, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 474.

2. The state need not be required to elect on which charge it will rely under an indictment for perjury charging false testimony that accused did not know of the execution of a contract, and that a named person claimed to be the owner of a specified piece of machinery. State v. Eaid, 33: 946, 104 Pac. 275, 55 Wash. 302.

Description of offense.

3. An indictment for practising medicine without a license need not state that accused was not within the classes not included in the law, where these classes were merely persons rendering gratuitous services and surgeons in the service of the Federal government, since the exception is not descriptive of the offense. State v. Smith, 33: 179, 135 S. W. 465, — Mo. —. 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

4. An indictment for perjury is sufficient which sets forth the substance of the controversy in which the crime was committed, in what court the oath alleged to be false was taken, and that such court had authority to administer the oath, with proper allegations of the falsity of the matter on which the perjury is assigned. State v. Eaid, 33: 946, 104 Pac. 275, 55 Wash. 302.

Sufficiency to support conviction.

5. A common-law indictment for perjury is sufficient to support a conviction for the statutory crime, where the common law and statutory crimes are substantially the same. State v. Eaid, 33: 946, 104 Pac. 275, 55 Wash. 302. (Annotated)

If the county attorney is disqualified from representing the state in the prosecution of a party charged with crime, said county attorney is without authority to appoint a special attorney to represent him before the grand jury in the investigation of said cause, and an indictment found as the result of such investigation upon motion of the defendant should be set aside. Hartgraves v. State, 33: 568, 114 Pac. 343, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —. (Annotated)

7. No person has a right to be in the grand jury room during any of their proceedings while investigating a criminal charge, except the witness then being examined and the attorney authorized by law to represent the state in such examinations; and, if any other person is in the grand jury room during any part of their investigations, an indictment found by them as the result of such investigation should, upon motion of the defendant, be set aside. Hartgraves v. State, 33: 568, 114 Pac. 343, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —.

8. Where a counsel privately employed to prosecute a case appears before a grand jury and assumes to represent the state upon the investigation of a case then pending before said grand jury, an indictment found by said grand jury as the result of such investigation should, upon motion of the defendant, be set aside. Hartgraves v. State, 33: 568, 114 Pac. 343, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —.

1. A surviving father cannot be deprived of the custody of a minor child by the mere fact that in giving the child to another it would be surrounded by greater material comforts than if given to the parent, where a statute provides that the surviving parent who is competent to transact his own business, and not otherwise unsuitable, is entitled to the guardianship of his minor children, and it affirmatively appears that the father is competent to transact his own business and that he is not otherwise unsuitable. Re Crocheron, 33: 868, 101 Pac. 741, 16 Idaho, 441.

(Annotated)

2. Proof that a father some four years previous did drink some and at times become a "little hilarious," and has at times failed or is unable to pay his debts, is not sufficient to deprive him of the guardianship of his minor children, under a statute providing that the surviving parent who is competent to transact his own business and not otherwise unsuitable is entitled to the guardianship of his minor children, especially where it appears that the father is neither indigent nor immoral and is capable of properly providing for and educating his children. Re Crocheron, 33: 868, 101 Pac. 741, 16 Idaho, 441.

3. Equity has power to restrain a party within its jurisdiction from prosecuting a suit in the courts of another state, and in a proper case will not hesitate to exercise the power. Mason v. Harlow, 33: 234, 114 Pac. 218, — Kan. —.

4. Courts will not enjoin a suit in another state merely on the ground of convenience of parties, but will do so when such restraint is necessary to prevent one citizen from doing an inequitable thing, as where the action has been brought maliciously, in order to vex and harass another citizen, or to interfere with or prevent the free administration of justice in a suit pending 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

in their own state. Mason v. Harlow, 33: 234, 114 Pac. 218, — Kan. —.

5. Equity will enjoin the prosecution by a resident of the state, of an action against an attorney, also resident there, in the courts of another state, for an alleged libel in a letter of instructions sent to an attorney in the latter state after the taking of depositions for use in a pending suit, which action is not brought in good faith, but to prevent defendant from properly discharging his duties to his client in the cause in which the depositions were taken. Mason v. Harlow, 33: 234, 114 Pac. 218, — Kan. —.

Against officers generally.

6. Attempted enforcement of contractual regulations of public service, by criminal proceedings under an ordinance of a city not authorized by legislative enactment to adopt such means of enforcement, may be enjoined. Bluefield Waterworks & I. Co. v. Bluefield, 33: 759, 70 S. E. 772, — W. Va. —.

Construction of policy generally.

3. A policy written by a state agent upon a brick building "and its additions adjoining and communicating," after notice from the owner that he wanted the policy to cover not only the brick building, but a wooden one which had been moved back to make way for it, and, although separated from it by a few feet, was connected by passageway and used with it, will cover the wooden structure. Shepard v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 33: 156, 130 N. W. 626, — Mich. —
(Annotated)

Assignment of policy.

Contract as against public policy, see Contracts, 9.

4. One who has paid the premiums of an insurance policy upon another's life, under an agreement for an assignment of the policy, may, in case the assignment is annulled as contrary to public policy, recover the premiums paid. McRae v. Warmack, 33: 949, 135 S. W. 807, — Ark. —
Change of beneficiary.

Contract to maintain policy; right of beneficiary to enforce, see Parties, 2.

5. The rights of a beneficiary named in a certificate of insurance in no wise depend upon the possession thereof by the beneficiary. Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. Ferrell, 33: 777, 112 Pac. 155, 83 Kan. 491.

6. Where, in the part performance of an antenuptial contract, a husband procures a change in a certificate of insurance in which his children were the sole beneficiaries, so as to make his wife an equal beneficiary with the children, and where she has fully executed the antenuptial contract on her part, she thereby obtains an equitable interest in the certificate, and he cannot thereafter, without her consent, surrender the certificate and obtain the issuance of a new one in which a third party is named as the sole beneficiary, and thus divest her of her interest in the certificate, which was procured pursuant to such contract. Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. Ferrell, 33: 777, 112 Pac. 155, 83 Kan. 491.

7. Where a husband agrees that, if his wife will help to pay the assessments upon a certificate in a mutual benefit association in her favor, he will not change the beneficiary, and in consequence of such agreement she makes a part of the payments thereon, using for the purpose what are in fact the proceeds of her own labor outside of her ordinary household duties, she cannot be displaced as such beneficiary without her consent, notwithstanding she commingles her earnings with those of her husband as soon as received, keeping no separate account thereof, and then takes the money for the assessments from the common fund. Savage v. Modern Woodmen of America, 33: 773, 113 Pac. 802, — Kan. —

8. Where the designation of the beneficiary in a certificate issued by a mutual benefit association is made in pursuance of an agreement founded upon a sufficient consideration, the person so designated acquires a vested interest, and unless by reason of countervailing equities cannot be displaced, although the rules of the order permit the member to change the beneficiary at will. Savage v. Modern Woodmen of America, 33: 773, 113 Pac. 802, — Kan. —

INTEREST.

1. Under a contract to pay on the 15th of each month for services and supplies furnished during the previous month, interest runs upon each month's items from the time payments for them become payable, and not merely from the time the last item is entered in the account, although the entire transaction becomes the subject of one book account. Bassick Gold Mine Co. v. Beardsley, 33: 852, 112 Pac. 770, —Colo. —.

2. A bequest of a certain fund to be expended in the purchasing of an annuity for the legatee carries interest from the expiration of the period applicable to bequests generally, and not from the death of the testator. Parker v. Cobe, 33: 978, 94 N. E. 476, —Mass. —.

1. Under a statute providing that a sale by one person for another shall be deemed a sale by both, and that both shall be liable, either jointly or severally, a licensed saloon keeper is criminally liable for breach by his servant of a statutory provision that no spirituous liquors shall be sold to a minor, irrespective of whether or not the sale was made without the saloon keeper's knowledge, and against his express instructions. State v. Nichols, 33: 419, 69 S. E. 304, 67 W. Va. 659. (Annotated)

2. Delivery of intoxicating liquors to a minor bell boy in a licensed hotel by the bartender, and receipt of payment therefor at the time, constitute a sale of the liquor to the minor, where there was nothing said at the time of delivery as to whether he was buying for himself or for an undisclosed principal, although the bartender was accustomed to let the bell boy take drinks ordered by the guests of the hotel to their rooms, and thought that the liquor in question was for one of them. *State v. 2. If one of several joint wrongdoers makes settlement with the injured party, and pays him damages which he agrees to receive, and does receive, as full compensation for all damages sustained, it will release all of the joint wrongdoers. Fitzgerald v. Union Stock Yards Co. 33: 983, 131 N. W. 612, —Neb. —.

3. Settlement with one of several joint wrongdoers, and payment of damages, is not a defense to an action against another, unless it was agreed between the parties to the settlement that such payment was in full of all damages suffered. *Fitzgerald v. 1. A tenant of property for a term of years who is to pay a monthly rental and furnish the lessor with the reasonable comforts of life, including room and board, cannot be required upon death of the lessor to pay more than the specified amount during the remainder of the term, although the rental value of the property amounts to such sum plus the value of the room and board. Re Shearn, 33: 347, 114 Pac. 131, — Utah, —. (Annotated)

2. Rent paid in advance cannot be recovered upon accidental destruction of the tenement, although the statute and lease provide that such destruction terminates the lease. Harvey v. Weisbaum, 33: 540, 113 Pac. 656. — Cal. —. (Annotated)

3. Under a statute providing that in case of the total destruction of a leased building, the rent shall be paid up to the time of such destruction, and then and from thenceforth the lease shall cease and come to an end, unless the parties have otherwise stipulated in their agreement of lease, the tenant may, in case of the total destruction of the property without his fault, recover such portion of the instalments of rent as have been paid in advance, as would have been earned after such destruction. *Carley v. 1. An article inquiring into the eligibility for re-election to office of a coroner if he was the one who failed to hold for inquiry a chauffeur who, with his automobile, ran down and killed a child in the street, is not libelous on the chauffeur, although it uses with reference to him such words as "killed a little child" and "mangled little tots," and this is, by innuendo, alleged to have charged him with a crime involving moral turpitude, since the words do not import a felonious intent. Diener v. Star-Chronicle Pub. Co. 33: 216, 132 S. W. 1143, 230 Mo. 613.

Privileged communications.

2. A newspaper article animadverting upon the conduct of a coroner in letting go a chauffeur without inquiry, after he had run down and killed a child, which simply states the facts, without any indication of malice, is privileged so far as the chauffeur is concerned, since it is a matter of interest to the public. Diener v. Star-Chronicle Pub. Co. 33: 216, 132 S. W. 1143, 230 Mo. 613.

3. The publication of a copy of a public record of conditional sales made by a retail merchant is privileged, and will not subject the publishers to a prosecution for criminal libel, although it was unwarranted, and is alleged to have subjected the seller to the hatred of his customers and injured him in his business. State v. Darwin, 33: 1026, 115 Pac. 309, — Wash. —.

4. Although advice by an attorney to a client as to the business integrity of a stranger with whom the client has been dealing is privileged, yet the attorney will be liable for slander if he gives the advice in a public or semipublic place, in a loud voice, and in the hearing of divers persons, and addresses his remarks, not to the client, but to a third person. Kruse v. Rabe (N. J. Err. & App.) 33: 469, 79 Atl. 316, — N. J. —.

5. A communication false in fact, addressed to the general public, imputing the commission of a criminal offense or of a moral delinquency to a public officer in the discharge of his official duties, is not privileged, although made in good faith and on probable cause. Oakes v. State, 33: 207, 54 So. 79, — Miss. —.

6. An osteopath cannot, under a charge of libel in calling him a quack and charlatan, recover damages on the theory that the libel was in fact against osteopathy as a profession, and that he was injured as a member of the profession. Lathrop v. Sundberg, 33: 90, 113 Pac. 574, — Wash.

7. An osteopath practising as a doctor without a license cannot recover damages for libel upon him in his common-law right to do business as an osteopath, since that was not the character in which he was attempting to carry on the business. Lathrop v. Sundberg, 33: 90, 113 Pac. 574, — Wash.

8. An osteopath doing business as a doctor without a license, contrary to statute, cannot recover damages for libel upon him in his professional capacity, since he will not be permitted to recover for loss of earnings which he received by violation of law. Lathrop v. Sundberg, 33: 90, 113 Pac. 574, — Wash. — (Annotated)

Laches.

1. The statute of limitation or laches will not prevent a purchaser of land under general warranty from claiming abatement of purchase money yet unpaid for a part of the land lost to him from superior adverse right. Smith v. Ward, 33: 1030, 66 S. E. 234, 66 W. Va. 190.

When statute runs.

2. The amount which remaindermen may recover for failure of a life tenant to make necessary repairs to the property is not limited to the amount of deterioration of the property within the period of the statute of limitations, since the duty to place the property in repair exists at all times up to the expiration of the tenancy, and the statute begins to run against the liability only at such expiration. Prescott v. Grimes, 33: 669, 136 S. W. 206, 143 Ky. 191.

When action is barred.

3. An action to have persons who have secured a legacy which is apparently absolute, upon promise to hold it for others, declared trustees ex maleficio, is not governed by the statute applicable to the time for beginning actions upon contracts not in writing, either express or implied. Winder v. Scholey, 33: 995, 93 N. E. 1098, 83 Ohio St. 204.

Interruption of statute; removal of bar.

4. An amendment after the completion of the limitation period, of a complaint demurrable for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, is permissible, if the facts stated in the original complaint are sufficient when read in the light of the amendment, to disclose that the amendment is but the perfection of the imperfect statement of the cause of action attempted to be pleaded, and not the statement of a new or different cause of action. Bourdreaux v. Tucson Gas, E. L. & P. Co. 33: 196, 114 Pac. 547, — Ariz. (Annotated)

5. Where the statute makes payments to the record owner of a mortgage binding upon the real owner, a part payment to a mortgagee who has made an unrecorded assignment is sufficient to toll the statute of limitations. Girard Trust Co. v. Owen, 33: 262, 112 Pac. 619, 83 Kan. 692.

(Annotated)

6. The payee of a note, who has assigned it as collateral security, has still such an interest therein that a written acknowledgment made to him by the debtor may serve to toll the statute of limitations. Girard Trust Co. v. Owen, 33: 262, 112 Pac. 619, 83 Kan. 692.

3. A master having furnished a reasonably safe working place to his servant, and the conditions being such that thereafter the servants necessarily are expected to make their own working place, which must change from time to time and at short intervals as the work proceeds, dangers created are not attributable to the master. Knudsen v. La Crosse Stone Co. 33: 223, 130 N. W. 519, 145 Wis. 394.

4. Notice to a mine operator of a defect in the original construction of the cage is not necessary to hold him liable for injury thereby caused to an employee. Poli v. Numa Block Coal Co. 33: 646, 127 N. W. 1105, — Iowa, —.

Sufficiency of evidence to show incompetence of servant, see Evidence, 36.

5. The master should furnish his servants with a reasonably safe place to work, reasonably safe instrumentalities with which to do the work, and the fellow servants provided should be reasonably safe as such; the standard of care as to each duty being such as is exercised by the great mass of mankind under the same or similar circumstances. Knudsen v. La Crosse Stone Co. 33: 223, 130 N. W. 519, 145 Wis. 394.

6. To hold a master liable for injury to a servant through the negligence of an incompetent fellow servant, it is not necessary to show that the bad general reputation of such servant extended to the precise character of negligence which caused the injury. Rosenstiel v. Pittsburg Railways Co. 33: 751, 79 Atl. 556, — Pa. —.

Assumption of risk.

7. An employee in a mine does not assume the risk of injury from the notorious and persistent disregard, by the proprietor, of his statutory duty to maintain a proper cover over the cage in order to protect employees from injury. Poli v. Numa Block Coal Co. 33: 646, 127 N. W. 1105, — Iowa, —.

(Annotated)

Contributory negligence.

8. A miner is not per se negligent in continuing to work in connection with a cage having a defective covering after receiving the employer's promise to repair it as soon as possible, unless the hazard is so great that no reasonably prudent person would expose himself to it. Poli v. Numa Block Coal Co. 33: 646, 127 N. W. 1105, — Iowa, —.

9. A miner is not guilty of contributory negligence by going to work in a room for which the owner has not furnished props in accordance with a statutory duty, which will prevent his holding the latter liable for injuries caused by fall of the roof, unless he could have seen or known by the exercise of ordinary care, that the situation was dangerous and imminently so. Low v. Clear Creek Coal Co. 33: 656, 131 S. W. 1007, 140 Ky. 754.

Fellow servants and their negligence.

Negligence in selection and retention of fellow servants, see supra, 5, 6.

10. Where the place in which a servant is to work necessarily changes from time to time, negligence of one or more of several servants, not excepting the foreman of the crew, rendering the working place of some other servant or servants unsafe, is negligence of a fellow servant, for which the master is not responsible. Knudsen v. La Crosse Stone Co. 33: 223, 130 N. W. 519, 145 Wis. 394.

11. An amendment of a statute making a railroad company liable for injuries to employees through the negligence of fellow servants, and prohibiting any contract which restricts such liability, which provides that no contract for relief or indemnity between the company and its employee shall bar a recovery, does not apply alone to such contracts as restrict the liability of the company. McGuire v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 33: 706, 108 N. W. 902, 131 Iowa, 340.

12. A blaster working with others under a foreman, all constituting a stone-quarry crew, is a fellow servant of such foreman in respect to duties of the latter as to guarding against the working place of those under him being made unsafe by the rolling down from one level to another of earth or rock in the course of quarry work. Knudsen v. La Crosse Stone Co. 33: 223, 130 N. W. 519, 145 Wis. 394.

13. The foreman of a crew erecting a water tank, or removing heavy machinery from a car to a factory, or moving a pile driver, or in charge of a train crew, or the crew of a vessel, or a dock crew, in regard to all the details of the general employment, as regards the safe-place rule, is a fellow servant of the men under him. Knudsen v. La Crosse Stone Co. 33: 223, 130 N. W. 519, 145 Wis. 394.

14. An employee of a mine may rely on the promise of a pit boss who employs and discharges the operatives and has immediate charge of the actual underground operations of the mine, to repair the cover of the cage, made in response to his complaint of its insufficiency. Poli v. Numa Block Coal Co. 33: 646, 127 N. W. 1105, — Iowa, —.

15. Requiring a mine operator to employ only licensed pit bosses does not relieve him from liability for the negligence of his employees so far as it pertains to the performance of the nondelegable duties 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the master. Poli v. Numa Block Coal Co. 33: 646, 127 N. W. 1105, — Iowa, —. Master's liability for acts of servant or independent contractor.

Durgin*, 33: 79, 93 N. E. 801, 207 Mass. 435. (Annotated)

17. A local manager of a telephone company does not act within the scope of his authority in assaulting and beating an employee who is about to leave, to compel her to sign a voucher for the compensation which he alleges to be due to her, and the telephone company is therefore not liable to her for injuries inflicted in that manner. Crelly v. Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. 33: 328, 113 Pac. 386, — Kan. —.

18. The fact that the painting of a municipal bridge was in charge of an independent contractor does not relieve the municipality from liability for injury to his servant through a dangerous electric line maintained by its authority on the bridge, where the contractor did not know the dangers incident to the presence of the line. *Hoppe v. Injunction against enforcement of ordinance, see Injunction, 6.

1. The validity of a provision in a city ordinance expressly authorized by the legislature does not depend upon the expediency or public policy of its enactment, but upon its being within the legislative power of the state. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33: 494, 130 N. W. 545, — Minn. —.

2. In the absence of a delegation thereof by the legislature, express or necessarily implied, a municipal corporation has no power to regulate or control rates for public service, such as the furnishing of water, gas, or electricity, or the terms and conditions of contracts therefor, otherwise than by contract with the corporation or person rendering such service. Bluefield Waterworks & I. Co. v. Bluefield, 33: 759, 70 S. E. 772, — W. Va. —. (Annotated)

3. Authority in a municipal charter to pass all ordinances necessary to the execution of the powers vested in the city, and such as may be deemed necessary and proper to conserve the health, comfort, happiness, and convenience of its inhabitants, and enforce the same by reasonable fines and penalties, does not include power to regulate or control public-service rates and conditions otherwise than by contract, nor to enforce regulations so made by fines or criminal penalties. Bluefield Waterworks & I. Co. v. Bluefield, 33: 759, 70 S. E. 772, — W. Va. —.

4. In the absence of legislative authority, a municipal corporation cannot enforce rates prescribed by it for a public-service corporation by a criminal penalty. Bluefield Waterworks & I. Co. v. Bluefield, 33: 759, 70 S. E. 772, — W. Va. —.

4. The trial court may properly allow an amended bill to be filed, after the evidence taken has developed a state of facts variant from those set up in the original bill, but not constituting a departure, as defined by the courts, nor a new cause of action. Floyd v. Duffy, 33: 883, 69 S. E. 993, 68 W. Va. 339.

Declaration or complaint.

5. A definite charge that the negligence of a street car company in refusing to stop its car when the one in charge of it saw a horse on a road running parallel to its track frightened at the approaching car, and its driver in peril, was the proximate cause of the resulting accident, is not necessary where the accident is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the corporation. Effinger v. Fort Wayne & W. V. Traction Co. 33: 123, 93 N. E. 855, — Ind. —.

5a. A petition, in an action against a municipality for injury on a highway, which alleges that the city had maintained a hydrant about 22 inches high, extending into the sidewalk about 40 inches from the outer edge thereof, and that plaintiff, while exercising due and proper care, and without any fault on his part, stumbled over said hydrant and fell, sustaining injuries, states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the municipality. Oklahoma City v. Reed, 33: 1083, 87 Pac. 645, 17 Okla. 518.

5b. It is not necessary that plaintiff, in an action against a municipality for injury on a defective walk, allege and prove that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. Oklahoma City v. Reed, 33: 1083, 87 Pac. 645, 17 Okla. 518.

What must be pleaded.

6. Whenever failure of consideration is a proper defense in an action of assumpsit upon a negotiable note, it need not be specially pleaded, but may be proved under the general issue. Dollar Sav. & T. Co. v. Crawford, 33: 587, 70 S. E. 1089, — W. Va. —.

murrer, but by motion. Seidler v. Burns, 33: 291, 79 Atl. 53, — Conn. —.

8. A bill which on its face shows want of necessary parties is demurrable. Augir v. Warder, 33: 69, 70 S. E. 719, — W. Va. —.

9. An allegation of fraud is not necessary to enable one accepting an advertised offer of a prize for a correct solution of a problem, to hold the one making the offer responsible therefor in case he refuses to comply therewith, and it may be ignored if made, and will therefore not render demurrable a complaint stating the offer, acceptance, performance of the contract, and refusal of the prize. Minton v. F. G. Smith Piano Co. 33: 305, 36 App. D. C. 137.

10. A demurrer admits an allegation concerning the laws of another state, since such allegation is one of fact. Edwards v. Schillinger, 33: 895, 91 N. E. 1048, 245 Ill. 231.

11. Where some of several joint defendants demur to the plaintiff's petition, and the demurrer goes to the substance of the whole petition and challenges the plaintiff's right to any relief, such demurrer inures to the benefit of all, though some may be in default. Tate v. Goode, 33: 310, 70 S. E. 571, 135 Ga. 738.

1. That a corporation undertaking to furnish electricity and steam heat to inhabitants of a municipal corporation, and securing from the municipality a franchise for that purpose, intends to use only the exhaust steam from the plant which manufactures the electricity, to supply the heat, does not, on the ground that such heat is merely a by-product, and that it could not furnish steam alone without loss, entitle it to deny the right to it to others than users of electricity. Seaton Mountain E. L. H. & P. Co. v. Idaho Springs Invest. Co. 33: 1078, 111 Pac. 834, — Colo.

2. A rule adopted by a corporation organized to supply electric light and steam heat to the inhabitants of a municipal corporation, and which, under a franchise from the municipality, has placed conduits for that purpose in the public streets, to the effect that steam for heat will be supplied only to persons taking electricity from the company, is unreasonable, and cannot be enforced to deprive persons who do not take electricity, of the right to steam. *Seaton Mountain E. Equal protection and privileges as to, see Constitutional Law, 4.

3. An inheritance or succession tax is a tax upon the exercise of the right to transmit property, and is based upon the right of taxation, and not upon the right to regulate the succession of property. Re McKennan, 33: 606, 126 N. W. 611, — S. D. —. (Annotated)

4. A constitutional provision that no tax shall be levied except in pursuance of a law which shall distinctly state the object of the same to which the tax shall be applied has no application to an inheritance or succession tax. Re McKennan, 33: 606, 126 N. W. 611, — S. D. —.

5. Special constitutional authority is not necessary to validate a collateral inheritance tax, where general legislative power has been conferred on the legislature. Rodman v. Com. ex rel. Selligman. 33: 592, 113 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88. (Annotated)

6. Constitutional authority to impose a special or excise tax includes power to levy an inheritance tax. Rodman v. Com.

ex rel. Selligman, 33: 592, 113 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88.

7. A collateral inheritance tax is not upon property, so as to be subject to constitutional provisions governing such taxes, by reason of the fact that it is made a certain per centum on the value of the estate, so that the property pays it. Rodman v. Com. ex rel. Selligman, 33: 592, 113 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88.

8. A succession tax is not placed upon decedent's estate by the fact that the executor is required to pay it, where he is also required to deduct it from the estate passing to the legatee or collateral heir. Rodman v. Com. ex rel. Selligman, 33: 592, 113 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88.

9. A succession tax is not invalid because it applies to inheritances in favor of institutions which are subject to general tax exemption. Rodman v. Com. ex rel. Selligman, 33: 592, 113 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88.

10. A provision of a treaty that the subjects of the contracting parties in the respective states may freely dispose of their goods and effects by testament, and that the heirs shall receive the succession without having occasion to take out letters of naturalization, will prevent a state from imposing any higher inheritance tax upon property devised or bequeathed by one of its citizens to a citizen of the foreign state, than it imposes in case of devises or bequests to its own citizens of the same degree of relationship to the testator under similar circumstances, and it is immaterial that the treaty also provides that the states shall be at liberty to make respecting this matter such laws as they think proper. Re Stixrud, 33: 632, 109 Pac. 343, 58 Wash. 339. (Annotated)

11. A succession tax, not being a tax on property, is not affected by a constitutional provision that all taxes shall be uniform upon all real and personal property according to its value in money. Re McKennan, 33: 606, 126 N. W. 611, — S. D. —.

12. A classification of inheritance taxes according to nearness of relationship of the recipient of the property to decedent, and according to amount received with increased tax as relationship becomes remote, or as the property taken increases in amount, does not violate a constitutional provision that all taxation shall be equal and uniform. Re McKennan, 33: 606, 126 N. W. 611, — S. D. —.

13. The imposition of increased rates of taxation upon the whole amount taken whenever a portion of a decedent's estate taken by a recipient exceeds certain amounts, and not merely upon the excess above the amount fixed, is not unconstitutional as being unequal taxation, although it may result in giving recipients of sums only slightly above the division line a less net estate than would be received by those whose shares were just under the division line. Re McKennan, 33: 606, 126 N. W. 611, — S. D. —.

all laws exempting certain classes of property from taxation has no application to an exemption from a succession tax of property transmitted to a widow and certain heirs, since such tax is not one on property. Re McKennan, 33: 606, 126 N. W. 611, — S. D. —.

15. A collateral inheritance tax does not violate constitutional requirements of uniformity or equality in taxation, although it is a definite per centum upon the amount of the inheritance; nor is it invalid because it may result in discrimination between relatives and strangers. Rodman v. Com. ex rel. Selligman, 33: 592, 113 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88.

16. A sum provided by antenuptial agreement to be paid the wife in case of her surviving the husband, in lieu of all claims and rights which she might otherwise have upon her husband's estate as his widow, is subject to succession tax. People v. Field, 33: 230, 93 N. E. 721, 248 Ill. 147. (Annotated)

17. A provision in a statute imposing a collateral inheritance tax, that the first $500 of every estate shall not be subject to the tax, refers to the estate passing to each recipient, and not to the whole estate of the testator. Rodman v. Com. ex rel. Selligman, 33: 592, 113 S. W. 61, 130 Ky. 88.

18. A constitutional exemption from taxation of property of the state and that devised to religious or charitable purposes does not apply to an inheritance or succession tax upon the transmission of property to the state or a religious body. Re McKennan, 33: 606, 126 N. W. 611, — S. D. —.

TRIAL.Statements and arguments of counsel.

1. It is not error for a trial court to refuse to listen to the reading of authorities upon the argument of a cause. State v. Meyers, 33: 143, 110 Pac. 407, — Or. —.

2. Counsel may be forbidden to read to the jury from law books in arguing a libel cause to them, notwithstanding the Constitution provides that in such suits the jury shall determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court. Oakes v. State, 33: 207, 54 So. 79, — Miss. —.

Objections and exceptions.

3. One does not waive his objection to the incompetency of evidence which has been admitted by the court, by eliciting a repetition of it on cross-examination of the witness. Cathey v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 33: 103, 133 S. W. 417, — Tex. —.

Questions of law and fact.

ion Stock Yards Co. 33: 983, 131 N. W. 612, — Neb. —.

5. An owner of property can be said, as a matter of law, not to give notice within a reasonable time within the meaning of a requirement of a bond insuring the performance of a contract to erect a building, that immediate written notice must be given of any breach of the contract by the contractor, or of any act on his part which might involve a loss for which the surety would be liable, where the undisputed evidence shows that the contract, which was to be completed on March first, was not completed within the time limited, that money paid on the contract price at the request of the contractor, after such date, was used to pay bills on other contracts, that on April 6th suit was brought against the contractor, wherein the owner was garnished by a materialman to recover for materials used in building, that the contractor informed the owner on April 13th that he would like to have further payments made as he was cramped for money, and that notice of the defaults and acts referred to was not given the surety company until April 27th, at about which time the contractor went into bankruptcy, although the owner, on being garnished, had consulted a commercial agency and received a favorable report as to the contractor's solvency. George A. Hormel & Co. v. American Bonding Co. 33: 513, 128 N. W. 12, 112 Minn. 288.

6. Where an attorney uses slanderous words in advising his client as to the business integrity of a stranger with whom the client is dealing, in a public or semi-public place, in a loud voice, and in the hearing of divers persons, and there is no need of either publicity or loud utterances, the question of express malice is for the jury. Kruse v. Rabe (N. J. Err. & App.) 33: 469, 79 Atl. 316, — N. J. —.

7. The court may require the jury to consider only the law given in its charge in a libel suit, notwithstanding the Constitution provides that in such suits the jury shall determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court. Oakes v. State, 33: 207, 54 So. 79, — Miss. —.

(Annotated)

8. The court may determine as matter of law on demurrer that a publication relied on without innuendo to be libelous per se is not so, or that an innuendo seeking to give words of hidden meaning a libelous intent is forced and unnatural, or that an attempt to put a libelous edge on ambiguous words is an unnatural and forced construction, and that therefore no libel is alleged, although the Constitution provides that in libel suits the jury shall, under the direction of the court, determine the law and the facts. Diener v. Star-Chronicle Pub. Co. 33: 216, 132 S. W. 1143, 230 Mo. 613.

9. The court cannot declare that a railroad company is negligent as matter of law in running a train into a station at an unusual speed, which results in striking an animal and throwing it against a person waiting to take a train, to his injury, where there is no limitation, by statute or ordinance, on the speed which trains may maintain. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Woods, 33: 855, 131 S. W. 869, — Ark. —

 Taking case from jury.

10. A general affirmative charge cannot be given where the evidence is in dispute. Seigel v. Long, 33: 1070, 53 So. 753, — Ala. —.

Special interrogatories.

11. Failure of the jury to answer a special interrogatory as to an immaterial fact will not prevent receiving their verdict. Union Depot & R. Co. v. Londoner, 33: 433, 114 Pac. 316, — Colo. —.

Prejudicial error as to, see Appeal and Error, 22-25.

12. Where the substance of an instruction requested by the defendant has been given by the court upon his own motion, he is not required to repeat it because of such request. Schultz v. State, 33: 403, 130 N. W. 972, — Neb. —.

13. Where the plea of a former acquittal is interposed, but no evidence is introduced to support it, it is not improper for the court to decline to instruct the jury on that issue. Hartgraves v. State, 33: 568, 114 Pac. 343, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —.

14. Where there is no evidence upon which to predicate a requested instruction, it is proper for the court to refuse to give it. Schultz v. State, 33: 403, 130 N. W. 972, — Neb. —.

15. In an action to hold a railroad company liable for striking an animal with its train and throwing it against a person waiting at its station to take the train, to his injury, an instruction that railroad companies are required to provide all things necessary to the security of passengers reasonably consistent with their business and appropriate to the means of conveyance employed is abstract and prejudicial. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Woods, 33: 855, 131 S. W. 869, — Ark. —.

16. On trial of a person charged with recklessly driving an automobile at a forbidden speed on a public street, and thereby causing the death of another, the court may define an unlawful rate of speed in the language of the statute regulating the use of motor vehicles upon the public streets and highways. Schultz v. State, 33: 403, 130 N. W. 972, — Neb. —.

Validity.

1. Where a testator executes two separate and distinct wills, one relating solely to property at his domicile, and the other relating solely to property situated in a foreign state or country, both are valid, if executed, attested, and proved in accordance with the laws of the place where the property disposed of is situated. Parnell v. Thompson, 33:658, 105 Pac. 502, 81 Kan. 119.

Testamentary character.

2. A dated and signed memorandum in the handwriting of deceased, found among his belongings on the page of a blank book such as he used in his business, stating that "everything is" his wife's, cannot be probated as his will, although there is evidence that he had made a will, if there is nothing to identify this memorandum as the will referred to. Smith v. Smith, 33:1018, 70 S. E. 491, — Va. —. (Annotated)

What may be disposed of.

3. Real property is included in a provision of a treaty giving a naturalized citizen a right to give by testament his goods and effects in favor of such parties as he thinks proper. Re Stixrud, 33:632, 109 Pac. 343, 58 Wash. 339.

5. A foreign will executed in accordance with local laws and disposing of local property may be admitted to probate where the property is situated, although testator also executed another will disposing of foreign property, which had been probated where that property was located. Parnell 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Thompson, 33:658, 105 Pac. 502, 81 Kan. 119.

Description of beneficiaries; who may take.

6. A devise to the widow of a man who is married at the time the will is made is not limited to the wife then living, but belongs to the one who eventually becomes his widow as the result of death of the wife and remarriage of the man. Meeker v. Draffen, 33:816, 94 N. E. 626, 201 N. Y. 205. (Annotated)

7. Under a bequest in trust to pay the income to testator's children for life, and after the decease of the survivor of them, to distribute the fund to those persons "who may then take the same as my heirs," the persons to take are those who were his heirs at testator's death, and not those who would have been such had he lived until the time of the death of the surviving child; at least, where other clauses of the will creating similar estates indicate that he referred to his real, and not hypothetical, heirs. Welch v. Blanchard, 33:1, 94 N. E. 811, — Mass. —.

(Annotated)

8. A devise of a life estate, with power to bequeath the property upon death of the life tenant to such of testator's heirs as the life tenant may prefer, confines the selection to testator's legal or actual heirs, so that the property may not be given to a descendant of testator, whose parent is living, but the heirs among whom the appointment may be made will be determined as of the time of the death of the life tenant. Wallace v. Diehl, 33:9, 95 N. E. 646, — N. Y. —.

(Annotated)

9. Under a devise to two minors, share and share alike, provided that in case of the death of either, his share shall revert to the other, with power to the executor to convert the real estate and pay the proceeds to the minor's guardian, to be held in trust until each attained majority, "when he shall have his share," the gift takes effect at the testator's death, with a gift over to the survivor upon contingency terminable at the attainment of majority, and all interest of one in the other's share terminates when the latter attains majority. Willits v. Conklin, 33:321, 130 N. W. 757, 88 Neb. 805.

10. The rule that words of limitation shall be applied to the death of the first taker without issue during the life of the testator is extremely technical in its character, and does not apply where there are any indications, however slight, that the testator referred to death subsequent to his own demise. Willits v. Conkl. 33:321, 130 N. W. 757, 88 Neb. 805.

11. The general rule is that the period of time to which survivorship relates depends upon the intention of the testator, rather than upon technical language used in a particular clause in a will. Willits v. Conklin, 33:321, 130 N. W. 757, 88 Neb. 805.

Nature of estate or interest created.

12. A devise to one, "his heirs, viz., his children, grandchildren, and assigns," limits the word "heirs" to the class named, and therefore passes only a life estate to the first taker. Hall v. Hall, 33: 191, 78 Atl. 971, — Vt. — (Annotated)

13. A provision in a will giving money to a testator's granddaughter "if she survives me" is not relieved of the condition by a succeeding clause, "I hereby give and bequeath such sum to her," and therefore the bequest will lapse in case of her death before that of testator. Wallace v. Dienl, 33: 9, 95 N. E. 646, — N. Y. —

Equitable conversion.

14. Where power is given to an executor to convert the real estate into money, and he is directed to pay the proceeds over to the guardians of certain minors during their minority, a court of equity will decree that an equitable conversion of the real estate of the testator took place, and that the estate should be distributed as personal property, in accordance with the terms of the will. *Willits v. Impeaching; discrediting.

4. Upon trial of a prosecution for incest which is defended on the theory that it was an attempt by the prosecuting witness where she had denied admitting such relations, evidence is admissible of such admissions, for the purpose of impeaching her, and showing her relations to such person, and her character generally. Gross v. State, 33: 477, 135 S. W. 373, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —

5. Where, upon a trial for incest, the prosecuting witness denies a statement which has been introduced in evidence, to the effect that she had had illicit relations with other-relatives, accused may introduce evidence to contradict her, for the purpose of showing the unreliability of her testimony and that her claim was fabricated. Gross v. State, 33: 477, 135 S. W. 373, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —

6. The state, having introduced the testimony of the prosecuting witness on a trial for incest, which was defended on the theory that the charge was made to get even with defendant for accusing her of wrongdoing with a suitor, that she was never allowed to be in the company of men unchaperoned, cannot object to the introduction of evidence that she had been seen alone with such person, on the ground that it was an immaterial matter. Gross v. State, 33: 477, 135 S. W. 373, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —

Fees.

7. Physicians employed without an agreement as to compensation, by a plaintiff in an action to recover for personal injuries, to make a personal examination of his condition in order to qualify as experts, and then to attend court to testify as such experts and assist counsel in meeting expert evidence from the other side, may recover from him reasonable compensation for their time, and are not limited to the regular witness fees, where they were not summoned, but appeared voluntarily under the agreement. Gordon v. Conley, 33: 336, 78 Atl. 365, — Me. —

WRIT AND PROCESS.

1. Service of summons by publication and mailing upon a foreign partnership in the partnership name as upon a corporation is not sufficient to give jurisdiction over the partners individually or collectively, at least where the firm name does not contain the full name of either partner. Yarbrough v. Pugh, 33: 351, 114 Pac. 918, — Wash. —

2. Mailing a summons directed to a partnership in which the full name of neither partner appears is not mailing directed to defendant as required by statute, and will therefore not give jurisdiction over the individual partners. Yarbrough v. Pugh, 33: 351, 114 Pac. 918, — Wash. —
